"Never mind, Lady Lundie! I have heard the medical report. Don't trouble yourself to repeat it."

"Don't trouble myself to repeat it?" echoed Lady Lundie—with her dignity up in arms at the mere prospect of finding her opinion disregarded. "Ah, Sir Patrick! that little constitutional impatience of yours!—Oh, dear me! how often you must have been given way to, and how often you must have regretted it, in your time!"

"My dear lady! if you wish to repeat the report, why not say so, in plain words? Don't let me hurry you. Let us have the prognosis, by all means."

Lady Lundie shook her head compassionately, and smiled with angelic sadness. "Our little besetting sins!" she said. "What slaves we are to our little besetting sins! Take a turn in the garden, Sir Patrick."

Any ordinary man would have lost his temper. But the low (as Sir Patrick had told his niece) has a special temper of its own. Without exhibiting the smallest irritation, Sir Patrick dex-trously applied his sister-in-law's blister to his sister-in-law herself.

"What an eye you have!" he said. "I was impatient. I was impatient. I am dying to know what Blanche said to you when she got better?"

The British Matron froze up into a matron of stone on the spot.

"Nothing!" answered her ladyship, with a vicious snap of her teeth, as if she had tried to bite the word before it escaped her.

"Nothing!" exclaimed Sir Patrick.

"Nothing," repeated Lady Lundie, with her most formidable emphasis of look and tone. He applied all the remedies with my own hands: I ear her faces with my own scissors: I completely wetted her head through with cold water; I remained with her until she was quite exhausted; I took her in my arms, and folded her to my bosom; I sent every body out of the room, I said, 'Dear child, confide in me.' And how were my advances—my motherly advances—met? I have already told you. By heartless secrecy. By unfeminine silence."

Sir Patrick pressed the blister a little closer to the skin. "She was probably afraid to speak," he said.

"Afraid? Oh!" cried Lady Lundie, distracting the attention of her own nerves. "Do you not have said that? I have evidently misapprehended you. You didn't really say, afraid?"

"I did say so probably," he answered.

"Stop! I can't be told to my face that I have failed to do my duty by Blanche. Sir Patrick! I can bear a great deal; but I can't bear that. After having been more than a mother to your dear brother's child; after having been an elder sister to Blanche; after having toiled—I say toiled, Sir Patrick!—to cultivate her intelligence (with the sweet lines of the poet ever present to my memory: 'Delightful task to rear the tender mind, and teach the young idea how to shoot!'); after having done all I have done—a place in the carriage overlooking the vista into the most interesting relic of feudal times in Perthshire—after having sacrificed all I have sacrificed, to be told that I have been such a man ner to Blanche as to frighten her when I ask her to confide in me, is a little too cruel. I have a sensitive—an unduly sensitive nature, dear Sir Patrick. Forgive me for wincing when I am wounded. Forgive me for feeling it when the wound is dealt me by a person whom I re vere."

Her ladyship put her handkerchief to her eyes. Any other man would have taken off the blister. Sir Patrick pressed it closer than ever.

"You quite mistake me," he replied. "I meant that Blanche was afraid to tell you the true cause of her illness. The true cause was the letter about Miss Silvester."

Lady Lundie emitted another scream—a loud scream this time—and closed her eyes in horror.

"I can run out of the house," cried her ladyship, wildly, "I can fly to the uttermost corners of the earth; but I can no' hear that person's name mentioned! No, Sir Patrick! not in my presence! not in my house! not while I am mistress at Windygates House!"

"I am sorry to say that Miss Silvester is disagreeable to you, Lady Lundie. But the nature of my errand here obliges me to touch—as lightly as possible—on something which has a connection in your house without your knowledge."

Lady Lundie suddenly opened her eyes, and became the picture of attention. A casual observer might have supposed her ladyship to be not wholly inaccessible to the vulgar emotion of curiosity.

"A visitor came to Windygates yesterday, while we were all at lunch," proceeded Sir Patrick. "She—"

Lady Lundie seized the scarlet memorandum-book, and stopped her brother-in-law, before he could get any further. Her ladyship's trembling words escaped her lips spasmodically, like words let at intervals out of a trap.

"I undertake—as a woman accustomed to self-restraint, Sir Patrick—I undertake to control myself, on one condition. I won't have the name mentioned. I won't have the matter mentioned. Say, 'The Person,' if you please. 'The Person,'" continued Lady Lundie, writing in the memorandum-book and taking up her pen, "committed an audacious invasion of my premises yesterday?"

Sir Patrick bowed. Her ladyship made a note—apparently some item connected with the paper viciously—and then proceeded to examine her brother-in-law, in the capacity of witness.

"What has left my house still 'The Person' invade? He very careful, Sir Patrick! I propose to place myself under the protection of the justice of the peace; and this is a memorandum of my statement. The library—did I understand you to say? Just so—the library."

"Add," said Sir Patrick, with another pressure on the blister, "that The Person had an interview with Blanche in the library."

Lady Lundie's pen suddenly stuck in the paper, and scattered a little shower of ink-drops round it. "The library," repeated her ladyship, in a voice suggestive of approaching suffocation. "I undertake to control myself, Sir Patrick! Any thing missing from the library?"

"Nothing missing, Lady Lundie, but The Person herself. She—"

"No, Sir Patrick! I won't have it! In the name of my own sex, I won't have it!"

"Pray pardon me—I forgot that 'she' was a prohibited pronoun on the present occasion. The Person has written a farewell letter to Blanche, and has gone nobody knows where. The distress produced by these events is done unspeakable for what has happened to Blanche this morning. If you hear that in mind—and if you remember what your own opinion is of Miss Silvester—you will understand why Blanche hesitated to admit you into her confidence."

There he waited for a reply. Lady Lundie was too deeply absorbed in completing her memorandum to be conscious of his presence in the room.

"Carriage to be at the door at two-thirty," said Lady Lundie, repeating the final words of the memorandum while she wrote them. "In quiet for the nearest justice of the peace, and place the privacy of Windygates under the protection of the law.—I beg your pardon!" exclaimed her ladyship, becoming conscious again of Sir Patrick's presence. "Have I missed any thing particularly painful? Pray mention it if I have."

"You have missed nothing of the slightest importance," returned Sir Patrick. "I have placed you in possession of facts which you had a right to know; and we have now only to return to my unfortunate friend's room, and leave him. You were about to favor me, I think, with the Prognosis?"

"Diagnosis!" said her ladyship, spitefully. "I had forgotten at the time—I remember now, Prognosis is entirely wrong."

"I sit corrected, Lady Lundie. Diagnosis."

"You have informed me, Sir Patrick, that you were already acquainted with the Diagnosis. It is quite needless for me to repeat it now."

"I was anxious to correct you in my impression, my dear lady, by comparing it with yours."

"You are very good. You are a learned man. I am only a most ignorant woman. Your impression can not possibly require correcting by mine."

"My impression, Lady Lundie, was that our friend recommended moral, rather than medical treatment for Blanche. If we can lay her thoughts from the painful subject on which they are now dwelling, all that is to be done is done. Those were his own words, as I remember them. Do you confirm me?"

"I am not prepared to dispute with you, Sir Patrick! You are a master of refined irony, I know. I am afraid it is beyond me to cope with you."

(The low kept its wonderful temper! The law met the most exasperating of living women with the most provoking politeness, by comparing all its own!)

"Of profound deference for your opinion," answered Sir Patrick. "Strictly speaking, no doubt, the serious responsibility of the case rests I am Blanche's guardian—"

"And I," interposed Lady Lundie, with a perfect explosion of pious fervor.

"I hear an outburst of devout thankfulness, reminding me that I have left Blanche in a suspressing—let me say—some little doubt, on your part, as to the conduct of managing Blanche successfully, under present circumstances?"

Lady Lundie's temper began to give way again—and this time it was not to be reinstated.

"If you are to take it," she said, "as expressing my conviction that I saddled myself with the charge of an incorrigibly heartless, obstinate, and perverse girl, when I undertook the care of Blanche."

"Did you say 'incorrigibly?'"

"I said 'incorrigibly!'"

"If the case is as hopeless as that, my dear Madam—as Blanche's guardian, I feel that it is my duty to relieve you of the charge of Blanche."

"Nobody shall relieve me of a duty that I have undertaken!" retorted Lady Lundie. "Not if I die at my post!"

"Supposing it were consistent with your duty," pleaded Sir Patrick, "to be relieved at your post? Suppose it was in harmony with that 'self-sacrifice' which is the pride of women?"

"I don't understand you, Sir Patrick. Be so good as to explain yourself."

Sir Patrick assumed a new character—the character of a hesitating man. He cast a look of timid entreaty at his sister-in-law, sighed, and shook his head.

"No!" he said. "It would be asking too much. Even with your high standard of duty, it would be asking too much."

"Am I to understand, you can ask me in the name of duty is too much."

"No! no! Let me remind you. Human nature has its weaknesses."

"A Christian gentlewoman's sense of duty knows none."

"Oh, surely yes!"

"Sir Patrick! after what I have just said, your good sense must tell you that I am incapable of something like an insult!"

"Don't say that. Let me put a case. Let us suppose the future interests of another person to depend on your saying, Yes—when all your own motives and feelings urge you irresistibly to say, No. Do you really mean to tell me that you could resolutely say, No, under those circumstances, if it could be shown that the purely abstract consideration of duty was involved in the sacrifice?"

"Yes!" cried Lady Lundie, mounting the pedestal of her virtues on the spot. "Yes—without a moment's hesitation!"

"I sit corrected, Lady Lundie. You embolden me to proceed. Allow me to ask (after what I have just heard)—whether it is not your duty to act on advice given for Blanche's benefit, by one of the highest medical authorities in England?"

Her ladyship admitted that it was her duty; mounting a more favorable pedestal for overmastering her brother-in-law.

"Very good," pursued Sir Patrick. "Assuming that Blanche is like most other human beings, and has some prospect of happiness to contemplate, if she could only be made to see it—are we not bound to make her see it, by every moral obligation to act on the medical advice?" He cast a courteously-persuasive look at her ladyship, and paused in the most innocent manner for a reply.

Lady Lundie had not been bent—thanks to the irritation fomented by her brother-in-law—on disputing the ground with him, inch by inch, she must have seen again, by this time, of the snare that was being set for her. As it was, she saw nothing but the opportunity of disparaging Blanche and contradicting Sir Patrick.

"If my step-daughter had any such prospect as you describe," she answered, "I should of course say, Yes. But Blanche's is an ill-regulated mind. An ill-regulated mind has no prospect of happiness."

"Pardon me," said Sir Patrick. "Blanche has a prospect of happiness. In other words, Blanche has a prospect of being married. And, what is more, Arnold Brinkworth is ready to marry her, in spite of every thing that has happened."

Lady Lundie started in her chair—turned crimson with rage—and opened her lips to say, No. Sir Patrick rose to his feet, and went on before she could utter a word.

"I am glad to have you, Lady Lundie—by means which you have just acknowledged it to be your duty to accept—of all further charge of an incorrigible girl. As Blanche's guardian, I have the honor of proposing that her marriage be advanced to the day after another name can be put forthright of the ensuing month."

To those words he closed the trap which he had set for his sister-in-law, and waited to see what came of it.

A thoroughly spiteful woman, thoroughly aroused, is capable of subordinating every other consideration to the one imperative necessity of wreaking her vengeance. There was but one way now of tarring the tables on Sir Patrick—and Lady Lundie took it. The low was, for the last moment, so intensely, that not even the assertion of her own obstinate will promised her the means of a successful contradiction, by comparison with the priceless enjoyment of beating her brother-in-law on his own weapons.

"My dear Sir Patrick!" she said, with a little silvery laugh, "you have wasted much precious time and much eloquent words in trying to persuade me into giving my consent, when you might have had it for the asking. I think the idea of hastening Blanche's marriage an excellent one. I am charmed to transfer the charge of such a person to any man who is fool enough to undertake it—and wise enough to be blind to the unfeminine nature of the willful girl, when I undertook the care of Blanche."

"Bless'd be that elder sister!" he exclaimed, in a parody of Lady Lundie's own favorite quotation. "Bless'd be that elder sister!"

CROSSING BROADWAY.—DRAWN BY SOL. EYTINGE.—[SEE PAGE 171.]

DR. LIVINGSTONE.

We give this week the portrait of the celebrated African traveler, Dr. LIVINGSTONE, a report of whose death by a tribe of savages is again in circulation. The report comes from Captain the Hon. EARNEST COCHRANE, commanding the British ship of war Petrel, on the west coast of Africa, who wrote as follows to a friend in England:

"ZANZIBAR, 9, 1870.

"MY DEAR SIR,—A few lines to tell you Dr. LIVINGSTONE has been killed and burned by the natives twenty days' journey from the Congo. He passed through a native town, and was three days on his journey when the king of the town died. The natives declared LIVINGSTONE had bewitched him, and after he was dead him he had stirred their king, and he must die.—They then killed him and burned him. This news comes by a Portuguese trader traveling that way. LIVINGSTONE was on the lakes at the head of the Congo, making his way to the Congo, where he was going to come out. I believe this news to be true."

SIR RODERICK MURCHISON, who, as our readers will remember, stoutly maintained the falsity of former reports concerning DR. LIVINGSTONE'S death, comes forward with a strong argument against the truth of the Portuguese trader's story. The grounds of his disbelief are stated as follows:

"LIVINGSTONE wrote from Ujiji on the 30th of May, 1869, to Zanzibar, requesting to be supplied with a number of boatmen and goods to enable him to proceed to the north of Lake Tanganyika, and, as he expressed it, 'to connect the sources I have discovered with the Nile of SPEKE and BAKER.' Dr. KIRK, in his dispatch to Lord CLARENDON of the 2d of October, 1869, states that he would lose no time in procuring and sending the supplies demanded. Granted that these requirements were forwarded in a week or two from that date, they could not have reached LIVINGSTONE before the middle of December, as it takes two months to communicate between Zanzibar and Ujiji. How, then, can LIVINGSTONE have had time to organize his expedition to proceed to the northern end of Tanganyika, and then round it to the as yet unknown lakes at the head of the Congo, by the date required to verify this new rumor of his death? For the death, as will be perceived, must have happened ninety days before the news reached the Portuguese settlements on the West Coast. Even on the incredible supposition that LIVINGSTONE started alone, and destitute as he then was at Ujiji, without waiting for the men and supplies he had written for, there would not have been time for him to have penetrated the totally unexplored and extensive region lying between Ujiji and the head waters of the Congo."

SIR RODERICK'S argument is further supported by a letter from the Doctor's brother, the English Consul at Fernando Po, who writes as follows to a daughter of the distinguished traveler:

"I had a note from Mr. VARNHAGEN, our Consul-elect at Loanda, which shows that the mendacious Portuguese are not all dead yet. It was accompanied by a letter from a Portuguese traveler to the interior, who had just returned, and given some impressions the news of DR. LIVINGSTONE'S death when he visited the Cazembe's encampment in 1868, though he knew the fact, of which your father was not aware, that he had to drink the message, and was cut to pieces by the natives, as none of the poison showed that it had taken effect on him. Poor VARNHAGEN has sent this letter to the Foreign Office, as he thinks it leaves but little room for doubt as to the fate of Dr. LIVINGSTONE. If the natives told our Portuguese this yarn in June, 1868, it would appear that your father managed somehow to put all his pieces together again. I have written to VARNHAGEN that the message and cutting-to-pieces part of this yarn come out of the two calabashes of cacolo (drink made of honey) with much secrecy," says VARNHAGEN, 'the natives told me, and suspected that Dr. LIVINGSTONE was a great fetich man. He

DOCTOR LIVINGSTONE, THE AFRICAN TRAVELER.

THE RECENT TROUBLES IN PARIS—ATTACK ON THE BARRICADES AT BELLEVILLE, FEBRUARY 7.—[SEE PAGE 167.]

SOURCES OF THE NILE
ALBERT N'YANZA
LAKE
EQUATOR
VICTORIA N'YANZA
KILIMANJARO
Mt. KENIA
Mt. KENIA
Mt. KILIMANJARO
Mt. ELGON
Mt. ELGON
Mt. KENIA
Mt. KILIMANJARO

while a bright blush came into her pale cheek, and her eyes shone, as she looked at Veronica, with bashful candor.

"Is it really such good news? He is a man of no family, and—"

"Veronica! Do you speak seriously? He comes of honest people, I am glad to say. But if he did not, he is he. And that is enough for me."

"You never cared about your own ancestry. But then, Mr. Lockwood is quite poor."

"Not poorer than I am," said Maud. The next instant she feared that the words might be taken as a complaint or a reproach to Veronica, and she added, quickly, "I never expected riches. I always knew that I should be poor. I had no right to look for wealth, and, as you said yourself, I do not covet it."

"No; not wealth, perhaps. But look here, Maudie; I shall come and put myself at your feet as I used to do. I can talk to you better so. It will seem like old times, will it not?"

But the gulf that divided the old times from the new was forcibly brought to Maud's mind by the fact that Lady Gale cautiously fastened the door that led into her bedroom, where her maid was waiting, lest the woman should enter the drawing-room and surprise her mistress in that undignified posture. Further, Maud observed that Veronica, by sitting at the end of her feet, was not compelled to meet her eyes, as she had done when they had conversed together before.

Veronica's rich draperies flowed over the dingy carpet as she placed herself on the foot-stool, and her head resting against Maud's knees. Maud timidly touched the glossy coils of hair that lay on her lap. And her pale, pure face shone above them like a white star at twilight.

"Now, Maudie," said Veronica, in a low voice, that had something constrained in its sound, "I don't want to speak of that man yet. You got my letter—thanks to little Flew, poor little fellow!—although I did not get your answer. You know the contents of that letter. They expressed my genuine feeling at the time. Beyond having left Shipley without papa's knowledge, I confess that I have behaved like a coward myself with."

Maud gave a little sigh, but said nothing.

The sigh or the silence, or both, annoyed Veronica; for she proceeded, with some irritation of manner: "I do not intend to be reproached by others. Evil and trouble came truly, but they were none of my making. I was the victim and the sufferer. I was entitled to sympathy, if ever woman was. But throughout I kept one object in view, and I have achieved it. I shall be replaced in my proper position in the world—in a position far higher, indeed, than any one could have prophesied for me."

All this was inexpressibly painful to Maud. Instead of the trembling gratitude that her reticence from obloquy; instead of the ingenuous confession of her own faults, and the acknowledgment of unmerited good fortune which she had expected to find in Veronica, there was a hard and vindictive tone of mind that betrayed itself in the words, and the nature of it, barren of good things. Maud was very young; she had her share of the weakness in judgment that belongs to youth. But, besides that, she had a quality by no means so common in the world as genius—a single-minded candor and simplicity of soul, which led her to accept words at their standard dictionary value. She made allowance for the depreciation of currency, but credited the bank whence such notes were issued with a certain sum of metal exactly equivalent to that expressed by the symbol.

That Veronica, in speaking as she did, was fighting against conscience, and striving to drown the voice of self-reproach, never occurred to Maud Desmond. She was grieved and disappointed. She dared not trust herself to speak; and it was the strength of her conscientious purpose effected that made Veronica's speech so painful.

Veronica continued: "You must not think that I mean to be unmindful of you, Maud, in my prosperity. I know that in a measure I may be said to have deprived you of a fortune, although, had it not been to injure and cut me to the quick, that fortune would never have been bequeathed to you."

Veronica! I implore you not to speak of that odious money! I had no thought of it. Practice, no desire for it. For Heaven's sake let us be silent on that score!"

"No," returned Veronica, raising herself a little on her elbow as she spoke, and looking up at the other girl, with cheeks that kept up a deeper flush beneath the false color that tinged them: "No, Maud, I can not consent to be silent. I have made up my mind that you shall have a handsome dowry. It should have been a really splendid one if all the money had come to me. As it is, I dare say Mr. Lockwood will be."

Maud put her trembling hand on Veronica's lips. "Oh, pray, pray," she said, "do not speak of it! Dear Veronica, it is impossible! It can never be!"

Veronica removed her arm from Maud's knee, a dark frown knitted her brows for an instant, but almost immediately she said, lightly, as she rose from the floor: "Oh, Maudie, Maudie, what a tragedy face! Don't be childish, Maudie. I say it must be. I shall not speak to you on the subject. Mr. Lockwood will doubtless be more reasonable."

"I do not dream of it! You do not know him."

"I am not in love with him," retorted Veronica, smiling disdainfully; "but that is quite another thing!"

However, she suddenly resolved to say no more on the subject to Maud. She had formed a scheme in her head. She could not quite forget Hugh's old admiration for herself, and she meant to seek an interview with him. She would do no wrong to Maud, even if Hugh were to put aside for a few moments the perfectness of his allegiance. But—she would like to assert her personal influence. She wished him to bend his still-necked pride before the power of her beauty and the charm of her manner. And in so wishing, she declared to herself that her main object was to be generous to Maud, and to give her a marriage portion.

"Maudie, let my maid take your hat and cloak. This room is warm. We must have some tea together," she said, going toward the door of her bedroom, and ringing the bell.

"No, Veronica, I can not stay. And pray don't call any one. I could take off my hat and cloak myself, if need were."

"You can not stay? Oh, Maud!"

"Hugh will be here for me at nine o'clock. And I promised to be ready."

"He is a bit of tyrant, then, your Hugh?" Maud shook her head and smiled faintly.

"Do you love him very much, white owl?"

The old petting epithet, coming from oneness from her lips, touched a chord in Veronica's heart which had hitherto remained dumb. She went into tears, and sobbed upon Maud's neck. Her arms around her, and sobbed upon her neck. Maud was thankful to see those tears flow. For some time neither of the girls said a word. Then Maud began to speak of Hugh: to say how good he was, how true, how noble, how unselfish—and how dearly she loved him. And then—still holding Veronica's head against her breast—she spoke of the voice, the music, the Shipley days, and what news she could of all that had passed in her old home since she left it. She tried, with every innocent wile she could think of, to lead Veronica's thoughts back to the days of her childhood and girlhood. But Veronica was cold to every far away.

"I shall never see the old place again, Maudie. Never, never! But, dear white owl, I have something to tell you. I—I—how shall I begin? I found Mrs. Naples' address in my mother's side.

"Was she good to you? Did you like her, dear?"

"It isn't my fault, it is the fault of your stupid English language, if I was unable to convey to you at once that my relative is—is cagine, not cognine. Don't look so amazed."

I didn't mean to be amazed, dear Veronica."

"Well, this cousin—Cesare his name is—is a Principe de' Barletti. Barletti, you know, was mamma's name. And he is a good fellow, and a real friend of mine, and—I mean to marry him, by-and-by."

"To marry him?"

"Yes."

"And—and he is good, you say? and you really love him, dear?"

"Oh yes; I—I love him, of course. And he is devoted to me. We have talked speak of arrangement as yet; because—you do not need to be told why. But I shall assuredly be Princess de Barletti, Maud."

Maud's mind was in such a chaos of astonishment that she could hardly speak. It all seemed incredible. But she clung to the only hopeful point she could discern, and repeated once more, "He is good, and you really love him, Veronica?"

"I tell you there is nothing in the world he could not do for me," said Veronica, a little angrily.

Her soft mood was wearing away. Maud did not show herself sufficiently delighted; by no means sufficiently impressed. Astonished she was, truly. But not pleased in the right sense.

"And—and is he in Naples now, your cousin?"

"In Naples!" still more sharply. "Certainly not. He is here.

"Oh! I did not know it. I had not heard of it, Veronica."

"I had no other male relative to whom I could look for due protection and support," said Veronica, with some bitterness.

At this moment the servant appeared, saying that Miss Desmond was waited for.

"I must go, dear. Indeed I must," said Maud, springing up. "And I have not said half that I wanted to say to you. I will write. I will not stay now, if you say so."

Veronica dismissed the servant, who was lingering near the door, and bade him say that Miss Desmond would become immediate. Then she kissed and embraced Maud, and told her that a visit to the care of Mr. Simpson would always find her.

"God bless you, Maudie! Thank you for coming. Don't mind Hugh. He is a dear, but a tyrant! Can not be be kept waiting for a moment?"

"Good-by, dear Veronica. Think of what I have said about Uncle Charles! If you would but try to do that matrimony so as to make it a complete university. He has already expended half a million of dollars on the Theological Seminary, and it is estimated that a million more will be necessary to accomplish the erection of a suitable edifice. If this enterprise is completed as the undersigned proposes, will have a first-class university, the gift of one man.

Rev. Dr. Osgood, who has recently returned from Europe, gives some interesting statements regarding the exposure of adulterated wines, now found in the cities of Europe. In Rome you can ride any where in the city with a friend a single course for sixteen cents. In London you can have a cab for a mile for twenty-five cents, and for greater distances at reduced rates. In Berlin a cab for twenty minutes costs twelve cents, and for half an hour seventeen cents; longer rides are in the same proportion. In a good vehicle, with two seats, in forty-five cents an hour by day, and sixty cents at night. In a few cases extra charges for baggage, and about ten per cent. less if you take the vehicle in the public street, instead of ordering it at the stable. In Switzerland you can have a man and horse, or mule, a day for two dollars or two and a half, even in places where travelers are numerous; and in Germany seventy cents, or a German dollar, is thought fair pay for an intelligent guide in the city or country. In Venice, Florence, and Rome, a dollar secures a well-informed guide. Why can not New York have similar convenient and economical arrangements both for strangers and for citizens?

Touch children to love the beautiful. Let them cultivate flowers in garden or house; allow them to have pretty pictures, and to decorate their rooms with their childish fancies; point out the fine sunrise or sunset, the beautiful hills, mountain, or landscape. Children are easily impressed, and a love of the beautiful in them will make them unconsciously more lovable and beautiful.

Madame De Catacazy, wife of the Russian Ambassador, is reported to be a woman of remarkable beauty. Her complexion is wonderfully clear, her form is perfect, and her manners courtly and elegant. But her crowning glory is her wealth of golden hair, which all admit to be natural in color and quantity, and which is of that rare shade about which poets and painters rave.

Napoleon III. visited Bordeaux about seventeen years ago, at which time he was received by the Prefect of the Department, a tall, powerful-built man, beside whom the Emperor himself made but a insignificant personal appearance. Side by side they drove through the city. "Prefet," said Napoleon, "the crowds seem to regard their Prefect, and forget their Emperor." "Sire," was the courtly reply, "when a regiment is marching, the crowd is more interested in the drum-major; but it is not to be concluded they forget the general in command." The Prefect afterward became Minister.

Not long ago a newly-married couple from the country established themselves at a fashionable hotel in one of the Western cities, for the purpose of "seeing the sights." The lady was young and pretty, the husband honest and verdant. The pair had been in the hotel some twenty-four hours, when the strangers walked up to the clerk and remarked: "That's my wife standing by the door, sir."

"Yes, I suppose so," was the bland reply of the clerk.

"Well, I thought I'd mention it," continued the man, "as you might think it strange in my compelling. I never like to deceive folk, you know; but we're kind of bothered. We've only been here since yesterday, and my wife has been trying to get me three times, and to go to the minstrels' shows likewise; and just now a sleek-looking chap knocked at the door and wanted to know if she was alone, and another scoundrel asked me if I wanted to have her on the string had gone.' I've no doubt these young men mean well enough, but they are too dogoned polite for me."

The poor fellow was assured that the "well-meaning" young men should not annoy him any further with their politeness, and he retired apparently much relieved.

Horse-meat has been used for food in Prussia for a year and a half, and it has been decided that it is wholesome. It sells for about half the price of beef under the market. It may be more than that here, but we fancy many will continue to patronize the beef and pay more.

Madame Emile Olivier is twenty years old, but does not appear to be more than sixteen. She recently dined at the Tuileries, and sat next to the curate of conversation to relate to the Emperor the history of her marriage. It seems that when young M. Emile Olivier saw one to the same waters, in the Vosges, to which her family frequently resorted. The young man's parents refused deputy made some impressions on the young girl, but he did not seem to think of her. For the first year he was not even in love with her. In the second year it appeared as if she had grown a little; and in the third year she had attained "to the stature of his heart," and the marriage took place.

Water-proof dress goods will doubtless soon be made beautiful as well as useful. By a German invention the ordinary cotton goods can be supplanted by cloths of bright colors. To effect this the fabrics are first dyed with alizarine, which is fixed upon the cloth, so as to form, when dried, a proper surface for taking the colors, the succeeding processes being those of ordinary dyeing.

Liszt has a young protégé at Rome, a boy pianist, of whom Liszt predicts great things. He is the son of an Italian literary man, of strong republican views.

A singular incident is mentioned in a German newspaper as having occurred at a marriage service before the civil authorities in Algiers. The consent of the mother of the bride was required, and the official asked if she was present. Mr. Jones's wife answered "Yes." The mayor looked up and saw a tall soldier before him. "That is well," he said; "the mother must be here—her consent and signature are necessary." To the astonishment of all present, the soldier approached the mayor with a necklace, related in military fashion, and said, "You ask for the mother of the bride; I am standing before you." "Yes, well, Sir," replied the mayor; "then stand back. I can take no proceedings. I must see the mother, I tell you!" "And I repeat," rejoined the soldier, "that she stands before you. I am Mrs. Jones. I have been thirty-six years in the service: I have been through several campaigns, and obtained the rank of corporal; here are my papers." The proposition to wear uniform, and my nomination as sergeant-major." The mayor carefully examined the documents, and found them perfectly correct, and consented the marriage. The bride and bride and the mother blessing them so fervently with her deep bass voice that all present were more startled than touched.

Professor Halford, of the University of Melbourne, Australia, has found an antidote for snake poisons, which has proved successful in the most critical cases. It is simply liquid ammonia injected into the veins. A small syringe with a sharp point, for the purpose of making the injection, is manufactured and sold in Melbourne, and now few travel in the country without one. Some time ago, Professor Halford, in making experiments, allowed himself to be bitten by a snake, and nearly lost his life, because he was unable to counteract the effects of the poison. But his theories, preserved in his experiments, and now is rewarded with success.

THE LATE ANSON BURLINGAME.

We give on this page the portrait of Mr. ANSON BURLINGAME, Chinese Envoy to the United States and the European Powers, who died at St. Petersburg, Russia, on the 23d of February, after an illness of only four days. He was born in New Berlin, Chenango County, New York, November 14, 1822, and at the time of his death was in the forty-eighth year of his age. His youth was chiefly spent on the Western frontier. At one time he was actively engaged with surveying parties, and at another participating in the making of Indian treaties far beyond the confines of civilization. He laid the foundation of his education at the Branch University of Michigan; but, removing to Massachusetts, he entered Harvard University, where he received a degree in 1846. He afterward studied and practiced law in Boston, and married the daughter of ISAAC LIVERMORE, of Cambridge. In 1852 he was elected to the State Senate, and was a member of the Convention for revising the Constitution of Massachusetts. He was elected in 1854 a Representative in the XXXIVth Congress, re-elected to the XXXVth and XXXVIth, serving therein on the Committee of Foreign Affairs. In 1861 he was appointed by President LINCOLN Minister to Austria, and subsequently to China. The latter position he held until 1867, when he accepted a diplomatic appointment from China to the United States and the European Powers.

Mr. BURLINGAME first acquired a national reputation in 1856, when his scathing denunciation of PRESTON S. BROOKS for the perpetration of the assault upon Senator SUMNER drew forth a challenge from BROOKS, which he promptly accepted, proposing to go to Canada and fight it out over the border with rifles. Mr. BROOKS refused to accept these conditions, on the plea that he apprehended violence in making the trip through the Northern States; and both parties were arrested by the authorities. The affair created great excitement at the time, and Mr. BURLINGAME was the hero of the hour at the North.

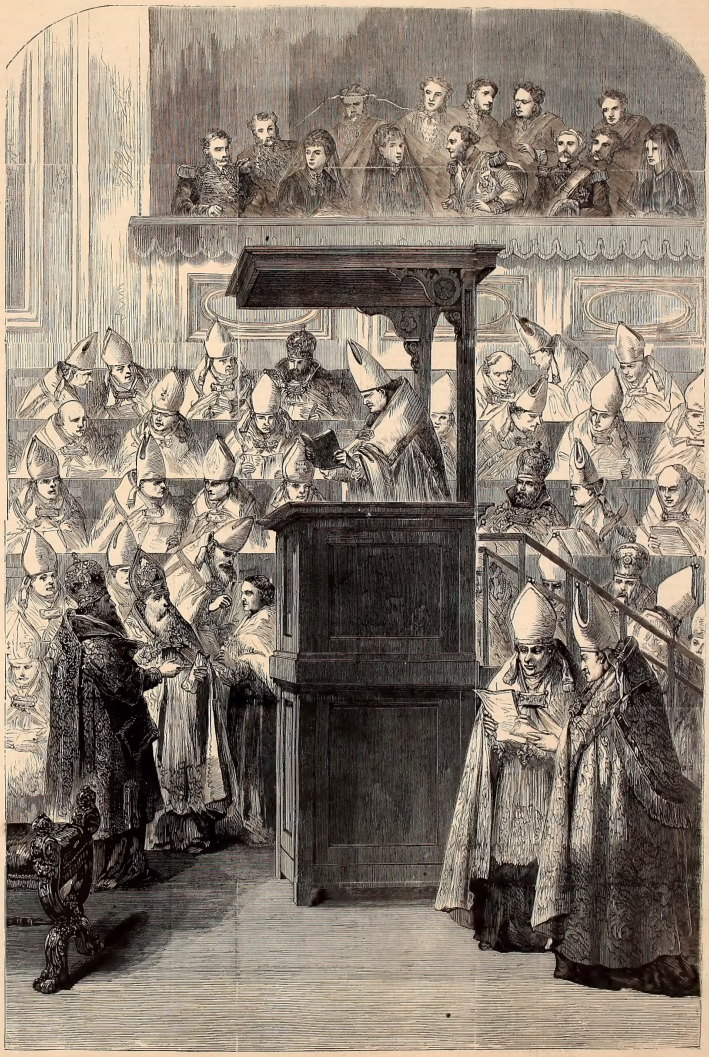
Toward the close of the year 1867 Mr. BURLINGAME undertook a mission from China to the rest of the civilized world; and in March of the following year he arrived in this country with the Chinese embassy, and was every where enthusiastically received. Here he negotiated additional articles to the treaty of 1858 between the United States and China; and in the autumn of the same year he went with the embassy to Europe. He and his associates were at first received with a great deal of ridicule by the English press, as having no definite mission to perform; but he succeeded in establishing a much more friendly understanding between the two governments of Britain and China than previously existed; and before his departure from England the tone of hostile criticism was exchanged for that of warm eulogy and appreciation. Subsequently the mission visited France and Prussia, and a short time since went to St. Petersburg. There Mr. BURLINGAME took a severe cold, which settled into congestion of the lungs, and resulted in his death. His decease is undoubtedly a serious loss, not to China alone, but to other countries with whom he was bringing that vast empire into close relations.

THE LATE ANSON BURLINGAME.

READING THE COUNCIL DECREES.

OUR illustration on page 173 represents the Secretary of the Œcumenical Council in the act of formally reading out the decrees of the Council at a plenary session in the Council Hall. This hall is situated in the north transept of St. Peter's Cathedral, having an altar erected at one end of it, and a throne for the Pope at the other end. Another and lower seat for the Pope, to be occupied by him during his attendance with the Council at mass, is placed a little in front of the altar. This seat is partly shown to the left hand in our engraving, which looks directly across the hall, toward the benches of the bishops and toward the gallery of the foreign embassadors and ladies, immediately above the bishops, so that the altar, farther to the right hand, is not seen from this point of view, within the compass of the artist's sketch. The most conspicuous object here at this moment is a portable wooden pulpit, which is brought into the Council Hall upon certain occasions, for the solemn promulgation of its transactions. The Pope, though not visible in our engraving, must be supposed to be present on his throne, far to the left hand, and the Secretary of the Council turns his face toward the Pope while reading the decrees. All the prelates of the Council wear their mitres upon this occasion, being in the exercise of their deliberative and legislative authority; but their mitres are laid aside, of course, when engaged in religious worship. The splendidly-attired Church dignitary to the left, with a gorgeous stole hanging over his shoulders in front and behind, and with an expanding, dome-shaped head-dress, surmounted by a beveled cross, is one of the Oriental bishops.

THE BAMBINO, OR CHRIST-CHILD, OF THE ARA CŒLI.—[SEE PAGE 174.]



THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL—READING THE DECREES.—[SEE PAGE 172.]

THE BAMBINO OF THE ARA CELI.

ONE of the most popular of the Christmas festivals at Rome is a representation of the interior of the inn at Bethlehem in the church of the Ara Celi, which stands on the site of the ancient temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and is dedicated to the Virgin. Its repute is owing to a very sacred image of the infant Saviour which belongs to the church. It is placed upon the lap of the Mother, amidst a group of other figures, in a small chapel which is kept for the present occasion, and is only opened at Christmas. The figures are as large as life. The shepherds are standing round in attitudes of adoration; there is a donkey and a cow, to give the scene the aspect of a stable; and beyond is a distant view, with small figures, and the towers and houses of the town. In the upper part there are clouds, formed of painted canvas, with the heavenly host singing and performing on instruments, and a figure of the Deity high above all. There is a curious custom in this church which lasts till the Epiphany, and which brings a crowd of people every day. A stage is erected in front of the representation of the Divine advent, and a number of children, principally little girls, appear and recite various pieces. Some are a kind of sermon, others are in the form of an address to the infant; some are orations of praise, others are dialogues, in which two children are on the stage reciting at once; and there are some of these performances which may be called dramas, and which are supposed to be a sort of remnant of the old mysteries, or sacred plays. The children seem to do this with great ease and confidence, as if they were quite used to it, and in some cases the performance is very beautiful. A great numbers of applause are heard when any one has done well. On the Epiphany, which is the last day, three new figures are introduced into the group at Bethlehem. These are the three kings from the East; and a star is placed over the group, to tell that it was by its guidance they found out the sacred spot. Being a holiday the crowd increases; the candidates for the platform are many; and sometimes there is a second platform with a second set of performers. The whole ceremony closes with a grand procession of priests and Franciscan monks, whom before the end of the

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

In denominations of $1000 and $500, coupon or registered, with interest at Eight per cent. per annum, payable 15th February and August, in Gold, free of U.S. States taxes, in New York or Europe. The bonds have thirty years to run, payable in New York in Gold. Trustees: Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, of New York. The mortgage which secures these bonds is at the rate of $15,000 per mile, covers a completed road for every bond issued, and is a first and only mortgage. This Line, connecting St. Joseph with Denver City, will make a short and through route to California. The Company have a Land Grant of

And a Grant of Land from Congress of 1,000,000 acres, valued, at the lowest estimate, at.....	4,000,000
First Mortgage Bonds.....	1,500,000
Total.....	$15,500,000

Length of Road, 271 miles. Price 97½ and accrued interest. Can be obtained from the undersigned. Also, pamphlets, maps, and information may be had. These bonds, being so well secured, yielding a large income, are desirable to parties seeking safe and lucrative investments.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO., Commercial Agents,
No. 54 Pine Street, New York.
TANNER & CO., Fiscal Agents,
No. 40 Wall Street, New York.

ROGERS'
Groups of Statuary.

These groups will be sent, with all the express charges prepaid, to any point east of the Mississippi, on receipt of price, viz.:

Council of War, $68. Taking the Oath, $30. Courtship in Sheep Hollow, $18. &c.

Send for illustrated catalogue.

Address
JOHN ROGERS,
212 Fifth Ave.,
New York.

THE VETERAN OF THE GRAND ARMY.

A Novel of thrilling interest; characters drawn from life. It exhibits the purposes and practical workings of the G. A. R., and brings to view remarkable characters developed by the war for the Union. To be issued semi-monthly, in Eight Parts, at 25 cents per part, by CYRUS & DARIUS COBB, Boston, Mass.

Parts I and 2 now ready. The Trade supplied by the AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY, & NEWS COMPANIES.

Opinions of the Press.

"The first part indicates that the novel will be interesting, full of incident, and worthy of a permanent institution."—Boston Daily Journal.

"The first part is well written, printed, and opens very favorably."—Boston Evening Traveller.

"The first part only has yet been issued; but this, besides being very humanely printed, opens at once into an interesting and exciting story."—Boston Evening Transcript.

PREFERENCE GIVEN TO SOLDIERS AS AGENTS.

LACE CURTAINS.—We are now receiving our new styles for the season. Wholesale and retail. CURTAINS and 1870 CURTAIN MATERIALS.
L. & J. B. KELTY & CO., 447 Broadway, near Grand St.
N. B.—Furniture Store at 661 Broadway.

WINCHELL'S
SKETCHES OF CREATION.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. Together with a Statement of the Intimations of Science respecting the Primordial Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2.

"A popular exposition of the leading facts and principles of the natural history of the earth. It is unlike any work in the English language in the union of exact scientific statements with etorical illustrations and poetical beauty. The whole range of geological research is described in a style of remarkable vividness and force, rendering it as much one of the technical nomenclature as is essential to accuracy of thought. Professor Winchell has the rare power of blending brilliancy of imagination with so great precision from the superficiarity and sentimentalism which are usually found in the attempts to reduce the conclusions of science to the level of common minds. It never has itself down to popular comprehension, but trusts to the force of its expositions and the aptness of its illustrations for full on the intelligence of readers. Deeply imbued with the bold and critical spirit of modern physical science, it is also profoundly religious, though without cant or dogmatism. While it accepts the results of the fairest investigation, it makes no suggestions adapted to shock the timid conservative. It is a model of the way in which science may be made to minister light of information

XVth AMENDMENT.—"Shoo Fly, don't Bodder me!"

Bargains! Bargains!!

In consequence of a CHANGE in our FIRM, and Removal in April to 68 Broadway,

Our Entire Stock of

$500,000 WORTH OF

CHINA, GLASS, SILVER AND PLATED WARE, CHANDELIERS, GAS FIXTURES, CLOCKS, BRONZES, CUTLERY, &c., &c.,

will be disposed of, and we offer it at and

BELOW COST.

An examination of our PRICES, which are shown in plain figures on the goods, WILL SATISFY buyers that WE ARE IN EARNEST. Every one is invited to call.

After the 1st of May the business will be continued by our successors,

Messrs. NICOL & DAVIDSON,

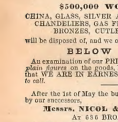
At 656 BROADWAY.

Our Messrs. E. V. & E. B. Haughwout retiring from the business, either party will sign the name of the present firm in liquidation.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO.,

488, 490, & 492 Broadway, cor. Broome St.

☞ Orders by mail will be carefully filled, and at our lowest prices.



Woodward's ARCHITECTURE.

Designs and Hints on Building, With priced catalogue of all books on Architecture and Agriculture. Quarterly, 25 cents per annum.

☞ Books sent postpaid on receipt of price.

Harney's Barns, Out-buildings, & Fences.

Just published, with 200 Designs & Plans of Stables, Farm Barns, Out-buildings, Gates, Gateways, Fences, Stable Fittings and Furniture.

Ten Dollars.

Woodward's National Architect.

1000 Working Designs, Plans, and Details of Country and Village and Suburban Houses, with Specifications and Estimates.

Twelve Dollars.

Woodward's Suburban & Country Houses.

70 Designs. $1 50.

Woodward's Cottages and Farm Houses.

188 Designs: $1 50.

Woodward's Country Homes.

150 Designs: $1 50.

GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,
191 Broadway, New York.

$20 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $20 FAMILY SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Correct Pamphlet, Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

TO HOTEL MEN.—Wanted, a party with Capital, to take a joint interest in a valuable Hotel in Saratoga Springs and Hotel property in this State, to complete a large and admirably located for immediate and highly remunerative business. B. F. COOK, 176 Broadway, N. Y.

BISHOP & REHN,

JEWELERS,

Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,

ARE NOW SHOWING

DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,
Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine

MOSAICS,
and other

FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.

WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.

We call particular attention to our large assortment of

CORAL JEWELRY.

THE LADIES' SOROSIS CLUB,

of New York, recently changed their discussions from woman's sufferage to Hair Preparations and Pimple Banishers. They declared that nature salves had not endowed them with beauty, it was their right—yes, their duty—to seek it where they could. So they all voted that MAGNOLIA BALM overcame Sallowness, Rough Skin, and Ring-marks, and gave to the complexion a most distingué (Sorosian) and marble-like appearance (dangerous to men, no doubt); and that LOVE'S RAVELING made the hair curl quick, rich and awful pretty, and, moreover, prevented it from turning gray. If the proprietors of these articles did not send the sisters an invoice, they are not smart.

VICK'S
Floral Guide for 1870.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY THOUSAND copies of Vick's Illustrated Catalogue of Seeds and Floral Guide have already been ordered. It is elegantly printed on fine tinted paper, with about 200 fine wood Engravings of Flowers and Vegetables, and a beautiful COLORED PLATE—consisting of seven varieties of Plain Ornamental, making a fine

BOUQUET OF PHLOXES.

It is the most beautiful, as well as the most instructive Floral Guide published, giving plain and thorough directions for the

CULTURE OF FLOWERS AND VEGETABLES.

The FLORAL GUIDE is published for the benefit of my customers, but will be forwarded to all who apply by mail, for TEN CENTS, which is not half the cost. Address

JAMES VICK,
Rochester, N.Y.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON - SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Will stitch, hem, fell, stitch, bind, braid, cord, tuck, quilt, gather, and sew from the coarsest to the finest. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any Machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOR & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., BOSTON, MASS., or St. LOUIS, MO. We warn the public against all dealers selling Machines under the same name as ours, unless they can show a Certificate of agency signed by us. We shall hold ourselves responsible for worthless Machines sold by other parties, and shall prosecute all parties either selling or using Machines under the same name, to the full extent of the law, unless such Machines were obtained from us or our Agents. Do not be induced, upon by parties who copy our advertisement and circulars, and offer worthless Machines at a low price.

FOLLAR & SON, Manuf'rs of GENUINE MICROSCOPES and Students' Outfits, 91 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 27 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular and Catalogue. Also Repairing and Boiling also done.

GOOD-Paying Trade for $1. Send Stamp for Circular to G. SOLOMON, 189 S. 6th St., Brooklyn, N.Y.

HARVEY FISK. A. & HATCH.

Office of FISK & HATCH,

BANKERS and Dealers in GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

No. 5 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK, February 15, 1870.

THE remarkable success which attended our negotiation of the Loans of the CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY and the WESTERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY, and the popularity and credit which these LOANS have maintained in the markets, both in this country and Europe, have shown that the First Mortgage Bonds of wisely-located and honorably-managed Railroads are promptly recognized and readily taken as the most suitable, safe, and advantageous form of investment, yielding on a more liberal income than can heretofore be derived from Government Bonds, and available to take their place.

Assured that, in the selection and negotiation of superior Railroad Loans, we are meeting a great public want, and rendering a valuable service—both to the holders of Capital and to those great National works of internal improvement whose intrinsic and exclusive merit and substantial character entitle them to the use of Capital and the confidence of Investors—we now offer with special confidence and satisfaction the

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS
OF THE
CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO RAILROAD CO.

THE CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO RAILROAD, connecting the Atlantic coast and the magnificent harbors of Chesapeake Bay with the Ohio River at a point of reliable navigation, and thus, with the entire Railroad system and water transportation of the great West and Southwest, FORMS THE ADDITIONAL EAST AND WEST TRUNK LINE so imperatively demanded for the accommodation of the immense and rapidly-growing transportation between the Atlantic seaboard and Europe on the one hand, and the great producing regions of the West and Mississippi Valley on the other.

THE INVIGORATION OF THIS ROAD AS A NEW OUTLET FROM THE WEST TO THE SEA magnifies it into one of national consequence, and insures to it an extensive through traffic from the day of its completion; while, in the development of the extensive agricultural and mineral resources of Virginia and West Virginia, it possesses, along its own line, the elements of a large and profitable local business.

Thus the great interests, both general and local, which demand the completion of the CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO RAILROAD to the Ohio River, afford the surest guarantee of its success and value, and RENDER IT THE MOST IMPORTANT AND SUBSTANTIAL RAILROAD ENTERPRISE NOW IN PROGRESS IN THIS COUNTRY.

Its superiority as an East and West route, and the promise of an immense and profitable trade awaiting its completion, have drawn to it the attention and co-operation of Capitalists and Railroad men of this city, of sound judgment and known integrity, whose connection with it, together with that of eminent citizens and business men of Virginia and West Virginia, insures an energetic, honorable, and successful management.

The road is completed and in operation from Richmond to the celebrated White Sulphur Springs of West Virginia, 277 miles, and there remain but 190 miles (now partially constructed) to be completed, to carry it to the proposed terminus on the Ohio River, at or near the mouth of the Big Sandy River, 120 miles above Cincinnati, and 390 miles below Pittsburgh.

Lines are now projected or in progress through Ohio and Kentucky to this point, which will connect the CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO WITH THE ENTIRE RAILROAD SYSTEMS OF THE WEST AND SOUTHWEST, AND THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Its valuable franchise and superior advantages will place the CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY among the richest and most powerful and trustworthy corporations of the country:

AND THERE EXISTS A PRESENT VALUE, IN COMPLETED ROAD AND WORK DONE, EQUAL TO THE ENTIRE AMOUNT OF THE MORTGAGE.

The details of the Loan have been arranged with special reference to the wants of all classes of Investors, and combine the various features of convenience, safety, and protection against loss or fraud.

The Bonds are in denominations of $1000, $500, $100, and $50.

They will be issued as Coupon Bonds, payable to bearer, and may be held in that form; or

The Bond may be registered in the name of the owner, and the interest remaining payable to bearer attached, the principal being then transferable only on the books of the Company, unless reassigned to bearer; or,

The coupons may be detached and canceled, the Bond made a PERMANENT REGISTERED BOND, transferable only on the books of the Company, and the interest made payable only to the registered owner or his attorney.

The three classes of BONDS will be known respectively as:

1. "Coupon Bonds Payable to Bearer."
2. "Registered Bonds with Coupons Attached."
3. "Registered Bonds with Coupons Detached,"

and should be so designated by Correspondents in specifying the class of Bonds desired.

They have THIRTY YEARS to run from January 15, 1870, with interest at six per cent. per annum from November 1, 1869. PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST PAYABLE IN GOLD IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

The interest is payable in May and November, that it may take the place of that of the earlier issues of Five-Twenties, and suit the convenience of our friends who already hold Central and Western Pacific Bonds, with interest payable in January and July, and who are not investing in making additional investments, to have their interest receivable at different seasons of the year.

The Loan is secured by a mortgage upon the entire Line of Road from Richmond to the Ohio River, with the equipment and all other property and appurtenances connected therewith.

A SINKING FUND OF $100,000 PER ANNUM

IS PROVIDED FOR THE REDEMPTION OF THE BONDS, to take effect one year after the completion of the Road.

The mortgage is for $18,000,000, of which $1,000,000 are held in trust for the redemption of outstanding Bonds of the VIRGINIA CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, now merged in the CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO.

Of the remaining $13,000,000, a sufficient amount will be sold to complete the Road to the Ohio River, perfect and improve the portion now in operation, and thoroughly equip the whole for a large and active traffic. The present price is 90 and accrued interest.

A Loan so amply secured, so carefully guarded, and so certain hereafter to command a prominent place among the favorite securities in the markets both of this country and Europe, will be at once appreciated and quickly absorbed.

Very respectfully,

FISK & HATCH, Bankers.

P. S.—We have issued pamphlets containing full particulars, statistical details, maps, etc., which will be furnished upon application.

We buy and sell Government Bonds, and receive the accounts of Banks, Bankers, Corporations, and citizens, subject to check at sight, and allow interest on daily balances.

Voice from the Adirondacks;
Voice from the Northwest;
Voice from the Lowlands,
Hear what they say of the

MAYNARD RIFLES,

for ACCURACY, RANGE, and CONVENIENCE.

Descriptive Circulars, with ACTUAL EXPERIMENTATIONS and Price-List, sent on request by SCIOT. ADAMS

MASS. ARMS CO., Chicopee Falls, Mass.

WARNER, PECK, & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS OF Children's Carriages,
Springfield, Mass.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE and Classical Academy. For both sexes. Terms opens April 4. Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., President, Claverack, N. Y.

A Novelty.—Great Cigar Tip. Samples, 50 cents. A. GRANT, Box 5486, N. Y. P. O.

"ECONOMY IS WEALTH"—FRANKLIN. "Where 10 people pay $50 or more for a SEWING MACHINE, 1000 will pay $5 or less for one that is a standard machine, is durable and practical, complete with Table, constructed upon entirely new principles, and manufactured by Yankee Ingenuity, and the extent all others" Patented Machines, fully licensed, are intended for poor people who want to save money, labor, and money. A second Wanted. Machines sent to Agents and given away to steady hustlers. For circulars containing reduced prices, address J. C. UTTS & CO., or FRANKLIN AND DIAMOND S. M. M. Co., 323 Broadway, Boston, Mass.

$732 in 31 DAYS

Made by one Agent, selling SILVER'S PATENT ELASTIC BRACE. Over 40,000 now in use. Recommended by Hon. Horace Greeley and American Agriculturist. Only county reserved for each Agent. A. CLUM & CO., 28 Cortlandt St., N.Y., or 120 Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

AGENTS WANTED for Willson's School and Family Charts.

To convince every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

$250 CITY LOTS.—Advance 100 per cent. annually. Apply to E. C. BLAKESLEE, 47 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 690.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE SHEIKH.

It was the opinion of Baron Larrey, the celebrated French military surgeon, that Adam and Eve were Arabs. He pronounced the Arab skull to be the most perfect type of the human head, and affirmed the intellectual traits of these children of the desert to be equal to their finely-developed physical organization. Their external senses are exquisitely acute and remarkably perfect; their sight is extensive in its range: they hear at very great distances; and they are capable of distinguishing the most subtle odors. But the Baron does not decide whether the perfect organization of the Arab arises from the desert climate or from the early cultivation of the higher faculties. "Sharp features, lean active figures, keen, animated, and restless eyes," says that great ethnologist, Dr. Prichard, "mark the Arab. Men not unlike Mohammed are often met with among the Sheikhs. Often you see Bedouins with long, thin, almost feminine faces, and large and finely-formed features, which, half covered by the folds of their white head-dresses, look somewhat sad and ghastly." "The Bedouin's dark orbs," says Mr. Kinglake, "roll slowly and solemnly over the white of his deep-set eyes. His countenance shows painful thought and long-suffering—the suffering of one fallen from a high estate. His gait is strangely majestic, and he marches along with his simple blanket as though he were wearing the purple. His common talk is a series of piercing screams, and cries more painful to the ear than the most excruciating fits music that I ever endured."

The true Bedouin has an aquiline nose, a receding mouth and chin, deep-set, bright dark eyes, large and ardent.—He is agile and spare, with little muscle, but active and vigorous; his limbs are small, his hands sometimes of almost feminine delicacy.—The Bedouin's hair is almost always of a deep black, and very bushy; the expression of their physiognomy is stern and severe. The Arabs high up the Nile, beyond Dongola, are black as negroes; while in the mountains on the west of Yemen, Bruce reports them as often having red hair and blue eyes. Niebuhr describes the mountain women as very pretty, at Esthen found the nomad maidens plain, haggard, and clumsy, without religion, and addicted to tobacco. Hospitable the Arabs are, and when they have them they will share with all who come beneath their tent-roof their camels' milk, curds, and bread.

The picture from which our engraving of the old, white-bearded shiekh is taken is by Mr. Carl Haag, one of the best of modern English artists in water-color. It has a venerable, patriarchal appearance, and seems to justify Baron Larrey's opinion of the intellectual capacities of the Arab race.

WHENCE COME METEORITES?

In examining a mass of meteoric iron found in the Cordillera of Deesa (Chili), M. Stanislas Meunier, of the Museum of Natural History in Paris, has discovered evidences of an unexpected relationship between this iron and two meteorites fallen at a great distance from Chili, viz., a mass of iron found at Caille (Alpes Maritimes), and a stone which fell at Sétif (Algeria), June 9, 1867.

The meteorite of Deesa is a mixture of these two rocks; it is composed of iron which is identical with that of Caille, injected in a sort of fusion into a stone which is identical with that of Sétif. The iron of Deesa is then evidently an eruptive rock, and it is the first hitherto observed among meteorites. Besides this, it is asserted that the iron resembling that found at Caille, and the stone resembling that of Sétif, have been mutually connected by stratification upon an unknown globe, and it is the first time that such a connection has been materially demonstrated.

M. Meunier remarks that the meteorites which now arrive upon the earth are not of the same mineralogical nature as those which fell in past ages. Formerly iron fell: now stones fall. During the last 116 years there have been in Europe but three falls of iron, whereas there have been, annually, on an average, three falls of stones. The greater number of meteoric irons which exist in the Paris collection have fallen on the earth at undetermined epochs; all the meteoric stones are of comparative recent date. Perhaps we are even justified in saying that stones of a new kind are beginning to arrive, for falls of carbonaceous meteorites were unknown before the year 1803, and four have been observed since then.

From this assemblage of facts M. Stanislas Meunier concludes that meteorites are the fragments of one or more heavenly bodies which, at a period relatively recent (for these waifs are never found except in superficial strata), revolved round the earth, or perhaps round the moon.—Having in the course of ages lost their own proper heat, and become penetrated by the cold of space, they have arrived, much sooner than the moon, by reason of their inferior volume, at the last term of the molecular action which are operating upon our satellite, and which are rendered evident to our eyes by the enormous crevices, the deep fissures, with which it is furrowed. Split in all directions,

THE SHEIKH.—[From a Painting by Carl Haag.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1870.

OUR INDIAN POLICY OF EXTERMINATION.

ON the 24th of May, 1637, before dawn, Captains MASON and UNDERHILL prayed, broke camp, and surprised a Pequot fort upon the Mystic River in Connecticut. Within an hour it was burned to the ground, and of the four hundred Indians not more than five escaped. This fearful blow, says the historian, secured civilization in New England. WILLIAM PENN secured it differently in Pennsylvania. But without refining too closely upon the necessities of war in the earliest colonial times, it is not certain that what may have been necessary for a band of settlers in a strange and savage country three thousand miles from their own land is humanly justifiable two hundred and fifty years later in a civilized nation of fifty millions of people dealing with some thousands of skulking savages.

Yet the recent destruction of the Piegan Indians by United States troops was in pursuance of that policy of Indian warfare which has undoubtedly the general approval. We mean that it is the common opinion that the Indians are a treacherous, cruel, remorseless, and wretched human vermin, who observe no rules of honorable war, and who will ravage and murder the innocent and helpless wherever and whenever they can, and that nothing but striking them "where it hurts," as GENERAL SHERMAN says, will tend to protect our women and children from their ferocity. Last year, when we had reports amazingly of some of the barbarities of the Indians, we received an indignant protest from the frontier, assuring us that the most ingenious torments that could be devised for their punishment were mild in comparison with the horrors they inflicted. And recently we knew of the visit to the territorial judge in an Indian region, who, starting with her husband upon a journey, made him promise to shoot her if they were taken by the Indians. "And I would have done it," said the judge, quietly.

It is not surprising that under such circumstances the popular Indian policy of the frontier should be extermination. And, undoubtedly, the feeling which led to the destruction of the Piegans was, at bottom, precisely the same as that which burned the Pequot fort upon the Mystic. Nevertheless, the policy of extermination is inhuman and unworthy of the United States; and it is also enormously expensive. It costs the Government, says Mr. PHILLIPS, about a million of dollars to kill a single Indian. Moreover, what must be the moral effect upon an army of the conduct of such a system of warfare? In the Middle Age chronicles we read that captured cities were given up to the license of the soldiery for several days. And one such little sentence appalls the imagination more as much as the most harrowing stories of Indian massacres.

No exposed family upon the frontier need suppose that we are indifferent to its situation, nor to the question of its most vigorous and successful defence. The very point to determine is how it can be best defended.

General PARKER, the Indian agent or superintendent, himself of Indian descent, does not approve the policy of extermination. The President GRANT does not approve it. The country, which gave but a languid attention to the subject, and is willing to believe any thing of the Indians, can yet observe that the Indian question is by no means settled by the present policy; the exposed families are not defended; and, if it inquires, it will discover that in Canada Indian wars are unknown, and that the Indian policy of that country is radically different from ours. One of the most valuable and interesting documents laid before Congress during its present session is the Report upon the Management of the Indians in British North America by the British Government, by Mr. F. N. BLAKE, United States Consul at Hamilton, Ontario. According to the census of 1868 there were more than 20,000 Indians in the Dominion of Canada, and the effort of the Government is directed to their incorporation with the rest of the inhabitants as citizens. The British policy aims to place the Indians under the protection of the law of the land. Our plan is to keep them aliens, and to make treaties with them as foreign people living upon our own soil. The result is the first one that is unbroken peace; in the second, endless war.

The British act of 1860 for the management of Indian affairs applies, indeed, to all the Indian degree, the existence and the authority of tribes, and provides a Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs, and may be said of the Indian bill. But it is gone? And if not, and the bill be repealed, and the benchmen approve, then what? Let the compassionate Indian-lover confess that the gentleman of whom we speak is in a cruel situation. If Mr. SWEENY and his friends are still in power, the Erie bill must be maintained; if they are not, it must be repealed. "Reliable information" is sadly wanted in the Executive Chamber.

We have seen various explanations offered of the Governor's action in this matter. It is said that he held the bill for consideration—that there was no protest—that the Legislature was virtually unanimous—that there were urgent requests from certain sections for the bill. But what did the bill do? It took from property-holders the control of their property, and gave it to those whom they had not selected. To read the bill was to see that. Why did the Governor hold it in consideration but because he saw it? The Legislature was unanimous in so unparalleled an act, what was the Governor for but to withstand their action? As for a public protest, does the Executive require an expression of general indignation to prevent his sanctioning so gross an outrage upon fundamental principles? And does he plead the request of those whose motives he could not know in defense of such a sanction? If the Erie bill had not been the measure of those who have "invented" the Governor, and who, controlling the State, were in his judgment essential to making him President, would it have been signed? And if the gentleman whom Governor HOFFMAN has in mind when he thinks of the Presidency proposed such a bill as the Erie for such reasons, or for any other, and if he is politically wholly the invention of the Ring, and the Ring is broken, does he see any reason whatever why his party in the State or in the country should prefer such a gentleman to any New York politician who is guiltless of complicity with the Ring?

THE CURIOUS SITUATION IN FRANCE.

M. OLLIVIER, the new French Prime Minister, has apparently made a fatal mistake. He refused to dissolve the Legislature and appeal to the country, upon the ground that it already represented the people. Soon afterward he declared that official candidates could no longer be tolerated; in other words, that the prefects must not secure the election of candidates nominated from the Tuileries. But this was very unwelcome to a great part of the Chambers, who had been elected in that manner, and the Minister was opposed by a very large majority, who carried their resolution to sustain such candidacies by a vote of 187 to 44. Before the vote was taken M. OLLIVIER asked that it be not made a vote of want of confidence. But such a request is absurd; for it must be considered a vital point. And thus the new Liberal Minister, who refused to appeal to the people, is left in a like minority, like our Republican friends in Maryland who refused to enfranchise the colored citizens.

The system has fatally weakened his position, because it is now evident that he depends upon the support of a majority which, by his own showing, has been—despite its real existence in the Chambers—virtually declared do not properly represent the country. If there is to be official candidacy government in France, the Ministry must first secure a really honest popular election, and then retire before an adverse majority in the Chambers.

And it is now really difficult to see how a truly Liberal policy can be carried out by the Ministry because of the defective composition of the Legislature. The Liberal members have opposed the new Ministry. Upon this question of official candidacy M. OLLIVIER has their support for the first time, and it was given under protest that they did not sustain the Ministry in the opposite proposition. The position is extraordinary. If M. OLLIVIER thinks that a perfectly free election is compatible with the existence of the empire, why did he refuse to trust to it by a dissolution, since he knew that the Imperial majority had been "cooked" at the polls? If he does not think so, why did he declare that the official candidacies must be abandoned? By his refusal to dissolve he inherited the incumbrance of the Liberals; by his proposition to abandon the candidacies he has shaken that of the Conservatives. Upon which does he mean to rely? The only explanation of his conduct may be, if his proposition is honestly made, it is the most positive evidence of the decided strength of the empire, because it shows a willingness to intrust its existence to an uncontrolled vote of the people.

LEGAL TENDER.

IN 1797, during the war with NAPOLEON, the British Government passed a law which made it illegal for the Bank of England to pay coin for its bills except for some small amounts, and declared that any debtor who should tender such bills should not be liable to arrest. During the beginning of the war the Bank was tempted to make collections from his tenants in gold and silver; when a further act was passed that, by means of directors' bills or bonds, on making such tender of bank-bills, should be entitled to have his property distrained upon delivered up, and that whoever, by any device or contrivance, took such bills for less than their nominal value should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Lord ELDON, in sustaining this act, stated that he had the official care of twenty-five millions of the property of MAJESTY's subjects, and that since the passage of the act restraining coin payments he had been unable to make any collections except in Bank of England notes; and that it was proper, therefore, to place proceedings for distress on the same footing. In effect, therefore, the bills of the Bank of England were made a legal tender, and kept so down from 1797 for over twenty years.

The motive for passing the original act as stated in the preamble to have been that specie had been withdrawn from the Continent, and that there was danger that the credit of the Bank and Government might be jeoparded if coin payments were not prevented. As between debtors and creditors in England, collections were made in legal proceedings in no other medium than Bank of England notes, which notes constituted the ordinary currency of the kingdom until, and for several years after, the termination of the war. As England was the most opulent nation in the world during all this period, and was deeply interested in preserving the highest monetary standard, her example in proof of the necessity of this resort in time of war, on the part of all nations less favorably situated as to pecuniary means.

In the recent war in this country the Treasury notes of the Government were declared to be a legal tender in all suits instituted for the

A CERTAIN GENTLEMAN AND THE PRESIDENCY.

IT is rather early to talk of the next Presidency, but we suppose that Governor HOFFMAN could mention a gentleman who occasionally thinks of it. And if that gentleman should be of the same mind with Governor HOFFMAN himself, it would be interesting to know what are the limits of his chance as the Erie bill at present current in his party. It can certainly be said with truth that the gentleman in question would never be thought of as a presidential candidate if there were any conspicuous candidate in his party. Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR is unquestionably the most prominent man among the country, but his rejection by the people in 1868 was so signal that he is not likely to be again a candidate for the Presidency. Mr. SEYMOUR had had the insight of a patriotic statesman when he was elected Governor in 1862, he might have commanded, in the next subsequent career. But his political life is ended. Nobody believes he should take an active part in a Presidential election, except, possibly to his party, when, if the successful candidate were not from New York, Mr. SEYMOUR would undoubtedly be made Secretary of State.

Governor HOFFMAN probably hopes that the candidate may be from New York, and may be successful, although modesty might debar him to mention who the candidate should be. But he has probably observed that Governor has in mind for the Presidency made any mark upon his party in the country, and is his position in the party in the State so commanding as it is officially prominent? He was Recorder of New York, and sentenced the rioters of 1863. Then the Tammany Ring, commanding as it must have a candidate of respectable antecedents, nominated and elected him Mayor. He was re-elected, receiving the votes of many Republicans, to secure the defeat of FERNANDO WOOD. As Mayor, the most memorable act of this gentleman was a proclamation protecting electoral frauds, which cost him the votes of some of the most honorable men of his own party. By means of these frauds, which were the work of the Tammany Ring, this gentleman became Governor. He is now in the second year of his office, and his most memorable act as Governor is the signature of the Erie bill, one of the most monstrous schemes of the Ring, to which this gentleman owes all his prominence.

Of course, if this gentleman should not be renominated as Governor, he could hardly look for a nomination as President, because he depends for success, not upon his own powers, not upon any natural leadership, but upon adroit political management. In a National Convention of his party, and without official position, he would stand no more first chance than any delegate. He does not rank with the great Democrats of New York—with MICHAEL HOFFMAN, with HORATIO SEYMOUR, nor even with HORATIO SEYMOUR. A famous political manager used to say that he had invented certain persons in politics, and it may be said of this gentleman politically that he is not a self-made man. If any body doubts it, let him ask Mr. SWEENY and his friends.

And now comes the difficulty. The Democratic enemies of the Ring declare that it shall not send a delegate to the next State Convention. But, if so, the Ring no longer controls the party in the State. And if this be so, what is the use of the chairman of the Ring do, who gave the sign of his total subserviency in his signature to the Erie bill? Plainly, if the Ring is gone, gone is the bill. But is it gone? And

JOHN McCLINTOCK, D.D.

BY the death of the Rev. Dr. JOHN MCCLINTOCK, whose portrait, with a biographical sketch, we give elsewhere, the country loses one of its accomplished and most useful scholars, the Methodist denomination one of its most able and eloquent preachers, and his personal friends a delightful and inspiring companion. Dr. MCCLINTOCK's knowledge was varied, extensive, and accurate. He studied with the zest of a lover, and he had a remarkable power of readily imparting what he learned to the best account, either as a teacher, an author, or an orator. For preaching, indeed, he was peculiarly fitted. He had the manly temperament, the presence, the voice, the electrical and broad sympathy that are essential to the popular orator, while the nobility of his nature and a certain simplicity and modesty endeared him to those who knew only the man. His literary labor was incessant and various, but his chief and most permanent work is his "Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature," upon which he had been long engaged with Dr. JAMES STRONG.

His patriotism was as firmand positive as his character. During the war he was pastor of the American chapel in Paris, and his labors to enlighten the European mind upon the real scope and significance of the great American contest were incessant and most efficient. No American then in Europe understood better than he how to mold public opinion upon the subject most powerfully. He served his country and his kind as truly as if he had been a General in the field; and to those in Europe who doubted, as well as to those who believed, he was himself a living illustration of the better American. When he returned to this country he found new duties growing out of the war awaiting him, and with his whole heart he did his share in wisely caring for the freedmen. But there was no narrowness, no rudeness, either in his patriotism or in his religion. Amidst all his interests, in all his busy career, he was not only always active, devoted, efficient, but he was equally generous and kindly. JOHN MCCLINTOCK had the large, charitable Christian heart that makes life beautiful and its memory precious.

THE CURIOUS SITUATION IN FRANCE.

M. OLLIVIER, the new French Prime Minister, has apparently made a fatal mistake. He refused to dissolve the Legislature and appeal to the country, upon the ground that it already represented the people. Soon afterward he declared that official candidates could no longer be tolerated; in other words, that the prefects must not secure the election of candidates nominated from the Tuileries. But this was very unwelcome to a great part of the Chambers, who had been elected in that manner, and the Minister was opposed by a very large majority, who carried their resolution to sustain such candidacies by a vote of 187 to 44. Before the vote was taken M. OLLIVIER asked that it be not made a vote of want of confidence. But such a request is absurd; for it must be considered a vital point. And thus the new Liberal Minister, who refused to appeal to the people, is left in the minority, like our Republican friends in Maryland who refused to enfranchise the colored citizens.

The system has fatally weakened his position, because it is now evident that he depends upon the support of a majority which, by his own showing, has been—despite its real existence in the Chambers—virtually declared do not properly represent the country. If there is to be official candidacy government in France, the Ministry must first secure a really honest popular election, and then retire before an adverse majority in the Chambers.

And it is now really difficult to see how a truly Liberal policy can be carried out by the Ministry because of the defective composition of the Legislature. The Liberal members have opposed the new Ministry. Upon this question of official candidacy M. OLLIVIER has their support for the first time, and it was given under protest that they did not sustain the Ministry in the opposite proposition. The position is extraordinary. If M. OLLIVIER thinks that a perfectly free election is compatible with the existence of the empire, why did he refuse to trust to it by a dissolution, since he knew that the Imperial majority had been "cooked" at the polls? If he does not think so, why did he declare that the official candidacies must be abandoned? By his refusal to dissolve he inherited the incumbrance of the Liberals; by his proposition to abandon the candidacies he has shaken that of the Conservatives. Upon which does he mean to rely? The only explanation of his conduct may be, if his proposition is honestly made, it is the most positive evidence of the decided strength of the empire, because it shows a willingness to intrust its existence to an uncontrolled vote of the people.

LEGAL TENDER.

IN 1797, during the war with NAPOLEON, the British Government passed a law which made it illegal for the Bank of England to pay coin for its bills except for some small amounts, and declared that any debtor who should tender such bills should not be liable to arrest. During the beginning of the war the Bank was tempted to make collections from his tenants in gold and silver; when a further act was passed that, by means of directors' bills or bonds, on making such tender of bank-bills, should be entitled to have his property distrained upon delivered up, and that whoever, by any device or contrivance, took such bills for less than their nominal value should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Lord ELDON, in sustaining this act, stated that he had the official care of twenty-five millions of the property of MAJESTY's subjects, and that since the passage of the act restraining coin payments he had been unable to make any collections except in Bank of England notes; and that it was proper, therefore, to place proceedings for distress on the same footing. In effect, therefore, the bills of the Bank of England were made a legal tender, and kept so down from 1797 for over twenty years.

The motive for passing the original act as stated in the preamble to have been that specie had been withdrawn from the Continent, and that there was danger that the credit of the Bank and Government might be jeoparded if coin payments were not prevented. As between debtors and creditors in England, collections were made in legal proceedings in no other medium than Bank of England notes, which notes constituted the ordinary currency of the kingdom until, and for several years after, the termination of the war. As England was the most opulent nation in the world during all this period, and was deeply interested in preserving the highest monetary standard, her example in proof of the necessity of this resort in time of war, on the part of all nations less favorably situated as to pecuniary means.

In the recent war in this country the Treasury notes of the Government were declared to be a legal tender in all suits instituted for the recovery of debts, and this was sustained by the highest court of nearly every loyal State. In Kentucky the act, in its application to a debt existing at the time of its passage, was declared to be illegal by a court composed of judges many of them unfriendly to the Union; and this decision had been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, in effect reversing the other decisions.

The policy pursued by the English, in giving a forced circulation to the bills of the Bank of England, enabled the Government to conduct its financial operations during the war with success; and although there are differences of opinion among citizens of the United States as to the expediency of giving a forced circulation to the Treasury notes of the Government, there is no doubt that the plan accomplished the object intended.

The circumstances under which recourse was had to this policy, by the United States, were of the gravest character. Within the first year of the war three loans which had been put upon the market were taken chiefly by the banks of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. As the war grew to extensive proportions the banks, finding that they could not dispose of what they had of these loans, announced to the Government that they could take no more of them, and that it was a question of a few days only which should break first, the banks or the Treasury.

Soon afterward, and on the 31st of December, 1861, the banks universally stopped specie payments.

At this time Congress had failed to provide any system of effective taxation, and there was then a large force in the field which remained unpaid; and in this emergency, when the proceeds of the loans had been entirely exhausted, the Secretary of the Treasury, finding that the Treasury notes then in existence, and which had been made receivable only for Government dues, were being discredited, called upon Congress to make them compulsorily receivable as money, by the whole people of the land, or the war would be ended.

At this time Congress had failed to provide any system of effective taxation, and there was then a large force in the field which remained unpaid; and in this emergency, when the proceeds of the loans had been entirely exhausted, the Secretary of the Treasury, finding that the Treasury notes then in existence, and which had been made receivable only for Government dues, were being discredited, called upon Congress to make them compulsorily receivable as money, by the whole people of the land, or the war would be ended.

The Constitution conferred upon Congress full power to adopt all "necessary and proper means" for conducting war, and Congress was the chief financial officer of the Government had stated to them that it was "indispensably necessary" to make these notes a legal tender, and as Congress, acting on this statement, had decided that it was necessary, the question of fact that it was so was found and affirmed by the only authority competent to make the decision. The Court, according to the uniform tenor of its rulings from the origin of the Government, was bound to accept this as final and conclusive if it was a recognized and effective means for accomplishing success in war, and was not a prohibited power. No one claims that it is prohibited. On the contrary, when the necessity of prohibition was under review by the Convention which framed the Constitution, it was decided to prohibit only the States from doing any thing but gold and silver a tender for debts.

It was undoubtedly competent for the framers of the Constitution to have extended the prohibition to Congress, and, according to all established rules of construction, the omission to do so, under such circumstances as the case made, is indicative of their view that great emergencies would make a resort to this power essential to the life of the Government. This view, which is the practical character of the emergency in February, 1862, when Congress, in the absence of all other means, was compelled to require of citizens of the United States that they should not discredit its money—its sinews of war.

The power to prescribe what shall constitute a legal tender for debts has been exercised by the General Government from its very origin. The language of most of the acts of this kind covered from the one passed in 1806, declaring that certain foreign coins at a certain rate shall be a "legal tender for the payment of all debts and demands."

The authority to pass these acts is not specifically granted, but is an incident to the express power to "coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coins," and that to regulate commerce, of which money is the measure. As the States could exercise this power at pleasure, and even with respect to coins, it might be productive of great inconvenience, if they chose to make different and contradictory regulations; and their control over the subject must therefore belong to that class of powers to be held solvent laws, which remain partially inactive during the operation of complete Congressional regulations.

It was proper to refer the States in this respect, because also they were not responsible for the principles in the conduct of war which might require a change in the medium.

War powerfully affects the relations between debtors and creditors by causing the expulsion and hoarding of the precious metals; and inasmuch as this incidental injury to debtors is the act of the Government, it is reasonable and just in such a dilemma that the Government should moderate this injury to the extent of its authority.

The duty of collecting debts through sheriffs and marshals comprehends an exercise of the public power which, at particular junctures, is not convenient or possible in the precious metals. Shay's rebellion was caused by an attempt to collect debts in gold and silver; and in the Anti-Rent Districts such numerous and serious collisions have taken place, resulting in the loss of life, that in some districts their forced collection had been suspended. Governments are obliged to consider the effect of war on this duty, and modify it according to exigencies. It has direct bearing on the issue of bank notes.

The creditor who supposes that in the midst of the tarmoils and immense pecuniary changes of a great war he can hold the Government to the duty of enforcing his pound of flesh, must think that the employment of an army in meeting the enemy should be accompanied by a police; it may suppose that the sheriffs in the vain attempt to collect his debt at such a time in gold and silver. The experience of mankind proves among that this is a misconception of his rights and duties, and that instead of his being supreme—as he is wont to be in time of peace—it is the Government which is supreme in war.

The Constitution itself contains evidence that in war powers which are unlawful in peace may be exercised for the common safety. Habeas corpus can be suspended in time of war.

In war, troops may be quartered in private houses, but in peace they can not be without the consent of the owner. The Executive who in peace can not be held to answer for a capital or infamous crime without being presented or indicted by a grand jury, may, when arising in the land and naval forces during war be tried and punished without that formality. The laws of war supplant the laws of peace in those of peace which are inconsistent with the general safety.

An impression prevails that we are going suddenly to specie payments, and that this decision of the Supreme Court has become immediately or in dangerous proximity operative of an essential means of warfare and defense on such delusive grounds. It will soon appear that the Legal Tender act can not safely be dispensed with. Its constitutionality is clear, and it should remain with Congress to decide when it shall be suspended. The public has overstepped the just line of its authority, and attempted to restrict Congress in this matter, when the framers of the Constitution decided to leave them free of such restriction.

NOTES.

MR. FRANCIS W. GODDARD, son of the late Professor GODDARD, of Brown University, in Rhode Island, has published two volumes of poems, entitled RIDER, in Providence, the writings of his father, who was well known to all Rhode Islanders, and who would fill in it one of the fullest statements of the arguments in the famous case of LUTHER vs. BORDEN, a question raised by THOMAS WILSON DORR was a natural and very important one in our political history. It was decided in favor of the great patriotic statesman, but without the profoundest excitement. MR. DORR claimed that the right to grant power resided in the people, a majority of the adult white male citizens could at any time peacefully, and without authority of law, overthrow any existing government and establish any other. In this view he was supported by JOHN QUINCY ADAMS of Massachusetts, and by MR. CAMPBELLING in New York; and he and his friends, the logical expounders of this theory, raised a civil war in Rhode Island twenty-eight years ago. The attempt failed. DORR was convicted of treason, imprisoned for a year, and then pardoned; and the Supreme Court decided that Congress must determine which of two organizations in a State claiming to be its lawful government should be recognized by the United States. The late debate which shook the House of Representatives had for a chief part, and the brief essays—the true logic, eloquent—which the author gives us the daily papers, and which were of the greatest influence in moulding an intelligent public opinion, have been very wisely preserved and preserved in these volumes, and are a permanently interesting and valuable addition to our political literature.

THE Tribune, in publishing the testimony in the gold case, said that the report was sent to it in ample time for publication in the morning issue, and that it preferred to keep its pledges and withhold the news until authorized to use it. This was bountiful praise. But the Washington authorities ought to have learned by this time that the temptation of breaking such pledges can not be resisted by every paper; and if it is desirable that news should not be published until Wednesday, it is simply absurd to send it over the means of publishing it on Tuesday. Meanwhile, if we gentlemen of the press can not keep our word in such a matter as the publication of a report, ought we to be so very wroth when our friend GENERAL BUTLER gibes at "newspaper men"?

IF there were any glamour still lingering about royalty in England the letters of the PRINCE OF WALES in the MORDAUNT cause would certainly help to scatter it. They are not letters that by any torturing of words can be twisted into libels. They are simply the friendly, simple effusions of a very simple young man chiefly interested in shooting and theatres; and there is no reason why any man should not write such letters. But remember, on what woman such a letter is found, if they mutually take pleasure in them. As an honorable man the Prince certainly loses nothing by the publication of his letters. The pity is that a future king of England should not understand that he is part of a state pageant which forbids this kind of indulgence.

WILL some Republican member of the New York Assembly explain his vote upon the bill which passed the House to the Board of Supervisors, with a salary of $6000 a year? The Police Justices seldom meet as a board, and have been paid but $1 each for $250 a year. It is stated from Albany that the bill could not have passed but for the votes of twenty Republicans. They may have had good reasons. Will they please to mention them?

THE horticultural school for women, of which we spoke some months since, has now been fairly established. MR. MARWEDEL, agent for the estate of ROBERT W. PEABODY, about thirty miles from the city, on the Long Island Railroad. MISS MARWEDEL is a lady of great intelligence and enthusiasm, a practical teacher who clearly comprehends her system. The horticultural manager is MR. JOHN HOPAIRT, a graduate of the school at Reutingen in Germany, which is entirely successful. The object of such a school is a practical knowledge of horticulture, including the management of the soil, and of nursery; and the course of study includes Political Economy, History of the Agricultural Country, Landscape Gardening, Book-keeping, and Drawing. The experiment will be tried under favorable auspices by MR. MARWEDEL, who has the best of references. And we observe that a school of the same kind is proposed near Boston.

ENGLISH writers are very fond of laughing at the French because the French can never write Englishmen and titles correctly, and continually speaks of the "Queen of Victoria" or "Sir Peel." But those writers know that they make mistakes quite as unpardonable when they speak of America? Here is a paragraph from an English periodical speaking of WALT WHITMAN'S poem upon GEORGE PEABODY, which, it says, is called "The Death Carol of Four Bachelors London periodical would sniff if an American paper should speak of MR. SPURGEON'S poem entitled "Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me, by I" But Fraser's Magazine, in an article upon President JOHNSON'S impeachment, speaks of "the most corrupt Congress, that of the illegal appointment of Senators to the Foreign Secretary."

Then there is "Alice du Clos Longfellow's never wiser than this; and the French "Sir Peel" was never so elaborately outdone. If the writer had only called the Secretary ANDREW JACKSON, his knowledge of what he was writing about would certainly have been more evident, but the fun would have been more complete.

IT was a most painful misprint in a Democratic paper that made a Democratic orator in the New York Legislature say that "the success of the Democratic party are jealous of any infringement upon popular rights." It was probably meant to be "the success," but the reader buys his paper and takes his choice.

SIGNOR GIUSEPPE RONCONI, the celebrated singer, has recently done a generous act, which merits as general an acknowledgement. There is a most excellent charitable institution in the city called The Sanitarium Home for the Aged, which receives and cares for helpless old men and women, and secures them a home for their few and feeble years remaining. Moved by sympathy with this charity, Signor RONCONI gave a representation of the opera of "Don Rohan" at the theatre of the Union League Club, paying all the expenses, and giving the entire proceeds of the night's labors, amounting to $1620, to the treasurer of the Home. It is a noble act, which NEW YORK will not forget.

IT is a recent lecture upon the public men whom he has known, Governor HOR ACE MANN declared that the powers of DANIEL WEBSTER seemed to him those of a great author rather than statesman. It is curious that the historian ALISON says the same thing of GEORGE CANNING.

IT is becoming a. "general habit to speak of representatives in congress distinctively as "Congressmen." But Congress constitutionally consists of a Senate and House of Representatives; and as the Senate is a "Representative" it is therefore a Congressman, if sic awkward a word must be used.

A CORRESPONDENT who calls herself "A Daughter of the Regiment," writes to the Tribune: "I believe FORE was right when he wrote,

"Woman is born to dignify retreat,
To shade the sunshine, and increase the great;
Fearful of fame, unwilling to be known,
Her life, her love, her happiness her own."

What does this correspondent say to MRS. BARBAULD'S exhortation to her own sex, which she must be supposed to have known quite as well as POPE knew it? She is speaking of flowers.

"Gay without dress, and lovely without art,
They spring to cheer the sense and glad the heart.
Nor less, fair maids, in you your charms appear,
Your best, your sweetest empire is to please."

With POPE'S and MRS. BARBAULD'S sensible view of women, suppose that this correspondent contrasts WORDSWORTH'S:

"A being breathing thoughtful breath,
A traveler between life and death;
The reason firm, the temperate will,
Endurance, foresight, strength, and skill;
A perfect woman, nobly planned,
To warn, to comfort, and command;
And yet a spirit still, and bright
With something of angelic light."

This is a positive, not a negative, human being, whose sweetest empire is not to please, but to influence.

ALL Americans who have traveled in Egypt during the last few years will hear with very great regret that CHARLES HALE, the late Consul-General, has resigned. He was appointed by PRESIDENT LINCOLN, and was one of the ablest officers in our diplomatic service. Of the highest character and ability, and, although a young man, of great experience in political life, and of the truest patriotism, MR. HALE was a most satisfactory American representative; and we shall be surprised if his retirement does not lead to still higher public distinction.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

February 28.—In the Senate, Mr. Sumner introduced a bill intended to enforce the Universal Suffrage provisions of the Constitution.—In the House, Committee of the Finance Committee, made a long speech in favor of the repeal of the Legal Tender act.—In the House, a resolution was adopted declaring that such tariff for revenue upon foreign imports is required as will afford adequate protection to the home manufactures, and will impose the least burden upon and best promote the industrial interests. A like measure was caused by the general opposition by the Democrats to the proposition, that, in this session, the Republican side that the resolution was a part of the political platform of the Republican party. Portions of the session was on the Indian appropriations, and the Georgia bill.—In the Senate, the Georgia bill was passed. March 1.—In the Senate, the day was spent in a resolution of inquiry regarding the loss of the Oneida was disposed.

March 1.—In the Senate, the day was spent on the Georgia bill, which was passed.—In the House, the Tariff bill was taken up, and Mr. Brooks, of New York, made a long speech against it, with a host of tariff free trade, advocating particularly the removal of the duty on coal. Mr. Wilson introduced a bill for the establishment of a Bureau of Education, and for the admission of Georgia, but yielded the floor for other business. A resolution was adopted calling for inquiry into the facts of the massacre of the Fiegan Indians by the United States troops in command.

March 2.—In the Senate, the bill to repeal the Test Oath was passed.—The Georgia bill came up.—In the House, a bill was passed making Jersey City a port of delivery.—The Georgia bill was passed, after a thrilling undelivered speeches in the Congressional Globe were referred to the Committee on Printing. The Georgia bill was taken up, and Mr. Butler made the opening speech in favor of passage.—In the Senate, the Georgia bill was passed.—In the House, Mr. Bennett, yielded the floor for the presentation of petitions.

March 3.—In the Senate was read the Georgia bill.—In the House, the debate on the Georgia bill was continued, without coming to a vote.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

The public debt statement for March shows a decrease of $3,000,000 in the currency balance. The coin in the Treasury is $100,000,000, and the currency is $44,000,000.

The steamer Colorado, which left San Diego, San Francisco to Panama, went ashore at Point Lazaro, Lower California, and became a complete wreck. All the passengers were landed in safety, but suffered lamentably from the heat and want of provisions. The steamer Colorado, from Panama, came near enough to be boarded and took the passengers and crew of the Orizaba. In order to board the Colorado they had to walk some distance along the burnt sand of the beach, and several were lost in the sand chaparral, and were left by the steamer. Many were taken off the wreck from the wreck owned drunkenness and disorder, and at last the Orizaba herself became a total wreck.

Havana dispatches announce the surrender of the insurgents to the authorities, and that General Jordan had restored the Government. Several Americans of Greenwald, has been executed for that crime.

President GRANT has nominated JOHN W. Mason, an intelligent and well-educated mulatto, as Minister Resident and Consul-General to Liberia.

Eleven Indian were recently drawn for jury duty for the March term of a court in Wyoming Territory.

A fire occurred on the 3d instant in Neponset, Mass., in an old wooden factory. The flames spread to the woods and destroyed about 100 acres. The building had been used as a powder factory for cotton, but had not been occupied for some time. The loss is $10,000.

Reports of fresh disturbances come from the Red River country. The Indians have risen, and said to have defeated two bodies of Government troops, and have captured and entrenched to death their commander, Major Paulton.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Pope is said to be confident of the success of the proposition of infallibility. A delegation is said to secure the support of the American Bishops for it. Count DUPANLOUP, Bishop of Orleans, has written a letter to the Archbishop of Paris in which he declares that the French troops will be withdrawn from Rome in the event of the hypothetical defense of infallibility. Spain, Portugal, and Austria, it is said, have also intimated their opposition to it. The Bishop of Nancy approves the protest of DR. Dollinger against the dogma, and says that the Government of the Sultan of Turkey has granted a large income to be used as a bounty by the Catholic missionaries throughout all the Empire.

The resales of the late Anson Burlingame will be sent to the country by one of the banking houses of London. The proceeds will for the present remain in the hands of the Government, but this has caused telegraphic communication to the Governments of the United States, China, expressed its sense for the affliction suffered by both nations in MR. BURLINGAME'S death. The letter was to be forwarded by MR. J. M. Leary Brown, the Secretary of the Embassy.

The salmon fishery in the River Tweed, which has been successfully laid by the Great Eastern, and telegraphic communication between England and India is now complete.

The British Postmaster-General explains that the delays complained of in the transmission of dispatches between England and India are due to the fact that the priority granted to members of the Stock Exchange.

The question of the abolition of the death penalty came up in the Prussian Chambers a few days ago. It was strenuously opposed by Count Von Bismarck, but the measure was carried by a large majority.

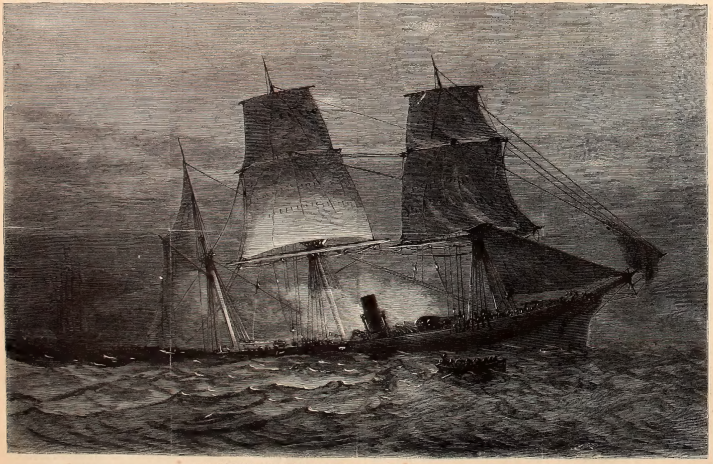
The Suez Canal question appears to have been settled by the London and Berlin Governments, which has made the passage in entire safety, though heavily loaded.

THE RECENT ACCIDENT ON THE MISSISSIPPI CENTRAL RAILROAD.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. MONTGOMERY MEIGS.—[SEE PAGE 183.]

LIEUT.-COMMANDER W. L. STEWART.—[SEE PAGE 181.]

COMMANDER E. H. WILLIAMS.—[SEE PAGE 181.]

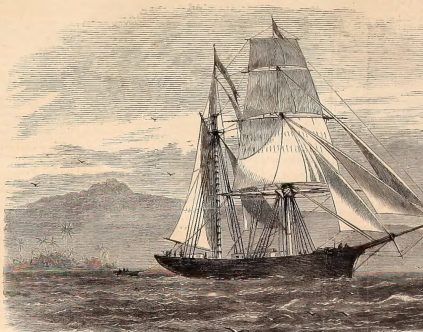
LIEUT.-COMMANDER A. W. MULDAUR.—[SEE PAGE 181.]



THE SINKING OF THE "ONEIDA" BY THE "BOMBAY."—[SEE PAGE 181.]

THE LOSS OF "THE MORNING STAR."

THE well-known Missionary brig, The Morning Star, which was built some years ago by tenent subscriptions, and of which we give a sketch on this page, was wrecked on Strong's Island on the 18th of last October. She left the harbor in the afternoon of that day, and early in the evening, which was cloudy and dark, the captain found the brig was rapidly drifting ashore with a strong current. The wind being light, and finding it impossible to keep off, the captain anchored; but about 10 o'clock a heavy squall struck the vessel, and drove her broadside on upon the rocks. About 11 o'clock the passengers were sent ashore in one of the boats, at great peril, and about half an hour afterward, the foremast having already been cut away to ease the ship, an enormous wave broke over her, making thorough wreck of every thing on deck and in the cabin — state - rooms, doors, and furniture being completely smashed by its force — and all the clothing, stores, etc., scattered and destroyed.

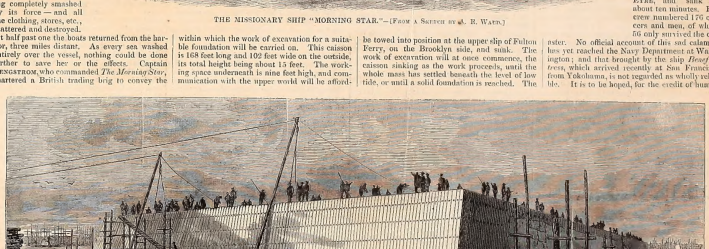


THE MISSIONARY SHIP "MORNING STAR."—[FROM A SKETCH BY A. R. WAUD.]

At half past one the boats returned from the harbor, three miles distant. As every sea washed entirely over the vessel, nothing could be done further to save her or the effects. Captain TEKARANOE, who commanded The Morning Star, chartered a British trading brig to convey the passengers to Honolulu, where they recently arrived, after a tedious passage of seventy-seven days.

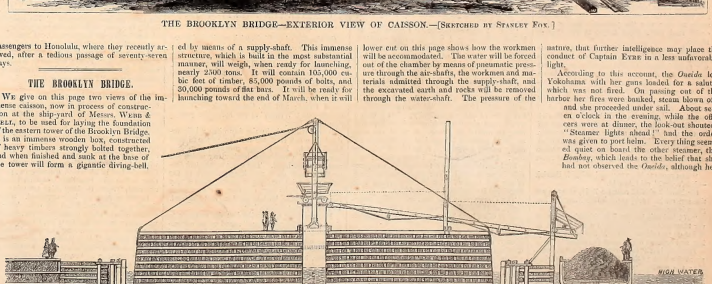
THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE.

WE give on this page two views of the immense caisson, now in process of construction at the ship-yard of Messrs. WEBB & BELL, to be used for laying the foundation of the eastern tower of the Brooklyn Bridge. It is an immense wooden box, constructed of heavy timbers strongly bolted together, and when finished and sunk at the base of the tower will form a gigantic diving-bell, within which the work of excavation for a suitable foundation will be carried on. This caisson is 168 feet long and 102 feet wide on the outside, its total height being about 15 feet. The working space underneath is nine feet high, and communication with the upper world will be afforded by means of a supply-shaft. This immense structure, which is built in the most substantial manner, will weigh, when ready for launching, nearly 2300 tons. It will contain 105,000 cubic feet of timber, 85,000 pounds of bolts, and 30,000 pounds of flat bars. It will be ready for launching toward the end of March, when it will be towed into position at the upper slip of Fulton Ferry, on the Brooklyn side, and sunk. The work of excavation will at once commence, the caisson sinking as the work proceeds, until the whole mass has settled beneath the level of low tide, or until a solid foundation is reached. The lower cut on this page shows how the workmen will be accommodated. The water will be forced out of the chamber by means of pneumatic pressure through the air-shafts, the workmen and materials admitted through the supply-shaft, and the excavated earth and rocks will be removed through the water-shaft. The pressure of the air in the chamber will be about equal to that of two atmospheres.



THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE—EXTERIOR VIEW OF CAISSON.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

When the required depth is reached, the chamber and shafts will be filled up with solid masonry; and upon this substantial bed of stone and wood, so firmly put together as to form one block, the foundations of the tower will rest. A strong coffer-dam, high enough to protect the workmen against the highest tides, will be constructed over the caisson, and within this inclosure the work of building will be commenced.



THE BROOKLYN BRIDGE—CROSS-SECTION OF CAISSON.

THE LOSS OF THE "ONEIDA."

On the 23d of January the United States ship Oneida, Commander F. H. WILLIAMS, left Yokohama, homeward bound, after a cruise of about three years in the ports of China and Japan; and on the evening of the same day was run down by the Bombay, a British steamer commanded by Captain ARTHUR WELLESLEY EYRE, and sank in about ten minutes. Her crew numbered 176 officers and men, of whom 56 only survived the disaster. No official account of this sad calamity has yet reached the Navy Department at Washington; and that brought by the ship Hesperides, which arrived recently at San Francisco from Yokohama, is not regarded as wholly reliable. It is to be hoped, for the credit of human nature, that further intelligence may place the conduct of Captain EYRE in a less unfavorable light.

According to this account, the Oneida left Yokohama with her guns loaded for a salute, which was not fired. On passing out of the harbor her fires were banked, steam blown off, and she proceeded under sail. About seven o'clock in the evening, while the officers were at dinner, the look-out shouted, "Steamer lights ahead!" and the order was given to port helm. Every thing seemed quiet on board the other steamer, the Bombay, which leads to the belief that she had not observed the Oneida, although her lights were burning brightly. The Bombay kept right on, striking the Ouvida on her starboard quarter, carrying away her poop-deck, cutting off her whole stern, one of her timbers running entirely through the bows of the Bombay at the water-line. Three times the Ouvida hailed the Bombay with "Ship ahoy!" "Stand by!" "You've cut us down!" blew her whistle, and fired her guns, all of which the officers of the Bombay say they did not hear, though the guns were distinctly heard at the port of Pernambuco, twenty miles away. The Ouvida went down stern first, in about twenty fathoms of water, with twenty officers and one hundred and fifty men. The captain of the Bombay did not stop to rescue those on board, nor did he, upon his arrival at Valparaiso, report the accident to the consul the authorities. The first known of the affair was the next morning, when Dr. Strauss came to the gangway with fifteen of the crew, arrived on foot. But two cutters were available, and the officers refused to take them while a man remained on board. Discipline was complete to the last. The sick were all being put into the boats, the officers remaining at their posts until the ship went down.

The Ouvida had lately lost all but three of her small boats in a typhoon, and one of these was cut in two by the collision, leaving but two boats to save 170 persons. When Lieutenant-Commander MULDAUR reported the vessel sinking, Captain WILLIAMS is reported to have answered, "I know it; but what can I do? I waited for more boats, and they were not allowed me." Thus, through the culpable negligence of some one, on whom official investigation will fix the responsibility, and the inexplicable conduct of the officers of the Bombay, the brave crew and their faithful officers went down with their ship.

On the same day on which the sinking of the Ouvida is depicted we give the portraits of Commander WILLIAMS, Lieutenant-Commander W. S. SCHLEY, Executive officer of the ship, and Lieutenant-Commander A.W. MULDAUR. Commander WILLIAMS especially distinguished himself during the war of the rebellion. He served in several actions, and was taken prisoner in the naval attack upon Fort Sumter, and remained in captivity for several months. He was detailed by Admiral DAHLGREN to take a principal part in the ceremonies at Sumter, after its surrender in April, 1865. Lieutenant-Commanders SCHLEY and MULDAUR also achieved honorable distinction during the war. The latter served on board the Susquehanna in the engagement with the ram Albemarle, and was promoted for gallant conduct. He was also present in the attack on Fort Fisher.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-EIGHTH.

SIFTED.

It is the nature of Truth to struggle to the light. In many men one discovery of the truth strove to pierce the overlying darkness, and to reveal itself to view, during the interval between the date of Sir Patrick's victory and the date of the wedding-day.

Signs of perturbation under the surface, suggestive of some hidden influence at work, were not wanting, as the time passed on. The one thing missing was the prophetic faculty that could read those signs aright at Windygates House.

On the very day when Sir Patrick's dextrous treatment of his sister-in-law had smoothed the way to the forming of the marriage-party, a obstacle was raised to the new arrangement by no less a person than Blanche herself. She had sufficiently recovered, toward noon, to be able to receive Arnold in her own little sitting-room. It proved to be a very brief interview. At the expiration of an hour later, Arnold appeared before Sir Patrick —while the old gentleman was pacing to and behind in the garden—with a face of blank despair. Blanche had indignantly declined even to think of such a thing as her marriage, at the time when she was heart-broken by the discovery that Arnold had left her forever.

"You gave me leave to mention it, Sir Patrick didn't you?" said Arnold.

Sir Patrick shifted round a little, so as to get the sun on his back, and admitted that he had given leave.

"If I had only known, I would rather have cut my tongue out than have said a word about it. What do you think she did? She burst out crying, and ordered me to leave the room."

It was a lovely morning—a day to arouse tenderest the heat of the sun; the birds were singing; the gardens were in the brightest bloom. Sir Patrick was supremely comfortable. The little wearisome vexations of this mortal life had receded to a respectful distance from him. He positively declined to invite them to come any nearer.

"Here is a world," said the old gentleman, getting the sun a little more broadly on his back, "of which a merciful Creator has filled with lovely sights, harmonious sounds, delicious scents; and here are creatures with faculties expressly made for enjoyment of those sights, sounds, and scents —to say nothing of Love, Dinner, and Sleep, all thrown into the bargain. And these same creatures hate, scarve, tear sleepless at each other, see nothing pleasant, hear nothing pleasant, smell nothing pleasant—cry bitter tears, say hard words, contract painful illnesses; wither, sink, age, die! What does it mean, Arnold? And how much longer is it all to go on?"

The fine connecting link between the blindness of Blanche to the advantage of being married, and the blindness of humanity to the advantage of being in existence, though sufficiently perceptible no doubt to venerable Philosophy ripening in the sun, was absolutely invisible to a mile, for discerning ground, in a remote part of the park—where Jones was reverting to Blanche, asked what was to be done.

"What do you do with a fire, when you can extinguish it?" said Sir Patrick. "Put it out. Let it blaze till it goes out. What do you do with a wound which you can't pacify for? Let her blaze till she goes out."

Arnold failed to see the wisdom embodied in that excellent advice. "I thought you would have helped me to put things right with Blanche, he said.

"I am helping you. Let Blanche alone. Don't speak of the marriage again, the next time you see her. If she mentions it, be grave, and tell her you won't press the question any more. I shall speak to her in resolution to keep Miss Silvester to go her own way? Those were the questions which insisted on coming round to the one question which Arnold himself was always round in the orderly progression of the dinner.

Sir Patrick's plan was carried out. Nothing took place at the table—appeared in the drawing-room afterward.

Sir Patrick came in to tea, with the gentlemen, still uncertain as to the right course to take in the matter of the telegram. One look at Blanche's sad face and Blanche's altered manner decided him. What would be the result if Arnold were to begin by summing the effect? Let trace Miss Silvester, and if he lost the trace a second time? He was the best man of the party and to see. Could any consideration justify him in turning her mind back on the memory of the friend who had left her at the moment when it was just beginning to look forward for the first time in years of her marriage? Nothing could justify him; and nothing should induce him to do it.

The evening—soundly enough, from his own point of view—on that basis, Sir Patrick determined on observing it. He addressed himself to his friend at Edinburgh. That night he warned Duncan to preserve the strictest silence as to the telegram. Next day, he burned it, in the case of accidents, with his own hand, in his own room.

During the next day and looking out of his window, Sir Patrick saw the two young people taking their morning walk at a moment when they happened to cross the open grassy space which separated the two shrubberies at Windygates. Arnold was evidently pressing Blanche's wish, and they were talking confidentially with their heads close together. "She is coming round already!" thought the old gentleman, as the two disappeared again in the second shrubbery from view. "I knew how things are running smoothly at last!"

Among the ornaments of Sir Patrick's bedroom there was a view (taken from above) of one of the Highland waterfalls. If he had looked at the picture, when he turned away from his window, he might have remarked that a river which is running with its utmost smoothness at one moment, may be a river which plunges into its most violent agitation at another; and he might have wondered, with certain misgivings, that the progress of a stream of water has been long undisturbed, with the universal consent of humanity, to the progress of the steam of life.

FIFTH SCENE. GLASGOW.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-NINTH.

ANNE AMONG THE LAWYERS.

On the morning Sir Patrick received the second of the two telegrams sent to him from Edinburgh, four respectable inhabitants of the City of Glasgow were assembled in the coffee-room of an hotel, for the purpose of transacting business.

It was still early in the day when a lady arrived, in a cab from the railway, at the Sheep's Head Hotel. The lady's luggage consisted of a box, and of a well-worn leather bag which she carried on her shoulder. The name on the box, recently written on a new luggage label, as the color of the ink and paper showed), was a very common one—Mrs. Graham. The name on the bag was a number of ladies, both in Scotland and England.

Mrs. Graham.

Encountering the landlord at the entrance to the hotel, "Mrs. Graham" asked to be accommodated with a bedroom, and was instantly shown in due course to the chamber-maid on duty at the time. Returning to the little room behind the bar, in which the accounts were kept, Mr. Karnegie surprised his wife by moving more quickly and speaking much brighter than usual. Being questioned, Mr. Karnegie (who had cast his eye at a passing glance at the lady on the passage) announced that one "Mrs. Graham" had just arrived, and was then and there to be looked as inhabiting Room number seventeen. Being informed (with considerable asperity of tone and manner) that this answer failed to account for the interest which appeared to have been inspired in him by a total stranger, Mr. Karnegie came to the point, and confessed that if "Mrs. Graham" was one of the sweetest-looking women he had seen for many a long day, and that he feared she was very seriously out of health.

Upon that reply the eyes of Mrs. Karnegie developed in size, and the color of Mrs. Karnegie deepened in tint. She got up from her chair, and said that it might be just as well if she personally superintended the installation of "Mrs. Graham" in her room, and personally satisfied herself that "Mrs. Graham" was a fit inmate to be received at the Sheep's Head Hotel. Mr. Karnegie, thereupon, did what he always did—he agreed with his wife.

The chamber was about to present for some little time. On her return her eyes had a certain tigerish cast in them when they rested on Mr. Karnegie. Certain facts and some light refreshment to be taken to Number Seventeen. This done—bringing any visible connection to account for the remark—she turned upon her husband, and said, "Mr. Karnegie, you are a fool." Mr. Karnegie replied, "Why, my dear?" Mrs. Karnegie snapped her fingers, and said, "That for your reasons!" You don't know a respectable looking woman when you see her." Mr. Karnegie agreed with his wife.

Nothing more was said until the waiter appeared at the bar with his tray. Mrs. Karnegie, having first settled the tray off, without intermitting her customary investigation, sat down suddenly with a thump, and said to her husband (who had returned to the world in the interval), "Don't talk to Me about her being out of health! Her for her health! It's trouble she's after."

Mr. Karnegie said, "Is it now?" Mrs. Karnegie replied, "When I have said, It is, I consider myself insulted if standing by, says he it?"

Then Mr. Karnegie agreed with his wife.

There was a pause. Mrs. Karnegie added up a bill, with a face of disgust. Mr. Karnegie looked at her with a face of wonder. Mrs. Karnegie suddenly asked him why he wasted his looks on her, when he would have done better to look at the ceiling? Mr. Karnegie, upon that, attempted to compromise the matter, by looking, in the interim, at his own boots. Mrs. Karnegie wished to know whether, after twenty years of married life, she was considered by her husband competent to judge of a husband. Treated with bare civility (she expected no more), she might have gone on to expect—from Mr. Karnegie—to know more. She might also have been prevailed on to mention that "Mrs. Graham" had asked a very remarkable question of a business nature, at the interview between them up stairs. As it was, Mrs. Karnegie's lips were sealed, and Mr. Karnegie deny, if he dared, that he richly deserved it. Mr. Karnegie agreed with his wife.

In half an hour more, "Mrs. Graham" came down stairs; and a cab was sent for. Mr. Karnegie, in fear of a misunderstanding with coachwise, kept in a corner. Mrs. Karnegie followed him into the corner, and asked him how he supposed she was? Did he suppose that, after twenty years of married life, that his wife is going? "Go, you brute, and hand Mrs. Graham into the cab!"

Mr. Karnegie obeyed. He asked, at the corner of the High Street of Glasgow in his field the driver to go. The reply informed him that the cab was to go to Mr. Cramp's office. The office of Mr. Camp, the lawyer. Assuming "Mrs. Graham" to be a stranger in Glasgow, and remembering that Mr. Camp was Mr. Karnegie's lawyer, the inference appeared to be, that "Mrs. Graham" had come to the metropolis, addressed to the landlady, had related to legal business, and to the discovery of a trust-worthy person capable of assisting her in her law.

Returning to the bar, Mr. Karnegie found his eldest daughter in charge of the books, the bar, and the waiters. Mrs. Karnegie had retired to her own room, justly indignant with her husband for his habitual stupidity in missing "Mrs. Graham" into the cab before her own eyes. "It's the old story, Pa," remarked Miss Karnegie, with the most perfect composure. "Ma told you to do it, of course; and then Ma says you've insulted her, because you've done what you know she told you to do."

Returning to the bar, Mr. Karnegie found his eldest daughter in charge of the books, the bar, and the waiters. Mrs. Karnegie had retired to her own room, justly indignant with her husband for his habitual stupidity in missing "Mrs. Graham" into the cab before her own eyes. "It's the old story, Pa," remarked Miss Karnegie, with the most perfect composure. "Ma told you to do it, of course; and then Ma says you've insulted her, because you've done what you know she told you to do."

Mr. Camp sat at his private room, absorbed over his papers. Multitudinous business documents were, they appeared to be not sufficiently numerous to satisfy Mr. Camp. He rang his bell, and ordered more.

The clerk appearing with a new pile of papers, appeared also with a message. A lady, recommended by Mrs. Karnegie, of the Sheep's Head, wished to consult Mr. Camp professionally. Mr. Camp looked at his watch, counting out precious time before him, in a little stand on the table, and said, "Show the lady in, in half an hour."

In ten minutes the lady appeared. She took the chair left vacant and lifted her veil. The same effect which had been produced on Mr. Karnegie, was once more produced on Mr. Camp. For the first time in that lawyer's long past, he felt personally interested in a total stranger. It might have been curiosity, or it might have been love; it might have been something in her manner. Whatever it was, it took swift hold of him, and made him, to his own secret astonishment, unconsciously anxious to hear what she had to say.

The lady announced—with a low sweet voice, touched with a quiet sadness—that her business related to a question of marriage (as marriage is understood by Scottish law), and that her own peace of mind, and the happiness of a person very dear to her, were concerned alike in the opinion which Mr. Camp might give when he had been placed in possession of the facts.

She then proceeded to state the facts, without mentioning names: relating in every particular, precisely the same succession of events which Geoffrey Delamayn had already related to Sir Patrick Lundie—with this one difference, that she acknowledged herself to be the woman who was personally concerned in knowing whether, by Scottish law, she was now held to be a married woman or not.

Mr. Camp's opinion given upon this, after certain questions had been asked and answered, differed from Sir Patrick's opinion, as given at Windygates. He too quoted the language used by the eminent judge—Lord Deas—but he drew an inference of his own from it. "In Scotland, consent makes marriage," he said; "and consent may be proved by inference. I see a plain inference in the circumstances of the case—circumstances which you have related to me; and I say you are a married woman."

The effect produced on the lady, when sentence was pronounced on her in those terms, was so distressing that Mr. Camp sent a message up stairs to his wife; and Mrs. Camp appeared in her husband's private room, in humble imitation for the first time in her life. When Mrs. Camp's services had in some degree restored the lady to herself, Mr. Camp followed with a word of professional comfort. He, like Sir Patrick, acknowledged the scandalous divergence of opinions produced by the conflicting nationality of the marriage-law of Scotland. He, like Sir Patrick, declared it to be quite possible that another lawyer might arrive at another conclusion. "Go," he said, giving her his card, with a line of writing on it, "to my colleague, Mr. Dodds, and you'll soon see."

The lady gratefully thanked Mr. Camp and his wife, and went next to the office of Mr. Crum.

Mr. Crum was the older lawyer of the two, and the busier lawyer of the two. He was the suit the influence which the charm that there was in this woman exercised—more or less, over every man who came in contact with her. He listened with a patience which was rare with him; he put his questions with a gentleness which was rarer still; and when he was in possession of the circumstances he said, in opinion flatly contradicted the opinion of Mr. Camp!

"No marriage, ma'am," he said, positively, "in Scotland in favor of perhaps establishing a marriage, if you propose to claim the man. But that, as I understand it, is exactly what you don't wish to do."

The relief to the lady, on hearing this, almost overpowered her. For some minutes she was unable to speak. Mr. Crum did, what he had never done yet in all his experience as a lawyer. He patted a client on the shoulder; and, more extraordinary still, he gave a client permission to waste his time. "Wait, and compose yourself," said Mr. Crum—administering the law of humanity. The lady composed herself. "I must ask you some questions, next," said Mr. Crum—administering the law of the land. The lady bowed, and waited for him to speak.

"I know, thus far, that you decline to claim the gentleman," said Mr. Crum. "I want to know why, whether the gentleman is willing to claim you."

The answer to this was given in the most positive terms. The gentleman was not even aware of the position in which he stood. And, more yet, he was expected to be married to another friend whom the lady had in the world.

Mr. Crum opened his eyes—considered—and put another question as delicately as he could.

"Would it be painful to you to tell me how the gentleman came to occupy that peculiar position in which he stands now?"

The lady acknowledged that it would be indescribably painful to her to answer that question.

Mr. Crum offered a suggestion under the form of an inquiry.

"Would it be painful to you to reveal the circumstances—in the interests of the gentleman's future prospects—to some discreet person (a legal person would be best) who is not known to you as a stranger to you both?"

The lady seemed herself willing to make any sacrifice, on those conditions—no matter how painful it might be—for her friend's sake.

Mr. Crum considered a little longer, and then delivered his word of advice.

"At the present stage of the affair," he said, "I need not tell you what is the first step that you ought to take under the circumstances. Inform the gentleman of your decision, by word of mouth or by writing—of the position in which he stands; and authorize him to place the case in the hands of a person known to you both, who is competent to decide on what you are to do next. Do I understand that you know of such a person so qualified?"

The lady answered that she knew of such a person.

Mr. Crum asked if a day had been fixed for the gentleman's marriage.

The lady answered that she had made this inquiry herself on the last occasion when she had seen the gentleman's betrothed wife. The marriage was to take place, on a day to be hereafter chosen, at the end of the autumn.

"That," said Mr. Crum, "is a fortunate circumstance. You have time before you. Time is, here, of the first importance. In your place not to waste it."

The lady said she would return to her hotel and write by that night's post, to warn the gentleman of the position in which he stood, and to authorize him to refer the matter to a competent and trust-worthy friend known to them both.

On rising to leave the room she was seized with giddiness, and with soffle sudden pang of pain, which turned her deadly pale and forced her to drop back into her chair. Mr. Crum had no wife; but he possessed a housekeeper—and he offered to send for her. The lady made a sign in the negative. She drank a little water, and conquered the pain. "I am sorry to have alarmed you," she said. "It is nothing—I am better now." Mr. Crum gave her his arm, and put her into the cab. She looked so pale and faint that he proposed sending his housekeeper with her. No: it was only five minutes' drive to the hotel. The lady thanked him—and went her way back by herself.

"The letter!" she said, when she was alone, "if I can only live long enough to write the letter!"

CHAPTER THE THIRTIETH.

ANNE IN THE NEWSPAPERS.

MRS. KARNEGIE was a woman of feeble intellectual violent temper; prompt to take offense, and not, for the most part, easy to appease. But Mrs. Karnegie being—as we all are in our various degrees—a compound of many opposite qualities, possessed a character with more than one side to it, and had her generous moments as well as her human faults. Seeds of sound good feeling were scattered away in the remoter corners of her nature, waiting only for the one fertilizing occasion that was to help them to spring up. The occasion arrived when Mr. Karnegie stood in the cab brought Mr. Crum's client back to the hotel. The face of the weary, heart-sick woman, as she slowly crossed the hall, touched that was heartiest and best in Mrs. Karnegie's nature, and said to her, as if in words, "Lessons of this broken creature? Oh, wife and mother, is there no appeal to your common womanhood here?"

"I am afraid you have overtired yourself, ma'am. Let me help you upstairs to your room."

"Send me pen, ink, and paper," was the answer. "I must write a letter. I must do it at once."

It was useless to remonstrate with her. She tried to accept no other assistance than was provided the writing materials were supplied first. Mrs. Karnegie sent them up, and then compounded a certain mixture known in the family for which The Sheep's Head was famous, with the addition of a little cayenne pepper and ready—and Miss Karnegie was dispatched by her mother (who had other business on hand at the time) to take it up stairs.

After the lapse of a few moments a cry of alarm was heard from the upper landing. Mrs. Karnegie recognized her daughter's voice, and hastened to the bedroom floor.

"Oh, mamma! Look at her! look at her!"

The letter was on the table with the first lines written. The woman was on the sofa, with her handkerchief twisted between her teeth, and her tortured face terrible to look at. Mrs. Karnegie raised her head, examined the letter, then suddenly changed color, and sent her daughter out of the room with directions to dispatch a messenger instead for medical help.

Left alone with the sufferer, Mrs. Karnegie exerted her will, and her skill, as she had never her left hand fell helpless over the side of the bed. Mrs. Karnegie suddenly checked the word of sympathy as it rose to her lips—carefully lifted the hand, and looked, with a momentary awareness of anxiety, at the third finger. There was a ring on it. Mrs. Karnegie's face softened on the instant: the work of pity that had been suspended the moment before came to her hand once more. "Poor soul!" said the respectable landlady, talking unconsciously to herself. "Where's your husband, dear? Try and tell me."

The doctor made his appearance, and went up to the patient.

Time passed, and Mr. Karnegie and his daughter, carrying out the directions which they had received, sent a message from up stairs which was ominous of something out of the common. The message gave the name and address of a medical nurse—with the doctor's compliments, and would Mrs. Karnegie have the kindness to send for her immediately.

The nurse was found and sent up stairs.

Time went on, and the business of the hotel went on, and it was getting to be late in the evening, when Mrs. Karnegie appeared at the top of the narrow behind the bar. Her landlady's face was grave; the landlady's manner was subdued. "Very, very ill," was the answer to the question her daughter's inquiries. When she and her husband were together, a little later, the same news from up stairs in greater detail. "A child born dead," said Mrs. Karnegie, in gentler tones than were customary with her, "and the mother dying, poor thing, so far as I can see."

A little later the doctor came down. Dead? No—Likely to live? Impossible to say. The doctor returned twice in the course of the night. Much time to the same answer. "Wait till to-morrow."

The next day came. She rallied a little. Toward the afternoon she began to speak. She expressed no surprise at seeing strangers by her bedside: her mind was clear, but her memory was insensibility. Then back to delirium once more. The doctor said, "This may last for weeks. Or it may end suddenly at any time. Is there you did something toward finding her friends."

(Her friends! She had left the one friend she had forever!)

The nurse was summoned to give his advice. The first thing he asked for was the unfinished letter.

It was blotted, it was illegible in more places than one. With pains and care they made out the address at the beginning and the ending, with some fragments of the lines that followed. It began: "Dear Mr. Blanche," and ended: "I am writing got, little by little, worse and worse. To the eyes of the strangers who looked at it, it ran thus: "I should ill require * * * Blanche's interests * * * For God's sake! * * * don't think of me * * *." There was a little more, but not so much as one word, in those last lines, was legible.

The names mentioned in the letter were reported by the doctor and the nurse to be also the names on her lips, when she spoke in her wanderings. "Mr. Brinkworth," and "Blanche"—her mind ran incessantly on those two persons. The one intelligible thing that she mentioned in connection with them was the letter. She was perpetually trying, trying, trying to take that unfinished letter to the post; and she could never get there. Sometimes the post was across the sea. Sometimes it was at the top of an inaccessible mountain. Sometimes it was built in by prodigious walls all round it. Sometimes a man stopped her cruelly at the moment when she was close at the post, and forced her back. Sometimes she broke away from it. Once or once mentioned this visionary man by his name. They made it out to be "Geoffrey."

Finding no clew to her identity either in the letter that she had tried to write or in the wild words that escaped her from time to time, it was decided to search her luggage, and to look at the address which she had worn when she arrived at the hotel.

Her black box sufficiently proclaimed itself as recently purchased. On opening it the address of a Glasgow trunk-maker was discovered inside. The linen was also new, and unmarked. The receipted bill for the box was found with it. The tradesmen, sent for in each case, and questioned, referred the lady to her books. As soon as the box and the linen had both been purchased on the day when she appeared at the hotel.

Her black bag was opened next. A sum of between eighty and ninety pounds in Bank of England notes, a few simple articles belonging to the toilet; materials for needle-work; and a photographic portrait of a young lady, inscribed, "To Anne, from Blanche," were found in the bag—but no letters, and nothing whatever that could afford the slightest clew to the owner, or could be traced. The pocket in her dress was searched next. It contained a purse, an empty gold-case, and a new handkerchief unmarked.

Mr. Camp shook his head.

"A woman can't disguise without any letters in it," he said, "suggests to my mind a woman who has a motive of her own for keeping her movements a secret. I suspect she has destroyed her letters, and emptied her card-case, with that view." Mrs. Karnegie and the nurse, examining the linen which the so-called "Mrs. Graham" had worn when she arrived at the inn, proved the soundness of the lawyer's opinion. In every case the marks had been cut out. Mrs. Karnegie began to doubt whether the lady whom she had seen on the third finger of the lady's left hand had been placed there with the sanction of the law.

There was but one chance left of discovering—or rather of attempting to discover—her friends. Mr. Camp drew out an advertisement to be inserted in the Glasgow newspapers. If those newspapers failed, copies of the lady's number of her family, she would, in all probability, be claimed. In the contrary event there would be nothing for it but to wait for her recovery or her death—with the money belonging to her locked up, and deposited in the landlord's strongbox.

The advertisement appeared. They waited for three days without receiving any reply to it. No change of importance occurred, during the same period, in the condition of the suffering woman. Mr. Camp looked in, toward evening, and said, "We have done our best. There is no help for it but to wait."

Far away in Perthshire that third evening was marked as a joyful occasion at Windygates House. Blanche had consented at last to listen to Arnold's entreaties, and had sanctioned the opening of a letter to London, to order her wedding-dress.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT IN MISSISSIPPI.

WE give on page 180 a sketch of the scene of the railroad accident near Oxford, Mississippi, on the 25th of February, taken a short time after the occurrence. Our readers will remember that the train run off the rails while crossing a high trestle-bridge over a ravine, crushing down through the woodwork and breaking in pieces. Twenty persons were instantly killed and sixty wounded. The cause of the accident is believed to have been the unsound condition of the trestle timbers, which permitted the rails to spread apart, thus switching off the cars.

NATIONAL CHARACTERISTICS.

"THE fashionable characterizers of modern nations," wrote Joseph Baretti, Samuel Johnson's friend, and the author of one of the best works on Spain in the English language—"a breed that in this century has prodigiously multiplied all over Europe—are indispensably obliged that there is a very great difference between the natural inclinations of this and that people of mankind, for instance, silence is as much inherent in the Spaniard and the Italian as the opposite quality is in the Englishman or the Frenchman. That this is not the case, sober reason would tell us if we would but think. There being no inherent qualities but what are common to the whole species; and should we grant that the characteristics are to be found in those nations, it would not avoid adopting the absurdly wicked opinion, that Providence has been so partial as to impart to one generation an innate love of labor, and to another an invincible aversion from it. These considerations often put me out of humor with those puny philosophers, who are perpetually ringing in our ears that the Italians are naturally jealous, the French naturally volatile, the Germans naturally heavy, the Spaniards naturally grave and lazy. Assertions of this sort should perpetually be combated, and every opportunity seized to condemn them as partial, as ridiculous, as absurd, and as generally tending to raise the contempt and antipathy of one part of mankind against the other—which ought to be nobody's business but the devil's. It is essentially the devil's business to spread these erroneous notions, that men may not consider themselves as brothers, but contemn and hate each other. Men not influenced by the suggestions of the devil have long since told us that mankind are nothing else but a great family; and that the wisest friend to that family who contributes his mite toward keeping it in discord and in enmity with partial and false representations."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THERE brothers, during a remarkable resemblance to each other, recently kept a shop in the same barber-shop, and on the same door, to be shaved: one going in the morning, the other in the afternoon. A wag, who had been shaved by the morning barber, what was a German, dropped his razor in astonishment, and exclaimed, "Mein Gott! mein Gott! de fellow beard I never saw: I shaves him die morning', shaves him at dinner-time, and he comes back now, mit his beard so long as it never vash."

A TRADE THAT NEVER FAILS.—No miller need ever be out of employment, for he can always grind his teeth.

"TAPS TO THE CORK."—A good apple.

LATEST FROM RUSH.—Our own correspondent, who has just returned from Scott County, Illinois, where the big scene first occurred, writes us that the native shriek are no great Shekles. (Great Republican Jubilee.)

MOTTO FOR FRENCH RED REPUBLICANS OF 1870.—Rouge et "Jolie."

THE TEUTON'S LAMENT.

Miss Col'mbia, she has language dat, I can not English spraken,
For whatt'er story I tells him right,
So sure I twice mistaken.

If I say "Hans" it vexats my beer,
I mean that lager mean;
Her mouth she sings dat folks ride on
Ven dey go dead a-lean.

Dey say dey "raise" a building,
Den I vould "lift" dem crane;
"Rays" mean den ting de sun trows,
Ven it is not in rain.

"Meat" mean den ting dat's not to eat,
"Meet" also mean to greet;
'Tis only "meter" to measure dese ting,
Ven somebody "greets" you.

Shust de same words means every ting.
It makes no difference
You spell him die or father way,
You wouldn't know de same.

Miss Col.! mine Col.! so sure I knows
I can not English spraken,
For vat I dessert for vat I dinner mean him right,
Yy, then, I gets mistaken.

THE SPIRIT OF THE TIMES.—The ghost of Hamlet's father.

The selectmen of a Connecticut town advertise a bridge for sale. The price of a stolen heavse "with the body of the thief inside."

A GILTY TRADE.—A carver and gilder.

"EXCUSE me, Sir," said a beggar, "but you have dropped a dollar." "Well, well, my child, keep it for your honesty."

It is said that there is no holier spot of ground than a graveless churchyard.

"I love you one," said a withered old bachelor to a lady, the other night, at a party. "For what?" said she. "Why, for two," was the gallant response. "If I did so," was the rather ill-natured reply, "I beg you him not degrade it as a compliment, for, though an old man, you may be still a young gentleman."

"HAVE you ever seen the Prince of Wales?" asked a lady of an Irish gentleman. "Indeed, Certainly, marm, saw prince of 'em in the primer long afore I ever went to sea," said Dagherty.

PORTUGUESE SWEETS.—Painted stage beauties.

A malicious libel is going the rounds that vegetation is scarce at Cape Cod that two mullen stalks and a whortleberry-bush is called a forest.

On a tombstone in Germany there is painted a red ox, with tail elevated and head sunk, evidently on the point of rushing furiously into a china shop. Incidental also is pressed up against a rock. Below the picture is the following epitaph:

"By the threat of ox's horn
Come I into heaven born
All so quickly did I die,
With as much ease as most I;
But in eternity rest I now
Under the tree, with head, thou?"

A pupil of the public schools, during his parsing exercise, came to the word "which," which he boldly declared "a noun." "You have never seen it used as such," replied the teacher. But I have, though," confidently retorted the young hopeful. "Where?" Down in the Fifth Ward, in the Police Reports, and I shall be as another man." The teacher was nonplussed.

INTEMPERATE LANGUAGE.—"Let's imbibe."

Some time since a gentleman died who, during life, refused to subscribe for a local newspaper. "One or two numbers after his demise his wife received, through a mistake on the part of the publisher, a bill which was followed by a polite note, requesting a remittance. 'Dear wife, I now believe.' Please send me my thin clothes and a barrel of ice-water."

"I am astonished, my dear Miss Rose, at your sentiments; you make me start." "Well, Sir, I have always thought you would start for the ball Wednesday."

FAST HORSES—Those that are safely secured.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.—[DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS MUST AND SHALL BE PRESERVED.

"FORT SUMTER."

THE MAN THAT HAULS DOWN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS SHOOT HIM ON THE SPOT.

THE PHILOSOPHER AND THE MONKEY.

On, little philosopher monkey-faced,
Peer in your crucible, pant and glow,
Pound your powder, and push your paste,
But still remember how glad you raced
In the woods of Monkey-land long ago.

That was gags and ages past,
You've left the Clews and the Tail behind;
Slowly you've thriven, slowly cast
Skin after skin, and all but lost
Behoid! the flower of a human mind.

Tender flower of a plant that dies,
Slender flower with a light of its own,
This is the thing you'd understand,
Little philosopher, pray be wise,
Remember, and let the flower alone.

You cry: "I've examined the four-foot kind,
Followed the chain up, link by link,
Now to dissect the magic of Mind.
I shall never slumber, until I find
The mechanism by which we think!

"Turn a key, and the watch will go,
Move a muscle, the bird takes wing,
All motion of any kind below
Is something mechanical, and so
The mind is moved at the pull of a string.

"Which? 's the question. I must pause
On the brink of the mystery, turning pale:
How to cast the invisible lure?
How does a lion open his jaws?
How does a monkey wig his Tail?"

Little philosopher, bark to me:
Walking once on my garden ground,
I found my monkey beneath a tree,
With a mushroom upon his knees,
Wagging his tail in delight at the sound.

Then I watched the monkey glow and burn,
Lifting the lid of the box prep in:
Then, bit by bit, with a visage stern,
Holding each piece to his ear in turn,
He broke it up and began to gap.

Ah, the music! 'Twas fed! 'twas fed!
Each part of the wonderful whole was dumb,
The flower was plucked, and the bloom was shed,
Well might the monkey scratch his head,
And staring down at the strings, look glum.

Little philosopher, stay, oh stay!
Let the wrecks of the mind-souls go!
Clews and tail have been cast away,
But peep in the looking-glass to-day,
Remember Monkey-land long ago.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

En Blue Books.—Book XV.

CHAPTER XI.

THE PARTNERS.

AFTER having been introduced to her at Bayswater, Miss Betsy Boyce called on Mrs. Lovegrove. The latter was a good deal flattered by the visit; which might have been inferred by those who knew her well, from the loftily patronizing tone she assumed in speaking of Miss Boyce.

"Miss Boyce is a thoroughly well-connected person, you said, Mrs. Lovegrove, speaking across the dinner-table to her husband with much impressiveness.

"Ah!" said Mr. Lovegrove, who was engaged in carving beef for the family.

"It is curious how immediately one recognizes blood."

"Hm!" murmured Mr. Lovegrove. "A little of the brown, Augustus?"

"No meat for me, Sir, thank you! Vigil of Blessed Rancocheus," returned the son of the house, austerely.

"As you will, you wont to say," proceeded Mrs. Lovegrove, "that his was some of the best blood in England—in a genealogical sense, I mean. Not literally, of course, poor man, for he was a martyr to gout.

"Oh!" exclaimed Mr. Lovegrove, whose interest in his dinner appeared to be more intense than that which he felt in his wife's respected parent.

"And in Miss Boyce," continued Sarah, in an instructive manner which was one of her peculiarities, "there is, despite eccentricity, an air of birth and breeding quite unmistakable."

"She seems a good-natured old soul," said Mr. Lovegrove. Wherein his youngest daughter, Phœbe, began to giggle.

"Levity, Phœbe, is low," said Mrs. Lovegrove, sternly.—"Miss Boyce gave me a terrible account of—" Mrs. Lovegrove broke off in her speech, and pointed downward with her finger in a manner that might have seemed to argue a startling allusion to regions usually ignored in polite society. But her family understood very well that she intended to signify Mr. Frost, whose office was on the floor beneath the room they were sitting in.

"Eh?" said Mr. Lovegrove. And this time he raised his eyes from his plate.

"I mean of the wife—of the wife. Deplorable!"

"Well, then, she is a less good-natured old soul than I thought," said Mr. Lovegrove, gravely.

"Mrs. Frost is her friend. I don't like that in Miss Betsy, my dear."

"Understand me, Augustus!" said Mrs. Lovegrove.

This phrase was frequently the preface to a rather long discourse on her part.

Her husband pushed his plate back, and began to cut his bread into little bits, which he afterward arranged in symmetrical patterns with much care and exactitude.

"Understand me! I am not implicating Miss Boyce. Far from it. The deductions drawn from what she said are mine. I only am responsible for them. If too severely logical, I can but regret it. But I conceive they will be found to be correct when the facts are stated."

The facts, when arrived at, were not altogether new to Mr. Lovegrove. Mrs. Frost was extravagant. Mrs. Frost was selfish in seeking her own pleasure and society in a crisis which her husband did not foresee, and of which he disapproved. Mrs. Frost, who after all was but the wife of a respectable solicitor, had costly jewels fit for any lady in the land! These were the main counts of Mrs. Lovegrove's indictment; and they were not unfrequently varied with an extraneous matter.

That afternoon Augustus Lovegrove said a few words to his father when they were alone together in the office.

"Do you know, father, I think that Mr. Frost ought to look after that wife of his a little more."

"Look after her! What do you mean?"

"I mean that he ought to curb her expenditure a little."

"I suppose he knows his own business best, Gus."

"Well, he certainly is very clever at other people's business. I don't deny that. But it may be that he is making a mess of his own. Such things sometimes happen. I did here—"

"Eh? What did you hear?"

"Well, there is a rumour about the Furthenope Embellishment Company. And I did hear that Mr. Frost had dipped pretty deep in it."

"Gad, I hope you have not got much speculation in you, Sir! I always injurious to a professional man to be exposed unable to keep his tongue between his teeth."

"I, Sir? Oh, no; you may be quite easy about that. I thought I might as well mention it to you."

"I don't attach my importance to it, Gus. Frost is too clear-sighted and long-headed to burn his fingers."

"So much the better, Sir," returned Augustus, quietly. And there was no more said at that time on the matter.

But Mr. Lovegrove thought of it seriously. Mr. Frost's proceedings had been by no means satisfactory of late. If he had not been so, he had neglected the business of the firm, nor that he had absented himself frequently from the private affairs on occasions when matters pertaining to the office should have claimed his best energies. It was true that Mr. Lovegrove had accidentally heard that his partner had dealings in Bayswater, of a questionable character; and nor the floating rumors that tradesmen had been dunning for their bills at the elegant little house in Bayswater. It was not any one of these circumstances, taken singly, that impressed him, so much as the fact that they had been and were questionably did so. And his wife's gossip respecting Mrs. Frost's extravagance, to which he would at another time have attached no importance, became disquieting as adding one more to the accumulation of other facts. Later on that same afternoon, as he was leaving the office, he saw Hugh Lockwood coming out of Mr. Frost's private room. On the following day he had a confidential testimony as to the hour of Lady Tallis Gale's death. Mr. Lovegrove and the young man had conceived a strong respect for one another. There had been the slightest possible acquaintance between them to that time.

"Good-day, Mr. Lockwood," said Lovegrove, offering his hand. He was not surprised to see the young man coming from Mr. Frost's room. He was aware of the old and close intimacy that had existed between the two families. "Hugh Gale?"

"Good-day, Sir."

"Is any thing the matter, Mr. Lockwood?" asked Lovegrove, struck with the expression of Hugh's face.

"Nothing, thank you. That is—to say truth, I have been put out a little."

Hugh hastily shook Mr. Lovegrove's hand, and walked away with a quick step. Lovegrove stood looking after him thoughtfully for a moment. Then he turned, and went into Mr. Frost's inner sanctum. He opened the door without first knocking at it, and, as the heavy panels swung back noiselessly, he had time to see his partner before his partner was aware of his presence.

Mr. Frost was standing at the little fire-place with his back to the door. He was leaning with his left elbow on the mantle-piece, and supporting his head on his hands. At a sight noise made by the door opening turned, and with his face more than almost started on seeing the haggard face that confronted him. Mr. Frost's forehead was knit and creased into deep wrinkles of anxiety. There was a dark red flush upon it, and it seemed expressive of intense pain of mind or body. His jaw hung, and his usually firmly closed lips were parted. His eyes stared wildly, and seemed darkly to take note of that which they looked upon. All this lasted but for a second. He passed his hand over his forehead, and said—

"Hullo, Lovegrove! I didn't hear you come in. Do you want me? I hope not, just now; for I have an appointment, and must be off."

"I did want to say a word to you. I can wait, however. Do you know, Frost, that you are not looking at all well?"

"Am I not? Well, I have a devil of a headache."

"Don't you do any thing for it? You really do look uncommonly ill."

"There's no cure for these things but time and patience. I have been overworking myself lately, I suppose. I've also I'm growing old."

"Old! nonsense! You are—why you must be five years my junior, and I—"

"Oh, you are as sound as a roach, and as fresh as a daisy. But, my dear fellow, age can not always be counted by years. I feel worn and weary. I know I have this ceaseless grind, grind, grind at the mill!"

"Hm! Well, for my part, I can never be thoroughly happy out of harness for long together. So then we take our easy spells of every summer, I am always the first to get tired of it. I long for what you call the pounce and excitement."

"Happy you!"

"If you like it so, why don't you retire and give up your share of the business to my Gus? You haven't a tribe of daughters to provide for. You must be independent."

"Rich!" echoed Mr. Frost. "Who shall say what 'rich' means in these days? And besides, my wife—you see she always interrupted with an extraneous matter.

That afternoon Augustus Lovegrove said a few words to his father when they were alone together in the office.

"Do you know, father, I think that Mr. Frost ought to look after that wife of his a little more."

"Look after her! What do you mean?"

"I mean that he ought to curb her expenditure a little."

"I suppose he knows his own business best, Gus."

"Well, he certainly is very clever at other people's business. I don't deny that. But it may be that he is making a mess of his own. Such things sometimes happen. I did here—"

"Eh? What did you hear?"

"Well, there is a rumour about the Furthenope Embellishment Company. And I did hear that Mr. Frost had dipped pretty deep in it."

"Gad, I hope you have not got much speculation in you, Sir! I always injurious to a professional man to be exposed unable to keep his tongue between his teeth."

"I, Sir? Oh, no; you may be quite easy about that. I thought I might as well mention it to you."

"I don't attach my importance to it, Gus. Frost is too clear-sighted and long-headed to burn his fingers."

"So much the better, Sir," returned Augustus, quietly. And there was no more said at that time on the matter.

But Mr. Lovegrove thought of it seriously. Mr. Frost's proceedings had been by no means satisfactory of late. If he had not been so, he had neglected the business of the firm, nor that he had absented himself frequently from the private affairs on occasions when matters pertaining to the office should have claimed his best energies. It was true that Mr. Lovegrove had accidentally heard that his partner had dealings in Bayswater, of a questionable character; nor the floating rumors that tradesmen had been dunning for their bills at the elegant little house in Bayswater. It was not any one of these circumstances, taken singly, that impressed him, so much as the fact that they had been and were questionably did so. And his wife's gossip respecting Mrs. Frost's extravagance, to which he would at another time have attached no importance, became disquieting as adding one more to the accumulation of other facts. Later on that same afternoon, as he was leaving the office, he saw Hugh Lockwood coming out of Mr. Frost's private room. On the following day he had confidential testimony as to the hour of Lady Tallis Gale's death. Mr. Lovegrove and the young man had conceived a strong respect for one another. There had been the slightest possible acquaintance between them to that time.

"Good-day, Mr. Lockwood," said Lovegrove, offering his hand. He was not surprised to see the young man coming from Mr. Frost's room. He was aware of the old and close intimacy that had existed between the two families. "Hugh Gale?"

"Good-day, Sir."

"Is any thing the matter, Mr. Lockwood?" asked Lovegrove, struck with the expression of Hugh's face.

"Nothing, thank you. That is—to say truth, I have been put out a little."

Hugh hastily shook Mr. Lovegrove's hand, and walked away with a quick step. Lovegrove stood looking after him thoughtfully for a moment. Then he turned, and went into Mr. Frost's inner sanctum. He opened the door without first knocking at it, and, as the heavy panels swung back noiselessly, he had time to see his partner before his partner was aware of his presence.

Mr. Frost was standing at the little fire-place with his back to the door. He was leaning with his left elbow on the mantle-piece, and supporting his head on his hands. At a slight noise made by the door opening turned, and with his face more than almost started on seeing the haggard face that confronted him. Mr. Frost's forehead was knit and creased into deep wrinkles of anxiety. There was a dark red flush upon it, and it seemed expressive of intense pain of mind or body. His jaw hung, and his usually firmly closed lips were parted. His eyes stared wildly, and seemed darkly to take note of that which they looked upon. All this lasted but for a second. He passed his hand over his forehead, and said—

"Hullo, Lovegrove! I didn't hear you come in. Do you want me? I hope not, just now; for I have an appointment, and must be off."

"I did want to say a word to you. I can wait, however. Do you know, Frost, that you are not looking at all well?"

"Am I not? Well, I have a devil of a headache."

"Don't you do any thing for it? You really do look uncommonly ill."

"There's no cure for these things but time and patience. I have been overworking myself lately, I suppose. Or else I'm growing old."

"Old! nonsense! You are—why you must be five years my junior, and I—"

"Oh, you are as sound as a roach, and as fresh as a daisy. But, my dear fellow, age can not always be counted by years. I feel worn and weary. I know I have this ceaseless grind, grind, grind at the mill!"

"Hm! Well, for my part, I can never be thoroughly happy out of harness for long together. Then we take our easy spells of every summer, I am always the first to get tired of it. I long for what you call the pounce and excitement."

"Happy you!"

"If you like it so, why don't you retire and give up your share of the business to my Gus? You haven't a tribe of daughters to provide for. You must be independent."

"Rich!" echoed Mr. Frost. "Who shall say what 'rich' means in these days? And besides, my wife—you see she always interrupted with an extraneous matter.

He had by this time nearly recovered his senses, and, together with the self-confidence and ease air of superiority which had never failed to impress Mr. Lovegrove.

"Ah, yes, one knows all that," said the latter. "Why then, on the whole, you have—things have gone badly with you, eh?"

Frost gave him a quick and curious glance. Then his mouth stretched itself in a forced smile, to which the impossibility of articulation any thing like spontaneity, he communicated an expression of irony. The latter, in his conscious of this exaggeration; but his muscles were not under his own control.

"Ah, yes, one knows," he exclaimed. "Things have gone very badly indeed with me. I haven't a shirt that I want by some ten or fifteen thousand pounds."

"Ten or fifteen thou—by Jove!"

"Yes," said Mr. Frost, Lovegrove, every man has his hobby. Mine has been to die worth a certain sum. I won't tell you what sum; you would be shocked at the extravagance of my desires. Not having reached the figure I had fixed upon, I suppose that I have the right to grumble. Consequently I do grumble—to the extent, that is," he added, with a sudden change of manner, "but between friends and partners, like you and me, I may say that on the whole—there is no use, my best isn't badly bothered."

"I thought it was—I thought so!" replied Lovegrove, nodding his head with a kind of sober triumph.

"Ah, but I grumble!"

"Then you have no—do. Only, if I were you, Frost, I wouldn't grumble too much!"

"Eh?"

"Folks might take you at your word, and as all the world does not know how rich you must be—why, Mr. Lovegrove! you see?"

Mr. Frost laughed a little dry laugh, and clapped his partner on the shoulder.

"Ah, ha, ha! Good! Good! I know there is wherewithal for plenty of grumbling without being rich. You have me there, Lovegrove."

"You have just had young Lockwood with you. I met him coming out."

"Just had him! Did he—did he say any thing?"

"Say any thing? He said, 'Good-day.' Oh, and he said, too, that he had been a good deal put out."

"Put out! He is terribly pig-headed."

"Is he? Well, I rather liked him. I thought he seemed to be in a fine way about the proposed the time of Lady Tallis's death. But I always thought you were such a great friend of his."

"I took him up, I offered to get him a fine position with a company abroad. But there are some people it is impossible to befriend. They won't let you."

"Dear me! Then he refused your offer?"

"Yes; I had given him a little time to consider of it. But he came to-day to—to say that he would not accept of it. And that not in the most civil terms, either."

"Oh! So that was what he had been to see you about?"

"Of course! Did he say that he had come for any thing else?"

"Not at all. I told you what he said. But talking of companies abroad, Frost, I wanted to speak to you about that. I did here—"

"Another time—another time, Lovegrove. I shall be late as it is. I have an appointment in the City—" and Mr. Frost pulled out his watch impatiently.

"Ah, well, I won't detain you. Some day—some evening, after business hours, I should like to be to speak of that with you, Frost."

"Of course. Delighted. Whenever you like."

Mr. Frost hurried off, and threw himself into the first cab that presented itself to be passed. As Mr. Lovegrove came out again through the outer chamber, the senior clerk was putting on his hat and gloves preparatory to going home.

"Oh, Mr. Lovegrove," said the clerk, "you were asking me about the bill of costs in Bowcher v. Bowcher!"

"Yes, I was. Has it been paid?"

"It has, Sir. Their solicitors sent down this afternoon, and the bill was paid. You were not in, Sir, so Frost took the notes, and that he was going into the City this afternoon and would settle them."

"Oh, very well, Mr. Burgess."

When the clerk had left Mr. Lovegrove's face changed.

"Another instance of Frost's thoughtlessness," he muttered. "He takes money to the bank for the firm, and does not go to the City until after banking hours. It had much better be left until the regular way. I suppose the truth is, he is too busy growing rich on his own account. I should never have guessed that Frost had the ambition of being wealthy. I hope he won't burn his fingers with speculations in try. ing to grow rich in a hurry. But he certainly is a very superior man! A most superior man is Frost. All the same, when your clever fellow does make a mistake, it is apt to be a big one."

CHAPTER XII.

TROUBLE.

MR. FROST left his office in a state of pitiable disorder and misery of mind. He had now said that Sidney Frost hated failure; and still more the avowal of failure. He had originally intended himself in a web of dishonorable complications for the sake of winning the woman who had inspired in the sole remaining passion of his life. And it was still his infatuated love for her that caused the greater part of his distress. What would Sidney say? What would Georgy say? How would Georgy bear it—the worst should happen? These were the chief questions with which he tormented himself. And at the same time he well knew, in his heart, that she would be the last to see and hardly to grudge his sufferings.

His business in the City, and the rumors he heard there, did not tend to reassure him. He drove to his home jaded and wretched. The butler knew when he had finished dressing for dinner, and took a quiet peep at the looking-glass to see that his master's appearance was correct. Then he would knock at the door, and tell, and anxiety had not so mark on her. Her peach-like cheeks were smooth and fresh; her eyes were bright; her hair was in perfect adjustment, and unmingled with a thread of gray. She was dressed in a rich but perfectly simple and unobtrusive simplicity might have deceived an uninstructed eye as to its costliness. But, both in material and workmanship, Mrs. Frost's attire was of the most expensive. Not a detail was imperfect from the elegant shape of the satin fitted her well-formed foot to a nicety, to the fine old cream-colored lace round her bosom. There was not a jewel on her neck or in her hair—not a chain, not a brooch, not a pin. But on one finger was a diamond ring, and on the other hand of gold, the famous opal, whose mild, milky lustre, pierced here and there by darts of fire, contrasted admirably with the delicate tint of her dress. Her husband, lying on the sofa, looked at her from beneath his half-closed eyelids, as she stood for a moment uncertain whether he were awake or asleep. She was very beautiful. Sidney thought in the single moment of her attitude! How placid the expanse of her broad white forehead! How clear and bright her closed red lips! How mild, grave, and matronly the light in her contemplative eyes! She seemed to have not a care in the world. Only by the slight perfume that hung about her garments was soothing and delicious. If she would but speak, sing, and actually, until her husband's eyes should close, and sleep come down upon him like a balm.

Thought is wonderfully rapid. Sidney Frost had time to see all that we have described, and to frame the above-recorded wish, before his wife opened her handsome mouth, and said, in the low, full tones habitual to her:

"Sidney, that man has been dunning again for his bill."

"Eh?" The sweet vision was gone, shattered into broken fragments like a clear lake-picture disturbed by a stone thrown into its waters. The veins in Frost's forehead started and throbbed distractingly. He could not suppress a groan—a groan of pain, and that pain physical, however—and he pressed his hot hands to his still hotter brow.

"Sidney! do you hear? That insolent man has been dunning. You don't seem to consider that I am annoyed when it is for me!"

"What insolent man? Who is it that you mean?" muttered Frost, closing his eyes completely.

"You may well ask. Dunns have been quite numerous of late," rejoined Mrs. Frost with a sneer, as she seated herself in an arm-chair opposite to the sofa. "But none of them have been so insupportable as that Wilson."

"The jeweler?"

"Yes! the jeweler. And you know, really and truly, Sidney, this kind of thing must be stopped, Sir."

Frost smiled bitterly.

"How do you suggest putting a stop to it?" he asked.

"I suggest! You are too amusing."

It would be impossible to convey the disdain of the tone in which this was said.

"Wilson came here and saw you, and was insolent?"

"Very."

"What did he say?"

"How can I repeat word for word what he said? He declared that he must have the price of the diamonds. I suppose that is true of us, and that put it into his head, I suppose. He said, too, very impertinently, that people who can not afford to pay for such jewels had no right to wear them. I told him that was your affair."

"My affair. I don't wear bracelets."

"You know that it is nonsense talking in that way, Sidney. I beg you to understand that I can not be exposed to the insults of tradespeople."

"Can you not? Listen, Georgina. To-morrow you must give me that opal when I go to business. I shall drive first to Wilson's, and ask him to take back the bracelet. He will probably make me pay for your having had it so long; but, as the stone is a really fine one, I think he will consent to take it back."

"Take back my bracelet!"

"It is not your bracelet. Do you remember that, when you first spoke of buying it, I told you to do so, and told you the price of it was he to send to me to pay?"

"Take back my bracelet!"

"Come here, George! Sit down beside me. Ah, how feverish you look! your hand is! Put it on my forehead for a moment. Listen, George. I am in great trouble and embarrassment. I have a considerable sum of money which I—I which I owe, to make up within six months. Six months is the limit of time allowed me."

Mrs. Frost shrugged her shoulders with the air of a person who is forced into by unnecessary details. "Well?" she said.

Her husband suppressed his indignation at her indifference, and proceeded:

"During that time I shall have to strain every nerve, to try every means, to scrape together every pound. I shall have—"

"I thought," said Georgina, interrupting him, "that your journey to Naples was to make your fortune. I have not yet perceived any of the fine results to that way for me from it."

"Matters have not gone as I hoped and expected. Still I do not despair even yet. No; far from it. I believe the Arabs will come to me, for if we can but title over—" He checked himself, after a pause at her fire. "Georgina, you have, you, utterly unsympathising. Her eyes were cast down, and were contemplating the opal bracelet on the arm which it adorned her privilege to call her lap. Sidney Frost heaved a deep sigh, that ended in something like a moan.

"I don't know whether you are listening to me, or whether you understand me, Georgina?

"I hear you, Sidney. But I can't see why you should want to take away my opal. I never heard of such a thing. I little expected that such a thing would happen to me."

"Be thankful if nothing worse happens to you."

"Worse! What can be worse? I promised to wear the bracelet as Lady Maxwell's, on Wednesday, to show to a friend of hers, a Miss Hamilton, who boasts of her jewels. Lady Maxwell had the loan of my bracelet, and had only returned that mine was far handsomer than any single opal she had ever seen."

"You can make some excuse to her."

"What excuse can I make? It is too bad!" And Mrs. Frost put her delicate handkerchief to her eyes.

Her husband remained silent; and after a little while she looked up at him in great surprise. He did not often have recourse to tears. But she had hitherto found it indelible in managing her husband's lenient reward, let him be as angry as he might.

Presently the dinner-gong sounded. After a short pause, Mrs. Frost wiped her eyes, and said, in a cold voice, "Are you not coming to dinner, Sidney?"

"No; it is impossible. I could eat nothing."

"Why not?" asked Georgina, raising her large eyes slowly on him.

"Oh, you know, of course, observed so trifling a matter; but the fact is, I am very unwell."

"No; I hadn't noticed it," she responded, with cool naïveté.

After an instant's reflection it struck her that this supposition might be the cause of her husband's unwonted severity. Sidney was often hot-tempered and cross, but never in opposition to her wishes she was quite unused to. The opal might not be lost after all. She went to him and touched his forehead with her cool lips.

"Poor Sidney, how hot his head is!" she exclaimed. "I will send you a little soup. Try to take something, won't you?"

He pressed her hand fondly. The least act of kindness from her made him grateful.

"Dear George!" She does spoil me now a little," he thought, as she glided with her peaceful step out of the room. And then he began to meditate whether it might not be possible to spare her the humiliation of parting with the bracelet.

But soon a remembrance darted through his mind, which made his head throb, and his heart beat. No; it was impossible. Any sacrifice must be made to avoid, if possible, public disgrace and ruin. It would be better for Georgy to give up every jewel she possessed than to confront that final blow. Yes; the sacrifice must be made, for her present. A servant could tell what piece of good luck might befall him before the end of the six months!

This was but the beginning of a period of unspeakable anxiety for Frost, during which he suffered alternations of hope and despondency, and feverish expectation and crushing humiliation, and during which he was more and more delivered up to the conviction that his wife was the incarnation of cold egotism. He strove against the conviction. Sometimes he dealt with it furiously and indignantly; sometimes he tried to overcome it. When the struggle was finally vanquished by the irrefragable truth, it would go hard with him. Of all this thought-passion Georgina had known nothing, she would have cared; because she would have perceived that when the truth should have overcome the last of her husband's self-delusions it must also go hard with her.

Meanwhile there was anxiety enough—with which Frost was intimately connected—at the house in Gower Street. Maud and the vicar were gone away to Shipley. The upper rooms were shut up, and the house seemed almost deserted. There had come to be a barrier between Hugh and his mother. It did not appear in their outward behavior to each other. He was as dutiful, she as tenderly, affectionate as ever. But the unrestrained confidence of their intercourse was at an end. It must always be so when two loving persons speak together with the consciousness of a forbidden topic lying like a dead weight between them, and both entering by no intrinsically antagonistic to Hugh's character that his mother's aversion to speak openly with him respecting the confession she had made once for all was extremely painful to him. And to her it soothed her to see that he was not going to make her the more reticent. She thought, "My son shall not be ashamed to confess to his mother's heart as she thought how hard his judgment of her would be when the dreaded moment of confession should arrive, and how if the confession had been made, and her son had been loving and forgiving, she would have no regret of remorse, and yet—and yet Zillah tormented herself with the thought that she was not sufficiently penitent, sufficiently sorry for her heart. Hugh had lost no time in telling his mother of the discovery that he had made. She listened all the details of it conscientiously, but without his usual frank spontaneity; for he saw that in her how she was shrinking from the subject, and in the constraint of his manner, she, on her part, could discern his consciousness that he had frightened as she pictured to herself the conflict of those two strong wills. Zillah, too, could be more severe than Hugh had been prepared to see in action. And, besides, twenty years of secret self-reproach and the sting of a tormenting and unrelieved conscience had sapped the firmness of her character.

"Let me know how him any mercy, then, Hugh?" she said, with her head leaning against her small pale hand, when her son had finished his account of it.

"Mercy! Yes, mother, surely I showed him more mercy than he deserved! I gave him six months' grace."

"Six months' grace. After five-and-twenty years of procrastination, how short those six months will seem to him!"

"And how long the five-and-twenty years seemed to you! But I told him the facts of the case plainly. The chance of buying the business was his own. He knew that it would be a good one for yet half a year longer. If by the end of that time I have not the money, I shall throw the business to the lot. He must repay the money he stole by that time."

"Stole, Hugh! You did not use that word to him?"

"No, mother, I did not use that word; but I should have been justified in using it."

"And how did he—did he seem? Was he angry and defiant, or was he secure of his power to pay the money?"

"He was certainly taken by surprise; but he has great self-command. And he is so clever and specious that I do not wonder at his having imposed on us. He tried to make a friend of me, and reminded me that he had been my father's friend. 'Yes; a false friend,' said I. Then he was silent. I did not reproach him with violence. I could not have brought myself to have a scene with him. But I felt secure of his power to pay the money?"

"He was certainly taken by surprise; but he has great self-command. And he is so clever and specious that I do not wonder at his having imposed on us. He tried to make a friend of me, and reminded me that he had been my father's friend. 'Yes; a false friend,' said I. Then he was silent. I did not reproach him with violence. I could not have brought myself to have a scene with him. But I felt secure of his power to pay the money?"

"Do you think he will really have a difficulty in repaying the money? I can not understand it. He must be rich." Every one says that the Arab is prosperous."

"He recovered himself after a minute or so, and began to expatiate on his fortune, and on that of the speculations in which he is engaged. He waxed eloquent at the sound of his own voice; and I accepted it. 'Yes; a false friend,' said I. Then he was silent. I did not reproach him with violence. I could not have brought myself to have a scene with him. But I felt secure of his power to pay the money?"

"Stop, Hugh! You did not use that word to him.)"

"No, mother, I did not use that word; but I should have been justified in using it."

"And how did he—did he seem? Was he angry and defiant, or was he secure of his power to pay the money?"

"He was certainly taken by surprise; but he has great self-command. And he is so clever and specious that I do not wonder at his having imposed on us. He tried to make a friend of me, and reminded me that he had been my father's friend. 'Yes; a false friend,' said I. Then he was silent. I did not reproach him with violence. I could not have brought myself to have a scene with him. But I felt secure of his power to pay the money?"

"

JOHN McCLINTOCK, D.D.

THE Methodist Episcopal Church has suffered a great loss in the sudden death of the Rev. Dr. McCLINTOCK, the celebrated preacher and theologian, which occurred on Friday, March 4, at his home in Madison, New Jersey.

Dr. McCLINTOCK was born in the year 1814, in the city of Philadelphia. When quite a boy he entered the grammar-school of the University of Pennsylvania, then under the direction of Dr. WYTSE, a famous Greek scholar in his day. Subsequently he was appointed book-keeper in the Methodist Book Concern of this city; in this position he acquired a thorough knowledge of business, which was of great service to him in all his subsequent life. Leaving New York he entered the university of his native city, from which he graduated with high honor in 1835. He had commenced preaching before completing his college studies, and in 1836 joined the Philadelphia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In this same year he was elected Professor of Mathematics in Dickinson College, Carlisle.

His career as Professor was brilliant and successful. In 1839 he exchanged the chair of Mathematics for that of Ancient Languages, and proved himself to be equally at home in either. His studies were so various, and his attainments even then so extensive, that he could have with ease taken charge of any department in the institution. During this period he prepared, in conjunction with Professor BUCHANAN, a translation of "Neander's Life of Christ;" and, in association with Professor CROOKS, a series of Latin and Greek Elementary Text-books, which have passed into extensive use in our colleges and schools.

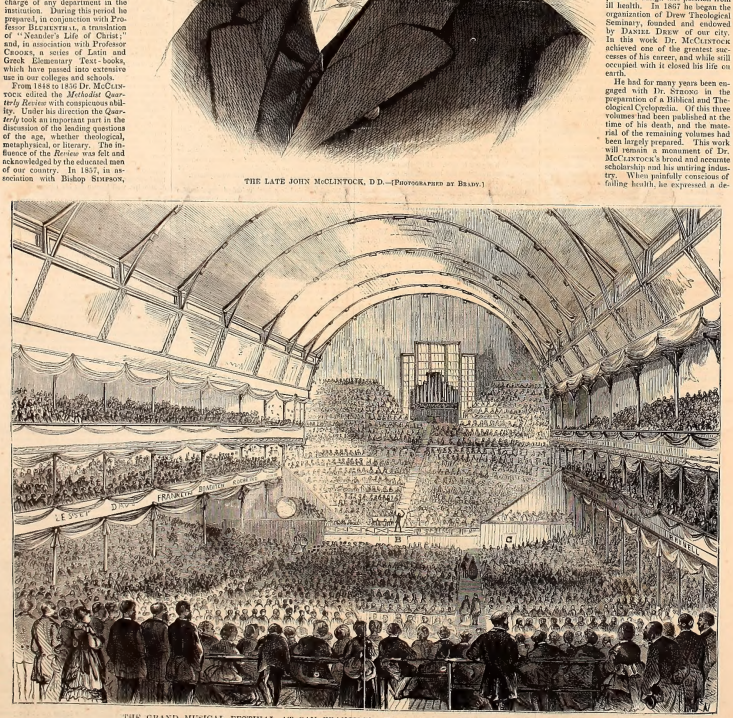
From 1848 to 1856 Dr. McCLINTOCK edited the Methodist Quarterly Review with conspicuous ability. Under his direction the Quarterly took an important part in the discussion of the leading questions of the age, whether theological, metaphysical, or literary. The influence of the Review was felt and acknowledged by the educated men of our country. In 1857, in association with Bishop SIMPSON, he was delegated to represent the Methodist Episcopal Church in the British Wesleyan Conference. In the same year he became pastor of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church in this city, where he established his reputation as one of the most eloquent preachers of the country. To every natural gift that an orator could claim, he added a clear apprehension of Christian truth and a most earnest desire to use it for the highest good of men.

In 1860 Dr. McCLINTOCK took charge of the American chapel in the city of PARIS. When our Civil War broke out it was soon made apparent that he was "the right man in the right place." The task of stemming the torrent of English and French prejudice against our national cause was disheartening; but Dr. McCLINTOCK was equal to it. By the printing and circulation of documents he corrected misrepresentations; by the aid of an extensive correspondence and his great personal influence he enlisted the co-operation of others, until a wide-spread system of agencies was successfully brought to bear upon European public opinion. No American who spent the years of the rebellion abroad deserved better of his country than did Dr. McCLINTOCK.

Upon his return home near the close of the war, Dr. McCLINTOCK accepted for a second time the pastorate of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, but was compelled to resign this position from ill health. In 1867 he began the organization of Drew Theological Seminary, founded and endowed by DANIEL DREW of our city. In this work Dr. McCLINTOCK achieved one of the greatest successes of his career, and while still occupied with it closed his life on earth.

He had for many years been engaged with Dr. STRONG in the preparation of a Biblical and Theological Cyclopædia. Of this three volumes had been published at the time of his death, and the material of the remaining volumes had been largely prepared. This work will remain a monument of Dr. McCLINTOCK's broad and accurate scholarship and his untiring industry. When painfully conscious of failing health, he expressed a desire to live chiefly that he might finish the Cyclopædia. But this was not to be.

THE LATE JOHN McCLINTOCK, D.D.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]



THE GRAND MUSICAL FESTIVAL AT SAN FRANCISCO.—FROM A SKETCH BY L. R. TOWNSEND.—[SEE PAGE 189.]

Dr. MCCLINTOCK'S life is an example of great powers faithfully used. His industry was unflagging; and until prostrated by disease, his capacity for labor was such as to make him insensible to fatigue. Whatever he did he would do thoroughly; for slovenly work he had no tolerance. His studies ran out in every direction, yet his learning was accurate and profound. He acquired knowledge rapidly, but systematized it with care. An orderly method was a necessity of his nature. His acquisitions, as a consequence, were always available when they were wanted. In the pursuit of the substance of knowledge he did not despise form: he expressed himself in a style of remarkable chasteness and finish. He was equally a man of books and a man of affairs—a writer and an orator; in brief, a various, versatile, and extraordinary man.

Of his many personal qualities it does not become us here to speak, save to say that his life was singularly pure, gentle, and affectionate. His friends, and the Church of which he was a distinguished representative, will long deplore his death as an irreparable loss.

THE SAN FRANCISCO JUBILEE.

We give this week, on page 188, a view of the interior of the San Francisco Mechanics' Pavilion, from a sketch taken on the first day of the grand musical festival held there, under the management of Madame CAMILLA URSO, for the benefit of the Mercantile Library of that city, commencing February 22, and continuing three days. It was a great success in every point of view, and after paying all expenses netted about $53,000 to the library.

SNOW ON THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

ONE of the mishaps to which the traveler on the Pacific Railroad is liable, at this season of the year, is that of being snowed in while crossing the high mountain ranges that separates the great plains from the Pacific slope. Our illustration on this page represents a train overtaken by such a catastrophe. It has been stopped by a heavy drift, through which it is powerless to shove the iron snow-plow, and all hands are turned out, without distinction, to clear away the obstruction.

LAYING OUT ROADS AND WALKS.

IN no department of garden art do we more frequently see a lack of taste than in the laying out of the roads and walks of a country place. Too often the approach to the house from the entrance gate is a straight lane, either by itself or in combination with a circle, an oval, or other positive geometrical form; sometimes we see walks so laid out as to cut the lawn into two or more parts; or, if a winding road or walk is to be made, it is done by joining at their ends a series of reversed semicircles or arcs of circles.

A straight carriage road leading directly from the entrance gate to the dwelling-house, with the latter directly in sight, is always unpleasing on account of its stiffness and formality, and in doing away with all idea of seclusion and privacy, and the suggestion of baldness which it conveys. Sometimes we see this straight road, shortly before it reaches the house, terminate in a large circle or oval, which forms the turn-round for the carriages. It is true that sometimes a straight road is admissible, as when the dwelling is situated at some distance from the entrance, and the road can itself be made of sufficient width, with a wide border of grass on each side of it, each border planted with a row of overarching trees. In such cases the grassy borders on either side should be of the same width as the roadway, and the trees planted on the outer edge of them; such a road becomes a grand avenue of approach, and impresses the visitor with an idea of grandeur. Even in such cases the road should not terminate abruptly in front of the house, but at some considerable distance therefrom it should gradually diverge from the straight line, and approach the house with long, flowing curves. The use of a winding road as an approach to a dwelling conveys the idea of pleasantness of grounds, admits of greater breadth of lawn, and permits the planting of greater variety of trees and ornamental shrubs, giving occasional glimpses of the house as we approach it, and giving an air of magnificence and seclusion thereto.

A SNOW DRIFT ON THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

In laying out public parks and country places of any extent in this country, it is the common practice to employ surveyors or civil engineers, and their universal mode of laying out a winding road is by the use of arcs of circles of some similar positive form. Now it must be borne in mind that neither the circle nor the oval (or ellipse), is ordinarily made from a combination of two circles, is known in nature as a line of motion; that is to say, nothing that moves in a manner that moves in these lines, but always, according to the circumstance that control them, move in other lines—such as the cycloid, the trajectory, the parabola, or the hyperbola, or combinations or modifications of them. The circle or combinations of various portions of it are appropriate as inclosing forms; as, for instance, in the laying out of flower-beds in the geometrical style, where its form or portions of it can be made to harmonize with the triangle, the hexagon, the square, or other rectilinear forms, which can not so well be done with other classes of curved lines.

All the lines of roads and walks should be free and flowing, without abrupt turns or forcible departures from the lines which the natural contour of the ground may suggest, or groups or masses of trees or shrubs may require, in order to avoid them. Many think that, to make a winding road, all that is necessary is to make it continually zigzag in and out on every hand, thus which nothing can be more erroneous or more at variance with correct taste.

The curves should not be set out to any regular radius, and the length or extent of their direction from a central line should be varied, varied and irregular, and the turns neither sudden nor abrupt; nor to maintain a proper medium and to endorse a newness of scene, a variety of curves should be introduced, great care being taken to blend two curves where they converge, so as not to produce a straight or tame line at their junction.

When undulation in the surface of roads and walks can be obtained, it will be productive of great variety, and be very effective; but sudden swells or dips are to be avoided: they should be gentle and gradual, and pass softly into each other; their highest and lowest parts should occur toward the centre of the lateral curves, as there the lines blend the easiest.

Some sufficient object should always be presented as the reason or cause for the deviation of a walk or road from a straight line. A tree, a group of plants, a change of level, or something of a similar character, should always appear to justify the divergence. No two walks should ever be seen to any extent as parallel to each other, as it conveys the idea of one of them being useless; in cases where circumstances render such parallelism necessary, one of the two walks should be masked from the other by intervening swells or banks of earth clothed with grass and shrubs, or by these latter alone. Neither should walks end in a mere cul de sac: some definite or sufficient cause of interest should always be placed at its termination, when it is not desirable to carry it beyond a certain point. An arbor, seat, or summer-house, is a suitable object for this purpose; but the walk must be returned upon itself by means of a circular sweep in front of them, the bed being planted with shrubs or flowers.

The use of serpentine walks gives great variety to a place; but this variety is destroyed if several of the curves can be seen at the same time. Such curves, therefore, should not be exposed to each other at any point, and be varied as much as they can be in their length and expansion, in order to prevent their being so exposed to each other, groups or masses of shrubs or trees should be disposed of everywhere, should be planted principally at the bodies of the curves, but not exactly in the centre of each and every curve, a certain proportion should be planted more or less to the right or left of the centre of the curve, or in front or behind it first begins to diverge from the previous one.

A main carriage road should always terminate at the house, and never be carried beyond it; the road to the stables from the house should always be narrower than the main road, or it would have the appearance of being of secondary importance imposed upon it. When the house is within sight of the public highway, it is desirable to have the lawn in front of the house so planted with shrubs as to prevent an interruption of view of the public road of the setting sun, or taking up of visitors at the door of the house. In no other way can a desirable privacy be had.

Care should be had in laying out the walks on a country place not to make them too numerous, as it destroys all breadth of lawn, and so mars its beauty; and, besides, they add much to the expense, both in their first construction and after maintenance. Neither should they be so laid down as to oppose any great extent of them longitudinally to view from the dwelling-house; nor should they ever appear as crossing a lawn, but should always be so planned as to appear as skirting the outer edge of it.

It is not possible to give absolute directions in this department of garden art, as the work to be done is so modified or controlled by varying circumstances. By applying these general hints to each individual case, each of our readers as are about improving their homesteads will be able to avoid the incongruities and unpleasant effects too often seen in such places or in the public parks of our cities.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES

A Cough, a Cold, or a Sore Throat requires immediate attention, and should be CHECKED. If allowed to continue, Irritation of the Lungs, a permanent Throat Disease, or Consumption is often the result.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES,

having a direct influence on the parts, give immediate relief. For Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, Consumptive and Throat Diseases, Troches have a soothing effect.

SINGERS AND PUBLIC SPEAKERS

will find Troches useful in clearing the voice when taken before Singing or Speaking, and relieving the throat after an unusual exertion of the vocal organs. Being an article of merit, and having proved their efficacy by a test of many years, each year finds them in new favor in various parts of the world, and Brown's Troches are universally pronounced better than other articles.

"TROCHES," SO CALLED, SOLD BY THE OUNCE, ARE A POOR IMITATION AND SUFFERED LIKE BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES, WHICH ARE SOLD ONLY IN BOXES WITH FAC-SIMILE OF THE PROPRIETORS, ON OUTSIDE WRAPPER OF BOX, AND PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP ATTACHED TO EACH BOX.

THIS CARE IN PUTTING UP THE TROCHES IS IMPORTANT AS A SECURITY TO THE PURCHASER IN ORDER TO BE SURE OF OBTAINING THE GENUINE BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.

Brown's
Brown's
Brown's
Brown's
Brown's
Brown's
Brown's

Owing to the good reputation, extensive use, and popularity of the Troches, many worthless and cheap imitations are offered in boxes, which are good for nothing. Ask for and obtain the true BRONCHIAL TROCHES, which, by long experience, have proved their value, having received the sanction of physicians generally, and testimonials from eminent men throughout the country. Do not be deceived by those who make a larger profit by selling worthless imitations. We would caution dealers in selling the various imitations offered by unprincipled manufacturers, as sellers of an article violating our trade-mark, are as liable to prosecution as makers.

The title "Bronchial Troches" is our trade-mark, entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by JOHN I. BROWN & SON, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the District of Massachusetts.

Bronchial
Bronchial
Bronchial
Bronchial
Bronchial
Bronchial
Bronchial

NEW YORK, Dec. 21, 1859.—SUPERIOR COURT, Special Term.—HON. JOSEPH BOSWORTH, Chief Justice.—TRADE-MARK CASE.

"This is a case commenced by the plaintiffs, who are druggists, in Boston, and proprietors of 'Brown's Bronchial Troches,' to restrain the defendant, a New York druggist, from violating the trade-mark of the plaintiffs.

"The Court held that the defendant's labels and wrappers, being a colorable imitation of the plaintiffs' trade-mark, the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from the further use or violation of plaintiffs' trade-marks, and from making or selling lozenges under the name of 'Bronchial Troches,' and from any further use of the plaintiffs' labels, wrappers, and other trade-marks."

John Sherwood, for Plaintiffs; Washburn and Sullivan, for Defendant.

Troches.
Troches.
Troches.
Troches.
Troches.
Troches.
Troches.

COURT OF GENERAL SESSIONS.—BEFORE RECORDER HOFFMAN.—The New York Herald, March 4, 1859.

"The defendant, a drug broker, was arrested for counterfeiting, forging, and imitating the trade-mark, label, wrapper, box, etc., of 'Brown's Bronchial Troches,' prepared by John I. Brown & Son, of Boston, and for selling these counterfeits.

"He was indicted by the Grand Jury, under the statute of 1861 for the protection of trade-marks.

"The defendant's counsel moved to dismiss the indictment in the Recorder's, on the ground that he could not see the difference between forging a man's signature and forging the name to a note or check, except that in forging a trade-mark even greater loss was incurred by the manufacturer than if his name had been forged to a note.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES are sold generally throughout the United States, Great Britain, and Native Provinces, and in many of the large cities of Europe.

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.

To cure a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat, use BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES.

AVER'S CHERRY PECTORAL—the world's great remedy for Colds, Coughs, and Consumption.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

PIMPLES ON THE FACE.

Comedones, Black-Heads, Flesh Worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions, and Blotched Discolorations on the Face, originate from a Suppressed Secretion, and are positively cured by Dr. Benjamin Hood's Magical Remedy. It tones the Skin, prevents Wrinkles, opens the pores, restores the Complexion to a clear all Over tone of the Skin, and contains no Lead poison.

Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by all Druggists. Send for Circular.

The New Books of the season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. Together with a Statement of the Doctrine of Evolution respecting the Primordial Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By Alexander Winchell, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

JOURNAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO THE EAST. Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Constantinople, Athens, and Malta, in the Suite of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By the Hon. Rev. Canon Grey. 18mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

GARIBALDI'S NOVEL. The Rule of the Monk; or, Rome in the Nineteenth Century. By General Garibaldi. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By Joseph Thomas, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a Map of Equinoctial Countries and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY. A Novel. By Mrs. A. C. Newman, Author of "Shadowbrook." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE UNKNOWN WORD, and Other Stories. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c., &c. 18mo, Cloth, $1 00.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By Alton Clyde, Author of "Magic Lynne." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HIRELL. A Novel. By the Author of "Abel Drake's Wife." "Bound to the Wheel," "Martin Pole," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

PENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. Now Publishing in Parts. Paper, each $1 00.

ADVENTURES OF CALEB WILLIAMS. By William Godwin. "Cheap and Nasty," &c. "Cloudesley," &c. Complete in One Volume. 16mo, Paper, 50 cents.

PLAUTUS'S PLAYS. T. Macci Plauti Captivi, Trinummus, et Rudens. With English Notes, Critical and Explanatory, by W. A. Wheelwright, A.M., Professor of Latin in the Wesleyan University. 18mo, Cloth, $1 00.

MEDORA LEIGH: a History and an Autobiography. Edited by Charles Mackay. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE LIFE OF JESUS, for the Young. By Joseph Addison Alexander. With Illustrations. 18mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, Related in Her Letters. Edited by Rev. H. Harness. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ONLY HERSELF. A Novel. By Annie Thomas, Author of "False Colors," "Denis Donne," "Play for Gold," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By Rev. John Ker, D.D., Author of "Jesus of Nazareth, his Life and Teachings," &c. Enlarged from Four Discourses Preached by Dr. Dalcroche, Durham, and Passmore. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50; Cloth, Gilt, $3 00.

KITTY. A Novel. By M. Betham Edwards, Author of "Doctor Jacob," "A Winter with the Swallows," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By James Greenwood, Author of "The Adventures of a Lost Child," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "Dick Temple," "Wild Sports of the World." With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

SOUND ON JUDDY COMPANY, or, The Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by Benjamin Vincent, Librarian and Secretary, Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain, and Secretary for the Use of Assistant Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00.

MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. A Novel. By Justin McCarthy, Author of "The Waterdale Neighbors." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By J. Russell Coulter, M.D. "Lessons and its Living Wonders." "The Harmonies of Nature," and "Wonders of the Deep." With Numerous Chapters and 168 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

THE ODES AND EPODES OF HORACE. A Metrical Translation into English. With Introduction and Commentary. By Lord Ravensworth. With the Text from the Editions of Orelli, Macleane, and Yonge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 209 elegant Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Gilt, $3 00.

COMFORT'S GERMAN COURSE. A German Course, adapted for use in Colleges, High-Schools, and Academies. By Dr. Georg A. Comfort, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Allegheny College, Meadville, Pennsylvania. 12mo, Leather, $2 00.

THE ISLAND JUNGLE. Narrated for Young People. By Past. R. De Cresilac, Author of "Discovery of the Northwest Passage," "Adventures in the Equator," "Journey to Ashango Land," "Stories of the Revolution," &c. With numerous Engravings. 18mo, Cloth, $1 75.

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By Jonathan Duncan Carlisle. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

"The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 18mo, Cloth, $3 00.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the Last War for American Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution," &c. With Numerous Engravings on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1054 pages, large 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 00; Half Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

in denominations of $100 and $500, coupon or registered, with interest at Eight per cent. per annum, payable 1st of February and August, in Gold, free of United States taxes, in New York or Europe. The bonds have thirty years to run, payable in New York by Gold. Trustees: Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, of New York, and Hon. Jesse Knight, of Salt Lake City.

The road is now finished and in operation, and will have a short and through connection with Fort Kearney. The Company have a Capital Stock of

$10,000,000

And a Grant of Land from Congress of 1,500,000 acres, valued, at the lowest estimate, at..... 4,000,000

First Mortgage Bonds..... 1,500,000

Total..... $15,500,000

Length of Road, 311 miles. Price of the bonds and interest. Can be obtained from the undersigned, who have maps, pamphlets, maps, and information relating thereto. These bonds, being so well secured, and bearing large income, are desirable to parties seeking safe and lucrative investments.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO., Commercial Agents,

No. 52 Wall and 5 Pine Street, New York.

TANNER & CO., Fiscal Agents,

No. 40 Wall Street, New York.

JUST PUBLISHED, No. 3

HITCHCOCK'S 10-CENT

BOYS' AND GIRLS' MUSICAL ALBUM,

MUSIC FOR THE SABBATH

ARRANGED FOR LITTLE FINGERS

(For Voice and Piano.)

CONTAINING SIX POPULAR PIECES,

Birth of the Savior. Rest for the Weary.

Angels over Bright and Fair. Mary at the Savior's Tomb.

Jesus, Lover of my Soul. Lord Dismiss us with thy Blessing.

Sold by dealers generally, or to be ordered through any newsdealer. Mailed on receipt of 15 cents.

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,

24 Beekman St., N. Y.

THE AMERICAN FAMILY

KNITTING MACHINE

is presented to the public as the most Simple, Durable, Compact, and Cheap Knitting Machine ever invented. PRICE ONLY $25.

This machine will run either backward or forward with equal facility, and will knit a piece of work as fast but far superior in every respect. WILL KNIT 20,000 STITCHES A MINUTE, and will knit a perfect web. It will knit a pair of stockings (any size) in less than half an hour. It will knit Hose, Socks, Plain or Ribbed Work, with any kind of coarse or fine woolen yarn, or cotton, silk, or linen. It will knit Gentlemen's, with double heel and toe, drawers, hoods, sacks, smoking caps, comforts, shawls, mittens, fancy stripes, ornamental embroideries, mittens, skating-caps, lamp-wicks, mats, and a variety of other articles. It will also do narrowing, looping, transferring, setting up, figuring, tubular work, and, in fact, an endless variety of work required every-day use, and is always ready for use.

FROM $5 TO $10 PER DAY can be made by any one with the American Knitting Machine. Knitting stockings, &c., while expert operators can even make more, knitting fancy work, and always commands a ready sale.

FARMERS can sell their wool at only forty to fifty cents per pound: but by putting the wool made into yarn at a small expense, and knitting it into socks, two or three dollars per pound can be realized. On receipt of $25 we will forward a machine at once.

Wrtaith to preserve active AGENTS EVERY WHERE, to whom the most liberal inducements will be given. Address

AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE COMPANY,

BOSTON, Mass., or 87 LOUIS, Mo.

ROGERS'

Groups of Statuary.

These groups will be sent, with all the express charges prepaid, to any point east of the Mississippi, on receipt of the price, viz.:

Council of War, $26. Taking the Oath, $28. Courtship in Sisery Hollow, $16, &c.

Send for illustrated catalogue. Address

JOHN ROGERS,

211 Fifth Ave.,

New York.

HOW to Write, How to Talk, How to Behave, and How to Do Business, is indispensable to every young man and woman in the world. A handsome vol. of 600 pages. Sent free, post paid, for $2.25. Illustrated circulars free. Agents. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

WORTH $5.—You may call what you please, but it is $5. How to Read Character, $1.25. New Physiognomy, 1000 Engravings, $5. The Victoria Phrenological Journal, monthly, $1 a year. Sample Nos., 10 cts. Send stamp for terms to Agents.

FACTS for ADVERTISERS.—There are 5 newspapers published in the United States about 5000 periodicals, including all the various classes, and advertisers and business men have a choice number of publications there are about 25 that have the largest circulation; more than 50 that have the largest circulation in their localities, and not one among them all that has as many first-class readers as DEMOREST'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

GREGORY'S SEED CATALOGUE.

MY ANNUAL CATALOGUE, containing a list of many novelties, besides all the standard vegetables of the garden (over 100 of which are of my own growing), will be ready for mailing about the 1st of February; price by mail, 1 warranting each small piece as represented. I warrant it shall reach the purchaser. I warrant all money forwarded shall reach me. Send for catalogue.

JAMES J. H. GREGORY, Marblehead, Mass.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States; to be paid for on delivery.

E. C. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,

OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 29 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.

29th Call or send for Price-List.

UPHOLSTERY GOODS.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

have made

Great Reductions in the Prices of

Brocatels, Silk Terrys,

Plain Satins, Figured Cotelaines,

Striped Reps, Furniture Chintz,

&c., &c., &c.

Also,

NOVELTIES in

Nottingham Lace Curtains,

Embroidered and Gimpure Curtains.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVE., AND TENTH ST.

BOOSEY & CO.'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.—A new Catalogue ready, free on application. Also Gems, Part 23, Opera and Oratorio Choruses, for the use of Choral Societies, 5 cents each. THE BALLAD SINGER.—50 cents each. Songs by Claribel and the best composers, 3 cents each. THE MUSICAL BIJOU.—Vols. 1 to 6, 25 cents each. THE MUSICAL TREASURY.—Vols. 1 to 6, 25 cents each. Instrumental, in books, 50 cents each. HOUSEHOLD MUSIC.—Vocal and instrumental series of popular music, 5 cents each. ALBUMS, OVERTIONS AND MASSES, 50 cents each. TUTORS AND STUDIES for all instruments, 50 cents each. VIOLIN LIBRARY, 40 books, 50 cents each. FLUTE LIBRARY, 12 books, 50 cents each. CHORAL Services, 28 cents each. Organ and Cabinet Organ Music, in Volumes, Part 23 now ready, Organ Operas, with words and music, Operas as Piano-forte Duets, Music for Harp, Part 23. Always keeping a stock at price and perfectly satisfactory in shape.—New York Tribune.

To be had of all music and book dealers in the world.

BOOSEY & CO., No. 644 Broadway, N. Y.

MADAM FOY'S

COMBINED

Corset, Skirt Support

AND

Is just the article needed by every lady who desires

HEALTH, COMFORT, and STYLE.

Testimonials in its favor are continually being received from all parts of the country.

Lady Agents wanted in every county of the United States.

Sole Manufacturers, HOWE, BALDWIN, & FOY, New Haven, Conn.

SPIRIT MYSTERIES.—Marvelous Feats of the Davenport Brothers &c., fully and clearly explained in HARPER'S JOURNAL of any newsdealer, or sent by mail, postage free, for 10 cents. Subscribe for only 25 cents for three months.

JESSE HANEY & CO., 119 Nassau St., N. Y.

$100 Scholarship given for Original Puzzles, Rebuses, Arithmetics, Acrostics, Conundrums, Enigmas and Charades. Every number. New volume and new attractions. Only $1.50 300 square inches of reading and engravings.

CHAS. A. DANA, Editor.

The cheapest and best paper in the New York newspapers. Everybody likes it. Three editions: DAILY, $9; SEMI-WEEKLY, $2 and WEEKLY, $1 a year. Specimens free. Address THE SUN, New York City. Clubs supplied at reduced rates and Post Masters' Checks, and a complete story in every number. The WEEKLY SUN contains more reading matter than any other paper published in the world. Ten dollar premiums guaranteed, $100 Life Insurance, Green Pastes, Chromos, Engravings, Spectacles and lots free. Send a Dollar and try it.

I. W. ENGLAND, Publisher, New York.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

FOR FAMILY USE—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits Every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and sample machine, Free. Howley, Haven & Co., Boston, Mass. MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SORGHUM, in ten hours. Without using drugs. For circulars, address F. C. SAGER, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

STEEL SHIRT COLLAR—Pickpocket Detective—and Capillary Pen Portfolio. Mailed on receipt of 50 cents each. HENRY GAY, 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

$20 A DAY: Business new. For circulars and sample, address I. S. JOHNSON & CO., Bridgeport, Ct.

EMPLOYMENT.—$200 a month with Stencil Dies. 3 Samples free. S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Oroide).—These justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for durability and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Full-jeweled patent Lever, $25, equal in appearance and for time to any $100 Gold Watch; Same, of extra fine finish, $28, Same, Ladies' Size, $25. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled patent lever, equaling in appearance a $250 gold watch. These magnificent watches are cheap at only $35. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All our watches are in hunting cases, gent's and ladies' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $3 to $6. Also, 18 Karat gold chains, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen, or ever handled.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—Ed. Post.

One of the $20 Watches in worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending it.—Democrat & Democrat.

We have received a Seventh watch free. Goods sent promptly.—Ed. Democrat.

WINCHELL'S

SKETCHES OF CREATION.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. Together with a Statement of the Intimations of Science respecting the Primeval Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

or

"A popular exposition of the leading facts and principles of the history of the earth. It is unlike any work in the English language in the clearness and simplicity of statements with respect to illustrations and poetical beauty. The whole range of geological science is passed in review, the most available evidences and fores, retaining only so much of the technical phraseology as is essential to accuracy of detail. Though expressly intended for popular reading, it will prove equally useful to students, and from the encyclopedic and exhaustive manner in which the subject is treated, it will be found a valuable work of reference."—Boston Traveller.

"It never lets itself down to popular style, but adapts to the taste of the expression and the spirited of its illustrations for its hold on the mass of readers, while it commands the bold and striking views of modern physical science, it is also profoundly religious, thoroughly sound and evangelical. While it accepts the results of the freest investigation, it makes no suggestions calculated to shock the timid conservative in matters of faith. Few works combine so extensive a range of topics with so much practical interest. Many of its disclosures, though founded on rigid scientific induction, have almost the effect of sensational fiction."

PUBLISHED by HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $2 00.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N. Y.

Will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and CABINET ORGANS, during the present month, at extremely low prices for Cash, or for this month, or will take from $5 to $10 per month until paid; the same to let, and rent money applied if purchased. Chickering Pianos are included in the above offer.

WILL CURE IN 5 MINUTES.

My AMAZON ROOT will cure Head-ache, Tooth-ache, and Ague in Five Minutes; it does more cures in the world. Will be sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1 00 cents, to any part of the world. Address

G. F. ALZORA, M. D.

No. 336 Broadway, New York.

Box 3026.

A MODEL PARLOR MAGAZINE, for a family of Operatives, splendid engravings, colored illustrations, together with an elegant display of fashions, and numerous articles on all subjects interesting to the ladies, published in America, and the value of the premiums offered to subscribers is almost incredible. —Phrenological Journal.

THE AMERICAN HATTERS' CONFORMETERS and CHARTS.—Invented and manufactured by Samuel Clark, 20 West 12th St., N. Y. Used for many years by principal and first-class hatters in this city and country, and recognized by them as being more generally correct than any other construction. They are the only article made that will make a hat fit. They produce immediate results. Full information compared to their quality. Send for a Circular.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our new Printing Presses and Outfits, printing it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., sent free. Presses for printing Hymn-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 16 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 98 Murray Street, New York.

EMPLOYMENT, a permanent home, and fair wages are given to Members of the Co-operative Home. For particulars, address as above, Phelps, Ontario Co., N. Y.

1000 CHILDREN'S CARRIAGES, from $4 to $25. L. P. TIRRALS, 478 Broadway, New York. Carriages Repaired.

A MENAI SEMINARY, Amenia, N.Y. Term begins April 5. Rev. J. H. TUTTLE, A.M., Principal.

$25 A DAY! 40 new articles for Agents. Samples cost free. 11, B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Due attention is also given to topics of general and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly engaged in the department of Illustration, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographers in all the large cities of America, Europe, and the East for prompt and valuable contributions. With a Literary Journal, the Publishers aim to be recognized as the only illustrated newspaper which has even approached the dignity of maintaining a claim to such a character.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY consists of comments on the most prominent topics. It includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Social Questions of the day.

In No. 673, for November 13, was commenced the new story "ALL ALONE," by WILKIE COLLINS, the Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers remitting $4 00 for each single subscription will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of this story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with gratuitous Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S WEEKLY is made a subscriber for life.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most remarkable in periodical literature. In the nature of journalism, it is recognized as the best and most attractive family publication issued. As an illustrated character it has already obtained a rival in the country. By a special arrangement with the Messrs. Reed, publishers of the Berlin Modenwelt, the leading journal of fashion in Europe—its fashion-plates are published in this country simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

The Literary Matter in the BAZAR is every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter—Stories, Sketches, Descriptive Articles, Travels, &c. Editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every topic of interest. In short, the Publishers of the BAZAR are spared no permanently secure for this journal the very best talent that is to be found in the country, as well as abroad.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in this country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has nearly completed its Forty-First Volume. Its success hitherto—unrivaled by that of any other monthly publication—has been fully deserved by the popular character, the variety and variety of its contents; to the enterprise of the Publishers in securing for its pages the best literary contributions of English and American writers; to its profusely illustrated articles; to its freedom from party partisanship, and to its unbroken adherence to the principles of the Religious Journal, upon which it was founded. Its steadily increasing circulation, upon the best guarantee of its merits. The Monthly Numbers of the Magazine has depended upon its literary attractions, and its publication has been a confident that with increased attention to the wants of its readers, and with the aid of the best talent in the country, it will merit a continuance of its present popularity.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than any similar periodical published in the English language. Thus the ample space at the disposal of its Publishers will enable them to present, from time to time, topics which their larger contemporaries of the Periodical Press have not the room to discuss with anything like adequate fullness. The Publishers feel themselves warranted in asking and anticipating for it, in the future, a continuance of the favor which has accorded to their enterprise in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00

HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year, one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of the Illustrated Series for the MAGAZINE 54 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 52 cents a year, postage prepaid, to any part of the country, at the office where received. Subscriptions from Booksellers, Postmasters, and others commenced with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 26 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to cover postage, which will be prepaid.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions will commence with the Number next after receipt of order. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the publisher wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is intended to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the Numbers are sent by Mail, it is necessary to notify the Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS, New York. Care should be taken, also, that the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200: Half Page, $110: Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Whole Page, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—Whole Page, $1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

"DOG LOST.—So OCTOBER, A BLACK AND TAN DOG, Cropped Ears, Long Limbs, Slightly Gray on each side of Neck; answers to name of SNAP. Those bringing him to 316 South Eleventh Street will be suitably rewarded."

A NEW DISCOVERY!!
PHALON'S
"VITALIA,"
OR,
Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Grey Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or flaccident matter, requires no shaking up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "VITALIA" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the direction being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!
AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box,
CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON,
517 Broadway, N. Y.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,
NEW YORK.

THE LADIES' SOROSIS CLUB,
of New York, recently changed their discussions from woman's suffrage to Hair Preparations and Pimple Banishers. They declared that where nature had not endowed them with beauty, it was their right—yea, their duty—to seek it where they could. So they all voted that MAGNOLIA BALM overcame Sallowness, Rough Skin, and Ring-marks, and gave to the complexion a most distinct (Borealis) and marble-like appearance (dangerous to men, no doubt); and that LYON'S KATHAIRON made the hair grow thick, fine, and awful pretty, and, moreover, prevented it from turning grey. If the proprietors of these articles did not send the statement to us, they are not smart.

VICK'S
Floral Guide for 1870.

OUR HANDSOME AND TYPICAL TRIBUNAL resists of Vick's Illustrated Catalogue of Seeds and Floral Guide, which has already been circulated to the extent of 300,000 copies on fine tinted paper, with about 100 fine wood Engravings of Flowers and Vegetables, and a beautiful COLORED PLATE—consisting of seven varieties of PHLOX DRUMMONDII, making a fine

BOUQUET OF PHLOXES.

It is the most beautiful, as well as the most instructive Floral Guide published, giving plain and thorough directions for the

CULTURE OF FLOWERS AND VEGETABLES.

The FLORAL GUIDE is published for the benefit of my customers, but will be forwarded to all who apply for it by mail, for TEN CENTS, which is not half the cost. Address

JAMES VICK,
Rochester, N.Y.

PATENTS INVENTORS who wish to take out Letters Patent, are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for Twenty-three Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. A pamphlet, containing full directions for obtaining Patents, sent gratis. Address MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, N.Y.

ELGIN WATCHES
MANUFACTURED BY
The National Watch Company.

All the Grades of the Elgin Watches, INCLUDING THE "LADY ELGIN," READY FOR SPRING TRADE.

The Company also call the attention of Watch buyers to the fact that the Elgin Watches now offered have several peculiar improvements over all others, and also a new so constructed as to enclose the works, and form a protection against dust, enabling the movement to remain in order without cleaning double the time that a watch will ordinarily run without this protection. The Elgin Watches have been the most reliable Watches thrown upon the market, and selling many thousands of them in all parts of the country, that the Elgin Watches are the best time-keepers now offered to the American public, for either Ladies' or Gentlemen's use, Railway or other uses.

PATENT DUST EXCLUDER,

OVER FIVE HUNDRED DEALERS

in various parts of the land have unreservedly endorsed them. They are in use upon numerous lines of Railway, including the Union Pacific and the Pennsylvania Central, and officers of these roads, with other prominent R.R. officials, endorse them as the best watches for the use of R. R. employés and travelers yet introduced.

The following are presented as specimens of these testimonials:

UNION PACIFIC R. R., OFFICE OF GEN'L SUP'T.,
OMAHA CITY, Nebr., Dec. 16, 1869.

HON. T. M. AVERY, President National Watch Co., CHICAGO, Ill.:

Dear Sir,—During the month that I have carried one of your T. M. Avery, 8 " Watches it has not failed to keep the time with so much accuracy as to leave nothing to be done in this regard. For accuracy in time-keeping, beauty of movement and finish, your watch is equal to any I have ever seen, and I take pride as an American, and I am confident that in all respects they will compete successfully in the markets of the world with similar manufactures of older nations. They need only to be known to be appreciated.

Yours, most respectfully,
C. G. HAMMOND, Gen'l Sup't.

OFFICE OF THE HANNIBAL & ST. JOSEPH RAILROAD, }
Gen'l Sup't, NEW YORK, Jan. 17, 1870. }

T. M. AVERY, Esq., President National Watch Co.,

Dear Sir,—The Watch made by your Company, which I carried the past two months, has not kept accurate time. I have carried it frequently on engines, and have been on the road with it almost daily, and during this time it has run uniformly with our standard clock.

Yours truly, ALEX. MITCHELL, Gen'l Sup't.

The following dealers, in various parts of the country, have certified that they consider the Elgin Watches to be all that the Company have advertised them, as better finished, more correct and durable, than any other watches of similar grade, and that they have great confidence in recommending them to the public on account of their general merit:

Wheeler, Parsons, & Co.,	C. Ockamp, Cincinnati.
N. Y.	C. Hallahan, "
Warren, Spadone, & Co.,	E. Jacard & Co., St. Louis.
"	N. E. Cutteridge & Co.,
Middleton & Bro., N. Y.	Cleveland.
T. B. Myers, "	H. Burt, Cleveland.
Henry Gunzel, "	Morse, Reddin, & Hamilton, Chicago.
Geo. W. Funk & Co., "	Hyde & Goodrich, "
Scott, Barrett, & Co., Phila.	J. H. Reese, Denver, Col.
"	Wm. Ellery & Co., San
J. B. Reed & Son, "	Francisco.
Dubasc & Co., Cincinnati.	Koch & Dryfus, N. Orleans.
Jenkins & Black, "	And over 400 others.

Various grades and prices made to suit different tastes.

No Movements Retailed by the Company.

☞ Call on your Jeweler and ask to see the Elgin Watches.

Business Office and Salesroom National Watch Company, 159 and 161 Lake St., Chicago.

WARNER, PECK, & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS OF Children's Carriages,
Springfield, Mass.

POLLAK & SON, Manufs. of Genuine Meerschaum Goods. Stores 119 Nassau and 20 Maiden Lane, Salesroom 37 John Street, middle of block. Send for illustrated price-list or retail circular before buying elsewhere. Repairing and Boiling also done.

Woodward's ARCHITECTURE.

Designs and Hints on Building. With priced catalogue of 61 books on Architecture and Agriculture. Quarterly, 25 cents per annum.

Books sent postpaid, on receipt of price.

Harney's Barns, Out-buildings, & Fences.

Just published, with 200 Designs & Plans of Stables, Farm Barns, Out-buildings, Gates, Gateways, Fences, Stable Fittings and Furniture.

Ten Dollars.

Woodward's National Architect.

1000 Working Designs, Plans, and Details of Country and Village and Suburban Houses, with Specifications and Estimates.

Twelve Dollars.

Woodward's Suburban & Country Houses.

70 Designs. $1 50.

Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses.

188 Designs. $1 50.

Woodward's Country Homes.

150 Designs. $1 50.

GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,
191 Broadway, New York.

"ECONOMY IS WEALTH"—FRANKLIN.

WHY will people pay $50 or more for a SEWING MACHINE when $32 will buy one that has a standard sewing motion, makes the Elastic Lock Stitch, is constructed upon entirely new and practical principles, runs by friction, and excels all others? These celebrated Machines, Fully licensed, are intended for the people who want to save time, labor, and money. Agents Wanted. Machines sent to Agents and place among to needy families. For circulars and reduced prices, address J. G. SMITH & CO., 27 FRANKLIN and DIAMOND S. M. Co., Box 297, Boston, Mass.

ESTB. ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS' 1849.
(211 Washington St., N. Y.)

SAPOLIO
THE BEST THING OUT
FOR CLEANING

Windows (without Water), Paint, Oilcloths, Floors, Tables, and all Woodwork, China, Earthen, and Glass Ware, and for General House-Cleaning Purposes.

FOR POLISHING

Knives, Tin Ware, Brass, Steel, Iron, and all Metallic Wares. REMOVES, as by Magic, Stains and Rust, leaving a brilliant surface, easy to Save.

Removes Stains from Marble, Paint, and Wood.

Is not injurious, and QUICKER, BETTER, and CHEAPER than Bath Brick, Rotten Stone, Acid, or Lye; it will be found, on trial, the most perfect, reliable, and indispensable article ever offered for public use in any other country; in fact, a preparation no individual or class can afford to be without.

We refer to the many testimonials in our possession, from families, hotels, and manufacturers; also to more than persons who have it in daily use in house and shop. It will cost you little to test our statements.

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND

For Sale—Wholesale and Retail—by Grocery, Drug, and Notion Houses throughout the United States.

$732 in 31 DAYS

Made by one Agent, selling SILVER'S PATENT ELASTIC BRAND. Over 50,000 now in use. Recommended by Hon. Horace Greeley and American Agriculturist. One county reserved for each Agent. C. A. CROSS & CO., 58 Cortlandt St., N.Y., or 132 Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

$20 A DAY to MALE and FEMALE

Agents to introduce the NEW IMPROVED SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED LOCK STITCH MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $40. All others are infringements and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. CENTRE FREE. Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

Stammering

Cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, address SIMPSON & CO., Box 5076, NEW YORK.

Have you Piles? If so, read ADVT. next week!!!

THE AMERICAN HUMORISTS.

MARK TWAIN, JOHN SHERMAN, P. V. NASBY.
A group photograph from life.
Three sizes: Cards, 25 cts.; Cabinet, 50 cts.; Royal (10 by 13), $1. Sent free by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address M. A. Mayhew, Box 975, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for Willson's School and Family Charts.
To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers Square, N.Y.

$3.—The Culver Sewing Machine will be sent to one boy, person in every town of 200 inhabitants, who will introduce it, for $3—worth $25. Warranted to outwear Howe stitch. T. CULVER & CO., Box 1918, Chicago, Ill.

General Garibaldi's New Novel.

THE RULE OF THE MONK;
OR,
ROME IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIV.—No. 691.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

CAPTAIN WILLIAMS, OF THE "ONEIDA."

LATER and fuller accounts of the terrible disaster to the Oneida leave no room for doubt as to the crime of Captain EYRE. It is shown that, after striking the Oneida, the Bombay must have backed away from her before continuing on her course, so that her officers must have been aware of the serious nature of the collision, and that it was not a "mere graze," as Captain EYRE afterward declared he supposed it to be. Nothing is wanting to show that in leaving the Oneida he knew he was forsaking a crippled and perhaps sinking ship. It is in evidence that the whistle of the Oneida was blown and three guns fired; yet Captain EYRE asserts that he heard nothing of these, although the sound was distinctly heard at Yokohama, twenty miles distant. It is somewhat remarkable that the "strong breeze" to which he attributes his not hearing them should not have prevented the sound from reaching ears so much further away in the same direction, and not listening, as he asserts he was, for signals of distress. But the steward of the Bombay, on arriving at Yokohama, asserted that they had run down a ship and "cut her in to the water's edge, so that he could see the men carrying some person on deck;" and Lieutenant CLEMENS, of the British ship Ocean, testified before the naval Court of Inquiry convened at Yokohama to investigate the conduct of Captain EYRE, that the Captain boasted to him, the night of his arrival at Yokohama, that "he had cut the whole quarter off a 6-gun Yankee frigate, and served her bloody right well." His own evidence before the Court, guarded as it was, shows that he knew or suspected that the collision was a very serious one; for he inquired of the pilot where he could go for safety, supposing his own ship was hurt, and seems to have been quieted by the answer that a spit of land was so near at hand that a ship could not possibly go down. If he had merely "grazed" the Oneida, why should he be so solicitous about his own safety? He spent a "good fifteen minutes" in looking out for signals, and then, without considering that possibly the ship he had run into was too much injured to fire signals (supposing it to be true that he did not hear the guns that were fired), he steamed away, leaving the noble ship to go down in darkness, bearing with her scores of brave men.

The records of cruelty on sea or land contain nothing to surpass the inhumanity and wickedness of this great crime.

Captain WILLIAMS, of the Oneida, conducted himself with the courage and heroism of a true man. One of the survivors of the disaster, Mr. W. W. CROWNINSHIELD, the Captain's clerk, says, in his account of his escape: "Captain WILLIAMS acted as bravely as he has always done. He would not leave his post on the bridge, although he was almost pulled away, and when urged by Mr. YATES, replied, 'I go down with my ship.' A petty officer urging him to go, he grasped the iron rail and said, 'No; this is my place, and here I remain.' This heroism, we are proud as Americans to say, was shared by all on board the ship; not one who had a station left it, but stood facing death without a murmur. Not a cry was heard when the good ship went down.

Several very touching instances of self-control and moral heroism were witnessed while the ship was settling down into the sea; none more so than that of Ensign CHARLES A. COFF. This brave youth was in charge of the "berth deck," and, after seeing all the sick and invalid seamen removed to the deck, returned below to his post of duty. A comrade hailed him to come on deck, as the ship was going down. "No," said Ensign COFF, "I am stationed here, and can not come until relieved."

Lieutenant-Commander STEWART and Ensign ADAMS went to fire the alarm-guns, and ascertained that one of the men at the wheel, who was killed and swept overboard, had the key to the magazine in his pocket. Together they forced the door, and together aided in firing three guns; but before the fourth could be fired the water had gained so rapidly that the heavy gun and iron carriage slipped and went down the hatchway, carrying with it Ensign ADAMS, and crushing him to instant death.

Surgeon FROTHINGHAM had with him a remarkably bright Japanese boy of two-sworded inheritance, whom he was taking to New York to educate for five years; true to his trust, he was last seen trying to rescue the little "Takonin."

CAPTAIN WILLIAMS, OF THE "ONEIDA."—"I GO DOWN WITH MY SHIP."

It is sad to think that, despite the brutal inhumanity of Captain EYRE, most of these lives might have been saved had the Oneida been suitably provided with boats. Before leaving Yokohama Captain WILLIAMS applied for boats to replace some that had been lost in a storm. His application was refused. This is a matter that requires strict investigation, to ascertain upon whom rests the responsibility of having sent to sea a national ship unprovided with the proper means of saving the lives of her officers and crew in case of accident.

SMALL MEN IN BATTLE.

THERE is a principle of natural selection in an enemy's bullets which bears more heavily against large than against small men. Large men are more likely to be hit. The chance of a man being accidentally shot is as the square root of the product of his height multiplied into his weight; where a man of 16 stone in weight, and 6 feet 2½ inches high, will escape from chance shots for two years, a man of 8 stone in weight, and 5 feet 6 inches high, would escape for three. But the total proportion of the risk run by the large man is considerably greater. He is conspicuous from his size, and is therefore more likely to be recognized and made the object of a special aim. It is also in human nature that the shooter should pick out the largest man, just as he would pick out the largest bird in a covey, or antelope in a herd. Again, of two men who are aimed at, the bigger is the more likely to be hit, as affording a larger target. This chance is a trifle less than the ratio of his increased sectional area, though we are unable to calculate the decrease, from our ignorance of the average distances of the enemy and the closeness of his fire. At long distances, and when the shooting was wild, the decrease would be insensible; at comparatively close ranges it would be unimportant. As a matter of fact, commanders are very frequently the objects of special aim. When Soult visited Inkerman, a story appeared in the newspapers of some English veteran having declared that the hero must have lived a charmed life, for he had "covered" him with his rifle upward of thirty times, and yet had never the fortune to hit him. Nelson was killed by one of many shots aimed directly at him, by a rifleman in the main-top of the Fougueux vessel with which his own was closely engaged.

The total relative chances against being shot in battle, of two men of the respective heights and weights I have described, are as 3 to 2 in favor of the smaller men in respect to accidental shots, and in a decidedly more favorable proportion in respect to direct aim; the latter chance being compounded of the two following—first, a better hope of not being aimed at, and secondly, a hope very little less than 3 to 2 of not being hit when made the object of an aim.

This is really an important consideration. Had Nelson been a large man, instead of a mere featherweight, the probability is that he would not have survived so long. His active career extended through twelve years, during the earlier part of which he was much more frequently under fire than afterward. Had he only lived through two-thirds, or even three-fourths, of his battles, he could not have commanded at the Nile, Copenhagen, or Trafalgar. His reputation under those circumstances would have been limited to that of a dashing captain or a young and promising admiral. Wellington was a small man, and he had been shot in the Peninsula, his reputation, though it would have undoubtedly been very great, would have lost the lustre of Waterloo. In short, to have survived is an essential condition to becoming a famed commander; yet persons equally endowed with military gifts —such as the requisite form of high intellectual and moral ability and of constitutional vigor are by no means equally qualified to escape shot free. The enemy's bullets are least dangerous to the smaller men, and therefore small men are more likely to achieve high fame as commanders than their equally gifted contemporaries whose physical frames are larger.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1870.

CONGRESS AND CUBA.

AS we write, it is still uncertain what action Congress will take upon the Cuban question. General BANKS's resolution, virtually recognizing the belligerent rights of Cuba, has not yet been reported, and Mr. MORRILL's bill reported in the Senate has been seriously shorn. It now forbids any ship or vessel to be fitted out, armed, or equipped for the service of any foreign prince or state for the purpose of subduing American colonists claiming independence; but the section prohibiting the sale of arms and munitions was stricken out in Committee. The bill as reported removes the obscurity of the present law of 1818, which forbids the equipping and arming of any vessel "to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace." Under this clause it was contended by Senator CARPENTER that the Spanish gunboats could be detained. But it was enough to ask whether, "colony, district, state, or people," did not necessarily mean to describe some authority which the United States had in some way recognized; and whether that could be applied, for instance, to the county of Yorkshire in England, or to the province of Catalonia in Spain.

The precise words of the new bill leave no doubt of this kind. It forbids the fitting out of ships in our ports by any foreign power, "for the purpose of subduing American colonists claiming independence. It says to the European nations, "You may send an army and navies and ships as you please from Europe to retain your colonies, but you shall not use our ports as your base of war." It virtually recognizes the equal right of European authority in the parent state and the American colony. If we are at peace with Spain she may strengthen Cuba in our ports to suppress a republic in Andalusia, but not to suppress a republic in Cuba. Our wish, therefore, according to this bill, is not to extend republicanism; it is to destroy European authority in America.

If any nation assent the bill goes beyond the declaration in President MONROE's Message of 1823, which was the manifesto of the Monroe doctrine." That declaration was in two passages of the Message. In one the President said that the American continents were henceforth "not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power." In the other he said, "With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere;" and he added that those governments who had declared and maintained their independence, and "whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged," must not be touched. Mr. MONROE's bill proposes that we shall now interfere with the existing colonies to the point of forbidding European powers to strengthen themselves in our ports by fitting out ships. They may, indeed, try arms and ammunition; but it is clear that European ships of war may not be repaired in our harbors. But Spain shall build no more gun-boats in New York to subdue Cuba —that, at least, is evident.

The reason of such a limitation as this it is not easy to see. If a European power has any right whatever to use force to subdue an insurrection in a colony, it is evidently the same right that empowers it to assert its authority any where within its dominions. The United States have never hitherto questioned this right. President MONROE, in his message in 1823, as we have seen, expressly disclaimed any question of it. Mr. CLAY, as Secretary of State, in 1825, wrote that the United States desired "no political change" in Cuba. Wherever the colonial authority of the European state existed, it was undisputedly recognized by the United States as of the same kind and degree as its authority elsewhere. To this country Spanish troubles in Malaga and Spanish troubles in Porto Rico were the same, so long as we were at peace with Spain, and so long as the troubles did not seem to us to involve the question of belligerent rights to the insurrection. Whenever that time came we were to be governed, of course, by the principles we had always accepted —by the same principles.

But if, as the Monroe bill seems to imply, the title of Spanish authority in Cuba, or of any European state upon this continent, is defective, or, for good reasons, intolerable, let us issue a general warning to that effect. If, when any number of inhabitants of a colony raise the standard of insurrection, we intend to regard them as "American colonists claiming independence," why do we resort to so clumsy a plan as Senator MORRILL's? The simpler and easier way would be to declare that such belligerents whenever they declare their independence, if this would be to flout all our own principles and to justify the action of the British Government when the rebellion began, it would at least be frank and intelligible. It would say plainly to the world that whenever a party of our own citizens, for whatever purpose, went to a colony and persuaded a few American colonists to claim independence, we should take their part, and, having broken their connection with Europe, annex them to ourselves. If this policy should imply reproach as to the contempt of other nations, it would at least be a striking proof of our glorious manifest destiny.

We hope that Congress will not botch and boggle this business. If a European state has not the same kind of authority over a colony that it has over any of its dominions, let us find the authority altogether. The position and condition of a colony in insurrection may, indeed, lead to many legal recognitions on our part, and it may be evident that no European state can hope to hold American colonists much longer. But such recognitions are merely incidental to the broad fact that no European state can be said to hold American colonies much longer.

But what Congress will not botch and boggle this business. If a European state has not the same kind of authority over a colony that it has over any of its dominions, let us find the authority altogether. The position and condition of a colony in insurrection may, indeed, lead to many legal recognitions on our part, and it may be evident that no European state can hope to hold American colonists much longer. But such recognitions are merely incidental to the broad fact that no European state can be said to hold American colonies much longer.

We hope that if, as we now hear, MR. JULES FAVRE has promised him active support to the Ministry, his action may well enlighten foreign public opinion.

GRAPES AND THORNS, AND FIGS AND THISTLES.

GRAPES are not gathered of thorns; and no one who knows any thing of the Democratic party of New York could seriously have supposed that it would give the city a new charter, or any economical reform. When the Governor signalled the Legislature as "honest," and spoke as if the result of the election had really purified our politics, every body felt that his Excellency spoke very foolishly, because the party that would now control the State had long controlled the city, unchallenged, and the honesty and economy and purity of Democratic rule are there forever visible. The gauntness in power and modernization in the city were precisely those parts of the municipal system which the Democratic party could not touch.

It was well understood that the great work of the Legislature would be a new city charter, and a charter which should give back the hands of the managers of the Democratic party all that had hitherto escaped them. In due time the new charter was presented. Its whole scheme virtually delivering the city to the Ring. It was outrageous, but of course not unexpected. But in a large city, where the power of a party sinks as we have hitherto shown the Democratic party to be, is undisciplined, and where the most ignorant and common man make the same weight in politics, the "loot" of the Ring would necessarily excite envy. MR. O'BRIEN, for instance, naturally inquire why MR. TWEED should be dictator. MR. GENET would see no divine right in MR. TWEED. The result shows that this was the sentiment in the city of down with the Ring was raised. There was a loud beating of gongs and a striking of fine attitudes, and an announcement of an anti-Ring charter; and finally the production of such a document. It was offered in the Legislature, and instantly in some every thing was in reprisals and nothing was left but the model charter of "the honest Democracy" permits the City Chamberlain, Mr. Connolly, to continue his present system of receiving, among other perquisites, about fifty thousand dollars for signing his name.

The Ring is dead, long live the Ring! The "honest Democracy," we presume, are quite as likely to purify elections and save money to the tax-payers of and between the publication of the city of New York, when they march under MESSRS. SWEENY and TWEED, as when they rally to the colors of MESSRS. O'BRIEN and GENET. The whole matter is brought to the country that watches this quarrel of Democratic factions for the sacking of the city that Democracy can not honestly govern from "Republican rascality" but calling the Democratic party to national power. How safe those gentlemen would be had the people only elected MR. SEYMOUR and GENERAL BLAIR! How richly secure, if they could only remain in power! Is SWEENY'S MR. HOFFMAN in the place of GENERAL GRANT!

THE RIGHTS OF RAILWAY TRAVELERS.

IN our issue for March 12 we stated the case of JOHN A. COLEMAN against the New York and New Haven Railroad Company, which in our judgment presents certain points that, in the interest of travelers, should be definitively settled. The great power of the great railway companies is like all other power. It consults its own advantage, not the convenience of the public. Moreover, the growing power of such companies is a very public peril. The means at their disposal for enforcing their own will are enormous. They are in possession of the only route of travel. The impracticability of organizing competing lines is notorious. They advertise in newspapers, and they pass entire lists of free passes are showered upon Legislatures, and many a Judge rides to his court to hear a case in which the Company that carries him freely to and from his home is a party. The name of the great New Jersey road has become a synonym for that of the State. It is generally understood that it even elected Senators in Congress. It was the most dangerous enemy that a Jerseyman could have in his own State.

Nothing, therefore, is more indispensable than that the managers of the great railways should feel their direct responsibility to public opinion through the watchfulness of the Press. There are a hundred points of interest constantly which can not be brought into court. There are a hundred more which no individual passenger, however strong the presumption in favor of his complaint, cares to contest against a great Company. There are Companies that still pack passengers into the old-fashioned black-holes—the cars without a raised roof. The New York Central dumps its passengers into the snow and rain at its Albany station. Last summer the New York and New Haven Railroad Company prohibited the sale of Hearth and Home in its cars, because of an article critical of the conduct of the road, its notorious disregard of the comfort of passengers, and alleging its resort to "the usual lobby-legislative tactics" to defeat the charter of a parallel road. This was a wanton infringement of the public convenience, for which, of course, there was no legal remedy —an act of despotic power, to which every traveler was forced to submit.

From the encroachment of the nameless petty oppressions of travelers by railroad power our only relief would be prompt and full exposure. It is, indeed, very troublesome to the individual. Few persons care to write a letter to the newspapers to recount the little mishaps, the delays, the inconveniences, which yet will not correct themselves, and will increase instead of diminish. When, therefore, a traveler has sustained severe personal injuries from what he conceives to be the excessive carelessness of a road agent, and has appealed to a jury, which, upon a fair hearing, has awarded him damages, as in the case of MR. COLEMAN—in which there was no urging the suit, raises questions which are of general interest to all travelers—we can have no hesitation in giving public the case as presented by one of its counsel, a gentleman of the highest personal and professional character. For readers of HARPER'S WEEKLY remember that, like the other, is an ex parte statement.

LAW OFFICES OF PERSON & CHOATE,
No. 2 WALL STREET, NEW YORK, March 7, 1870.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

In the case of COLEMAN vs. The Railroad Company, tried before Judge MARCH on the 23d, 24th, and 25th days of February, 1870, in the County of Suffolk, in the State of Massachusetts, in which Judge MARCH and a jury of twelve men awarded COLEMAN $5,000 damages, the New Haven Railroad Company is defendant. As you state in your article, the public against a railroad, to remind the jury. Your conclusion is that, "upon the evidence, there can be little doubt that the conductor struck him a blow," and that MR. COLEMAN is entitled to recover." Inasmuch as the statement of the case which you publish in your issue incorrectly set forth, I ask you, in simple justice to all the parties concerned, to print

1. The entire evidence showed that the conductor COLEMAN never behaved in any way except in a most plaintiff admitted it; his witnesses proved it. The only contradictory evidence was that of the ex-officer MR. COLEMAN still be had repeatedly urged that gentleman to put his fare or leave the car.

2. It is not true that, when the conductor came through the car to inspect the tickets, MR. COLEMAN refused him, and stated that he was traveling constantly," etc., as a reason for not paying his fare or showing his mileage-book ticket. The plaintiff himself admitted that when the conductor first came through the car he had the ticket between the leaves, exposed to view, and had his newspaper before him, so that the conductor could not be expected to see the ticket without noticing its irregularity, is it probable that the conductor would have called the attention to it? The evidence showed an entirely different purport. MR. COLEMAN could not be bought by the mileage ticket "to pass or if he failed on the other, but after the fare was paid he concluded to "stay by it." His conversation took place until the conductor informed him that he would not stand upon his ticket. Then he presented, and remained him that he had already been so informed. MR. COLEMAN replied, in effect, that he had determined to test his right to ride upon the ticket which he presented, and should refuse to pay the fare. MR. COLEMAN ordered the conductor to allow him to pass by the ground that a kind of transportation existed between the conductor and the traveling public; that the latter consideration and the traveling public; that the directors would never know it, and it would be no detriment to the road; and that if he, the conductor, was reprimanded or got into trouble, he, COLEMAN, would make it right. He did not offer to throw the ground him who knew him." There was no evidence to show that any passenger in the car knew what was said from the car, and no evidence that he was in any way prejudiced by it. He was a stranger to the conductor, and apparently to the other passengers in the car. He only "would hear" or "might hear" what was said in the car was a State director of the Boston and Albany road. He admitted his ignorance, as a director, of the rules of his own road in similar cases, his duties as a director, and his position as a stockholder in the road.

MR. COLEMAN manifested no willingness to yield to any authority, and told the conductor that "he might use, he did it at his peril." The conductor repeatedly urged MR. COLEMAN to pay his fare, and told him that the orders of the road precisely what MR. COLEMAN proposed to the conductor, except that in the latter case the car was stopped, advanced the car, in the other, the conductor, and courteously asked him not to remain. MR. COLEMAN refused to accede to these requests. At Stamford MR. COLEMAN was ejected by force from the car, and the conductor returned immediately before his expulsion. He declined to do so. Still, instead of immediately leaving the train, he knees against the seat in front of him, and placed his arm under the rail in the center of the car. The blow he struck from the car by main force, was carried to the platform of the car, and upon the platform-step, thus carrying him fell with him. The evidence did not sustain the contention that he was "thrown violently upon the platform." While being carried out he resisted with all his force, and struck the conductor. He claimed to have been struck before he was taken into the aisle of the car. The evidence upon this point was conflicting, both as to his being struck and as to whether he gave or was given the first blow. The conductor, by the rules of the Company to the acts of the employés engaged in preventing the violation of the car. He was therefore justified in the blow, but every employé who assisted in the blow MR. COLEMAN was present at the trial, and denied striking him. Is it quite fair, then, to fasten the blow upon those who, unconstructed, deny it, or to dignify MR. COLEMAN'S turbulent conduct as self-defense?

The injury occasioned by the blow was admitted to be slight. The only serious injury which MR. COLEMAN suffered was the fall from the platform to the track. But MR. COLEMAN knew that he was subject to this danger when he took it. The jury fully allowed for the resistance by bruising his knees and holding on to the seat would have prevented his falling, and for any other violence to which he was exposed. It certainly requires no argument to show that MR. COLEMAN was not entitled to compensation for injuries occasioned by his own contribution thereto. Has he a special claim to sympathy for a voluntary aggravation of a disease known only to himself?

There are other serious inaccuracies of statement in the article to which I have referred. I have mentioned enough to show you that the information upon which you relied, to say the least, is partial.

I do not ask you to weigh my statements against those of your informant. Having tried the case at all its trials, its base and at nisi prius, I am, of course, fully alive to the importance of the point you desire it important to satisfy yourself as to which has the better means of information. The accompanying notice will be allowed you for private inspection.

It is not my purpose to suggest any argument respecting the law of the case. However sound your views may be, they are not necessarily the interpretation by the courts must conclude the matter. Permit me, however, to call your attention to the decision of MR. COLEMAN, viz., that a railroad ticket is received in consideration of the conductor's passage and not upon how he will use it, notwithstanding the purpose for which it is purchased. This is a question of fact, not of evidence—and that a ticket of passage from one terminus of a railroad to the other gives the holder the right to stop at intermediate points to such stations as he may desire until he has traveled the length of the road—contrary to the current usage of all railroads in every respectable court of England and the United States. MR. COLEMAN, in the case before us, who first tried the case, and MR. Justice RAM, who presided at the second trial, decided MR. COLEMAN'S legal theory of settlement counsel who represented him did not except to the charge.

If MR. COLEMAN honestly sought to test his legal right in the premises, he in no way compromised his claim by leaving the cars under protest, or by submitting to the conductor's demands. His remedy would be full and complete and he need for damages confessed himself a trespasser, and, as to the price of his passage-money. And he is peculiarly fortunate in the circumstances of the editorial comment of so respectable a journal as your own as the representative of "the Rights of Railway Travelers."

In connection, allow me to say the suit in which you pass judgment is not decided. The case is now in a position to present a state of fact involved therein are likely to read your article: and it is quite fair for a railroad company to publish in Harper's Weekly its prejudge a case upon an ex parte statement? In its just pursuit by the ordinary public, unaccustomed to paper argorly circulates, a report of a case as yet undecided, and which involves issues which is adverse to the defendant? MR. COLEMAN elected his remedy and has the right to maintain such wrongs as he may have suffered. He could not was not of a representative character, and was not in any sense public. He is not entitled to be clothed with any of the attributes of a railroad as against the denial. He was simply that of a traveling agent desiring, very properly, to make the most of his time. He was not in the employ, nor was he, in fact, known to be invalid, without detection, and disappointed at the failure of passengers in his obstinate rest to seek litigation, and was by himself to contend that in some knew he was subject to, premeditatedly and deliberately, and at the most is only entitled to damages at law, which he has voluntarily sought.

Until this case is ended it falls we ask a suspension of judgment. Seeking justice as our right, we ask the Press not to usurp the duties of the Courts, and to allow us at least a fair field where we ask no favor.

The importance of the matter to the entire controversy by you is my apology for the length of this communication. I am, sir, very truly your obedient servant,

Respectfully yours,
CALVIN G. CHILD,
of Counsel for the N. Y. and N. H. R. R.

NOTES.

CAPTAIN G. SCHWERES is a name to be as loudly remembered as that of GENERAL ARTHUR WELLESLEY EVER IS to be uttered with horror. Captain SCHWERES was commander of the Ocean Gondy, which left Bremen on the 22d of January and was struck by a hurricane a week afterward. The vessel was pitch-pine on the 8th of February. For twelve days the ship lay to, while captain, engineers, and crew worked unceasingly to mend the machinery. At last they started with halting engines and came on at the rate of five knots an hour, and were met by the ravages of fifty days, during which happily all were well. Captain SCHWERES brought his vessel safe to port, and the hearty welcome of a country which feared never to hear of the voyagers from the Ocean Gondy was the evidence of mind alone saved us," my passengers. Let us remember his name and honor him.

GAIL HAMILTON'S new volume, "A Battle of the Books," including her version of her differences with her publishers, is placed before the public by MESSRS. HURD & HOUGHTON in the most attractive style of the Riverside press. Waiving the consideration of the taste and propriety of such a publication, which must be regarded by the author for herself, it may be safely said that her book affords much entertaining matter, and that it will be widely and joyfully read. Those who may not wholly approve of what some will call the bad taste of complying with the most exacstic wish of old Job, that his enemy "would write a book," will find the book full of the most rare of sparkling vivacity and interest. The story of her troubles is told under a very transparent veil, but it is full of facts, and forms a history of an author's dealings with publishers just a century ago; but the names of places, books, magazines, and living authors and publishers are so slightly disguised as to be recognizable at a glance. One can not but admire the ingenuity with which the rather difficult machinery of her story is managed, her keen satire, brilliant style, and business-like power of analyzing contracts and detecting the weak points of their phraseology. The book is highly suited to the necessity of reading a contract before signing it, no one need hope to catch her napping glance.

It is not necessary to go into the merits of the case, as between the author and her publishers. She is convinced of having suffered wrongs and losses, and does not hesitate to say so without mincing words; but for the evidence on which she brings her complaint, and justifies herself in making the unusual acquaintance with her private affairs, we must refer the reader to her own pages.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 7.—In the Senate, a bill was introduced for the admission of Georgia to the Union on equal footing with the other States. The day was occupied with a discussion of the Georgia bill. The Georgia bill was introduced to provide for additional representatives in the Forty-second Congress.

March 8.—In the Senate, among the bills introduced was one to amend the customs and tonnage laws, providing that one-half of the payments on duties or imports may be made in legal-tender notes; and another to promote the civilization of Indians, and to prepare them for the responsibilities of citizens. The bill proposed making a misdemeanor to fit out or equip ships of war for service in a European war. It also made American colonists claiming independence in Mexico, Central America, or South America, or the islands adjacent thereto, liable to the penalties of piracy. Action upon this bill shall affect the present office-holders in the States. And the bill for the admission of the representatives in 1870 be held on the day named in the Constitution, or on such other day as the present Legislature may designate, was adopted by a vote of 37 to 29.

March 9.—In the Senate, the Georgia bill as it passed the House was received from the Committee and reconsidered.—In the House, a resolution was offered for the repeal of the section of naturalization law in New York and elsewhere in seiring private property and appropriating it to the authority thereof was adopted by a vote of 37 to 29.

March 10.—In the Senate, a communication was received from General Rawlins, Secretary of War, giving copies of the new Constitution of that State, and announcing the ratification by it of the Fourteenth, the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments. —In the House, the bill for the reorganization of the army was considered at some length, and finally passed without a division. The bill provides for retaining a military branch of government service in regard to the Indian tribes, their lands, their trade, their title to fire, forests, and other important matters; for the appointment of a Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and other officers, to be selected from officers of the army, or who have served in it; establishes reduced rates of pay, and reduces the number of officers. The bill was discussed in sections, and all were agreed to as reported, with but one modification, which was to strike out the section that transfers the Indian Bureau to the War Department from that of the Interior.

March 11.—In the Senate, the Pending bill was passed by a vote of 49 to 19.—In the House, bills introduced was one to secure more efficient women for the Navy, by forbidding the appointment of any but apprentice from each congressional district and assistant surgeons, and providing examinations for candidates in the appointment of assistant surgeons in the Navy. The appropriations as aggregate amount of $17,817,000 is deficiencies in the bill now before for the present fiscal year. The largest items are as follows: For pensions, $10,000,000; for Indian Bureau, $200,000; Mint at San Francisco, $200,000; and Reconstruction Committee, $500,000.

March 12.—The Senate was not in session, and in the House the day was occupied in dealing with GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

The Assembly of the New York Legislature has passed a bill, by a vote of 71 to 27, for the abolition of intoxicating liquors. The clause in relation to the sale of liquor for any other than medicinal purposes on election days, in any incorporated city, reads as follows:

"Licenses granted, as in this act provided, shall not authorize any person or persons to sell or dispose of, or sell, give away or dispose of, any strong or spirituous liquors, wines, ales, beer, or any other drink on any hours of one and five o'clock in the morning, or on any day appointed by the laws of this State for holding any general election, or any town to open a polling place for the same shall be held, or on Sunday. And all persons licensed as aforesaid shall be closed and kept closed on Sundays and election days, and between the hours aforesaid, and the doors of the building herein contained shall be construed to prevent holes from being made in the walls connecting with the building, public upon Sundays, or from allowing free ingress or egress on the same days to any person, save as a druggist, or from presenting the sale of liquor here within the meaning of this act, and every violation of this act by Kings on that day in any public garden or other place, shall be deemed a misdemeanor in this State."

The steamer Ocean Queen is now upon the dock at the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

A Democratic caucus in the Democratic members of the Assembly the abolition of the City Commissioners of Police and the exemption of the Central Park Commission being the point of difference. It was agreed that all amendments in the Senate, it is said, desires to leave the Central Park Commission unbroken.

The trial of M'Farland, indicted for the murder of ALBERT D. RICHARDSON, was resumed in the Court of Sessions.

The Republicans of New Hampshire have re-elected GOVERNOR WESTON by a majority of 5,000.

There is a boisterous but uneventful passage of 20 days' duration, and the steamer arrived at her dock in Brooklyn safely on the 11th inst. The city of Boston has not yet been heard from.

FOREIGN NEWS.

It is reported from Rome that a scheme on infallibility was recently distributed to the members of the Council of Bishops. It says that the Church does not possess supreme and complete power, but that the Church of Rome and the Universal Church was received with perfect unanimity. The Pope is declared to be the head of which the Pontiff is the successor. All questions of faith are to be determined by the decrees of the whole of the Lord to Peter would be directed to the Universal Church. The Roman Catholic See, Catholic and immaculate, the doctrine has always been held by the Universal Church, and is irrevocable; with the concurrence of the Council, and define as a dogma of faith that the Roman Pontiff, when as the Roman Pontiff, of whom it was said, "I have prayed for thee, Peter, that thy faith fail not," and not for only when acting as the head of the Universal Church, pronounces what the Church must hold in matters of faith and morals. The definition of the infallibility extends over the same matters to which the infallibility of the Church extends. The Church should sure, which God forbid, to controvert the present definition, it would not be the departure from the true faith." The French and other Governments have demanded that their diplomatic representatives should be present at the deliberations of the Council.

A duel has taken place near Munich between the Duke de Montpensier and Prince Adalbert de Bavaria, growing out of a quarrel in the Spanish Cortes in relation to the Princess of the Duke. The Prince fell dead at the first fire, shot through the head.

The Abbé Lacordaire, a distinguished preacher, the leader of the Liberal Catholic party in France, took place at Paris on the 21st inst., in the 69th year of his age.

MR. Charles Dickens has had an interview with QUEEN VICTORIA, by royal invitation.

WILD-BOARS.

THE WILD-BOAR

"Of all the animals in India killed by me"—writes Captain SHAKESPEARE, a celebrated hunter—"the tiger, wild elephant, buffalo, bison, bear, boar, panther, and leopard, not one has ever made good his charge against the deadly bullets of my heavy rifle, or against the spear, save the wild-boar and panther. I consider hog-hunting to be the finest sport in the world."

It is difficult for one who has only seen the pig in a domestic state to realize the force and truth of the foregoing statement. What trace is there of thundering speed, eyes savage as those of a trapped tiger, and glowing as red-hot charcoal; of strength to rush beneath the horse's belly and bear him, with the hunter on his back, sheer off his legs; or of the terrible nine-inch-long tusk, which, entering the steed's flank, would plow a deep gory rut, ending only at the shoulder-bone? What trace is there of all this in the meek sow, affectionately cuddling her litter of tiny squeakers, or grunting her gratitude to Roger who replenishes her trough, and rolling her eyes with delicious languor as the worthy young mash-beaxer, leaning dreamily over the wicket, scratches her back?

In various parts of Europe the boar still roams at large—in parts of France, and in considerable numbers in the deep forests of Germany; but little or nothing is done as the present day in boar-hunting. India is the great field for this sport, and the animals there found are certainly the largest and most formidable of any in the world. There the boar roams the jungle, fearing not even the terrible tiger; crops his dinner at the verge of the auburn-striped monster's lair, and comes down with him to the pool to slake his thirst; yet that no affection exists between them is certain, from the fact that now and then sportsmen come across boars and tigers dead, the latter bearing marks of the wild pig's tremendous tusks.

Boar-hunting in India is always conducted on horseback, and the chief weapon employed is the spear. Of this there are two kinds in use. The one adopted in Eastern Hindostan is called a "jobber," about six feet long, weighted heavily at one end with lead. In Western Hindostan hunters have adopted a lance about ten feet in length, without any counterpoise. The writer's experience is, that the style of spear is of little consequence so long as the horse is thoroughly trained to the sport. Wherever a hog will go, even when hard pressed, there should the horse follow—up steep hills, down sudden slopes, over bushes, and along the face of rocks at an angle of forty degrees, and more slippery than the Nicolson pavement in foggy weather. It is very possible to have a horse too ardent: when it is considered that, when hard run, a boar has been known to tuck in his feet and fling himself over a bank fifteen feet deep, falling on his chest, to be up and off again in an instant, that disad-vantage of mounting a horse who hunts boars for his own amusement at the spectacle.

DEPARTURE OF A COLONY OF EMIGRANTS FOR COLORADO.—[SEE PAGE 203.]

INDIANS GAMBLING FOR THE POSSESSION OF A CAPTIVE.—SKETCHED BY M. W. CARY.—[SEE PAGE 199.]

As in Indian boar-hunting there is generally as much racing as fighting, and the hunter's valor goes for naught unless he possesses such facilities as will make him more than a match for the fleet, tusked monster, a fast horse is indispensable. "At his first burst the Indian boar will run away from the fleetest Arab racer." Therefore care is taken to give the horse every possible advantage. It generally happens that the pasture-ground selected by the hunter is surrounded for a long distance—ten, twenty, even thirty miles—from his strong-hold. Setting out in the early morning, he goes at a leisurely pace, while his fleeting place about the middle of the night. Here he springs, softly hogs wild and tame, and forge, sugar-cane, or such other food as he finds, and, strolling off, reaches home before daylight. This is the time to hunt him. He is full, tired, and sleepy, and altogether incapable of running his fastest. Indeed it may be said that gang of natives, with tomtoms, bells, cymbals, horns, and other implements of hideous Indian music, to rouse him from his covert; and roused he must be, for to penetrate to his sanctum sanctorum, where perfect privacy is had, is official act. When roused, however, the boar will make the best running he can; and here the hunter's fun has the advantage, for his opponent has taken care, after he has had his supper overnight, to put on a new suit of muscle, and has fed out in the morning empty and light, and in a condition to go at the fastest pace he is capable of. The hunter's great aim is to "head" his formidable game at the first burst and bring him to bay, well knowing that if he allows him to keep the lead until he recovers his wind, his hungry horse will flag and drop his ears, while the game, with the best event, is as fresh as a daisy.

The secret of aiding a wild hog is to ride as close to him as you can, keeping him on the spear or right hand of you. You must be able to turn the horse with the legs, and therefore the rider must be always in hand. In short, when the hog flags to speed the hunter must be ready to make his horse spring upon him, so to speak. The spear then goes through the fox, and if the hog charges at the horse, the increased force of the bodies meeting at such speed generally drives the spear through and out behind.

Wild pigs are found also in Africa. De Chaillu describes one variety as attaining very great size. "It is conspicuous," he says, "for a curious white face, adorned with several large, warty protuberances, on each side, found in between the eyes and nose. These, and the singularly long bristles which surround the eyes, and the long mane, give to a full grown male boar have a very curious effect. The color of the body is red."

Most difficult game these red, hairy-eyed pigs appear to be. They are described as tremendously savage, and active as berserkers. "I have," he says, "singling a boar from among a herd, and bringing him down with a shot, its companions in their fright "made a leap which must have measured over ten yards." "I have repeatedly seen them," says he, "leaping across the Ovenga, where by my own measurement it was more than eight yards wide."

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Dead Secret," etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

SIXTH SCENE.—SWANHAVEN LODGE.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FIRST.

SEEDS OF THE FUTURE (FIRST SOWING).

"NOTHING large as Windyates. But—shall we say snug, Jones?"

"And comfortable, Smith. I quite agree with you."

Such was the judgment pronounced by the two chosen specimens on Julius Delamayn's house in Scotland. It was, as usual with Smith and Jones, a sound judgment—as far as it went. Swanhaven Lodge was not half the size of Windyates; but it had been inhabited for two centuries when the foundations of Windyates were first laid—and it possessed the advantage, without inheriting the drawbacks, of its age. There is in an old house a delightful mellowness in the human character, as there is in an old hat. Kindly adaptation to the human head. The visitor who left Swanhaven quitted it with something like a sense of leaving home. Among the few houses not our own which Mrs. Delamayn held on our sympathies this was one. The ornamental grounds were far inferior in size and splendor to the grounds at Windyates. One of the park was beautiful—less carefully laid out, but also less monotonous than at Windyates. The lake on the northern boundary of the estate, famous for its trout of cream, was one of the curiosities of the neighborhood. The old house had a history, associating it with more than one celebrated Scottish name, which had been written and illustrated by Julius Delamayn. Visitors to Swanhaven Lodge were invariably presented with a copy of the volume (privately printed). One in twenty read it. The rest were "charmed," and looked at the pictures.

The day was the last day of August, and the occasion was the garden-party given by Mr. and Mrs. Delamayn.

Smith and Jones—following, with the other guests at Windyates, in Lady Lundie's train—exchanged their opinions on the exterior of the house, standing on a terrace at the back, near a flight of steps which led down into the garden. The terrace formed the van-guard of the visitors, appearing by two and threes from the reception rooms, and all bent on going to see the swans before the amusements of the day began. Julius Delamayn came out with the first detachment, recruited Smith and Jones, and other wandering bachelors, by the way, and set forth for the lake. An interval of ten minutes brought together the terrace remained empty. Then two ladies—at the head of a second detachment of visitors—appeared under the old stone porch which sheltered the entrance on that side of the house. One of the ladies was a maiden, remarkable person, very simply dressed. The other was of the tall and handsome sort. She was attended by a cloud in dazzling array. The first was Mrs. Julius Delamayn. The second was Lady Lundie.

Exquisite in its picturesque irregularity, the old mullioned windows of the house, with their framing of creepers, and the grassy-edged buttresses projecting at intervals from the wall, each with its bright little circle of flowers blooming round the base. Was there really grieved that Sir Patrick should have missed this."

"I think you said, Lady Lundie, that Sir Patrick had been called to Edinburgh by family business?"

"Business, Mrs. Delamayn, which is anything but agreeable to me, as one member of the family. I have ordered all my arrangements for the autumn. My step-daughter is to be married next week."

"It is so near as that? May I ask who the gentleman is?"

"Mr. Arnold Brinkworth."

"Surely I have some association with that name?"

"You have probably heard of him, Mrs. Delamayn, as the heir to Miss Brinkworth's Scotch property?"

"Exactly! Have you brought Mr. Brinkworth here to-day?"

"I bring Mr. Brinkworth's apologies, as well as Sir Patrick's. They went to Edinburgh together the day before yesterday. The lawyers engage to finish the settlements in a week, and then, and not before, if a personal consultation can be managed. Some trifling question of the trustees' powers to decide. Sir Patrick thought the safest way and the speediest way would be to take Mr. Arnold with him, and to leave me to do the business over to-day—and to wait until we join them, on our way to the Highlands."

"You leave Windyates, in this lovely weather?"

"Most unwillingly! The truth is, Mrs. Delamayn, I am at my step-daughter's mercy. Her father has the authority, as her guardian—and the use he makes of it is to leave it to me. I have my way in every thing. It was only on Friday last that I gave consent to the day be fixed—and even then she made it a positive condition that the marriage was not to take place in Scotland. Sir Patrick's wish, and Mr. Brinkworth's also. It is to be quiet in the morning—and I am to follow their example. I feel it my duty to be present—and, as a matter of course, I sacrifice myself. What kind of a lake is this?"

"Is Miss Lundie to be married in London at this time of year?"

"No. We only pass through, on our way to Sir Patrick's place in Kent—the place that came to us with the title. I am to remain at home with the last days of my beloved husband. Another trial for me! The marriage is to be celebrated on the scene of my bereavement. My old wound is to be reopened on Monday next—simply because my husband was born there. Shocking, Mrs. Delamayn!"

"This day week, then, is the day of the marriage?"

"Yes. This day week. There have been reasons for hurrying it—as only a woman knows you with. No words can my how I wish it was over—not, my dear Mrs. Delamayn, from thoughtless of me to assail you with my family worries! You are so sympathetic. That is my excuse for talking to you on the most intimate guests. I could linger in this sweet place for-ever! What is Mrs. Glenarm's?"

"I really don't know. I missed her when we came out on the terrace. She will very likely join us at the lake. We are slowly moving to the lake, Lady Lundie?"

"I adore the whims of Nature, Mrs. Delamayn—especially lakes!"

"We have something to show you besides: we have a boat-house at the lake, and a boat-house at the place. My husband has gone on with some of the gentlemen, and I believe we are expected to follow, as soon as the rest of the company—in search of my sister—have seen the house."

"And what is Miss Delamayn? Historical associations in every corner of it! It is the very thing in my mind to take refuge in the past. When I am far away from our present place I shall people Swanhaven with its departed inhabitants, and live in the sad sorrows of centuries since."

As Lady Lundie announced, in these terms, her intention of adding to the population of the past, the last of the guests who had been roaming in the old flower-garden under the porch. Among the numbers forming this final addition to the garden-party were Blanche, and a friend of her own age whom she had met at Swanhaven. The two girls lagged behind the rest, talking confidentially, arm in arm—the subject (it is surely needless to say?) being the coming marriage.

"But, dearest Blanche, why are you not to be married at Windyates?"

"Because dearest Windygates Janet. I have the most miserable associations with the place. Don't ask me what they are! The effort of my life is not to think of them now. I long to see the last of Windygates. As for being married there, I have made a condition that I am not to be married in Scotland at all."

"What has poor Scotland done to forfeit your good opinion, my dear?"

"Poor Scotland, Janet, is a place where people don't know whether they are married or not. I have heard whether it from my uncle. And I know somebody who has been a victim—an innocent victim—to Scotch marriages."

"Absurd, Blanche! You are thinking of runaway matches, and making Scotland responsible for the difficulties of people who don't even know the truth."

"I am not at all absurd. I am thinking of the dearest friend I have. If you only knew—"

"My dear! I am Scotch, remember! You can be married just as easily—I really must insist on that—in Scotland as in England."

"I hate Scotland!"

"Blanche!"

"I never was so happy in my life as I have been in Scotland. I never thought to be so happy. I am determined to be married in England—when the time comes—in the house where I used to live when I was a little girl. My uncle is quite willing. He understands me and feels for me."

"It is time such as to say that I don't understand you and feel for you? Perhaps I had better relieve you of my company. Blanche!"

"If you are going to speak to me in that way, perhaps you had!"

"Am I to hear my native country run down and not to say a word in defense of it?"

"Oh, Janet, will people make such a fuss about your native country!"

"We Scotch people! you are of Scotch extraction yourself, and you ought to be ashamed to talk in that way. Irish you good-morning!"

"I wish you a long walk!"

A minute since the two young ladies had been like twin roses on one stalk. Now they looked like a pair of cruel beetles pinching and cutting words. How ardent is the warmth of youth! how unspeakably delicate the fragility of female friendship!

The flock of visitors followed Mrs. Delamayn to the edge of the lake. The brooch on the swan was a single diamond of resplendent water and great size. The fun in her hand was a water-spider of the finest Indian workmanship. She looked what she was, a person possessed of a large fortune, and endowed by an individual best with plenty of superfluous intelligence to correspond. This was the childless young widow of the late Julius Delamayn, otherwise, Geoffrey Delamayn.

The rich woman tapped the strong man coquettishly on the shoulder with her fan. "Ah! you bad boy!" she said, with a slightly-labored imitation of the Irish manner. "Have I found you at last?"

Geoffrey sauntered on to the terrace—keeping the lady behind him with a thoroughly savage reperiority to all civilized submission to the sex—and looked at his watch.

"I said I'd come here when I'd got half an hour to myself," he mumbled, turning the flower carelessly in his hands. "I've got half an hour, and here I am."

"Will you wait for the sake of seeing the visitors, or did you come for the sake of seeing Me?"

Geoffrey smiled graciously, and gave the flower another turn in his hands. "Ion. Of course."

The iron-master's widow took his arm, and looked up at him with a look which no woman would have dared to look up—with the searching summer light streaming in its full brilliancy on her face.

Reduced to the plain expression of what it is really worth, the beauty and English idea of beauty in women may be summed up in three words—youth, health, plumpness. The more spiritual charm of expression, the variety, the subtler attractions of delicacy of line and finesse of detail, are little looked for and seldom found in the female form at noon in this island. It is impossible otherwise to account for the extraordinary blindness of perception which, in the case of women only, makes it that Englishmen out of ten who visit France come back disappointed. They have not seen a single pretty Frenchwoman, in or out of the public, the whole country. Our popular type of beauty presents, in short, the fullest material development at every shop in which an illustrated periodical is sold. The same features, the same girl, with the same inane smile, and with no other appreciable whatever, appears under every form of illustration, month after month and year after year, all the year round. Those who wish to know what Miss Glenarm was like, have only to go out and stop at any bookseller's or new-spaper's shop, and there they will see her in the first illustrated paper the young woman in it, which they discover in the window. The one noticeable peculiarity in Miss Glenarm's purely commonplace and purely material beauty, which would have struck an observant and a cultivated man, was the curious giddiness of her look and manner. No stranger speaking to this woman—who had been a wife at twenty, and who was now a widow at twenty-four—would ever have thought of addressing her otherwise than as "Miss."

"Is that the use you make of a flower when I give it to you?" she said to Geoffrey. "Mumbling it in your teeth, you wretch, as if you were a horse!"

"If you come to that," returned Geoffrey, "I'm more a horse than you. I'm going to run in a race, and the public are betting on me. How? four? Five to four."

"Five to four! I believe he thinks of nothing but betting. You great heavy creature, I can't move you. Don't you see I want to go like the rest of them to the lake? No! you're not to let go of my arm! You're to take me."

"Can't do it. Must be back with Perry in half an hour."

Perry was the trainer from London. He had arrived sooner than he had been expected, and had entered on his functions three days since.)

"Don't talk to me about Perry! I'll take up wretch. Put him off. You won't? Do you mean to say you are such a brute that you would rather be with Perry than be with me?"

"The betting's at five to four, my dear. And the race comes off in a month. Yes, that's it."

"Oh! go away to your beloved Perry! I hate you. You're you'll lose the race, I hope, by a mile."

Geoffrey gave the flower another turn in his teeth, and looked as if he thought the idea worth considering.

"All right," he said. "Any thing to be agreeable to you. I'll ask Perry."

He turned away, as if he was going to do it at once. Mrs. Glenarm put out a little hand, revokingly checked him by a button-hole, and said it on the athlete's mighty arm. She pinched those iron muscles (the pride and glory of England) gently. "What a man you are!" she said. "I never met with any body like you before."

The whole secret of the power that Geoffrey had acquired over her was in those words.

They had been together at Swanhaven for little more than ten days; and in that time he had shaken the composure of Mrs. Glenarm for the day before the garden-party—in one of the leisure intervals allowed him by Perry—he had caught her alone, had taken her by the arm, and had asked her, in so many words, if she would marry him.

Instances are instead of women who have been wooed and won in ten days' time; but in a still all possible respect—not wanting. But an instance of a woman willing to have it known still remains to be discovered. The iron-master's widow made a promise of secrecy before she committed herself. Mrs. Glenarm had pledged her word to hold his tongue in public until she gave him leave to speak out. She had given him further hesitation, said Yes—having, be it observed, said No, in the course of the last two years, to at least half a dozen people who were her superiors in every conceivable respect, except personal attractions and personal strength.

There is a reason for every thing; and there was a reason for this.

However passionately the epicene theorists of modern times may deny it, it is nevertheless a truth plainly written in the whole past history of the sexes that the natural condition of a woman is to find her master in a man. Look in the face of every woman who is in no direct way dependent on a man; and, as certainly as you see the sun in a cloudless sky, you see a woman who is not happy. The want of a master is their profoundest known want; the possession of a master is—unconsciously to themselves—the only possible completion of their lives. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, when the primitive instinct is at the bottom of the otherwise inexplicable sacrifice, when we see a woman, of her own free will, throw herself away on a man who is her inferior, this one primitive instinct was at the bottom of the otherwise inexplicable facility of self-surrender exhibited by Mrs. Glenarm.

Up to the time of her meeting with Geoffrey, the young widow had gratified only one experience in her intercourse with the world—the experience of a chartered tyrant. In the brief six months that she married life was to her whose grand-daughter she might have been—and ought to have been—that of finding all her wishes to be obeyed. The doting old husband was the willing slave of the petulant young wife's slightest caprice. For the short period, wanting effect its triple welcome to her birth, her beauty, and her wealth—Love who makes all men found herself the object of the same prostrate admiration among the suitors who vied with each other in the service of her hand. It was the time in her life she encountered a man with a will of his own—when she met Geoffrey Delamayn at Swanhaven Lodge.

Geoffrey's occupation of the moment especially favored the development of the woman's sensation of her influence and the man's assertion of his will.

During the days that had intervened between his return to his brother's house and the arrival of the new guests Geoffrey had submitted to all needful preliminaries of the physical discipline which was to restore the efficiency of his frame, lost by previous experience, what exercise he ought to take, what hours he ought to keep, what temperance he ought to practise, what to refrain from. Over and over again Mrs. Glenarm tried to lure him into commuting intrinctions of his own discipline —and over and over again the influence with men which had never failed her before failed her now. Nothing she could say, nothing she could do, would move this man. Perry arrived, and Geoffrey submitted to a course of attempted exercise of the charming feminine tyranny, to which every one else had bowed, grew more outrageous and more immovable than ever. Mrs. Glenarm became as jealous of Percy as if Percy had been a woman. She flew into passions; she burst into tears; she flirted with other men; she threatened to leave the house. All quite useless! Geoffrey never once missed an appointment with Percy; never once touched any thing to eat or drink that she could offer him, if Percy had forbidden it. No other human servant is so hostile to the influence of the sex as the pursuit of athletic sports. No man are so entirely beyond the reach of women as the men whose lives are passed in the cultivation of their own physical strength. Geoffrey ruined Mrs. Glenarm without the slightest effort. He casually entered her admiration, and undesignedly absorbed her regard. She clung to him, as a hero; she recoiled from him, as a brute; she struggled with him, submitted to him, despised him, adored him, all in a breath. And the close to it all, confused and contradictory as it seemed, lay in the simple fact—Mrs. Glenarm had found her master.

"Take me to the lake, Geoffrey!" she said, with a little pleading pressure of the hand upon his bored hand.

Geoffrey looked at his watch. "Percy's expect me in twelve minutes," he said.

"Percy again!"

"Yes."

Mrs. Glenarm raised her fan, in a sudden outburst of fury, and broke it with one smart blow on Geoffrey's face.

"There!" she cried, with a stamp of her foot. "My poor fan broken! You monster, all through you!"

Geoffrey coolly took the broken fan and put it in his pocket. "I'll write to London," he said, "and get you another. Come along! Kiss, and make it up."

He looked over each shoulder, to make sure that they were alone; then lifted her off the ground (she was no light weight), held her up in the air like a baby, and gave her a rough loud-sounding kiss on each cheek. The whole of this compliments from women truly!" he said—and burst out laughing, and put her down again.

"How dare you do that?" cried Mrs. Glenarm. "I shall claim this Dalamyn's protection if I am to be insulted in this way! I will never forgive you, sir!" As she said those indignant words she shot a look at him which battled unconsciously them. Her attitude at that was leaning on his arm, and was looking at him wonderingly, for the thousandth time, as an entire novelty in her experience of the male kind. "How rough you are, Geoffrey!" she said, softly. He smiled in recognition of the artless homage to the manly virtue of his character. She saw the smile, and instantly made another effort to dispute the habitual supremacy of Percy. "Put him off!" whispered the daughter of Eve, determined to be the serpent, after a bite of the apple. "Come, Geoffrey, dear, never mind Percy, this once. Take me to the lake!"

Geoffrey looked at his watch. "Percy expects me in a quarter of an hour," he said.

Mrs. Glenarm's indignation assumed a new form. She burst out crying. Geoffrey surveyed her for a moment with a broad smile of pleasure —and then took her by both arms, and shook her.

"Look here!" he said, impatiently. "Can you coach me through my training?"

"I would if I could!"

"That's nothing to do with it! Can you turn me out, fit, on the day of the race? Yes? or No?"

"No."

"Then dry your eyes, and let Percy do it."

Mrs. Glenarm dried her eyes, and made another effort.

"I'm not fit to be seen," she said. "I'm so agitated, I don't know what to do. Come indoors, Geoffrey—and have a cup of tea."

Geoffrey shook his head. "Percy forbids tea," he said, "in the middle of the day."

"You brute!" cried Mrs. Glenarm.

"Do you want me to lose the race?" retorted Geoffrey.

"Yes!"

With that answer she left him at last, and ran back into the house.

Geoffrey took a turn on the terrace—considered a little—stopped—and looked at the porch under which the irate widow had disappeared from his view. "Too lionnaise a type," he said, thinking of the matrimonial prospect which he was placing in peril. "And she is really well earned," he added, going into the house, under protest, to appease Mrs. Glenarm.

The offended lady was on a sofa, in the solitary drawing-room. Geoffrey sat down by her. She turned her back at him. "Don't be a fool," said Geoffrey, in his most persuasive manner. Mrs. Glenarm put her handkerchief to her eyes. Geoffrey took it away again with some resistance. Mrs. Glenarm rose to leave the room. Geoffrey stopped her by main force. Mrs. Glenarm condescended to summon the servants. Geoffrey said, "All right! I don't care if the whole house knows I'm fond of you!" Mrs. Glenarm looked at the door, and whispered, "Hush! for Heaven's sake!" Geoffrey put her on his knee, and said, "Come along with me: I've got something to say to you." Mrs. Glenarm drew back, and shook her head. Geoffrey put his arm round her waist, and walked her out of the room, and out of the house—taking no notice of her on the terrace, but of a fir plantation on the opposite side of the grounds. Arrived among the trees, he stopped and held up a warning forefinger before the offended lady's face. "You're just the sort of woman I like," he said; "and there isn't a man living who's half as sweet on you as I am. You leave off bullying me about Percy, and I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll let you see me take a Sprint."

He drew back a step, and fixed his big blue eyes on her, with a look which said, "You are a highly-favored woman, if ever there was one yet!" Curiosity instantly took the leading place among the emotions of Mrs. Glenarm. "What a Sprint, Geoffrey?" she asked.

"A short run, to try me at the top of my speed. There ain't another living soul in all England that I'd let see it but you. Now am I a brute?"

Mrs. Glenarm was conquered again, for the hundredth time at least. She said, softly, "Oh, Geoffrey, if you could only be always like this!" Her eyes lifted themselves admiringly to his. She took his arm again of her own accord. Geoffrey put it gently back. "Loving chaps," Geoffrey prophetically felt the ten thousand a year in his pocket, "are usually fools," he continued to himself, walking up and down before the cottage, holding his hands behind him. The level plain was the best possible exercising ground in the world for the hero's retreat; and the smart little man was the hero's trainer.

If Mrs. Glenarm hated Percy, Percy (judging by appearances) was in no danger of loving Mrs. Glenarm. Appearances were apparently in her opinion, the trainer came to a stand-still, and stared silently at the lady. Mrs. Glenarm, on her side, was unconscious that any such person as the trainer was then in existence, and present to public view at all.

"How about time?" said Geoffrey.

Percy consulted an elaborate watch, constructed to register time to the fifth of a second, and answered Geoffrey, with his eye all the while on Mrs. Glenarm.

"You've got five minutes to spare."

"Show me where you run! I'm dying to see it!" said Geoffrey, taking possession of Geoffrey's arm with both hands.

Percy led the way back to a place (marked by a sapling with a little flag attached to it) at some short distance from the cottage. She glided after him. Percy, on reaching the cottage, by a movement which appeared to complete the exasperation of Geoffrey, turned round, without heeding—and then he invoked (let us say) the blasts of heaven on the fashionably-dressed head of Mrs. Glenarm.

"You take your place there," said Geoffrey, posting her by the sapling. "Then I run. You've stopped, and surveyed her with a good-humored, masculine pity. "How the devil am I to make a gentleman of it?" he said to himself. "Look here! when I pass you, it will be at what you would call (if I was a horse) full gallop. I shall be out of breath—I never was yet. You're to look me after me as I leave you, to where the edge of the cottage will hide me from you. You've not lost sight of me behind the wall, you'll have seen me run my three hundred yards from this flag, to the flag at the cottage. You've seen me do the long Sprint to-day. You understand you're to say, 'Harvey! Percy will then—let me go and get my toggery on."

"Sha'n't I see you again, Geoffrey?"

"Harvey! Percy will then—that you'll see me run?"

"Yes—but after that?"

"After that, I'm sponged and rubbed down—and rest in the cottage."

"You'll come to us this evening?"

He nodded, and left her. The face of Percy looked unutterable things when he and Geoffrey made up a set to meet at the cottage.

"I've got a question to ask you, Mr. Delamayn," said the trainer. "Do you want me? or don't you?"

"Of course I want you."

"What did I say when I first come here?" proceeded Percy, sternly. "I said, 'I won't have nobody a-looking on at a man I'm training. These here ladies and gentlemen may all have made up their minds to see you. I've made up my mind not to have no lookers-on. I won't have you tuned at your work by nobody but me.' I've broke my own rules. Here's ground you cover put in the noospapers. I won't have a living soul in the secret of what you can do, and what you can't do, except we two selves. "—Did I say that, Mr. Delamayn? or didn't I?"

"All right!"

"Did I say it? or didn't I?"

"Of course you did."

"Then don't you bring no more women here. It's clean against rules. And if you don't like the other living creature adopting this tone of remonstrance would probably have had reason to repent it. But Geoffrey Delamayn was used to show his temper in the presence of Percy. In view of the contest for the race, the first race of British trainers was not to be trifled with, even by the first and foremost of British athletes.

"She won't come again," said Geoffrey. "She's going away from Swanhaven in two days' time."

"I've put every shilling I'm worth in the world on you, Geoffrey," said Percy, with tenderness. "And I tell you I felt it! It cut me to the heart when I see you coming along with a woman at your heels. It's a fraud on his backers, I says to myself—that's what it is, a fraud on his backers!"

"Shut up!" said Geoffrey. "And come and help me to win your money." He kicked open the door of the cottage—and athlete and trainer disappeared from view.

After waiting a few minutes by the little flag, Mrs. Glenarm saw the two men approaching her from the cottage. Dressed in a close-fitting costume, light and elastic, adapting itself to every movement, and seeming to answer every purpose required by the exercise in which he was about to engage, Geoffrey's physical advantages showed themselves in their best and bravest aspect. His head an proud and easy on his firm, white throat, like the head of Mars. The rising of his mighty chest, as he drew in deep draughts of the fragrant summer breeze; the play of his lithe and supple loins; the easy, elastic strids of his straight and shapely legs, presented a triumph of physical manhood in its highest form. His whole body spoke devotion and him in silent admiration. He looked like a young god of mythology—like a statue animated with the breath of life. Mrs. Geoffrey! Let us consider softly, as he went by. He neither answered, nor looked; he had his own business on hand before going to soft nonsense. He was gathering himself up for the effort; his lips were set; his fists were clenched; his eyes looked straight over his place, grim and silent, with the watch in his hand. Geoffrey was in perfect health, for he as to give himself start enough to reach his full speed as he passed it. "Now then!" said Percy. "In an instant more, he flew by (to Mrs. Glenarm's excited imagination) like an arrow from a bow. The action was perfect. His speed, at its utmost rate of exertion, preserved in rare underlying elements of strength and steadiness. His arms and knees like he grew to the use they followed his course; still lightly flying over the ground, still firmly keeping the straight line. A moment afterwards Geoffrey runner vanished behind the wall of the cottage, and the stop-watch of the trainer returned to its place in his pocket.

In her eagerness to know the result, Mrs. Glenarm forgot her jealousy of Percy.

"How long was he?" she asked.

"There's a good many besides you would be glad to know that," said Percy.

"Mr. Delamayn will tell me, you rude man!"

"That depends, ma'am, on whether I tell him."

With this answer, Percy hurried back to the cottage.

Not a word passed while the trainer was attending to his man, and while the man was recovering his breath. When Geoffrey had been partially rubbed down, and clothed again in his ordinary garments, Percy pulled a comfortable easy-chair out of a corner. Geoffrey dropped into it, and, raising his legs on it, Percy started, and looked at him attentively.

"Well?" said Geoffrey. "How about the time? Long? short? or middling?"

"Very good time," said Percy.

"Am I fit?"

"When did you say the lady was going, Mr. Delamayn?"

"In two days."

"Very well, Sir. I'll tell you 'how long' when the two days are over."

Geoffrey made no attempt to insist on an immediate reply. He had trained himself, during the interval of less than ten minutes he stretched out his legs and closed his eyes.

"Going to sleep?" said Percy.

Geoffrey opened his eyes with an effort. "No," he said. "I'm dead beat. I hardly passed his back-door."

He went closer to the chair. There was no doubt about it. The man was asleep.

Percy rubbed his whistle under his breath. He stooped and laid two of his fingers softly on Geoffrey's pulse. The beat was slow, heavy, and labored. It was unmistakably the pulse of an exhausted man.

The trainer changed color, and took a turn in the room. He opened a cupboard, and produced from it the relics of the preceding meal. The entries relating to the last occasion on which he had prepared Geoffrey for a foot-race included the failed chicken. He turned to the window for the first trial, at three hundred yards, full speed, the time was by one or two seconds, not so good as the time on this occasion. But the result, afterward, was utterly different. There it was, in Percy's words: "I rules good." He was in high spirits. Ready, if I would have let him, to run it over again.

Percy looked round at the same man, a year afterward—utterly worn out, and fast asleep in the chair.

He fetched pen, ink, and paper out of the cupboard, and wrote two letters—both addressed "Private." The first was to a medical man, a great authority among trainers. The second was to Percy's own agent in London, whom he knew he could trust. The letter pledged the agent to the strictest secrecy, and directed him to back Geoffrey's opponent in the Foot-Race for a sum equal to the sum which Percy had betted on Geoffrey. "Back him to have got the money of your own on him," the letter concluded, "do as I do. "Hedge"—and hold your tongue."

Another hour passed. Percy sat in the trainer, looking round again at the sleeping man. "He'll lose the race."

INDIANS GAMBLING.

OUR illustration on page 197 represents an emigrant train captured by the Indians while journeying across the plains. The attack was made during the absence of the female captive whom they have tied to the wheel of one of the wagons. They have a very singular and primitive mode of gambling. It is done by means of two sticks or stones. They take them in their hands, and, holding them behind their backs, separate them, or put both together in one hand; then, bringing them forward, ask the opposite chief to guess which hand they are in. If there is one in each hand it counts nothing. If both are together, and the hand is guessed, he has chosen right. This process is repeated a certain number of times, until all have had their turn, when the one who has most often guessed right becomes possessor of the unfortunate captive. In this way the Indians often gamble away their horses, wives, and other possessions.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Fanc the quarrelette that is going on over the dogma of papal infallibility, it may be styled a cat-and-pope.

When may one, talking a walk through English woods and vales, be said to resemble a sailor in a merry night at sea? When he is whistling a ballad-tune.

How to Cure a Cold.—First catch your cold; then procure as with bacon.

A dandy, bronchitised, shiny-booted, glossy, newly-shaved, and in full-dress, was observed among Tremont Street, when he was approached by an itinerant vender of cakes. "Buy a cake, Sir?" "No!" "Nothin' much, Sir; only I would be obliged to ye if ye'd buy one!" "No!" "Then one with a parlor stove, I'm movin' from that house yonder."

What is better than a promising young man?—A paying one.

GOOD SOUND ADVICE.

Never throw a stone at any one until you have looked to see whether there is a window behind, or you may have to pay rather dearly for your revenge.

Never leave your hat in the passage, unless it is a bad one.

Never fly your own price, but leave it "entirely to the liberality" of the gentlemen, as the chances are you will get more than you ask for.

Never sit next a young lady at dinner, for she only likes beef and cucumber, and nothing else.

Never go to a concert alone, as it is all hatility, great trouble, and no profit.

Never attempt to write a play, as you will only have to make it up, and pay for the reconciliation in the form of a season ticket at the opera, a trip to the springs, a silk dress, or a cashmere shawl.

Never attempt to be a manager or lessee, or some impertinent fellow will be asking you to stand a dinner.

Never pay to see a balloon go up, as you can see it much better by remaining outside.

A Well-balanced Man.—One with a large bank account.

One Sabbath afternoon an eloquent English minister, in his closing prayer, referred to the late prevailing drought, and earnestly besought the Divine Giver to "open the windows of heaven, and cause copious showers to descend upon the earth." Rain began to fall—the first for many weeks—and for a short time in his pious answer-book. Before the church service having concluded, the congregation was dismissed, and the minister issued from the sanctuary. One lady, who had no umbrella with her, commenced to gather up her dress and prepare to run, and before quitting the church vestibule, at the same time remarked to a friend, "Mr. Simpson doesn't look too bad o' the doctor; he might like kotten ta-name first."

Gone all the dreams of early youth—
The castles in the air!
Also that what we deem is truth
Is found to be not fair!

Gone all the friends whom once I knew,
Changed—changed, or dead!
I little thought such friendships true
Could perish on the head!

Gone! gone! Except one—one that shows
How constant misery!
My watchful watch! It never goes—
It hasn't gone for years!

A youth, repeatant, but incoherent, over his dissipation, signed the following pledge: "I solemnly promise to abstain from the use of intoxicating beverages, otherwise than as a drink, and probably, in extreme cases, by a physician, at least four times a day, excepting cider."

Barber that have Failed thin Winter—Bowlinbrake.

A man of the name of Pike was tried under the English Weights and Measures act for selling bacon by tallow-chandler's measure, sentenced to the usual fortunate Pike to have his scales taken off.

A Veteran Bachelor observes, in assertion so frequently made, that it is impossible to arrest the flight of time, is altogether erroneous, for who is there that has not arrested a minute?

A rude fellow once told Mr. Barnum he had never published any thing that was true. "Yes, I have," said Barnum; "the bearded lady wasn't bearded."

Useful Marriage—Wedded to one's business.

A Methodist preacher, bragging how well he had instructed some Indians in religion, called upon one of them, and, to show his proficiency, asked him if he had not found great comfort last Sunday after receiving the sacrament. "O, yes," replied the savage, "but I wish it had been brandy."

Taking People—Thieves.

A Chicago lawyer's name is to be stricken from the rolls "for unprofessional conduct." He probably left a few cents in the possession of his client, contrary to usage.

A lady, in passing through Connecticut last summer, observed to a boy, "Sonny, where is a bush?" Horses taken into grass—long tails, Sa. 6d.; short tails, 5s." Boy scratched his head for a while in reason of the difference of price. He answered: "You see, ma'am, the long tails brush the flies off the best, but the short ones are so tormented by them that they can hardly get at all."

A Silly-boss—For one woman to kiss another woman.

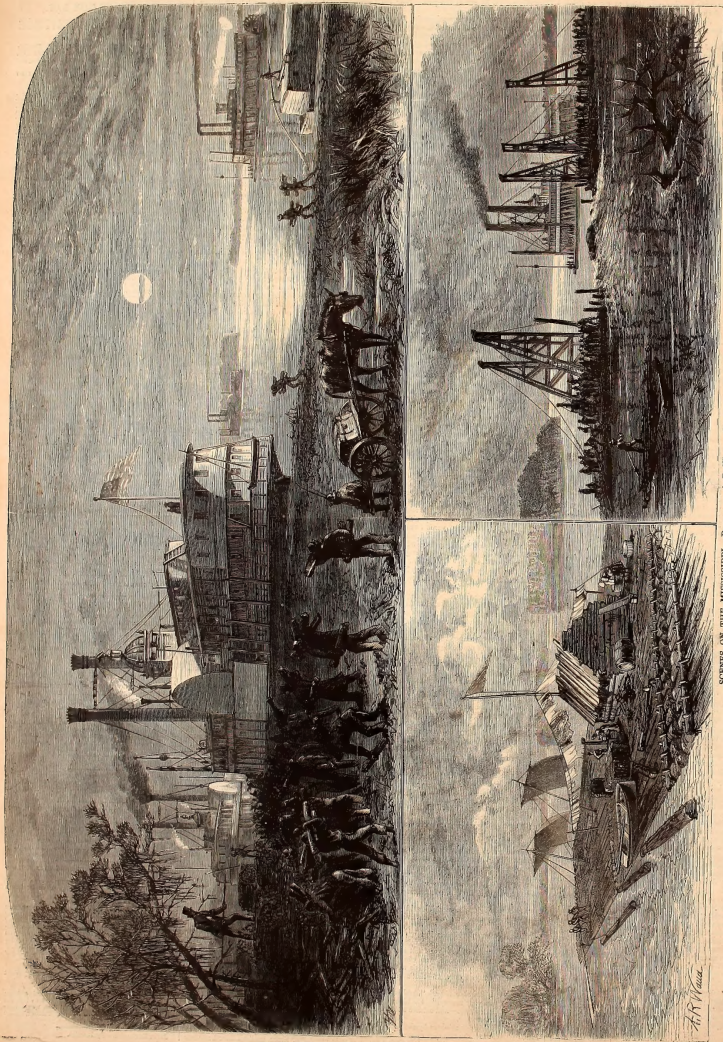
What medicine does a man take when he has a cure wife?—Doctor.

The landlord of the Stock House, at Fremont, sent a note a few days ago to a clergyman, telling him that he was building a new house, and would oblige him by paying it off. "Mr. B. Stout: Dear Sir,—You say you are building a new house; my note yet. That is all right—perfectly right. Just keep building on to it, and if you find your hands stopping, spit on them and try it again. Yours, affectionately.

To Cure a Bachelor's Aches—Carry to the patient eleven yards of silk, with a woman in it.

A little boy, some time ago, while coming down stairs, was cautioned by his mother not to lose his balance. His question, which followed, was a puzzler: "Mother, if I should lose my balance, where would it go?"

Joint Education—Gymnastics.



SCENES ON THE MISSISSIPPI.—DRAWN BY A. R. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 203.]

THE WHISKY PEDDLER ON THE PLAINS.—[See Page 205.]

WAITING.

Wait it be over to-day or to-morrow?
Will it last for a week, or a month, or a year;
This trance that is neither a joy nor a sorrow,
This waiting that is not a hope nor a fear?

While I am waiting the end draws near;
It will come before I am dead some day;
Shall I feel it, I wonder, when it is here?
Its coming seems like going away.

It is only that watching has made me weary,
And that being weary has made me dream?
But in dreams the world is not so dreary,
And in dreams things are not as they seem.

And indeed I am not tired yet;
I have strength to wait while it yet to see,
What this trance I know will end from?
The end of the watch that is set for me.

Is it the end that has made me strong,
Lest I say what it means? It is come to late
Then till it came I should find it long:
I have forgotten for what I wait.

Then why are my thoughts bound up to this
By a bond that I neither feel nor see,
While the world goes on its late or before
Do I think the world keeps watch with me?

Yet the end will come, and the end will go,
And leave no trace in the empty air;
When it is over none will know,
And I hardly think that I shall care.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book V.

CHAPTER I.

A RETROSPECTIVE MEDITATION.

An April day smiled and wept over Shipley. Wherever the clouds broke after a shower, the sky showed of a pale blue color. Near the zenith floated white rolls of vapor. Below them were long lateral bars of gray cloud stretching singularly across the western horizon. They were vague and unfinished at the sides, like lines drawn by a soft loud-pencil; and they seemed of about the same height as the blue and white. A few early flowers peeped out in the garden borders. When the sun was shining bright on the old yew-tree, it was seen to glisten with trembling diamond-drops of rain. A blackbird piped his sweet notes from the white thorn. Light and shadow animated the flatness of the distant wold, whence came the faint bleat-blend of lambs blended into one sound. A solitary sheep cropped the short turf in St. Gildas's grave-yard.

A young lady sat there on the low stone-wall, looking across the flats toward Shipley Manor. She sat so still that the grazing sheep came quite near to her as to teeth out the short grass with a crisp sound in regular cadence. It was Miss Desmond who sat there on the wall of the graveyard, and whose face had gained more color since her hat by the April breeze. She was absorbed in a reverie. She had been in Shipley now nearly a week, and had had ample opportunity to review all the traits and circumstances she had observed during that time, with a view to discover what changes had taken place in the vicar's mode of life, and in the vicar himself, since she had left his house for her aunt.

At first sight things had seemed little altered. But she soon found that there was a change in Mr. Levincourt which she had not observed in him in London. In the first place, he seemed to have broken completely the few relations he had ever held with his country neighbors in the rank of gentlefolk. That was more than he expected with a character such as Mr. Levincourt's; it was natural that he should shun any possible occasion of seeking in the manner of even his fellows, of his equals that he had become an object of pity to them. But this was not all. It seemed to Maud that after the first paroxysm of grief, and wounded feeling, and crushed pride had ceased, the whole character of the man had undergone a change. He shrunk from the society of his equals; but, on the other hand, he appeared by no means to shun that of his inferiors. He would sit for hours enduring the babbler chat of Mrs. Magget, and women such as she. He was shocked and astonished to find him, one day, listening almost with delight to some gossiping details of village scandal from the lips of Mogworthy, the parish clerk. The air of personal refinement which had formerly distinguished him seemed to be disappearing under the influence of a slipshod laziness—a laziness without preference to every thing save his own immediate comfort. He was by turns querulous, almost herbrymous, and self-asserting. It was terrible to Maud to see his whole character thus lowered; and she tried to believe that the change was only temporary, and that perhaps she even exaggerated it in her affectionate anxiety.

During the journey from London her mind was full of that which she had to reveal to him respecting Veronica. And had the opportunity for task, being entirely uncertain how he would receive it. But when she began to perceive the change in him, she conceived that these sad tidings might at least have the good effect of rousing him from the apathy into which he seemed to have allowed all the higher part of his nature to fall, while he fed the daily life of his mind with contemptible trivialities. She had approached the subject one evening when she and her guardian were alone together in the old chintz-furnished sitting-room after tea. Maud had quietly opened the piano-forte, and had played through softly a plaintive adagio from one of Haydn's sonatas.

The piece was chosen with the cunning instinct of affection. It was soothing and gracious, and yet, in its old-fashioned stateliness, it did not too deeply probe the spring of grief. The somewhat wiry tones of the well-worn instrument rendered crisply every twirl and turn of the brave old music under Maud's light fingers. In the very twang of the yellow keys there was a staid pathos. It affected the ear as the sound of some bit of an old woman affects it—that thin quavering pipe, to which some heart has thrilled, some pulse beat responsive, in the days of long ago. Maud played on, and the spring twilight deepened, and the vicar listened, silent, in his arm-chair by the empty fire-place. He had taken to smoking within the past year. He had bought a great meerschaum with a splendid fantastic bowl, and the color of the pipe bore testimony to the persistency of its owner in the gathering dusk, the Maud played on, and the vicar's dusky form and puffs of smoke from the vicar's chair grew rarer and rarer, and at last ceased. Maud rose from the piano, and went to sit beside her guardian. He was still silent. The influence of the music was on him.

"Uncle Charles," said Maud, in a low voice, "I have something to tell you, and something to ask you. I will do the asking first. Will you forgive me for having delayed what I have to say until now?"

"I do not think it likely that you have need of my forgiveness, my child. What you mean is beween us must be chiefly from you to me, not from me to you."

"You say that, dear Uncle Charles! You touch my conscience too nearly. And yet, at the time, I thought—and Hugh Desmond thought he was better to keep the secret for a while. I hope you will think so too, and forgive me. Uncle Charles, some one is dead whom you love."

The vicar gave a violent start. Maud, with her hand on the arm of his chair, felt it shake. She, and she added, quickly: "It is no one whose death you can regret. It is awful to think that any human soul has left the body in a state unfit for rejoicing, rather than sorrow, in the hearts of all who love him. But it is the will of God, dear Uncle!" The vicar drew a long, deep breath. His head drooped down on his breast; but Maud felt that he was not in a faint. At this time almost dark within the house—that he was listening intently. A moment's silence—a ghastly and awful stillness of purpose, Maud told her guardian of Veronica's marriage, of her desertion of Mr. Matthew Gaia, his behavior in so base conduct. She merely suppressed in her narrative two facts. First, the will which Veronica had (unduly) borne to her father Gaia's wealth; and, secondly, the late baronet's intention of defrauding Veronica of her rights. To all this Maud agreed that it would be well to spare Mr. Levincourt the useless pain of these revelations. The vicar listened in silence while Miss Maud continued to speak.

Then the moment, after a little pause he said:

"And she was in London! My daughter was within a few streets of me and made no sign! Has she been ill—very ill—that I should see no one to ask my pardon!"

His voice was loud and angry. He breathed quickly and noisily, like a man fighting against emotion. Still Maud felt that in his very reproach there was a hopeful symptom of some softening in the hardness of his resentment.

"She thought you would not see her, Uncle Charles. I told her so, and she did not deny it. But I—I believe she was afraid."

"Afraid! Veronica Levincourt afraid! She was not afraid of disgracing my home and impoverishing my life, but she was afraid to come and abuse her wicked pride at my feet, when she might have done so with some chance of bringing me—her mother dead—her father crushed her evil past—but at least some little alleviation of the weight of misery which has been bowing me to the earth ever since her flight."

Maud could not but feel, with a sensation of shame at the thought, that the vicar's words had not touch her heart. There was nothing in them that was noble. He was not afraid to sound hollow. How different it had been when the vicar had first discovered his daughter's flight, and wherever the name of the seducer had fled with! Then every word, every gesture, had been full of terrible rage, and grief, and horror. The vicar had been in agonies almost then, no doubt. But now, as he spoke, it was as though he felt that he owed it to his daughter to appear to be not in his heart, as though he were ashamed of expressing relief at Maud's return, and could find no other pride to excite his own wrath against his daughter.

Maud had yet more to tell him. She must reveal the fact of Veronica's engagement to the Prince Barletti. And she much feared that the announcement would be received by another of her guardian still more. She could not see the expression of his face, for he had turned it away to interrupt her by the least word until she paused, having finished what she had to say. Then the vicar murmured in a voice so low that though he were restraining its natural expression:

"Her name is Veronica?"

"Yes. This gentleman is Veronica's cousin."

"Prince—Prince Barletti! Is that the title?"

"Prince Ceseare de' Barletti. Veronica assured me that he is devotedly attached to her. He was a friend to her in her trouble abroad, and—"

"Barletti is a noble name—an old name. That wretch was a parvenu sprung from the mud—a clay image covered with gilding."

There was a long silence. At length the vicar spoke again:

"And my daughter was in London, and made no attempt to see me. She allows me to learn this new from other lips than hers—to bear sorrow, my misery, my suspense, matter nothing, to her affection."

"Veronica told me that she would write to you as soon as we got back to Shipley. She said that she believed it best, on the sole ground of consideration for you, for her to wait before addressing you until all should be settled."

"Settled! cried the vicar, wrathfully. "What was there to settle?"

"Her—her repentance; and—and the proof of her marriage. She may have been mistaken in deluging to communicate with you; indeed, I think she was mistaken; but I do believe she was sincere when she professed to think it for the best."

The vicar rose and walked to the door. Arrived there, he paused, and said, "Until she does address me, and address me in a proper spirit, I shall take no notice of her whatsoever. Send Miss Maud to me as soon as she can. Nothing—no human power shall induce me to waver in my resolution."

Maud stood near the vicar's hands waving through the gloom with the action of repulsing or repudiating some one.

"She will write to you, dear Uncle Charles," said Maud; still with the same disagreeable persistency that she had the words and tone were cold, low, and with the same feeling of being ashamed of the perversity. Then the vicar left the room and went out into the garden. He relit his pipe, and as he paced up and down the gravel path Maud could see the glow for a long time, looming faintly as he came within range of the light from the windows of the house, and then receding again into the darkness. Next day there came a letter for Mr. Levincourt from Veronica, which contained her vows, and those terrible handwriting on the black-bordered envelope, with its crest and monogram, and Shipley, seem to Maud like a horror to her touch. She took the letter to his own room and read it in private. He did not show it to Maud, nor did he appear to bestow on her further than to say that evening, just before retiring to bed: "It appears, Maud, that the present Lord Gaia of Matthew Gaia, has behaved in a very becoming manner in immediately receiving and acknowledging his cousin's widow."

"Oh, dear Uncle Charles, there is more than Veronica! She has written to you. I am so thankful!"

The tears were in Maud's eyes as she clasped her hands nervously together and looked up into her guardian's face. He put his hand on her head and kissed her forehead.

"Good, sweet, pure-hearted child!" he said, softly. "Ah, Maudie, would to God that I had been blessed with a daughter like you! But I did not deserve that blessing; I did not deserve it, Maudie."

It was on all these sayings and doings just narrated that Maud Desmond was pondering as she sat alone in the church-yard of St. Gildas.

CHAPTER II.

MISS TURTLE.

MAUD sat absorbed in a reverie that prevented her from hearing a footstep that approached suddenly. Perhaps, had the step come nearer, it was light, but as regular as that of a soldier on the march. Presently, a shabby hat, with an ornate feather and a bow above the wall of the church-yard, and little Miss Turtle, Mrs. Meggitt's factotum, appeared, with a parcel in each hand and a basket in the other. She walked straight up to Maud, and then stopped.

"Excuse me, miss," said Maud, "Miss Turtle, and looked into Maud's face with a decidedly curious expression, half sly, half shy.

"Oh, I—I did not see you, Miss Turtle. How do you do?"

"I startled you, I'm afraid. I hope you're not subject to palpitation, Miss Desmond? I am. Oh dear me, yes! I'm very subject to it. I you allow me to seat myself here for a few minutes and rest—"

Maud smiled at the humility of the request. The wall of St. Gildas's church-yard was certainly at two feet. Miss Turtle so to herself. She made room for the little governess beside her. Miss Turtle first disposed her parcel and basket on the top of the low wall, and then made a queer little spring—something like the attempt to fly of a maternity hen about to succeed in quit terra firma—and seated herself beside them. Maud was by no means delighted at this encroachment on her privacy. But she was too gentle and too generous to risk hurting the little woman's feelings by at once getting up to depart. So she made way for her still a while and endure Miss Turtle's discourse as best she might. That lady, however, showed no signs of turn to Shipley. Miss Turtle and her two pupils, Farmer Meggitt's daughters, had salutary Maud as she came out of church on the Sunday after her arrival at the vicarage, having previously exchanged with their eyes during the service.

"And how, if I may venture to inquire, is our respected vicar?" said Miss Turtle.

"Mr. Levincourt is quite well, thank you."

"Is he, really? I am so many changes are at last had the honor of seeing you in Shipley, Miss Desmond."

"Indeed! If you did not say so, I should suppose, from what I have seen and heard hitherto, that there were, on the contrary, very few changes."

"Oh dear me! Mrs. Sack—you have heard about Mrs. Sack?"

"No. Is she ill?"

"I joined a Wesleyan congregation at Shipley Magna. Gone over to Dissent, root and branch! I am surprised that you had not heard of it."

Maud explained that Mrs. Sack's conversion to Methodism had not been widely discussed in London.

"And she's not the only one, Miss Desmond, I'm afraid. There are several converts."

"Indeed!"

"Oh no, not the only one by any means. A considerable number of the congregation of St. Gildas's have gone over too. They say that the dissenting gentleman who preaches at Shipley Magna (he is not, strictly speaking, a gentleman either, Miss Desmond, being in the retail grocery line, and in a small way of business) is so very earnest. I hope you will not think I did wrong; but the truth is, I did go to an evening meeting at their chapel once, with Mrs. Sack, and I must say he was most eloquent. I really thought at one time that he would have a stroke or something. The glass in the windows jiggled again, and I came home with a splitting headache."

"He must have been extraordinarily eloquent, indeed," said Maud, quietly.

"Oh, he was! But then, as I say, where are your principles, if you are to change your religion every time your church like that? Didn't you notice, Miss Desmond, how thin the congregation was last Sunday?"

Maud was obliged to confess that she had noticed it.

"I am there's Mr. Snowe, junior."

"He has not joined the Methodists, has he, Miss Turtle?"

"Oh no. Quite the contrary. But he is engaged to be married, I believe, and the lady hates music. Just fancy that, Miss Desmond, and be such a confirmed unmusique."

Little Miss Turtle shook her head in a melancholy manner, as though she had been reluctantly accusing Herbert Snowe of "confirmed" gambling or confirmed drunkenness.

"Then," said Maud, "I am afraid we may lose Mr. Herbert Snowe's assistance at the week-day practicings in the school-room."

"Practicing! Oh dear, Miss Desmond, the singing-class is nothing now; nothing to what it used to be. Mr. Mogworthy, he does what he can. But you know, Miss Desmond, it was the case of the man of many occupations who have to contend with a voice like—there! Just like that, for all the world!"

And Miss Turtle screwed up her mouth, and inclined her head toward the distant common, whence came at that moment the monotonous, long-drawn ba-a-a of some fleecy mother of the flock.

Maud could not help laughing as the recognized the resemblance to Mr. Mogworthy's professional utterance of the Amen.

"Why, Miss Turtle," she said, "I didn't know you were so satirical."

"Satirical! Oh pray don't say that, Miss Desmond. I should be loth, indeed, to think so of myself. If I was satirical, it was quite unconscious, I assure you."

Miss Turtle fidgeted with her paper parcel, tightening its strings, and putting it into shape. Then she peeped into the basket, as if to assure herself that its contents were safe. She showed no symptoms of being about to resume her walk, and there was a mingled hesitation and eagerness in her face every time she looked at Maud. These conflicting sentiments at length resolved themselves into a question that indirectly appertained to the main point to which her curiosity was directed.

"Ahem! And so, Miss Desmond, you don't—ahem!—care to don't find our revered vicar much broken by all he has gone through?"

Maud drew herself up, and looked full at the speaker. But Miss Turtle's wishy-washy little countenance was so meek and meaningless that resentment seemed absurd.

The governess's straw hat was somewhat on the side, and so was the long ragged feather that adorned it, as it had successively adorned a long series of hats, beginning Anno Domini—but no matter for the date. Miss Turtle and her black ostrich feather were coeval in the chronicles of Shipley; for the good lady's endless reason that they had emigrated into Dansehire together. The long feather, wafted hither and thither by the most capricious airs, had made not straight by the capricious showers of spring, drooped curved-wise from the crown of the hat, and overshadowed Miss Turtle's little snub nose, with a shabbily swaggering air ludicrously at variance with the simplicity of the wearer's face.

"I told you that Mr. Levincourt was quite well," said Maud.

"And you, Miss Desmond," said Miss Turtle, timidly putting out the tip of her cotton glove to touch Maud's dress, "you, I'm sure have had a good deal of trouble."

"I have lost a dear relative and a true friend."

"Yes, to be sure. Oh dear me! Life is a whole. How it flies! Don't you find it so, Miss Desmond? You have been very young, a lady of title too," added Miss Turtle, with so comical an air of being shocked and surprised by this circumstance that Maud, in spite of herself, smiled faintly to the great democrat, Death, "How could you—a person so well connected, and habitually addressed by mankind as 'my lady!'" that Maud's sense of humor conquered her sadness, and she turned away her face lest Miss Turtle should be scandalized by the smile on it.

Miss Turtle's next words, however, effectually sobered the mobile, dimpling mouth.

"Yes; you have lost your aunt—and your uncle, if rather I should say, dear."

Maud's heart beat fast, and she could not speak. Miss Turtle appeared to have a perception of hearing Veronica's name. It was not yet pronounced, however. Miss Turtle dropped her chin down on her breast, at the same time throwing back her shoulders stiffly, and infused a melting tearfulness into her habitually subdued voice as she asked: "And have you yet seen Mrs. Plew, Miss Desmond?"

"Mrs.—Mrs. Plew? No. Poor old lady, how is she?"

"She's pretty well, thank you, Miss Desmond. As well as she ever is. She is quite a character of the olden time; don't you think so, Miss Desmond?"

"Well, I—I don't know. She seems a very good old woman," answered Maud, considerably at a loss what to say.

"Of course, Miss Desmond, you have had great scholastic advantages. And I shouldn't presume to—" But as far as Pinnock goes, Miss Desmond, I should say that Mrs. Flew was quite the moral of a Roman matron!"

Maud stared in unconcealed surprise.

"I should indeed, Miss Desmond," pursued the governess, well with the same mingling of coarseness and a kind of suppressed writhing of her shoulders.

"I have not read the Roman History in the original. But, if Pinnock may be relied on, I should say that she quite came up to my idea of the mother of the Gracchi," which Miss Turtle pronounced "Gratchy."

There was so long a pause, and Miss Turtle so plainly showed that she expected Maud to speak, that the latter, although greatly bewildered, at length said, "I have always supposed Mrs. Flew to be a very kind, honest, good old woman. I can not say she ever struck me in the light of a Roman matron. Perhaps, on the whole, it is a better thing to be kind, honest woman; or we, at least, may be excused for thinking so. But the fact is, I never was very intimate with Mrs. Flew. It was Mr. Flew—"

Maud stopped, with a flushed face and trembling lip. She had been about to mention Veronica, and Miss Turtle pounced on the opportunity thus afforded.

"If it was your cousin, or at least we all called her so, Miss Desmond, although aware that no tie of blood united you together; I was at Miss Levincourt who was most intimate at the Rectory. Oh yes, indeed it was! But, of course, that is all over. Those spheres have other claims, have they not, Miss Desmond? And that which the proud and haughty have rejected may be very precious to the humble and lowly. I am sure I think so: may it not, Miss Desmond?"

A light began to dawn in Maud's mind, which illumined the oracular utterances of Miss Turtle. Through the mincing affectation of the little woman's speech and manner there peeped the real stuff of genuine emotion. Still Maud did not understand why Miss Turtle should have chosen to reveal such emotion to her.

Maud rose and held out her hand. "Good-by, Miss Turtle," she said. "I hope you and Miss Cissy that I hope to see them at the practicing next Saturday."

"Good-by, Miss Desmond. I hope you won't take it amiss that I ventured to enter into conversation with you."

"By no means! How can you imagine that I should do so?"

"Nor look upon it in the light of a liberty?"

"Certainly not. Pray do not speak so!"

"Thank you, Miss Desmond. People were always so kind and affable!" There was the least possible emotion laid on the personal pronoun, as though Miss Turtle were mentally distinguishing Maud from some one who was not always kind and affable. "And you are just the same, and ever, I'm sure, Miss Desmond. And—and—I didn't fear to offend you, which I wouldn't do for the world—indeed I would not!—I should like to—to—to ask—" The governess made a long pause, as though afraid to ask what she could not. She was too sure in her heart about whom Miss Turtle desired to ask. The latter remained silent for some minutes; but, as Maud, timid in her manner, from years of repression and snubbing, Miss Turtle was very exquisitely sensitive, and she had that sort of mild obstinacy which frequently accompanies stupidity.

Neither Maud's silence, nor her pale, distressed face, availed therefore to turn Miss Turtle from the purpose she had in view. She must see sit down on the wall beside the vicar's ward. Her purpose was to ascertain, if possible, what the truth of Veronica's position really was.

Of course Shipley-in-the-Wold had rung with gossip about her; and naturally the gossip had reported—most wonderful to relate—something far from the actual state of the case.

"I should like to ask, if you please," repeated Miss Turtle at length, "if it is true what we hear, that Miss Levincourt—for all we do as we have heard anybody say, not, of course, Miss Levincourt any longer—if she is in England again, and—and quite wealthy, and—and if you are not offended, Miss Desmond?"

"She is in England. She is a widow, and is left in possession of a considerable fortune."

"Oh dear me! So it was true?"

Maud bowed, and was moving away.

"One instant, Miss Desmond. I'm afraid you are angry with me for speaking. But, after all, it was natural that we should wish to know the truth; wasn't it now, Miss Desmond?"

Maud reflected that it was natural. Her conscience told her that the movement of sensitive pride which made her shrink from hearing Veronica talked of by indifferent persons, was far from being wholly a good movement. She constrained herself to hold out her hand once more to Miss Turtle. The gratitude in the governess's face repaid her for the effort.

"Oh, thank you, Miss Desmond! I should have been so sorry to hurt your feelings. Of course you will say Miss Flew found me out, and then I suppose you—you will tell him, and you? Of course he will know, so intimate as he was with the family—and always a favorite with the greatest respect, I'm sure. When he knows something certain about Miss Levincourt—that is—I'm so used to the name, you see—we hope, his mother and I hope—or, at least, she hopes—for of course I can't presume to put myself forward—that he may get to be more comfortable and settled in his mind. Very likely he is a good deal changed, Miss Desmond. His sprain we like a plummet of lead, to what they were. I do assure you. Good-by, Miss Desmond, and thank you very much."

Maud walked home across the paddock and up the long gravel path in the vicarage garden, with a feeling of heaviness at her heart. She was half inclined to hate Miss Turtle, Mrs. Flew, and all the people in Shipley. But she resisted the impulse of irritated temper. What was her vexation compared with the sorrow and misery inflicted on others? If Veronica could but have known, if she could but have foreseen!

As she thus thought, she entered the house through the garden door, which stood open. She was going into the sitting-room, when she paused for a moment at the sound of voices in conversation.

"Go in, go in, miss Maudie," said old Joanna, who happened to be in the hall. "You won't disturb no one. It's only that poor creetur, Mr. Flew, a-talking to the vicar."

A COLORADO COLONY.

WE give on page 197 a sketch of an interesting event in the history of our far-Western territory—the departure of a party of German emigrants from Chicago to settle on a tract of land purchased by them in Colorado. The colony is said to be the first of the kind ever organized in this country, and it is called "the German Colonization Society of Colfax, Colorado," that township being its destination. It can hardly fail, if filled with other colonists of the same enterprising character, to exercise an important influence on the development of the Western territory. In many of those remote regions where, under ordinary circumstances, farming could be profitably pursued, the cost of transporting the large quantities over which subsistence must be transported, is so great as to have compelled the abandonment of the mines. Agricultural advantages of the highest available character were not lacking, but the farmer did not come, and the miner could wait for him. It was in view of this state of things that Mr. Horace Gust, CAR. WETZEL, a citizen of Chicago, conceived the idea of organizing, in that city, a society of farmers, mechanics, and laborers, who, with their wives and families, should select some favorable location in the great territory of the west, and there enter upon the work of tilling the soil, and the erection of a village, and, maybap, the foundation of a metropolis.

Mr. GUST has visited Colorado with the view of selecting a suitable place for the location of the colony, and his choice at length fell upon West Mountain in Fremont County, near the head waters of the Arkansas River, in Southwestern Colorado. The district is described as one of surpassing excellence, and admirably adapted to agriculture. The soil is rich, prairie and timber lands abound, numerous streams supply irrigation and power for manufacturing purposes, and the climate is mild and salubrious. On the return of Mr. GUST he reported the favorable result of which he was chosen President, and soon afterward Governor MARSHALL Washington, where he obtained from the Secretary of War a letter to the the commanders of Forts Wallace and Lyon, and other officers on the line of route, to furnish an adequate escort of soldiers from the point of leaving the railroad to their destination was reached; ambulances to convey the women and children; tents in which the colony might live until houses could be erected, and to give the party every possible aid and assistance.

Accordingly, on the date of the organization, each member pays $200, which constitutes a common fund for the benefit of the colony, and out of which are defrayed the expenses of transportation and subsistence on the way, live stock, seed, agricultural implements, machinery for sawmill, grist-mill, etc. All the benefits of charity and enterprise are to be conducted on the cooperative plan, and each family receives a lot in which time an equal subdivision of lands, improvements, assets, etc., will be made. Colfax is situated 250 miles, or, by railroad, 320, on the Kansas Pacific Railroad, 70 miles from Pueblo, and 30 miles from Canon City, the county seat, village of five or six hundred souls, being the nearest settlement. A detachment of United States troops will furnish protection from the Indians against molestation from Indians; but it is designed soon to have a sufficient force among the colonists, to whom the Governor of the Territory will issue arms and ammunition.

The colony will start from Chicago a few weeks since, numbered about two hundred and fifty persons, men, women, and children, all of them Germans. They were accompanied by a clergyman, a doctor, and a schoolmaster, but, as they were to be governed by the unity, not by a lawyer. If this experiment meets with success it will be followed by other colonies; and in this way the West will be speedily settled, and the Indian question with it.

SCENES ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

THE Mississippi by daylight is neither picturesque nor beautiful. Its monotonous line of water, flowing between low banks clad with cottonwood trees and willows, by moonlight, or just when the sun is rising or setting, sometimes seems to undergo a wonderful and mysterious change, but under the ordinary glare of noon, land and water are so mingled in the hazy distance that one can hardly distinguish the dividing-line between them.

The sketch of a steamer "wooding up," on page 200, was made by our artist on one of those dreary, moonlight evenings that show the Father of Waters at his best. It represents a misty stretch of river, with phantom boats gliding away across the moonlit water; a large steamer, tied up to the bank, on which are seen a group of negroes aboard whole wood-piles to feed the roaring furnaces, the trailing Spanish moss—the ghostly beard worn by the trees of southern swamps—gleams in the fitful light, and assists the romantic feeling of the place and hour.

The "raft on the Mississippi" was probably put together at St. Paul, and consigned to New Orleans. In the comfortable shaft-house the raftsmen sleep and eat while slowly drifting down with the current. Now and then they ground upon an island or at a bend in the river, when if they can not get off unaided, they hail a passing steamer, and for a trifle to rope such a cumbrous craft. Sometimes the whole country is flooded, for some considerable time, and the river gains the day, where the work of devastation may end.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE London Times pays the United States many high and well-deserved compliments, in a recent article on manufactures. After stating, however, the fact, that Birmingham is at this moment losing its old markets, it remarks:

"A few years ago it used to supply the United States largely with edged tools, fine weapons, and various smaller wares. It does so no longer; nor is it to be done by sugar-candy and fine words. We have found that the manufacturers of America actually supply themselves. In their own, they have better machinery than we can obtain; and the Birmingham Chamber has been told to discover why it is cheaper to make the finest steel to the superiority of American goods.... High as are the wages paid in Birmingham, those of an American mill are higher still; and yet the manufacturers of the United States can supply the finest steel, the finest edge, a heavy duty, work up the metal by highly-paid labor, and yet come and sell it there after all the intermediate profits. How is that to continue?

"The Birmingham manufacturer is met by 'novelty of construction and excellence of make.' They find, for example, that it is to be more matter of fact. Gorgeousness may still be the cheapest, but they are no longer the fashion. Birmingham must, therefore, do for herself what the Yankee implement, the best article is the cheapest, whether it be a pen or a pistol. Her great defect must be attributed to the greater aptitude of many of the foreign workmen and their habitual disregard of time. There is every opportunity of improving their manufactures."

"In Mr. G——good!" said a bank officer to a director.

"That depends whether you mean Godward or maward," was the answer.

"Regular," said the bank officer.

"Godward, Mr. G——is good: so man in our parish, who wanders in the fields, or loiters about in our meetings, or is more benevolent apparently than he ought, I am sorry to say, Mr. G——is rather tricky."

Men too often seem like double-books. But the Good Book pertinently inquires, "Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter?"

The latest foreign scandal is from a German writer, who comes out with a story that Queen VICTORIA and her children were very unhappy together during their early married life, and that a divorce nearly ensued.

They make shirts by lightning now. An electric sewing-machine is a whirring-machine that does its work with astonishing rapidity, and at little expense.

Crumpton is a little village of three hundred population, at the head of steam navigation on the Chester river in Maryland. Near by are a number of clustering houses occupied by colored people. At Pond Town, about a mile and a half distant, the colored people have purchased for themselves houses and tracts of land. They have a church, a school, and a tannery, and industry that this neighborhood, which was a barren waste, has been brought under cultivation. Some of the colored people have been to the Baltimore Association for the Education of Colored People for a lecture by Frederick Douglass, a colored man of about twenty-five, arrived at Crumpton on the 13th of January, and announced that he would deliver his lecture in the colored people's church on the following Monday, which was attended by over seventy people, from six to thirty years of age. Early in February, it having been noised that a lecture would be opened an evening school, an infuriated mob, with blackened faces, and armed with axe and feathers, as well as guns and pistols, surrounded the colored people's church. Finding they intended victim had not yet come there, the mob swore to be bombarded and demanded that the colonists should be surrendered to them, declaring they would burn the church if they did not come there to look signs." With great difficulty the mob was in some measure calmed, but with many threats toll Mr. Hamilton in the event of his appearance in the town. Seeing no way of continuing the school with safety, the promised lecture in the unity, and having reported the matter to the Association and to General Howard.

A Michigan girl, aged eighteen, and possessed of a big foot, called at a shoe-dealer's a few weeks ago, and asked for a pair of No. 7's. A pair of 6's was shown her, and she tried them; but, to her astonishment, could not get her foot half into them. She asked if she could try a pair of 7's, and got a pair of 7's. He replied that he had, and handed her a pair of shoes, in which they were a little loose, but then the pair she had just tried on: and she was told that "number seven" was the size she could not get shoes to fit. She then asked if he had a No. 8 pair of 8's. He replied that he had one pair still left, and handed them to her. She put them on, and found that pair of 8's" just a fit, paid for them, and left the store.

A recent number of the London Lancet contains an article from Sir Charles Murchison, an able English physician, in which he says that relapsing fever, which made its appearance in London in August last, now taxes severely the resources of that city to provide adequate hospital accommodation for the sick. This fever now made its appearance in this city during the last autumn, and began to spread with alarming rapidity. But in consequence of the efficient action of the Board of Health and the Commissioners of Charities, there has been in this city no perceptible increase of the relapsing fever for several weeks. The health have of London are most stringent, and are administered by efficient officers; yet the measures taken in New York seem to have been more successful in this disease. If proper vigilance is continued, this fever may still be kept in check.

The following hit at New York, whether founded in fact or not, evidently originated at the "Tribune." A young Bostonian who proposed starting in business in this city, made a preliminary visit to it with the letters of introduction to business men. One New Yorker to whom introduced a young Boston friend, replied, do. "I have not exactly decided," replied the youth, "but I expect to settle here some good business in which I can get a living honestly."

"Then you will not," said the New Yorker.

"An honest living," repeated the Bostonian.

"Young man," said the New Yorker, "I congratulate you; there is not a city in the United States in which you will meet with so little competition in your line of honest business."

In a recent report of the proceedings of the Third Annual Convention of the American Institute of Architects there is an interesting paper on chimneys. After various observations on the causes and building of chimneys, the causes of smoky chimneys are mentioned as follows:

1. Insufficient height of the chimney.
2. Too small or too large a sectional area.
3. Interior friction, the surface being too rough.
4. Too large a discharging orifice at the top.
5. Action of wind, rain, and sun on this orifice, to a correction of the above three causes.
6. Contrary draughts, induced by a neighboring chimney, or by the construction of the house.

The first instance in a house is heated by furnace, and draws the heated air from the basement to the apartments above. Mr. Kennedy's shaft the room-doors and open the windows.

The second is where there are open fire-places. (Each fire ought to have its own flue.)

3. Openings in the shaft for the use of flues, should be well closed, so that no cold air can dilute the flaring column of hot air.

The strong prejudice against the negro race, which still exists in many parts of the South, excited some surprise recently to attempt to lynch a colored preacher. They were, however, disappointed in the morning's meeting: "I have been wondering for a long time," said the colored man, "what it was that I preached that was worth getting a lick."

Among many reports about noted personages is one concerning Alexander Dumas, to the effect that he is suffering from paralysis of the right hand—Charles Lever is said to have been in a lethargic state, so that he sleeps sixteen hours out of the twenty-four. Mr. Dana, when he wakes up, always writes something—The new novel upon which Mr. Dickens is engaged is said to be the history of Edwin Drood."

The popular author, Mr. Shirley Brooks, who has been severely ill, is reported convalescent.

The Weekly Scotsman states that there are in Scotland 1,000 manufacturers of kilts, each of whom sells a similar pattern; and in connection with these from 20,000 to 30,000 persons are employed. The manufacture was widely scattered over the country. In one instance the whole machinery was transported at once from a mill to a distance, and surmounted by thirty tall brick stacks, which, in all, form an extraordinary appearance. Raw material is brought and finished goods are sent out by branch railways, the traffic on which nevertheless amounts to about £1,000 weekly. The hundred tons of clay, and about an equal weight of coal, burned every day. Upward of 1,000 persons are employed by the company; and these are aided by seven steam-engines, with an aggregate of 1,000-horse power. This is exclusive of the power employed to bring the clay and coal out of the pits.

"Miss Grundy" says that Madame Garcia, wife of the Spanish tenor, the Jenny Lind of Switzerland, is better known than any of the other foreign ladies. She has been in the habit of appearing in the plainest white sack and shoulders, weighs one hundred and sixty, and at the table entertains cordially on her reception days, and is somewhat of a literary character, having written a novel entitled "Love in the Pampas."

Madame Podesta is thought by many to be handsomer than Madame Ristori. She has been famous for her beauty and graceful manners. Madame Podesta is the wife of the Count of the Imperial Spanish Legation, but is an American by birth. Her mother was a native of Virginia known as a beauty and cordial in manners, lives quietly in Georgetown, but is a great favorite in society.

"Any thing in this store for a dollar?" inquired a would-be economical customer of a Boston clerk. "Only air store."

"Pay for one dollar you can take your choice. Of course I do not include in this my young lady attendants."

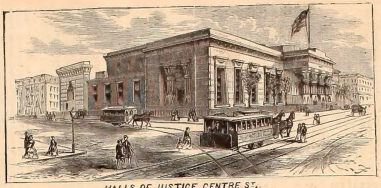
So replied the storekeeper, his ending off probably being intended to be a joke; but he smiled grimly as he said it, and seemed to enjoy it more than anybody.

"Well, I'll take that," said the customer, pointing to a stove which stood at the mid-door, and owner of the room. The customer clearly had the best of the dollar-store.

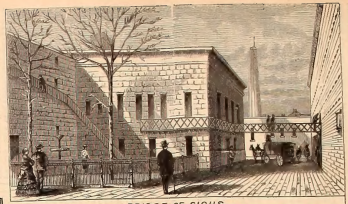
It has been remarked that it would be of great service if some one would invent a good resonant cry which could be heard by underground or steam engineers. The words "fire," "murder," "thieves," etc., convey such impressions, but are often curiously inappropriate. It is related of the late Mr. Charles Sheridan that in attempting to hand from a steamer one dark night he fell into the hold, and called out for help most fiercely from his perilous position. "What did you do?" asked a friend, to whom the accident was mentioned. "Why, what do you think?" answered his niece; "instead of screaming 'murder' or 'fire,' as any one of sense would have done under the circumstances, he only roared and called 'boat!' Of course no one went to his assistance!"

Rev. Sydney Smith once said: "Some men always read with a pen in their hand, and commit to paper any new thought which strikes them; others trust to chance for its reappearance. Which of these is the better plan I leave to the consider of the curious; must, I suppose, depend a great deal upon the particular circumstances of the case. Some men can do nothing without preparation, others little with it; some are fountains, some reservoirs."

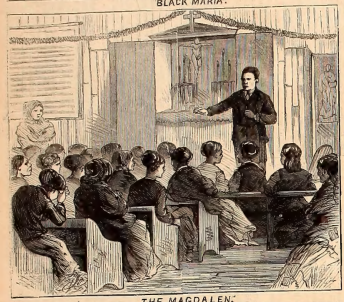
BLACK MARIA.



HALLS OF JUSTICE. CENTRE ST.

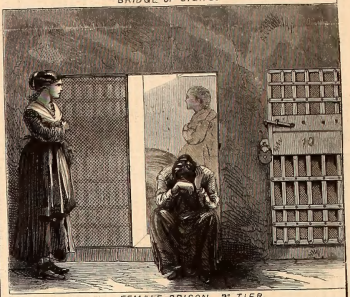


BRIDGE OF SIGHS.

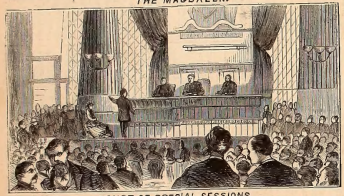


THE MAGDALEN.

INTERIOR OF MALE PRISON



FEMALE PRISON 2ª TIER.



COURT OF SPECIAL SESSIONS.

BOYS' HALL.

THE TOMBS.—From Sketches by Stanley Fox.—[See Page 205.]

THE THIEVES' SUPPER.

Our illustration on this page represents an entertainment of once novel and interesting. A London ex-thief and pugilist, by the name of Ned Wright, who, from being the wickedest man in the English metropolis, has become a useful missionary among his former associates, provides a weekly supper, consisting of a plentiful supply of soup and bread, alternately to the male and female members of the profession. The condition of admission to this entertainment is the proof that the applicant has been convicted once or oftener of theft. The company is, of course, of a very mixed character: some of the thieves being hopelessly depraved, while others appear to be steady and hard-working people who have fallen before temptation. After supper Ned Wright makes them a speech, of a very homely and practical kind, full of good advice, and closing up with the assurance that if any one present wants to reform and lead a different life, he will put him in the way of getting honest work. It is said that this man is doing much to reclaim young men and women from evil courses. The figure standing with a hat on, at the back of our sketch, is a portrait of Ned Wright.

THE TOMBS.

We give on page 204 a series of sketches in "the Tombs," as our dismal city prison is appropriately called, whose forbidding Egyptian architecture casts a cold shadow over Centre Street. To enter its chilling halls is like going into a damp cavern; and many a poor fellow, whom misfortune or strong temptation has driven to crime, must have felt, on first passing its doors, as if he had stepped through that gateway on which the words are engraved: "Who enters here leaves hope behind." Too often this is literally true. The poor wretch leaves his cell only to return to it, for longer and longer periods of detention. Some criminals pass more than half their lifetime behind grated doors, and appear to make use of liberty only to get back to prison.

The Tombs is not a pleasant place to visit, even when you have the privilege of going out when you have satisfied your curiosity; and Mr. Fox has kindly saved all nervous people the trouble of such a visit by making the faithful sketches to which this article refers. The central sketch represents the main hall of the prison, where males are confined. It is narrow and lofty, with four tiers of cells, one above another, those above the ground-floor being reached by galleries, and each gallery guarded by two keepers. The cells are narrow, lighted by a small window at the farther end, ample ventilation being secured by means of the iron-grated door that opens into the hall. Formerly the doors were of wood, and the effect was to make the cells close and unhealthy. Most of the cells are full, and several of them are occupied by noted criminals. Among these is John Real, ex-deputy-sheriff and watchman, who murdered policeman Sheldon in July, 1868. He has a nicely-carpeted cell, with chairs, table, books, and pictures, and appears to enjoy himself pretty well for a man in his position. Reynolds, who murdered Townsend a few weeks ago, is also an inmate of one of these cells. M'Farland occupies a cell on the first gallery. It is very comfortably furnished. The other cells, when Mr. Fox visited the prison, were filled with every sort of criminal, from the "unfortunate" man or boy who "happened" to be found drunk or disorderly in the streets, to the hardened old offenders, some of whom had been sentenced to State prison, and were waiting to be sent away. Most of them were very willing to talk, and few sought to avoid observation.

Another sketch represents the interior of the boys' room, where they are kept during the day. At night they are locked up in separate cells. Every variety of youthful character is exhibited by these boys. Some of them are jolly under their misfortunes, some modest and shamefaced, others hardened and depraved. Our sketch gives a faithful idea of the ways in which they amuse themselves.

Another sketch gives a view of the "Bridge of Sighs," by which murderers pass to the scaffold when led to execution. The last execution which took place at the Tombs was that of Jeremiah O'Brien, for the murder of his mistress. It occurred on the 9th of August, 1867.

The "Black Maria," of which we give a sketch, is a close wagon, used to convey sentenced prisoners from the Tombs to "the Island." At the moment the sketch was taken the motley crowd of passengers was gathering for the ride. The other sketches, which complete the interior survey of the Tombs, are the "Court of Special Sessions," the "Female Prison," and the "Magdalen," or chapel for women.

The present warden of the Tombs is Mr. John Stacom, who is assisted by two deputy-wardens and a large number of subordinate officers. They have their hands full all the time. The number of prisoners committed to the Tombs in 1869 was 42,209, the great bulk of them for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, their term of imprisonment rarely extending over ten days. It is no unusual occurrence to find the same person committed ten or twelve times a year, and instances have been known where a drunkard has been arrested twice in the same week, having evaded imprisonment in the first instance by the payment of a fine, only to rouse the offense. The cases of mania a potu are very numerous on the books.

THE THIEVES' SUPPER.

The condition of the Tombs is creditable to the management. The cells are kept scrupulously clean, and the prisoners are allowed to suffer no unnecessary privations.

A WHISKY PEDDLER ON THE PLAINS.

The army sutler, or, as that personage is now designated, trader, is forbidden to sell whisky to the enlisted man. The order gave a smart trooper the opportunity of airing the following bon mot, which is now current on the frontier:

"Shoulder-straps may get beastly, and go for his quarters; but chevrons keep sober with alkali waters."

To some extent this is true; for the free access which the officers have to the sutler's whisky (at twelve or fifteen dollars per gallon) is at times too evident for good discipline and thorough discharge of duty. The enlisted man will have his whisky too, if by any possibility he can obtain it. One of the sources of supply is shown in our illustration on page 201.

The peddler is well aware of the risk that he runs in selling the contraband article to the soldier. For this reason he takes care to select some unfrequented spot in the vicinity of a military post, thus protecting himself from discovery by the officers, and at the same time searching for himself some measure of safety from Indians.

When such an "outfit" is discovered it is immediately confiscated, and the peddler, if he should fall into the hands of Government, has also had the hair shaved from his poll, and immediately after is treated to prolonged pedestrian exercise through camp, to the lively air, "The Rogue's March."

It may not be out of place to enumerate some of the beverages that are in favor with the troops in the Far West when whisky is not accessible. A Cologne-water cock-tail is not despised, a toddy concocted from some of the hair-washes, of which castor-oil, alcohol, and tincture of cantharides are the principal ingredients, is accepted as a palatable beverage. Extract of ginger, qualified with water, is not an unsolidarity liquor either. But here these are tales told out of school; so no more of them, for the temperance lecture has reached a sufficient length.

JOHN ABLANY'S TROUBLE.

I.

At the breakfast-table, that morning, John Albany's wife, and Carrie, the dearest, youngest little women in the world, had said to him:

"Have you heard from brother Joe yet?"

"No, Carrie: not time yet. You know he only left day before yesterday. Get a letter to-morrow, maybe."

"Do you know, John, I'm almost will with curiosity to see his wife? Such a queer notion of theirs, to put off their wedding-trip for three months after they were married!"

"Wanted to make it in pleasant weather, I suppose—showed their common-sense," said John.

"Any how, they'll be here in a fortnight, as soon as his business is arranged," and Carrie's bright, rosy-cheeked girlish face beamed with delight at the thought, for she all but idolized her "brother Joe," and had heard wonderful stories of the beauty of his bride.

Such had been, in part, the talk at the breakfast-table, and when had not both of them in the summer face than with which John Albany had said good-by to his dear little wife and his rosy-faced baby boy; but now, half an hour later, he sat in his down town office, glowering at a bit of crumpled paper on the table before him, with an expression of countenance which might fairly be thought to include doubts of his own identity.

"Crumb Street Station-House!" he exclaimed. "What in—Well, I might as well go and see what's there."

And so he set out, barely enough presence of mind to put his hat on before he started. A few minutes of almost fiercely rapid walking, a brief parley with the officials in charge, and John Albany was admitted to a dingy and dimly-lighted cell.

"John!"

"Good heavens! You here?"

"Hush! Not a word—I gave my name as Caleb Smith, and it's gone into the reports that way."

"But how did it happen?"

"I can't tell, John. I only know they found the pocket-book in my pocket, and I was so upset I couldn't say a word."

"The pocket-book?"

"Yes; it was at the railway station. I'd just checked my trunks when they began to make an outcry, and that's about all I know about it until I found myself nabbed and searched."

"But Lucille?" said John.

"I wrote to her that I was detained in New York, for a few days, by important business. Then I gave your name as my counsel, and sent for you."

I didn't get the note till this morning," said John.

"Some mistake or other. But here I am, trapped, and what to do I don't know."

"Oh, I can get you off easy enough; it's an old game of the pickpockets. All I've got to do is to prove who you are, and the thing won't fail to sue it," said John.

"But I don't want to prove who I am. I would half kill Carrie, and just about murder Lucille. You don't know how sensitive she is. No: I must be got off and quietly as Caleb Smith, or I'll never get over it. Now, John, old fellow, promise me not to say a word even to any body, least of all to Carrie. Lucille's letters will come to your care, as usual; and I can send a letter to Carrie dated from where you know, as if it was inclosed to you."

"You mean to take the responsibility of all the deception, then," said John; and, after a good deal of grave hesitation, the young fawner of loved Lucille to be overpersuaded to accept the desired promise; but he left the station-house and returned to his office a troubled and anxious-hearted man. He did not like deception in any shape, and he seriously doubted his capacity for concealing any thing from his dear little wife.

And as it was that when John Albany went home that evening, and silently handed Carrie a unpostmarked missive, over which her blue eyes glistened, and which made her kiss the baby twice, he did so with a flush on his cheek and a cloud on his brow, which never left him the whole evening. In vain he tried to be gay, or to make the crowing youngster a means of concealing his perturbation; for the quick eyes of his wife penetrated his clumsy artifices, and then—well, if he had been in trouble, he was busily enough beset now. John Albany was accounted a promising lawyer, and remarkably good at cross-questioning; but never had any witness suffered under his own hands as he now did under those of his wife.

Of course John kept his promise of secrecy, but at the expense of a red face and a flustered manner. He was not half the man in his conscience had not caught him in several pretty well-defined fibs and equivocations before they well-defined fibs and equivocations before they had well-nigh passed his lips; and he was not penetrated her husband's secret; and she was not only a true helpmeet for as far as outside, but as self-willed and imperious a little body as she was loving, with a good deal of that peculiar element of chastened out of which jealousy is manufactured under favorable circumstances. And so, though at first she tried not to show it, Carrie was more than a little offended; and John, poor fellow, could not help seeing and feeling it.

And thus the next day passed, and the next, and matters at home grew more and more worse, and matters at home grew cloudier at a rate which John Albany would have thought impossible, but for looking for a secret from his wife; and the poor fellow grew gloomier with every glance of the fearful and inexplicable cloud that had hitherto been so sunny. Even the baby was compelled to suffer his share of the house and trouble.

In her irritated mood, Carrie's thoughts naturally turned to her brother; and so one day she sat down and wrote him a letter, in which she said a great many things which were only the result of her own fancies, but which Lucille would have followed but that Carrie mailed the letter with her own hand, without regard to the wish of her husband, and that, more by accident than any thing else, it was opened and read by a young lawyer named Smith, in the large New England town, on the following day.

II.

It was not the same cell that John Albany had found Caleb Smith in, and it was many days weeks later. The prisoner was the same, however; and, with all his confinement, he was hardly a day older, as cheerful and badgered looking visitor.

"It's all up, Caleb!"

"What's up, John?"

"Why, this wretched secrecy business. Lucille's coming!"

"Lucille? How do you know?"

"Read that telegram. Got to meet her at the cars this afternoon."

John Albany had the better in color now, very decidedly.

"Oh, John, my boy, what is to be done?"

"You must know!"

"And Carrie?"

"We'll see about that. Don't see what I can do to help you out of this mess." And John Albany looked more like a baited wild animal than ever, as he left the young Nimrod out of the cage.

Carrie didn't go home to dinner that day, or he might have discovered that nurse had been left alone with the baby while his wife had gone out," no one knew whither. So, in uncomfortable ignorance of the dangers that beset him, John went to the New Haven depôt that afternoon, and waited for a lady who should resemble in the most remote manner the description which had been shown him. And he found her very readily. There was no chance for mistake. She was a conspicuous looking beauty; and, in fact, as he advanced to meet her, the trembling lips parted wide enough to say,

"John Albany?"

"And can this be Lucille?"

"Oh, John, where is my husband? Why is he not here?"

"He is safe and well, I assure you; and you shall soon see him."

"But I don't understand! Why is all this mystery and deception?"

"I can't explain here," said John; "but if you will get into the carriage I will tell you as we go."

And John was determined to keep his word, though he would almost as soon have been convicted of burglary. He was not sorry to see the female form that had followed his into the depôt, nor had his excited and confused faculties taken in the fact that a pair of bright eyes sprang lightly into a close coupé which drove off rapidly after the carriage which contained John and Lucille. When the latter was pulled up in front of a hotel, the coupé also stopped at a little distance, and a veiled lady sat within it and leaned forward to the window, muttering, "I knew there was something of that sort! Oh, John! John! How could you?" And then the driver of the coupé received fresh orders, and drove more rapidly up town.

Lucille had only gone into the hotel to gather her scattered senses together, and in listening to the news imparted by John, and, on the whole, she had sustained the shock much better than he had expected. In a very short time—for, with all her nervousness, she was a brave and devoted wife—Lucille declared her readiness to hurry off at once to the prison.

"I must stop at my office for a moment," said John.

"Oh, but I am in such a hurry!" exclaimed Lucille.

"But it's only to leave a law paper with my partner. He has been at court all day, and have not seen him."

John's office was in a very busy part of the city, and both he and Lucille had their heads altogether too full of exciting thoughts to notice any particular members of the hurrying throng upon the sidewalks. Still, as the carriage pulled up at the curb-stone, John said—

"Good! I won't have to go up stairs. There's my partner now. Brown! Eh, Brown!"

The gentleman thus addressed was just standing on the edge of the sidewalk, as if waiting for some body, and now came forward with a remarkably beaming expression of countenance.

"John, my boy, it's all right."

"What's all right?"

"Why, that Caleb Smith case."

John Albany had to catch his breath for a moment: "Caleb Smith!" he stammered, "How?"

"Why, there was a whole batch sent up this morning; and when the prisoner Chas. Hallenger Dick" confessed to putting the money on Caleb's person."

"Well, but what did you do?"

"Oh, Judge — was as good as pie; let him right out, and I've got him up stairs."

A gloved hand was on John's shoulder, and a trembling voice was trying to ask him:

"John, John, isn't that Joe?"

"Yes, it's Joe," said John Albany; but he was sorry enough, at the moment, as he sat in a corner of the carriage trying to recall the color to the white and beautiful face, for Lucille and Joe had been lovers for years, he had competitor, and he had even managed to dash up stairs and to his office, where he had come to herself she was no better hands than the somewhat clumsy ones of John Albany.

And now the carriage was being whirled away up town, for John was urged by something even stronger than hospitality in his eagerness to reach his own residence. He could have no patience with either horses or driver, especially as Lucille and Joe, in their overpowering loving and happy joy there on the beach seat.

Home was reached at last, however, and the somewhat flurried driver reined in his smoking horses in front of the house. John sprang to the sidewalk, and was even steamed of aiding Joe; but Lucille by this time was very well able to help herself.

It was not yet dusk when they entered the house, and John's latch-key dispensed with bell-ringing and knocking.

"Wait a moment in the parlor," said John, "while I call Carrie."

And he went with a big weight upon his heart, John pushed onward toward the sitting-room. At last he threw open the door before him, however, he was suddenly confronted by a lady figure in full traveling costume, and a glance beyond showed him a marvelous disarray of trunks and bandboxes.

"Carrie, my wife!"

A gloved hand held out toward him a small white envelope, while a husky voice said:

"Good-by, John."

"Carrie—"

"Isn't that Joe's voice? Oh, Joe! are you here?"

"Yes, Carrie, here I am, safe and sound." And Lucille sprang forward, taking hold of his pretty sister as if he was about ready to swallow her.

"Oh, Joe, take me to mother's!"

"But, Carrie, what's the matter? John has been in trouble here of late, and—"

"Joe—there she is—I saw her at the depôt!—the very same woman; and now he's brought her here! Oh, I'll never, never it all mean!"

"Mean? Why, Carrie—come here, Lucille—Carrie, this is my wife, your sister Lucille. I've been in trouble, and your John has helped me through, like a splendid old trump as he is. So you've got Lucille for a husband, Joe?"

Carrie gave one good look at Joe, another at his wife—for Carrie had but also caught a glance of the keen suffering in the trembling lips of her own husband.

"Oh, John, I've been so foolish! John?"

And John Albany's trouble was over.

BORDERS FOR GRAPE-VINES.

THE vine requires a warm, dry, well-drained soil, entirely free from stagnant water. Hence all sides which are northerly or easterly exposures are almost always recommended for the sites of vineyards; and generally this aspect is generally insisted upon as an absolute necessity. But not every one who wishes to grow grapes for a hill-side, or has the most extensive gardens overlaying a bed of gravel; it is, therefore, necessary to describe the various methods prerequisite to success in an artificial manner.

Where the subsoil is of a heavy, clayey nature, the usual practice is to dig out the border in which the vines are to grow to a depth of three or four feet, placing at the bottom of the trench a layer of small stones a foot or more in depth, and then filling it up with very richly composited soil; provision being made for the efficiency of the drain-pipe to carry off the water from the bottom of the bed to the outlet.

This answers the purpose for a time, but eventually the earth settles between the stones, they become consolidated together, and the drainage becomes insufficient. Under circumstances like the water from the ascending drains rises in the trench, and the layer of stones becomes a drain for a large surrounding area, and although any excess of water may run off, yet the evaporation through the soil above the layer of stones keeps it too cold for the roots of the vine; and should the outlet pipe become choked, as it frequently does, the water is backed up under the whole border, which causes the roots to decay, and the vines receive serious injury.

Yet we have found that, in all cases where it is necessary to make vine borders, it is best to make them entirely above the surface of the soil; and we believe that people would be much more successful in growing them were they in all cases to do so. The directions of these borders should be from north to south, or as nearly so as may be possible, so as to expose both sides of the vines, as much as possible, to the direct action of the sun's heat. They may be from six to ten feet wide at the bottom, and from three to five feet wide at the top; with a depth of two and a half to three feet of soil. Two-inch plank edges should be laid every ten or fifteen feet across the bed, with their upper edges just above the natural surface or level of the surrounding soil. This not only carries off any surplus of water from heavy rains, but also allows the air to permeate through the bed, which keeps it much warmer than it would otherwise be.

The sides of the beds should be laid with grass sods, or sown with some dwarf-growing grass, such as Rhode Island bent.

Any good fresh soil will answer; but if it can be procured from an old pasture, or from the surface of some new road-side, it is preferable, taking it, sods and soil, to a depth of nine or ten inches. To this may be added about one-fourth of well-rotted horse or barn-yard manure, and a twentieth part of coarse ground bones. This being well mixed or incorporated with the soil before it is made into the bed. The autumn is the best time to prepare the soil and make the border; but if not done then it should be commenced as early in the spring as possible, so as to have it properly settled before planting the vines. After they are planted, the surface of the bed should be mulched with two or three inches of strawy manure.

Many will, no doubt, think that the soil of the border should be made much richer with manure. This would certainly induce a stronger and more rapid growth of the vines at first; but the rich vegetable growth of the manure is exhausted the vines receive a great check, and are generally more subject to mildew thereby. They are better to get a solid, stocky growth of the vines than to superinduce, by the use of excessive quantities of stimulating manures, a succulent, long-jointed growth of wood, which, owing to its continuous rapid growth during the autumn, does not ripen, and so becomes winter-killed or otherwise injured; such vines also become very subject to mildew and rot. Where the soil is in the least checked by sudden atmospheric changes during the summer. The native vines are generally very much given vers that there is no necessity for increasing it by excessive stimulation. The use of much wood-excessive stimulation. The use of much wood-ashes, or any other kind of similar character, are injurious, as they produce an incipient fermentation and activity of the soil, which is also very serious to the vine. After the vines come into bearing the borders should annually receive a top-dressing of well-rotted manure, lightly forked into the soil, and then covered with a mulching of stable litter. This top-dressing not only gives nourishment, and every rain carries to the roots of the vine a proper proportion of the soluble fertilizing elements of the manure.

No fears need be entertained that such raised borders will become too dry in summer, or that the vines will suffer from drought. No fruit suffers less from drought than the vine, for its large, ample leaves furnish a special facility for absorbing moisture from the atmosphere, and it delights in dry, warm soil, in which the fruit ripens earlier, and has a richer and higher colored than when grown in moister soil.

Borders constructed in this way, owing to the expense, are only applicable to gardens where from two or three to twenty vines are all that are required to supply the family with fruit. For vineyard purposes natural sites, combining the requisite drainage and exposure, or large expenditure for drainage, must be selected; but even in such cases it would be of great advantage to have the soil, by means of trenching, into ridges six or eight feet wide and two or three feet high at the apex, and the same distance apart, using the intervening furrows for carrying off the surplus water or laying drainage tiles through them altogether.

Many modern made in the way here suggested, the cultivator will escape insect rot, mildew, the uneven ripening, and in a large degree from mildew.

BRAIN AND MUSCLE.

THERE is an obvious analogy between the man of brains and the man of muscle. In the numerous saleable way in which they exercise and assert their claims to superiority over less gifted, but far better educated competitors, the man of the sailor climbs rigging, and an average Alpine guide scrambles along cliffs, with a facility that would be thought to a man who had been scared away from ships and mountains. But if he have extraordinary gifts, a man who has taken to the sea will rapidly make up for his arrears of education. A born gymnast would soon, in all probability, outstrip the sailors by far. Before the voyage was half over, he would outrun them like an escaped monkey. A born mountaineer would never previously planted his foot on crag or icy, succeeds in Alpine work to a marvelous degree.

A FAVORABLE NOTICE.—The good reputation and extended use of "Brown's Bronchial Troches," for Coughs, Colds, and Throat Diseases, have caused the Troches to be extensively imitated. Obtain only the genuine "Brown's Bronchial Troches," and do not be influenced by those who make more profit by selling worthless imitations.—[COM.]

MENUFFIES OF PEOPLE RESIDING AT ALTITUDES of from 5,000 to 10,000 feet above the sea, sometimes cured the derangements that creep into the system, and are used and valued by those who have experience. ATER'S CHERRY PECTORAL IS SO IMPORTANT.—[COM.]

REMOVAL.

S. W. GERRY & CO. will remove to northeast corner of 54th Street and Broadway, 1st of May. Importers and Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES.

FURNISS, I. & SON, No. 170 Broadway, Established in 1804. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.

Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Goods can be sailed for (with the 51y) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!

The reputation of the NOVELTY JOB PRINTING-PRESS is thoroughly established, as meeting all the requirements of a first-class press, with which to "do your own printing," and is the general Job Printer. Many printers are using them, and find them most admirably adapted for job work. Many young men have bought them, and are doing all the printing for the house which employs them, thereby materially adding to their salaries. THOMSON and MANUFACTURERS are finding them great aids to their business. The Principals of Schools are finding them very useful assistants; and boys are finding them a mental and moral means of instruction, pleasure, and profit. Most lads of fourteen years and upwards, of those present at the office of the publisher, have perfectly capable of doing all the printing for their respective schools, and for their own and fellow boys' use. Prices of Presses, $30, $32, $50. Send for full descriptive Circular, containing, with testimonials from every part of the country, and specimens of plain and colored printing done on the press, and specimens cards, envelopes, &c., &c., to BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer, 204 Fulton St., Boston, Mass., dealer in every description of printing materials; or to the following Agents: C. C. BESTOR & CO., No. 16 College Place, New York. KELLY, HOWELL, & LUDWIG, 917 Market St., Philadelphia, Pa., J. L. KELLOGG, 107 Main St., Hartford, Ct., and

J. C. HAZEN & CO.'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.—A new Catalogue readyy, free on application. Also, Sheet Music, Books, and Music for Choruses, for the use of Choral Societies, 3 cents each. THE BALLAD SINGER.—30 new songs by Clarke and the best composers, 5 cents each. THE MUSICAL CABINET.—A complete library of music, vocal and instrumental, Vocal and Secular, Vocal and Instrumental, in books, 20 cents each. HOUSEHOLD MUSIC.—A new and elegant series of popular music-books, 40 cents each. CREATORIOS AND MASSES, 50 cents each. TUTORS AND STUDIES, for all instruments, 50 cents each. PIANO LIBRARY, 40 books, 50 cents each. FLUTE LIBRARY, 13 books, 50 cents each. Church Services, Vocal and Organ and Choral Books, each 50 cents. Vocal Duets, $1 to $2 each. Complete Operas, with words and music, $2 each. Catalogues of Sheet Music for Bands, &c., &c. "Abundance of music at a price and perfectly satisfactory in shape."—New York Times. To be had of all music and book dealers, or

BOOSEY & CO., No. 644 Broadway, N. Y.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N. Y.,

Will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, at six dollar-class makers, at extremely low prices for Cash during this month, or will take from $5 to $25 monthly until paid; the same to be sold rent-money if not purchased. Chickering Pianos are included in the above offer.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about Presses, Type, Recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., for 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 83 Murray Street, New York.

HUDSON RIVER Institute and Claverack College and Hudson River Female Seminary, Claverack, N. Y. A first-class Boarding School for both sexes. College course for ladies and Academic course for ladies and gentlemen. Nine departments. Fifteen professors and teachers. Term opens April 9th. For Catalogue containing full information, address Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Pres't, Claverack, Columbia Co., New York.

PSYCHOMANCY, Fascination, or Science of the Soul, as applied to the purposes of Life and Love, 400 pp., Cloth. By Herbert Hamilton, B.A. A curious book for inquisitive people. It contains complete instructions to acquire this wonderful power over men or animals. Can be obtained by sending 50 cents for postage, and address to, T. W. EVANS & CO.,

41 South Eighth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

WESTWARD, HO!

GERMAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY, of Colfax, Colorado.—Persons wishing to join this Colony can obtain full information of the plan of organization, &c., by addressing

R. P. ARNOLD, Agent, 111 Dearborn St., Chicago.

HOMES for the Million! $200,000 worth of Farms and Farming Lands for sale, in lots to suit, mostly in Lewis Co., Missouri. Excellent markets, fertile soil, and healthy climate. Write to Town Property for sale. Daily communication with Quincy. For descriptive circulars, address A. W. COWDREY, Lexington, Mo.

ONLY 25 CENTS.

A HANDSOME ALBUM holding 30 card pictures. A Full gilt cover, new, novel, and very handsome. Sent free on receipt of 25 cents.

SAMUEL BOWLES & CO., Springfield, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's School and Family Charts.

To canvass every town in the Union. Men of ability, and will recommended, can realize handsome profits. For particulars and terms, address

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

HOCKLEY KNITTING MACHINE

FOR FAMILY USE—simple, durable, reliable. Knits Every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and sample stocking FREE. Address HOCKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

OXYGENIZED AIR. A Cure for Scrofula, Consumption. Send address for pamphlet to Dr. C. L. BLOOD, Boston, Mass.

SEND 25 Cents for PATENT TICKET. RAILROAD HAT BUCKLE. Address E. BURSON, Fastener, Griffin, Ga.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 237 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Oroide):—These justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for tone and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Full-jewel Patent Levers, $15, equal in appearance and for time to gold ones costing $150. Three-quarter Plate, $20, equal to $200 gold ones. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jewelled, with all the improvements of the most costly watch. For these magnificent watches we charge only $25. All our watches fully guaranteed by written certificate. All our watches are of the usual gentlemen's and ladies' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $3 to $8. Also, all kinds of watches, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The Collins Metal Watch Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

We find the new Watches in wear in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

Now, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

OF THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

In denominations of $1000 and $500, coupon or registered, with interest at Eight per cent per annum, payable 1th February and August, in Gold, free of United States taxes, in New York or Europe. The bonds have thirty years to run, payable in New York in Gold. Trustees: Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, of New York. The mortgage which secures these bonds is at the rate of $17,500 per mile, covers a completed road for every bond issued, and is a first and only mortgage. The line, connecting St. Joseph with Fort Kearney, will make a short and through route to California. Our Company have a Capital Stock of $10,000,000

And a Grant of Land from Congress of 1,500,000 acres, valued, at the lowest appraisal, at 4,000,000

First Mortgage Bonds 1,500,000

Total $15,500,000

Length of Road, 271 miles. Price 90% and accrued interest. Can be obtained from the undersigned. Also, pamphlets, maps, and information relating thereto. Those bonds, being so well secured, and yielding a large income, are desirable to parties seeking safe and lucrative investments.

W. P. CONVERSE & CO., Commercial Agents,

No. 58 Wall Street, New York.

TANNER & CO., Fiscal Agents,

No. 49 Wall Street, New York.

The Chesapeake and Ohio Railway

WILL CURE IN 5 MINUTES.

My AMAZON ROOT will cure Head-ache, Tooth-ache, or Earache in Five Minutes; is also a sure cure for Catarrh. Will be sent, postage paid, on receipt of 50 cents, to any part of the world. Address

G. E. ALZORA, M.D.,

No. 338 Broadway, New York.

Box 3066.

PAPER-BOATS

For exercise, pleasure, racing, traveling, and hunting. Special models for sporting ladies, lads, travelers, and gentlemen. Descriptive circulars & price-list sent on application. WM. WATERS, BALTIMORE, 303 Fourth St., N.Y.

$20 A DAY: Business new. For circulars and sample plan, address J. C. HAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

$5 Outfit of Jewelry and articles sold by a simple remedy, and will send one receipt free.

Mrs. M. C. LEGGETT, Rochester, N. Y.

$25 Capital, $2000 Profits. Partner wanted in every town. C. W. DENNIS, Rochester, N. Y.

AMENIA SEMINARY, Amenia, N.Y. Term begins April 14. REV. E. FOX, A.M., Principal and Proprietor.

EMPLOYMENT.—$200 a month with Stencil Dies. Samples free. S. M. SPENCER & CO., Brattleboro, Vt.

THE AMERICAN FAMILY

KNITTING MACHINE

is presented to the public as the most Simple, Durable, Compact, and Cheap Knitting Machine ever invented. PRICE ONLY $22.

This machine will run either backward or forward. By a simple contrivance, it makes the heel and toe shape, and for super in every respect. WILL KNIT SOCKS Strikes One Minute. Changes from one size to another in a pair of stockings (any size) in less than half an hour. It will knit Close or Open, Fine or Coarse Work, with any kind of cotton or fine woolen yarn, cotton, silk, or linen. It will knit stockings with double soles and high drawers, hose, socks, stockings, cuffs, pantalettes, muffs, fringe, afghans, nubias, undersleeves, mittens, shawls, caps, hoods, comforts, cardigans, shawls, jackets, cradle-blankets, leggins, suspenders, wristlets, tidies, lamp-mats, and work, and, in fact, an endless variety of articles in every day use, as well as for ornament.

FROM $8 TO $10 PER DAY can be made by any one with the AMERICAN FAMILY KNITTING MACHINE, stockings, &c., while expert operators can even make from $10 to $15 per day. Agents always commanded a ready sale.

FARMERS can sell their wool at only forty to fifty cents per pound, or by getting the wool made into yarn at a small expense, and knitting it into socks, two or three dollars per pound can be realized. On receipt of $25 we will forward a machine, ordered.

We want a few more active AGENTS AT EVERY PLACE to whom the most liberal inducements will be offered. Address

AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE COMPANY,

BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO.

THE CHILDREN'S CARRIAGE.

With safety and comfort. Send for Circular. Address

THE CHILDREN'S CARRIAGE CO.,

No. 49 Wall Street, New York.

THE DOLLAR SUN.

The cheapest, smartest, and best New York newspaper. Everybody likes it. Three editions Daily, Sunday, and WEEKLY, $2; and WEEKLY, SIX COPIES, ALL TO ONE ADDRESS, $10. Specimens free. Address THE DOLLAR SUN, New York, and a copy of the Dollar Sunday, Weekly and Semi-Weekly number. A present of valuable goods to every subscriber. Agents wanted everywhere. CHAS. A. DANA, Editor and Proprietor.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $75 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new wonderful inventions. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

STEEL SHIRT COLLAR.—Pickpocket Detective—and Cupidless Pen Pomatum. Sent free on receipt of 50 cents each. HENRY GAY, 79 Nassau St., N.Y.

EMPLOYMENT, a permanent home, and fair wages given to Members of the Co-operative Home. For particulars, address as above, Phelps, Ontario Co., N.Y.

1000 CHILDREN'S CARRIAGES, from $4 to $25. L. P. TIBBALS, 478 Broadway, New York. Carriages Repaired.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

SPECIAL TRADE SALE, 1870.

FROM MARCH 16 TO APRIL 25.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, March, 1870.

We invite the attention of Booksellers to our Special List of Books, which we will sell on the following Terms, for Cash, from the 16th of March to the 25th of April, after which our Terms will positively be as heretofore.

On Orders of $ 100 at one time, 25 per cent. Discount, and Five per cent. for Cash.

"	$ 500	"	30
"	$1000	"	33½
"	$2000	"	35

We shall not sell at any of the Trade Sales this Spring.

The SPECIAL LIST will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

"The Best Monthly Periodical, not in this country alone, but in the English language."

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR APRIL, 1870.

CONTENTS:

THE WAR IN PARAGUAY. By GENERAL M. T. MCMAHON.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—On the Paraná.—Las Palmas.—Bridge from Las Palmas to Paraná.—Head-Quarters.—Coming from the Front.—Inroad of the Cavalry.—The Night after the Battle.—Across the Yerty.—The Dying Colonel.—The Wounded Major.—The Pass of Arcoyo.—Your Revered Servants."—The Paraguayan Mother.—The Sergeant's Story.

LOST DAYS.

CONCERT OF VON BISMARCK.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Otto Von Bismarck.—Otto Von Bismarck at School.—Young Bismarck's Visit to the Dean.—Bismarck as a Student at Göttingen.—Bismarck in Bed.—The King residing in the Forest.—The Attempt to assassinate Count Bismarck.—The King and Bismarck at the Battle of Sadowa.—Count Bismarck in the Prussian Chamber.

AMONG THE SILK-WORMS AND VELVET LOOMS.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Cocoons.—Silk-Worm Nest.—Hatching the Eggs.—First Period.—Second Period.—Third Period.—Fourth Period.—End of Fifth Period.—Dormant State of the Several Periods.—Silk-Worm casting its Skin.—Forming the Cocoon.—Cocoons Completed.—Female Moth; Male Moth.—Moth Laying Eggs.—Moths; Chrysalis.—"The Boots".—Cocoons during Spinning Process.—Cocoons Dying Process.—Marketing the Cocoons.—Reeling the Silk.—A Velvet Loom.

BEAUTIFUL CHILD.

FREDERICK THE GREAT.—V.—THE DEATH OF FREDERICK WILLIAM I. AND THE ACCESSION TO THE THRONE OF FREDERICK THE SECOND.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Frederick the Great, Æt. 10.—The Crown Prince entering the Tobacco Parliament.—Frederick awaking the Ministers.—Frederick in the Garden.—Frederick's first Interview with Voltaire.

AROUND THE WORLD ON SKATES.

THE LOST PET.

LINDA'S YOUNG LADY.

TRIFLES.

A BRAVE LADY.—(Concluded.)

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Mr. Douglly's Woolng.—Down Revealed in a Song.

WHAT WE SAW, AND WHAT WE SHOULD DO WITH HIM.

BARNABAS CAREW'S CURSE.

THE GREAT GOLD CONSPIRACY.

ANTEROS. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone."

HARPER'S EASY CHAIR. By GEO. R. B. RAYMOND.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

With the May Number will be concluded the Fortieth Volume of Harper's Monthly. The Magazine contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more reading matter than any other Monthly, and is in other monthly periodical in America or England. The unparalleled success of HARPER'S MAGAZINE is due to the popular character and variety of its contents; to the energetic efforts of the Publishers in securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions of the best writers of the country; to its richly-illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration; to its carefully-prepared Record of Progress in Science and the Arts, and upon the Literature and Improvements of the age, and to the variety and lateness of its several Editorial Departments. For the above reasons, the second, the co-operation of members of the Smithsonian Institution has been secured for its pages.

In the January Number was commenced the publication, from the author's manuscript, of "Anteros," a new serial story, by the Author of "Guy Livingstone."

TERMS FOR HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, AND BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00

HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for One Year, postage free, $10.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is to begin with the Number next after the completion of a Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to notify us of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be replaced. Remit loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1.50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1.50 per Line; Outside Page, $2.00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1.00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1.25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$25 A DAY! 40 new articles for Agents. Samples sent free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

"SERVED HER BLOODY WELL RIGHT."

"Lieutenant CLEMENS, of H. B. M.'s ship Ocean, sworn: Upon the arrival of the Boodaay I went on board for our locked mail, said, in conversation with Captain ARTHUR WELLESLEY EVANS, he said, 'I have run out the whole quarter off a d—d Yankee frigate, and I served her bloody well right, for I met her as I came up running out with her helm a-starboard.' Either the Doctor, in the presence of the Captain, or Captain EVANS, in the presence of the Doctor, I do not remember which, but one or the other said he thought the ship was so badly sore that as the drifted past us one could see into the officers' cabin."

COLLECTIONS OF FLOWER SEEDS BY MAIL.

The following Collections contain the most showy varieties in our large assortment, with full directions for culture. Each packet contains a mixture of the choicest colors and varieties of its species, so that a greater display can be made at a much less price than when ordered in separate packets. Those unacquainted with Flowers, as well as the experienced cultivator, may order without fear of disappointment.

COLLECTION A—contains twenty choice varieties of Annuals..... $1 00
" B—contains twenty choice varieties of Annuals and Perennials..... 1 00
" C—contains ten extra varieties of Annuals and Perennials, embracing many of the new and choicest in cultivation..... 1 00
" D—contains five very choice, varieties, selected from Price Flowers, of English Pansies, German, Carnation, and Picotee Pinks, Verbenas, Truffaut's French Asters, Double Hollyhocks..... 1 00

Any one remitting $1 00 will receive the four Collections postage free.

COLLECTIONS OF KITCHEN-GARDEN SEEDS BY MAIL.

A Complete Assortment of Vegetable Seeds for One Year's supply, for a Large or Small Garden.

The following Collections are made up in the most liberal manner, care being taken to give a sufficient quantity of all the finest varieties and most useful sorts of Vegetables required in the Kitchen Garden.

ASSORTMENT No. 5 contains 50 varieties..... $5 00
" No. 4 contains 25 varieties..... 2 00
" No. 3 contains 15 varieties..... 1 00

Larger Collections, which can be safely sent by express (freight paid by purchaser) to any part of the country, as follows: No. 1, $20 00; No. 2, $15 00; No. 3, $10 00; No. 4, $5 00. For a list of the contents of each Collection, see Catalogue.

The Annual Seed Edition of their Illustrated Seed Catalogue and Guide to the Flower and Kitchen Garden, containing 136 pages, will be issued in March. Plates engraved expressly for this work; regular customers will receive it without charge.

Bliss's Gardener's Almanac mailed to all applicants upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. Address

B. K. BLISS & SON,
41 Park Row and 151 Nassau St.,
P. O. Box 5712, New York.

WARNER, PECK, & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS OF Children's Carriages,
Springfield, Mass.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE and Claverack College. For both sexes. Term opens April 4. Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., President, Claverack, N. Y.

SPECIMEN FREE.—Monthly, 600 pages, $2 a year. Send stamp to MOTHER'S JOURNAL, Chicago.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,
OFFER FOR SALE
DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,
Rosaic, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS,
and other
FINE JEWELRY AND SILVERWARE.
WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.
We call particular attention to our fine assortment of
CORAL JEWELRY.

THE LADIES' SOROSIS CLUB,
of New York, recently changed their discussions from woman's sufferings to Hair Preparations and Pimple Banishers. They decided that where nature has not endowed them with beauty, it was their right—yea, their duty—to get it where they could. So they all voted that MAGNOLIA BALM overcame Sallowness, Rough Skin, and Ring-marks, and gave to the completion a most distingue (Sorosian) and marble-like appearance (dangerous to men, no doubt); and that LYON'S KATHAIRON made the hair grow thick, soft, and awful pretty, and, moreover, prevented it from turning grey. If the proprietors of these articles did not send the sisters an invoice, they are not smart.

$732 in 31 Days
Made by one Agent, selling SLOTE'S PATENT ELASTIC BRACES. Over 50,000 now in use. Recommended by Rev. Horace Greeley and American Agriculturist. One county reserved for each Agent. C. A. CODE & CO., 20 Cortlandt St., N. Y., or 176 Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY,
MARION, N. J.,
Manufacturers of 20 and 18 size AMERICAN Watches, Pendant Winders and Key Winders,
BOTH NICKEL AND FROSTED MOVEMENTS.

The finer grades all having three pairs Conical Pivots, Cap Jeweled, in Gold Settings, and accurately adjusted to Heat, Cold, and Positions; and all, even in the cheapest grades, have the STRAIGHT-LINE Escapement, with Exposed Pallet Jewels, and Hardened and Tempered Hair Springs; and for our late improvement in STEM-WINDING mechanism, we claim a STRENGTH, SIMPLICITY, and SMOOTHNESS hitherto unattained in any other manufacture, at home or abroad.

Constantly on hand, full lines, all sizes, in Gold, Silver, Diamond Set, and Magic Cases, Minute Repeaters, Independent 1-4, 1-5 Split, Fly back Seconds, and taking three different times.

Wholesale Warerooms, 13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,
And GILES, BROTHER, & CO., 142 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

NEW YORK, Jan. 17, 1870.

☞ WATCH NO. 1089 (Stem Winder)—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me from December, 1868, to January 17th, 1870; its total variation being only two seconds in the entire time.

L. E. CHITTENDEN, Late Register U. S. Treasury.

GILES, WALES, & CO., 13 Maiden Lane, New York.

☞ Price-Lists furnished the trade on application, enclosing business card. For sale by the trade generally.

WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,
OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.
☞ Call or send for Price-List.

FREEMAN & BURR, MERCHANT CLOTHIERS, TAILORS, and Outfitters in Men's and Boys' Clothing and Furnishing Goods, 138 & 140 Fulton Street, New York.
Best Materials, Best Styles, Best Workmanship, and Lowest Prices.

CLOTHING OF EVERY description, ready-made or made to measure, for all ages, all occasions, and all seasons.
An immense assortment of SPRING AND SUMMER CLOTHING, IN ALL THE NEWEST DESIGNS AND MATERIALS, at FREEMAN & BURR'S.

ORDERS BY MAIL attended to with care and punctuality. The easy and accurate system of self-measurement introduced by FREEMAN & BURR enables them to guarantee Perfect Fit in all cases.

RULES FOR SELF-MEASURE, Price-Lists, Samples of Goods, and Fashion Sheet, with full directions for ordering Clothing, sent free, on application, to any part of the country.

FREEMAN & BURR'S CLOTHING WAREHOUSE, 138 & 140 FULTON ST., NEW YORK.

Bargains! Bargains!!
In consequence of a CHANGE in OUR FIRM, and Removal in April to 66 Broadway,
Our Entire Stock of
$50000 WORTH OF
CHINA, GLASS, SILVER AND PLATED WARE, CHANDELIERS, GAS FIXTURES, CLOCKS, BRONZES, CUTLERY, &c., &c., will be disposed of, and we offer it at and
BELOW COST.
An examination of our PRICES, which are shown in plain figures on the goods, WILL SATISFY buyers that WE DO, IN EARNEST. Every one is invited to call.
After the 1st of May the business will be continued by our successors,
Messrs. NICOL & DAVIDSON,
AT 210 BROADWAY.
Our Messrs. E. V. & E. E. Haughwout retiring from the business, either party will sign the name of the present firm in liquidation.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO.,
488, 490, & 492 Broadway, cor. Broome St.

☞ Orders by mail will be carefully filled, and at our lowest prices.

THE WIDELY-KNOWN CELEBRITY BAND INSTRUMENTS continue to grow in popular favor. Their peculiarity for quality are mainly discovered by the musician, whose playing our serves but to strengthen the first favorable verdict. The closest tests and scrutiny precede sales. Each part bears its own commendation.

Bands are often encumbered with some of the numerous inferior styles which are vigorously "pushed" on the market. We only arrange to take them when a fair condition, at a moderate price, in exchange for a set of our superb instruments.
TRY, and you will hold fast, because you will find them GOOD.
Address SCHREIBER CORNET COMPANY,
M. J. FALLERT, Sup't, Agents,
66 Broadway, N. Y.

"ECONOMY IS WEALTH" — FRANKLIN.
"I will people pay $50 or more for a SEWING MACHINE when $25 will buy one that has a standard reputation, is double thread, elastic stitch, Tube, constructed upon entirely new and practical principles, runs by friction, and excels all others?" These celebrated Machines, Lally Improved, are intended for poor people who want to save time, labor, and money. Agents Wanted. Machines sent to Agents and prices easy to every family. For circular and reduced prices, address J. C. UTTS & CO., or FRANKLIN AND DIAMOND Sts., P. O. Box 291, Boston, Mass.

NEXT OF KIN.—GOULD'S INDEX to 12,000 advertisements of Governors' Proclamations.
JOHN HOOPER & CO., No. 41 Park Row, New York.

AGENTS WANTED, Something New. 100 per cent. profit. FRUIT & SONS, Mount Vision, N. Y.

Woodward's National Architect. 1000 Working Plans, Elevations, Sections, Detail Drawings, Specifications, Estimates. Postpaid, $12.
Harney's Barns, Outbuildings and Fences. 200 Designs, including Stables, Gates, Fences, and Stable Fittings. Postpaid, $10.
Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses. 150 Designs and Plans. Postpaid, $1 50.
Illustrated price-list and catalogue of all books on Architecture and Agriculture mailed free.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,
191 Broadway, New York.

$20 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE
Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $28 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold for less than $40. Warranted for Six Years. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution. Circulars free. Address
Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

Dr. Wm. Hall's Manufacturing Company, 160 Genesee Street, Utica, N. Y., 66 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 27 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter-Box 8546. Repairing and Boiling also done.

The New Books of the Season
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Price.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. Together with a Statement of the Intimations of Astronomy and Geology in regard to a Future and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By JAMES NEWBERRY, LL.D., Professor of Geology and Zoology in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With 16 Illustrations. 12mo, $1 75.

JOURNAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO THE EAST. Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Constantinople, Athens, Greece, Corfu, Malta, Spain, and the Prince and Princess of Wales. By the Hon. Mrs. WILLIAM GRIMSTON. 12mo, $1 75.

GARIBALDI'S NOVEL. The Rule of the Monk; or, Rome in the Nineteenth Century. By General GARIBALDI. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By JAMES ORTON, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Equatorial America, and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY. A Novel. By Mrs. A. D. T. WHITNEY, Author of "Gayworthys." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE UNKIND WORD, and other Stories. By the Author of "Mine Holding, Bodily." 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By ALTHEA CLAVE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00; Cloth, Gilt Edges, $1 50.

PLAUTUS'S PLAYS. T. Maci Plauti Captivi, Trinummus, et Rudens. With English Notes, Critical and Explanatory. By HENRY PRESCOTT, M.A., Professor of Latin in the Wesleyan University. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

ADVENTURES OF CALEB WILLIAMS. By WILLIAM GODWIN, Esq., Author of "St. Leon," "Cloudesley," &c. Complete in one volume. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE SEVEN GREAT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By LUDAN ARNOTT, Author of "Joan of Naples," "Ida Norman," &c. Elegantly Illustrated from Designs by Dore, Delamotte, Durham, and Pearson. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00; Gilt Edges, $3 50.

HIRELL. A Novel. By the Author of "Abel Drake's Wife." "Home's to the Wind," "Martin Pole," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE ODES AND EPODES OF HORACE. A Metrical Translation into English. With an Introduction and Commentaries. By LORD LYTTON. With Latin Text from the Editions of Orelli, Meinekes, and Yonge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

HEDDA LEIGH: a History and an Autobiography. Edited by CHARLES MACKAY. With an Introduction, and a Commentary on the Charges brought against Lord Byron by Mrs. Beecher Stowe. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, Authorness of "Our Village," Told by Herself in Letters to Her Friends. With Anecdotes and Sketches of her most celebrated Contemporaries. Edited by Rev. A. G. K. L'ESTRANGE. 2 vols., 18mo, Cloth, $3 50.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIV.—No. 692.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

ENSIGN COPP, OF THE "ONEIDA."

WE give on this page a portrait of CHARLES A. COPP, of the Oneida, whose name, with that of his Captain, has been added to the list of heroic men who died rather than leave the post of duty. After the collision with the Rowena—our readers will pardon the repetition of the story—his solicitude for the sick who were under his charge was worthy of his warm and generous heart. After seeing all the invalid seamen on board the cutter, he went below to his station. A comrade called to him to come up, as the ship was sinking. He replied, "No; I am stationed here, and can not come until relieved." Scarcely had he spoken those noble words when the Oneida sunk beneath the waves.

This brave officer was born in Troy, New York, July 25, 1847. At the age of fifteen, while a clerk in New York, he enlisted in the United States navy, and passed a year in the blockading fleet off Charleston Harbor, where he acquired a practical knowledge of modern naval warfare.

An appointment to the Naval Academy was sent to him while on board the Monadnock, which he was inclined to refuse, fearing he was too rusty in his studies to pass the required examination. His officers, who admired his manly ways and seaman-like qualities, urged him to accept; and one of them, Lieutenant-Commander JOSEPH N. MILLER, even threatened, if he refused, to reduce him from a petty office to which he had been promoted. He was complimented at Newport on his examination in mathematics, and immediately on entering the school became champion for his younger and weaker fellow "plebs" in their usual encounters with upper-classmen. He was one of the movers in an organized defense, and for some time was president of his class. During his course he studied just enough to pass the several examinations, giving his attention to the practical branches, and excelling in all manly sports. He was a leading member of the ball and boat clubs, was a splendid swordsman, and the best boxer at the Academy. He was graduated with his class in June, 1868, and in October following was ordered to report to Admiral ROWAN, of the Asiatic Squadron. He served on the flag-ship Delaware until October, 1869, when he was transferred to the Iroko, and came near death when that vessel was caught by a typhoon and broken almost in two. He was on his way home for examination for promotion when the disaster to the Oneida occurred.

ENSIGN COPP, OF THE "ONEIDA."

Report speaks well of him as an officer. His magnificent physique gave him a commanding presence, and his noble bearing won the respect of all with whom he came in contact. He had rare executive ability, and a tone of command that caused every order to be instantly obeyed. He was a genial companion, a sympathetic friend, and a loving, devoted son and brother. By his death the United States navy has lost one of its most promising officers.

THE MISSING STEAMER.

SINCE the reported arrival of the City of Boston at Queenstown, telegraphed from London on the 16th of March, turned out to be a cruel hoax, the hope that we shall ever receive tidings of the missing steamer is but faint indeed. She sailed from this port on the 26th of January, and two days later touched at Halifax, on her way to Queenstown; and has not been seen or heard of since that date. A passenger by the Russia, which sailed from this port four days after the City of Boston left Halifax, reports a heavy gale, which the missing steamer must have encountered at its height. He writes: "During the latter half of our passage we were beset by a most ugly, tempestuous sea—such a one as, in four previous passages across the Atlantic, I had not known. The wind was ahead, and continued so up to the very port of Liverpool. We were constantly slipping the most tremendous seas, and our noble vessel, strong and steady and magnificent as she is, seemed yet put to her utmost resources to hold her position. It was, indeed, a stormy time; and instead of making the passage in nine days, as is usual with the Russia, we were eleven. I have no doubt that this was the weather from which the City of Boston suffered. She probably encountered the storm several days before we did, and it may then have been yet more violent than it was. I can imagine how a vessel could make her way through such a sea without being very much injured, but not in all her parts. If there was any weak spot in her machinery it must inevitably have succumbed. If, therefore, the steering apparatus of the City of Boston was defective, as is alleged, she was no doubt disabled by the weather from which we had. It is to be feared that these apprehensions will prove to be too well founded, and that the City of Boston will be added to the list of ill-fated steamers that have gone down in mid-ocean, leaving none to tell the story of their doom.

IN THE SEPULCHRE.—[FROM A PAINTING BY M. CLAXTON.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1870.

☞ Messrs. Harper & Brothers are not responsible for the statements of any Advertising Agent, and have no such persons in their employment.

A POLICY OF PEACE.

THE facts of the Fingon expedition are these: The Piegan band had been steadily making war and murdering in Montana, and General SHERIDAN on the 4th of November received permission from General SHERMAN to punish them, believing that "a good hard blow" would make peace desirable to the Indians. General SHERIDAN gave orders for an expedition, which left Fort Shaw, in Montana, on the 19th of January, under command of Colonel BAKER. On the 23d it surprised the Fingon camp, killed 173 Indians, captured more than 100 women and 100 horses, and destroyed 44 lodges. It seems that small guns was raging among the Indians, which, of course, could not be known to Colonel BAKER. It now appears also that of the 173 killed 62 were men, 90 were women, and 50 were children, none of the last twelve years old, and many of them in their mothers' arms. It was a terrible blow, which, of course, will have no other effect than to make the hatred of the Indians toward the whites more deadly, and which must strengthen the strongest plea for a policy of extermination upon our part or to a total change of our Indian management.

The whole question while pioneers are at the frontier and the officers of the army are generally agreed that nothing but the utmost severity will save life and protect the families of American citizens exposed to the Indians. General SHERIDAN forcibly states this view:

"So far as the Indians are concerned, the problem to be decided is, Who shall be killed—the whites or the Indians? They can hardly be worse than since 1862 at least 900 men, women, and children have been murdered within the limits of this department, inclusive of the most fiendish manner—the men usually scalped and mutilated,.... women violated, and sometimes fifty and sixty times in succession, then killed and scalped, sticks shot into their persons before and after death. I have myself conversed with one or two men who, while some months gone in pregnancy, was ravished over forty times successively by different Indians, becoming insensible two or three times during the horrid ordeal, and each time, upon returning consciousness, mostly appealing for mercy, if not for herself, for her unborn child. Such atrocities cannot be punished with mere fearful brutality over fifty times, and the last Indian who striking the point of his arrow into the person of the woman. I could give the names of these women were it for delicacy. It would be well to bear that MR. VINCENT COLYER wants this work to go on. I can mention those two cases especially because they came under my own personal examination, and can give them as an example of what has occurred to hundreds of others."

Again, in his report, the General says:

"The Indians have run riot along the whole of our Western settlement and the emigrant and commercial trade of this country for many years, murdering and plundering without any adequate punishment, and the Government has heretofore sought to give protection to some of its best interests by making presents to these savages, or, in other words, while it found it necessary to use the most stringent efforts by the government of the civilized whites, it was attempting to govern a wild, roving, and savage people without any laws at all, or the infliction of any punishment for the most heinous offences. The result has been the excess. If a man commits murder or robs we hang him or send him to the penitentiary. If an Indian does the same we have been in the habit of giving him more blankets. The Indian is to be treated with bond. He never labors, and has no profession except that of arms, to which he is raised from infancy. His scalp is constantly dangled before his eyes, and the highest honor he can obtain to be a warrior is to take by himself. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, if he aims to do what he considers his highest duty when there is no punishment to follow the barbarous act."

MR. M'CORMICK, the delegate from Arizona, says that we cannot remember these atrocious classes of Indians, which differ from each other as Americans differ from Japanese. They are the civilizable and the hopelessly barbarous tribes, and while he supports increased appropriations for friendly Indians, he is sure that the most valuable lives and enormous property would have been saved by "an uninterrupting aggressive war upon the relentless Apache." MR. M'CORMICK alluded to the constant and innumerable murders and outrages of every kind committed by the Indians within his own Territory of Arizona—murders upon the best of frontier citizens—and he asks why it is only the woes of the Indians that excite the horror of the "Eastern States?"

We do not deny the horrible outrages of the Indians, their treachery and cruelty, but neither will General SHERIDAN deny the broken faith of the United States and the systematic criminality of the treatment of the Indians upon the frontier. We have known a white woman of the frontier to say that she would kill an Indian as she would kill a mouse; it was merely the determination of disgust. But we say that it is surprising a woman should feel so, under the circumstances. But if that feeling is to be the foundation of our Indian policy, there certainly that policy ought to be founded. The army ought to hunt the savages off the face of the earth, and never be recalled. The present situation is intolerable, but general destruction is not the only remedy. It is simply because Indians are neither to be made citizens, nor understand treaties as we understand them, nor be subjugated to law. But we can enforce our own laws upon our own citizens. We can compel them to respect the arrangements we make with the Indians, and we can allow no latter by the summary punishment of our citizens who war against them that we will do what we can to protect them against the cruelty and rapacity of our own men.

And when the cry of humanity of that race appear in Congress as the form of bills "to civilize the Indian title" in hands coveted by some railroad ring, the press can at least expose the gentlemen who support them, and the people can be kept in redeeming the promises by which we induce them to acquiesce in the new order. The wish, and this wish could have very great weight with all intelligent men:

"If I were to waive all inquiry as to the moral obligations of a Christian nation under such circumstances, I think it would be demonstrably clear that, as a mere question of pecuniary economy, it would be cheaper to feed every Indian now living, even to cheap unfeeling, during his natural life, while their children are educated to habits of agriculture, than it would be to carry on a general Indian war for a single year. The destruction of property and mutilations of the dead and of prisoners which are of ordinary occurrence in an Indian campaign are Indian warfare. By preserving peace we may hope to avoid these, and can not believe that the dictates of wisdom and the resources of a great nation like our own to give a peace policy a thorough trial."

War has plainly failed. Let us try a policy of peace.

SHALL WE HAVE HONEST ELECTIONS?

THE one point upon which all parties are agreed is that the chief root of the municipal infamy of New York is corrupt elections. The Speaker of the present Assembly, and Mr. SWEENY's friends, and other Democrats, recently declared upon the floor of the House that the registered returns of the vote of every the city were so enormous as to make it doubtful, according to one of the orators, whether the Speaker himself was elected a member of the Assembly. This was a kind of state's evidence that was scarcely needed, but it is useful. The frauds at the polls are the great opportunity. The government is poisoned at the fountain. Now this greatest of crimes under a popular system has equally interested the leaders of every party. But the Democratic papers sneered at the charges of fraud in 1866. The present Governor, Mr. HOFFMAN, declined all suggestions to be a mere party device of the Republicans, and virtually protected the electoral frauds. The conduct of Democrats upon naturalisation was astounding. It was very evident that "the honest Democracy" did not think that the time had come for them to appear.

Do they think that it has now arrived? The frauds are more than ever patent, and are controlled ascendency at the polls of the worst part of the Democratic party. The only conceivable remedy is an honest election, and every man that they will unite to secure pure elections. To do this it is essential that there be a final electoral supervision which is not partisan, and which each party is equally represented. But this can be done only by law, and the Democrats are now the law-makers. Will they secure this purity? Are they in favor of honest elections? Are the honest Democrats, such as, for instance, Mr. CHARLES O'CONOR, with the unrepeated vote of their party in the city of New York? If they are, do they honestly suppose that any such system as that suggested by MR. KERNAN will secure it? That system is substantially the Supervisor system. Has that resulted honestly?

Why does MR. KERNAN's plan propose that there shall be one Republican inspector in every district? Because it is universally allowed that the official presence of some representation of the other party at the voting and in the canvass is essential to a fair election. If that be so, let us take every election and guard it—Federal and State—there goes the Democratic method to secure the result which the Democratic method to secure the result which his professes to desire. Instead of a system which favors what has been called a union of "the Ring and the Radicals," let us agree, as the Citizens' Association proposes, that there be a Board of Judges of Elections, composed equally from both parties, who shall divide the city into districts of not more than two hundred voters each, with competent police for a thousand voters, including name, age, residence, birthplace, personal appearance, and whatever is necessary for identification—there goes the vote from sunrise to noon or one o'clock, and canvass before sunset. Some such system as this is indispensable. It can be altered, improved, or any plan for every purpose may be. But is there then no choice of methods? Is therefore every plan for purpose equally good? Because we can not abolish disease, shall we observe no sanitary laws? No plan to secure pure polls will make voters honest; but some plan will save us from their dishonesty much more surely than others.

If the latent portion of the party which now has the majority in the Legislature really wish to purify the polls in this city, they will adopt some such method as has been indicated. But if they do not—if they merely wish to eat their cake and to have it—if they desire only to give their party the credit of trying to secure honesty while it retains the advantage of fraud, they will refuse to adopt a plan palpably fair and practicable, and prefer one which is not secure. Meanwhile we can spare the balderdash about broken Rings and honesty triumphant until we see some evidence of such honorable facts. A Legislature which refers MR. FREAR's alleged offenses to MR. FREAR's committee for investigation, is hardly to be considered a Legislature in which the power of the Tammany clique is imperiled; and those who expect MR. CAGGER to introduce a bill to destroy the Democratic majority in this neighborhood would be reduced, will probably also expect that Speaker HITCHMAN to advocate a repeal of last year's bill establishing the new Board of Education.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY.

THE most striking and unpleasant point in the long Cuban discussion, upon the part of those who have from the first demanded that belligerent rights should be conceded to the Cubans, is what must be called their unfairness. We are all fond of saying, and, we hope, of thinking, that it is an American instinct to sympathize with any oppressed people striving to break the power of the oppressor. But we hope, also, it is not less an American instinct to be just to our own honest laws, and our own honorable traditions. Yet it is constantly charged that the United States have been neutral to the Cuban struggle, but have favored Spain at the expense of the colony. They denounce the fact that we did not send our fleet to stray the expedition to aid Cuba, while they suffer the Spanish gun-boats to sail. We already in this point last week. We repeat it. It is put forth in the address of the friends of Cuba. It has constantly appeared in the papers that call for investigation. It is one of the unfairest charges that could be made.

And it is so for reasons that we have already stated, but which ought to be constantly and they are understood. Under the law of nations, and under our own law, the war ships of a foreign friendly power may only enter our ports, and contracts may be made for the building of others, even when they are intended for hostilities against a part of the subjects of the power whom we have not yet acknowledged as belligerents. We say, under our own law. But it is sometimes supposed that the law of 1818, forbidding the equipping of ships to be used against "any colony, district, or people" with whom we are at peace, would have detained the gun-boats. But evidently these words do not bear this construction. If to-morrow an insurrection should break out in Kent, it would require the law of 1818 require us to refuse assistance to English ships of war in our ports, unless it should be proved that they were not to be used against that "district," or those "people," with whom our peaceful relations were undisturbed? The words of the law would thus be, if interpreted, are made utterly unmeaning. If the act means to say that no friendly power shall use our ports for equipment against any other friendly power, nor against any other collection of persons engaged in hostilities, but with whom we are not fighting, it leaves them to every power the moment war begins. Obviously this is not the meaning of the law; and, therefore, to say that the United States have not been neutral, because they have obeyed their own laws and treaties, is suspiciously unfair.

The only way in which, under the law of nations and our own law, we could be neutral in the sense demanded is by declaring the belligerency of the Cubans; and that could not be done until we were satisfied that there was a government which could properly maintain the rights of the flag that we should recognize. If, however, this is not considered a course worthy of Americans, who owe their political independence to successful revolution, there is another course. We can announce that the first movement of insurrection against European power upon this continent will be recognized by us with all the rights of belligerency. We may go further. We can declare that the moment any insurrection breaks out any where in the world against a government not republican we will remember our own origin, and the assistance of France, and fly to the rescue.

It seems to be thought by some persons that, after the Cuban troubles had continued for some months, the United States should have said: "The horrible oppression of Cuba by Spain is notorious. The Cubans have asserted their independence, and are trying to maintain it. We are the official organ of revolution. We sympathize with their efforts. Therefore, we concede them belligerent rights, or recognize their independence." The feeling is natural, but the logic. The folly is in taking that international law and precedents and neutrality. It is very well, and may be very noble, for the United States to say to the Cubans, "You have had a hard time under Spain, and you are having a hard struggle to throw her off, and we grant you all belligerent rights." But it would be extremely foolish if the United States should add that they did this upon recognized principles of international law. The principle would be simply, "We choose to do it, and we take the consequences." It is indeed true that every nation decides for itself when to grant the rights of belligerency. But it is none the less true that it does so under certain conditions.

If those conditions now exist in Cuba, let belligerent rights be conceded. Or if we choose to concede them even without the existence of those conditions, let us do that. But don't let us pretend that the conditions do exist if they do not. There are not now and never have been ten men in this country opposed to the recognition of Cuban belligerent rights or of Cuban independence upon grounds that would justify that policy in any other similar struggle. It is the special pleading, the attempted sneaking evasion of our plain law, the plain course that we should do the work of the revolution, the bribe offered to public opinion of inevitable annexation, the assumption that our refusing Cuban belligerence at once was to be in collusion with slaveholders, to lie prostrate at the bloated and bloody feet of Spain, and to be recreant to our own principles and traditions—it is all the flapdoodle and Buncombe that have been lavished upon the discussion of the subject. If they were the sole arguments, which have alienated the confidence and sympathy of the American people, who love liberty more than party, and who would gladly aid in every honorable and lawful way any people any where struggling with oppression.

THE BLESSINGS OF PATRONAGE.

HOW entirely the patronage of the Government is considered for the private purposes of Senators was recently curiously illustrated by a little event in the Senate. The President nominated a Collector of Customs for Tennessee. The Senate was constitutionally and honorably bound not to consider whether he were agreeable to Senator Booth or Jones, but whether he were in character and capacity a proper officer. It appears that it had virtually decided that he was, when Senator PATTERSON of Tennessee claimed the right which the courtesy of the Senate accords to every Senator of resisting the appointment of any person in the place of his residence who is not agreeable to him. The Senate yielded. And thus a person whom the President had decided to nominate, and whom the Senate were willing to approve, was rejected because Senator FOWLER did not like him. Nothing could more clearly, if any proof were needed, that the Senate has quite abdicated its constitutional function of advising the President, than the exercised the patronage for its own advantage.

Some time since a gentleman wrote to a Senator from another State, and asked him, for reasons which he mentioned and which seemed to him conclusive, to support the nomination of a certain other gentleman. The Senator replied that he had no doubt of the merits of the case as presented by his correspondent, but that he should be governed in voting by the Senators from his friend's State. The great principle of mutual tickling was fully comprehended by that Senator.

Another instance was that of a little country post-office, for which, upon the resignation of the incumbent, the neighbors of a certain man recommended a very competent person. There was a mysterious delay, and it presently appeared that a Senator of the State had a candidate for the office. Upon reflecting, however, that if he persisted in thwarting the wishes of the neighborhood he would hardly advance his own interests, the Senator yielded, and the other candidate was appointed.

Our whole civil service system is a vast circumlocution office. Officers are appointed by the favor of certain politicians known only to their own ends, as the nobility placed their dependents and cadets in the government service in England. And the hostility to any reform of the service proceeds, of course, from the class of trading and ambitious politicians. The chief distinction of his office to many a member of Congress is the sense of power derived from his share of the patronage. There are men in high position whose success is explained wholly by a skillful use of patronage, and not in the least by any intellectual capacity or moral power. It is a strong side-light upon our system. It shows that an election by no means necessarily represents the choice of the people, but the shrewd management of certain leaders. The people cast the spring stains the stream. Whoever controls the caucus writes the ballots at the polls.

Of this practical view of popular government nothing is a surer ally than our present civil service system. Patronage is administered almost entirely for personal objects. "I have no effect to his prejudice; but it is expected that he will not attempt to influence the votes of others, nor to take any part in the business of electioneering—that being deemed inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution and his duties to it." Those are the words in which the greatest party leaders who have ever lived in the country. But we have changed all that. The very indictment of votes and the vehement electioneering which JEFFERSON condemned are the conditions of appointment under a system of patronage.

"THE HISTORY OF TEN YEARS."

It is just ten years ago that JEFFERSON DAVIS, then a Senator from Mississippi, proposed in the Senate a series of resolutions which were passed by a strict party vote of the Democratic majority in that body, excepting Mr. PUGH of Ohio. The resolutions were elaborately and ingeniously drawn. Their intention was, first, to brand Mr. DOUGLAS'S squatter sovereignty as a party heresy; and second, to nationalize human slavery. The Democratic majority was thereby ruled by Mr. DAVIS and his friends, did not hesitate. One Senator ventured to move that it was not meant that Congress should provide a complete system of laws for slavery. But Mr. DAVIS looked at him, and the poor Senator—it was Mr. CLINGMAN—had the supporting Democratic vote but the same Mr. PUGH. So vast was the crime against human nature and American liberty proclaimed by the Democratic party.

A year from that time, on the 21st of January, 1861, JEFFERSON DAVIS, still a Senator and his conspiracy being ripe, gravely argued, in the highest legislative body of this government, the right of a few citizens, at their pleasure, to destroy a nation; in the Senate that grew out of the Declaration of Independence asserted that the Declaration was alleged that all men were created equal, meant some men; and after a little rhetoric about solemn separation, departed to do his part to destroy the American Union, and perpetuate African slavery upon the American continent. At the end of nine months the American Union is unpregnable; African slavery is abolished; and a Senator from Mississippi rises in the place of JEFFERSON DAVIS to address the people, and that Senator, intelligent and self-possessed, is one of the enslaved race.

No wonder that a paper which represents the ridiculous theory that the glory of the country departed when JEFFERSON DAVIS and his accomplices left the Capitol and ceased to address speech (see the New York World): "To-day's session of the Senate was signalized..... by the first speech ever delivered by the black descendant of an orang-outang in Congress....." During the morning hour..... REVELS himself sat at his desk, tranquilly gazing at his white vis-ge and beard with hands resembling claws, and eying the assemblage aloft with a greasy and complacent smile. In the Middle Ages the Senate sat to-day SUMNER, WILSON, and the other Radicals who helped to bring on a bloodier revolution than the French, still on a par with the vindictive spirit of the conflict and its issues that it seemed to them a fine thing to foist this African into their equality with themselves and their betters, among American statesmen to raise this mulatto idol, stuffed with vapid argumentation and sentimental logic." It is the very comedy of impotent hate.

THE MINISTER TO SPAIN.

THE Republican Senate of the United States, which did not think Attorney-General HOAR to be a proper person for an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, believes General SICKLES to be a proper person to present to Europe, at the side of LOTHROP MOTLEY, JOHN JAY, GEORGE P. MARSH, ELIHU B. WASHBURNE, and GEORGE BANCROFT, on whom he will seem to delight to honor. We have steadily protested against this serious WRONG, this fatal blunder, and we shall not suffer its consummation to pass unobserved. The Republican party is strong in its party character. No one knows this better than the chairman of the Foreign Committee of the Senate; and when Mr. SUMNER gives his name to this appointment he deals himself and his party a blow a hundredfold more injurious than that party received from the votes against the confirmation of ANDREW JOHNSON. Moral influences are secret and silent, but they are sure; and the power of every Republican Senator who voted for this appointment is henceforth diminished.

We protest against the shameless sophistry which has been the staple of the Republican support of this appointment. The duty of the Republican press every where in the country is now to have what would have been said that he had made a serious mistake, and by the energy and unanimity of its expression to have caused the withdrawal of the nomination. The press treated it merely as a party matter, and the Senate, seeing no vehement opposition, has at last, as a party matter, confirmed it.

General SICKLES is not an old man, and should his name be hereafter offered to the national party councils, or to the people, every objection would be triumphantly overruled by the assertion that the Senate of the United States, upon the recommendation of GRANT, had declared him to be a fit recipient of the most conspicuous national honors.

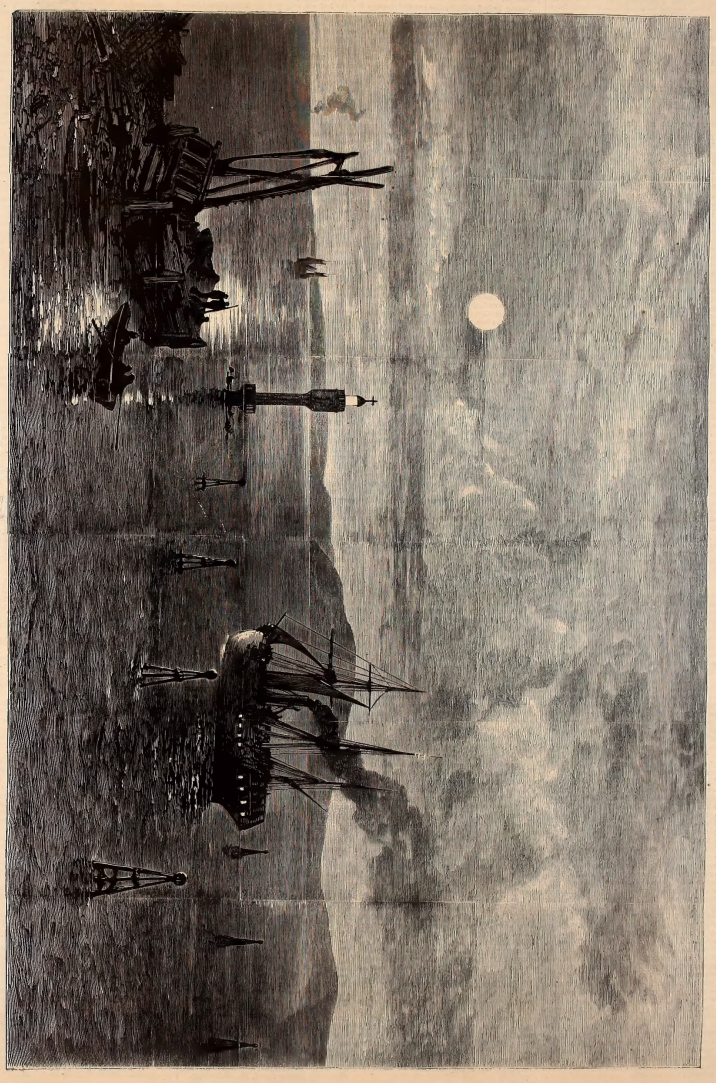
MORE LIGHT.

THE Hon. W. D. KELLEY, who has most faithfully and ably represented the leading district for five terms, naturally wished to withdraw, but has received a letter signed by thousands of his constituents, and by many of the chief citizens of Philadelphia, asking him to consent to serve again. In his admirable reply Mr. KELLEY agrees to consider reasonable, my constituents, and to a considerable extent the public mind, the duty of a representative to the duties of a Representative the impossible one of finding places for all the gentlemen who have claims known to them, and promotion for all ambitious or meritorious employés of the government. There was much of this during the war; but the government then needed the service of every able-bodied man to some department, and it was quite reasonable that one might serve it and the appetient both, by giving him a note to the head of a department. But, as that is not the case now, and the practice of sending personally to Washington for appointment to employment has become so common as to be insufferable, Mr. KELLEY proposes to test the question. He will, in case

THE REMORSE OF JUDAS.—[FROM A PAINTING BY E. ARMITAGE, A.R.A.]

THE REMORSE OF JUDAS.

OUR engraving on this page is taken from a painting by Mr. E. ARMITAGE, A.R.A., an English artist of high reputation. It is founded on the following passage from the Gospel of St. Matthew (chap. xxvii., vers. 3, 4): "Then JUDAS which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, saying, I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. And they said, What is that to us? see thou to that." In the original picture the figures are considerably above life-size, and the subject is treated with intense dramatic force, and the power of modelling, chiar-oscuro, and color for which Mr. ARMITAGE holds very high rank among modern English artists. The introduction of a vulture—bird of ill omen—is the most faulty point in the picture.



THE BITTER LAKES, SUEZ CANAL.—[See Page 215.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SECOND.

SEEDS OF THE FUTURE (SECOND SOWING).

AND what did the visitors say of the Swans?

They said, "Oh, what a number of them!"—which was all that was to be said by persons ignorant of the natural history of aquatic birds.

And what did the visitors say of the lake?

Some of them said, "How solemn!" Some of them said, "How romantic!" Some of them said nothing—but privately thought it a dismal scene.

Here again the popular sentiment struck the right note at once. The lake was hidden in the centre of a fir wood. Except in the middle, where the sunlight reached them, the waters lay black under the sombre shadow of the trees. The one break in the plantation was at the farther end of the lake. The one sign of movement and life to be seen was the ghostly gliding of the swans on the dead-still surface of the water. A solemn scene—as they said; it was romantic—as they said. It was dismal—as they thought. Pages of description could produce no more. Let pages of description be absent, therefore, in this place.

Having satiated itself with the swans, having exhausted the lake, the general curiosity reverted to the boat on the trees at the farther end—remarked a startlingly-artificial object, intruding itself on the scene, in the shape of a large red curtain, hanging between two of the tallest firs, and closed the prospect beyond from view—repeated an explanation of the motive which Julius Delamayn—and received for answer that the mystery should be revealed on the return of the visitors to the lawn—remainder of the guests who had loitered about the house.

On the appearance of Mrs. Delamayn and the stragglers, the united party constat the shore of the lake, and stood assembled in front of the curtain. Pointing to the silken screen, the latest elder side of it, Julius Delamayn picked out two little gold ribbons of his well-fitting vest, and sent them to the cords, with instructions to pull, and see what happened. The nieces of Julius pulled with the eager hands of children in the presence of a mystery—the curtains parted in the middle, and a general universal sentiment and delight saluted the scene revealed to view.

At the end of a broad avenue of firs a cool green glade opened its grassy expanse in the midst of the surrounding plantation. The ground at the farther end of the glade rose in terraces, with lower slopes, a bright little spring of water bubbled out between gray old granite rocks. Along the high-land edge of the turf ran a row of tables, arrayed in spotless white, and covered with refreshments waiting for the arrival. On the opposite side was a band of music, which burst into harmony at the moment when the curtains were drawn. Looking back through the avenue, the eye caught a distant glimpse of the lake, where the sunlight played on the water, and the plumage of the gliding swans flashed softly in brilliant white. Such was the charming surprise which Julius Delamayn had arranged for his friends.

The band played. The guests moved about in groups, or sat down in chairs placed in the shade of the trees. The two nieces of Julius Delamayn—young ladies of fifteen and sixteen—had the honor of serving the refreshments. Mrs. Delamayn and Mrs. Glenarm—the two married sisters—were left to entertain the host. And here, on the other, is Mrs. Glenarm—a young widow. Jet as the side of the carriage, she sits, in her glossy mass of the young widow. And both mysteriously absent at the same time. Is it not the best opportunity for Mr. Dale, mayn't I guess wrong, if I guessed that you will have a marriage in the family, too, before long?

Mrs. Delamayn looked a little annoyed. She was accustomed to be consulted on every delicacy for making a match between Geoffrey and Mrs. Glenarm. But she was not prepared for Julius. The lady's fruitful in this line of all attempts to conceal it from discovery) made the conspicuous discovery that Julius was "in love."

"I am not in the secrets of the lady and gentleman whom you mention," she replied, dryly.

"Ah, I see! You're sly on your appointments, and slow to abandon movement, when once accomplished," Julius continued to remark, being essentially heavy, followed the same rule. She still persisted in being as lively as ever.

"Oh, what a charming evening!" exclaimed her ladyship. "I think I can interpret it, though. At all events, a little bird has told me that one is Mrs. Geoffrey Delamayn in London, next season. And I, for one, shall not be surprised to hear of approaching Mrs. Glenarm."

"If you persist in letting your imagination run away with you," said Julius, "I really can't help it. I can only request permission to keep the bridle on mine."

This time, Lady Lundie understood that it would be wise to say no more. She smiled and nodded, in token of her appreciation of Julius's extraordinary cleverness. If she had been asked at that moment who was the most brilliant Englishwoman living, she would have answered, Herself on herself—and would have seen, as in a glass brightly, Lady Lundie, in her Sphynxes.

From the moment when the talk in her side interest on the subject of Geoffrey Delamayn and Mrs. Glenarm commenced, to the end of the refreshing which it remained occupied with that topic—Blanche became conscious of a strong sense of some injurious figure, vaguely down on her, as she fancied, from behind and from above. The figure was Mrs. Delamayn's mother-in-law. She looked round to see whether any special manifestations of grief was proceeding inexplicably at the back of her chair. The result proved to be none. In her head, her attention was claimed by a pair of tremulous gloves, with fingers like long fat green pie, profusely sprinkled with fruffles.

"Eh, my bonny Miss!" whispered a persuasive voice at her ear, "you're staiving in a hot house. Eh? Tak' my advice, and ye'll tak' the best thing at tabble—grosee-pye, and fruffle-lers."

Blanche looked up.

There he was in the man of the canny eye, the fatherly manner, and the mighty nose—Bishopsgrass—engaged in service and ministering at the festival at Swanhaven Lodge!

Blanche had only seen him for a moment on the memorable night when she arrived, and was surprised Anne at the inn. But instants passed in the hotel-yard by Sir Patrick's carriage and hours spent in the company of inferior men. Blanche instantly recognized him; instantly decided to make Sarah's conviction that he was in possession of Anne's lost letter; instantly rushed to the conclusion that, in discovering Bishopsrigs, she had discovered a chance of tracing Anne. Her first impulse was to claim acquaintance with him on the spot. But the eyes of her neighbors were on her, warning her to wait. She took a bite of the pie, and looked hard at Bishopsrigs. That discreet man, showing no sign of recognition on his side, bowed respectfully, and went on round the table.

"I wonder whether he has got the letter about him?" thought Blanche.

He had not only got the letter about him—but, more than that, he was actually then on the look-out for the means of turning the letter to profitable pecuniary account.

The temporary establishment of Swanhaven Lodge included no formidable army of servants. When Mrs. Delamayn gave a large party, she suspended for each additional assistance as was needful partly on the contributions of her friends, partly on the resources of the principal inn at Kirkandrew. Mr. Bishopsrigs, serving at the latter (in the absence of any town employment), as a supernumerary at the inn, made one among the waiters who could be spared to assist at the garden-party. In the case of the gentleman by whom he was to be employed for the day had struck him, when he first heard it, as having a promising air. He had made his inquiries; and had then betaken himself, for additional information, to the person who he had picked out from the parlor floor at Craig Ferine.

The sheet of note-paper, lost by Anne, contained, Mr. Bishopsrigs discovered, two letters—one signed by herself; the other signed by Geoffrey Delamayn, referring, to a stranger's eye, of relations between the writers which they were interested in concealing from the public world.

Thinking it just possible that Mr. Dale might care well open at Swanhaven—that he might improve his interest with a marketable commodity of the stolen correspondence, Mr. Bishopsrigs had put the letter in his pocket when he left Craig Ferine. He had recognized Blanche, as a friend of the lady at the inn—and as a person who might perhaps be willing to open on that capacity. And he had, moreover, heard every word of the conversation between Lady Lundie and Mrs. Glenarm on the subject of Geoffrey and Mrs. Glenarm. There were hours to be passed before the guests would retire, and Blanche would be disengaged. The conviction was strong in the mind of Mr. Bishopsrigs that he would find an opportunity yet for compelling him himself on the chance which had associated him with the festivities of Swanhaven Lodge.

It was early in the afternoon when the gayety at the dinner-table began, in certain quarters, to show signs of flagging.

The younger members of the party—especially the ladies—grew restless with the appearance of the table-cloth. One after another they looked longingly at the smooth level of elastic turf in the middle of the glade. One after another they cast stealthy looks with their fingers to the waltz which the musicians happened to be playing at the moment. Noticing these symptoms, Julius Delamayn set the example of rising; and he was followed, in a few minutes more, by ten minutes more the first quadrille was in progress on the grass; the spectators were picturesquely grouped about the dancing ones; and the servants and waiters, no longer wanted, had retired out of sight, to a distance of their own.

The last person to leave the deserted tables was the venerable Bishopsrigs. He alone, of the men in attendance, had continued to command the confident appearance of waiting on the company with a clandestine attention to his personal interests. Instead of hurrying away to the servants' dinner with the rest, he made the round of the tables, quietly clearing away the cold dishes—actually, emptying the wine-glasses. Immersed in this occupation, he was startled by a lady's voice behind him, and, turning as quickly as he could, found himself face to face with Miss Lundie.

"I want some cold water," said Blanche. "Be so good as to get me some from the spring."

She pointed to the babbling rivulet at the farther end of the glade.

Bishopsrigs looked unaffectedly shocked.

"Lord's sake, miss," he exclaimed, "d'ye reely mean to offer your stomach wi' cauld water when there's wine to be had for the asking?"

Blanche gave him a look. Skewdom's perception was not on the list of the failings of Bishopsrigs. He took up a tumbler, winked with his eye, and departed, and left the lady to the rivulet. There was nothing remarkable in the spectacle of a young lady fetching water from the spring-water—or of a waiter who was getting it for her. Nobody was surprised; and (with the usual playing cards) he could by no possibility hear what might be said at the spring-side.

"Do you remember me at the inn on the night of the storm?" said Blanche.

Mr. Bishopsrigs had his reasons (carefully inclosed in his pocket-book) for not being disposed to commit himself with Blanche at starting.

"I'm no' saying I canna remember ye, miss. What's the matter, mon? mak' sic an answer as that to a bonny young lady like ye!"

By way of assisting his memory Blanche took out her purse. Bishopsrigs became absorbed in the scenery. He looked at the running water of the glade—of a man who thoroughly appreciated it, viewed as a beverage.

"There is a gold seal, addressing himself to the rivulet, "bubbin' to yer sin anihilation in the loch yonder! It's little I know that's gude about ye, in a professional point o' view. Ye're no' human life, they say. I tak' up my testimony against that. Ye're no' Bishopsrigs's gude. Ye're heated wi' fire, and sweetened wi' sugar, and strengthened wi' whisky; and then ye're a drop o' gude—and human life's a' green! Is ye got something to say to ye in that capacity?"

"I have heard more about you, since I was at the inn," proceeded Blanche, "than you may suppose." (She opened her purse: Mr. Bishopsrigs became the picture of attention.) "You were very, very kind to a lady who was staying at Craig Ferine. You went on, yesterday, to know that you have lost your place at the inn, because you gave all your attention to that lady. She is my dearest friend, Mr. Bishopsrigs. I want to thank you. I do thank you. Please accept what I have got here!"

All the gold's heart was in her eyes and in her voice as she emptied her purse into the gouty (and greedy) old hand of Bishopsrigs.

A young lady with a well-filled purse (no matter how rich the young lady may be) is a combination not often witnessed in any country on the face of the earth. Whether the money be always spent, or the money has been, forgotten on the toilet-table, the young lady's purse contained a sovereign and some six or seven shillings in silver. As pocket-money for an heiress it was contemptible. But as a present to Bishopsrigs it was magnificent. The old rascal put the money into his pocket with a long look, and closed away his senses of sensibility, which he had not shed, with the other.

"Ye got bread on the waters," cried Mr. Bishopsrigs, with his one eye raised devotionally to the sky, "and ye shall find it again devisedly to the sky, "and ye shall find it again deviously to the sky, "and ye shall find it again deviously to the sky, "and ye shall find it again deviously

There's a chiel wi' a lang head on his shoulders, if ever there was one yet! What might Sir Patrick's lad said?"

Blanche noticed a change in his tone. Blanche was rigidly careful (when it was too late) to answer him in guarded terms.

"Sir Patrick thought you might have found me better," she said, "and might also have remembered about it again until after you had left the inn."

Bishopriggs looked back into his own personal experience of his old master—and drew the correct conclusion that Sir Patrick's memory of his connection with the disappearance of the letter was not the purely unsuspicious view reported by Blanche. "The dear auld deevil," he thought to himself, "knows me better than that!"

"Well?" asked Blanche, impatiently. "Is Sir Patrick right?"

"Richt?" rejoined Bishopriggs, briskly. "He's far away from the truth—as John o' Groat's House is from Jericho."

"You know nothing of the letter?"

"Deil a bit I know o' the letter. The first I ha' heard o' it is what I hear noo."

Blanche's heart sank within her. Had she defeated her own object, and cut the ground from under Sir Patrick's feet, for the second time? Surely not! There was unquestionably a chance, on this occasion, that the man might be prevailed upon to place the trust in her which he was too cautious to confide to a stranger like herself. The one wise thing to do now was to save the way for the second visit of Sir Patrick's agent with influence, and Sir Patrick's superior skill. She resumed the conversation with that object in view.

"I am sorry to hear that Sir Patrick has guessed wrong," she resumed. "My friend was anxious to recover the letter when I left town, and I hoped to hear news of it from you. However, right or wrong, Sir Patrick has some reasons for wishing to see you—and I take the opportunity of telling you so. He has left a letter to wait for you at the Craig Ellachie inn."

"I'm thinking the letter will ha' lang enough to wait, if it was till I gae back for it to the hottle," remarked Bishopriggs.

"In that case," said Blanche, promptly, "you had better give me an address at which Sir Patrick can write to you. You wouldn't, I suppose, wish me to say that I had seen you here, and that you refused to communicate with Sir Patrick?"

"Never think it!" cried Bishopriggs, fervently. "If there's ain thing that mair mischief than I'm careful to preserve intact, it's joost the respectful attention that I owe to Sir Patrick. I'll mak' my bield, min, as he conseeders best at that bit stand. I'm no' seetled in ony place yet ('cause the gift o' the time o' life's to Sir Patrick may hear o' me, when Sir Patrick hir sees' o' me, there." He handed a dirty little card to Blanche containing the name and address of a butcher in Edinburgh. "Sawmuel Bishopriggs," he went on, glibly. "Ane o' Slevin's Devie Dow, flesher; Cowgate; Embro. My Fatmos ist hir condeemess, miss, for the time being."

Blanche received the address with a sense of unspeakable relief. If she had once more ventured on advising Sir Patrick's place, and once more failed in justifying her motives to his satisfaction, she had at least gained some strong advantages, after all, by opening a means of communication between her uncle and Bishopriggs. "You will hear from Sir Patrick," she said, and nodded kindly, and returned to the company with the guests.

"I'm sent for Sir Patrick, wull I?" repeated Bishopriggs, when he was left by himself. "Sir Patrick will wark naething less than a meesrable he finds Sawmuel Bishopriggs at Slevin's Cowgate, Embro!"

He laughed softly over his own cleverness, and withdrew to a lonely place in the plantation, in which he could consult the stolen correspondence without fear of being observed by any living creature. Once more the truth had tried to struggle into light, but the day of the mastrings, and once more Blanche had innocently helped the darkness to keep it from view.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-THIRD.

SEEDS OF THE FUTURE (WEIRD SOWING).

After a new and attentive reading of Anne's letter to Geoffrey, and of Geoffrey's letter to Anne, Bishopriggs laid down comfortably under a tree, and left behind the task of setting his opinion plainly as it was at that moment.

The profitable plunder of the correspondence to Blanche was no longer among the possibilities involved in the case. As for treating with Sir Patrick, Bishopriggs determined to keep equally clear of the Cowgate, Edinburgh, and of Mrs. Inchbare's inn. As long as there was the faintest chance of his pushing his own interests in any other quarter. No person living would be capable of so seriously estranging his employer from him, on such ridiculously cheap terms, as his old master. "I'll no' put myself under Sir Patrick's thumb," thought Bishopriggs, "if I'ye ane my ain rounds among the lave o' them first."

Rendered into intelligible English, this resolution pledged him still to communication with Sir Patrick—until he had first visited his accuser in negotiating with other persons, who might be equally interested in getting possession of the correspondence, and more liberal in giving hush-money to the thief who had stolen it.

Who were the "other persons" at his disposal, under these circumstances?

He had only to recall the conversation which he had overheard between Lady Lundie and Mrs. Delamayn to arrive at the discovery of one person, to begin with, who was extremely interested in getting possession of his own letter. Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn was in the habit of being married to a lady named Mrs. Glenarm. And here was this same Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn in matrimonial correspondence, little more than a fortnight since, with another lady—who signed herself "Anne Silvester."

Whatever his position between the two women might be, his interest in possessing himself of the correspondence was plain beyond all doubt. It was equally clear that the first thing to be done by Bishopriggs was to find the means of opening a personal interview with him. The interview led to something else, it would decide one important question which still remained to be settled. The lady whom Bishopriggs had waited on at Craig Ellachie might, will be, "Anne Silvester." Was Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn, in that case, the gentleman who had passed as her husband at the inn?

Bishopriggs rose to his gouty feet with all possible alacrity, and hobbled away to make the necessary inquiries, addressing himself, not to the gentlemen at the dinner-table, who would be sure to insist on his joining them, but to the women-servants left in charge of the empty house.

He easily obtained the necessary directions for finding the cottage. But he was warned that Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn's trainer allowed nobody to see his patron at exercise, and that he would certainly be ordered off again the moment he appeared on the scene.

Bearing this caution in mind, Bishopriggs made a circuit, on reaching the open ground, so as to approach the cottage as far as possible from the line of the tree behind it. One look at Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn was all that he wanted in the first instance. They were welcome to order him off again, as long as he obtained that.

He was still hesitating at the outer line of the trees, when he heard a loud, imperative voice, calling from within the cottage, "Now, Mr. Geoffrey! Time's up!" Another voice answered, "All right!" and, after an interval, Geoffrey Delamayn appeared on the scene, immediately proceeding to the point from which he was accustomed to walk his race-course.

Advancing a few steps to look at his man more closely, Bishopriggs was instantly detected by the trainer—who called out, "Now, Geoffrey! Parry, 'what do you want here?' Bishopriggs opened his lips to make an excuse. "Who the devil are you?" roared Geoffrey. Bishopriggs answered the question out of the resources of his own experience. "I'm Sir Sylvester's agent," he said, pointedly.

Geoffrey lifted his mighty fist, and sprang forward a step. Parry held his patron back. "No, no! Let me!" he said. "The man's too old. No fear of his turning up again, when I've spoken to him." Mr. Parry's statement was strictly true. The terror of Bishopriggs at the sight of Geoffrey's fist restored to the first by the activity of his youth, was the best time for twenty years; and only stopped to remember his dignity and his gout when his breath, when he was out of sight of the cottage, among the trees.

He sat down to rest and recover himself, with the comforting inner conviction that, in one respect at least, he had gained his point. The furious savage, with the eyes that darted fire, and the fist that threatened destruction, was a total stranger to him. In other words, he was not the man who had passed as the lady's husband at the inn.

As the question now it was equally certain that he was the man invited by the correspondence which Bishopriggs possessed. The husband—if a husband existed—who received the letter was entirely incompatible (after the characteristic reception of his fist) with the strong regard which Bishopriggs felt for his own personal security. There was no alternative now but to open negotiations with the lady who was more concerned in the matter (fortunately, on this occasion, a person of the gentler sex), who was sensibly within reach. Mrs. Glenarm was at Knowstonbaven. She had a direct interest in clearing up the question of a wife's empire over her husband. Delamayn on the part of another woman. And she could only do that by getting the correspondence into her own hands.

"Praise Providence for a' its mercies!" said Bishopriggs, getting on his feet once more. "

THE MISSING STEAMER.—[See First Page.]

GOING ALOFT.—[SEE PAGE 221.]

LAST HEART-BEATS.

Save me—but a rose-leaf—yet a token
To tell me what your life kept unspoken,
That you are sorry that my heart is broken,
Before I die.

For soon your silence will no more perplex me,
And soon your coldness will have ceased to vex me,
Although I cling unto the rock that wrecks me
Until I die.

And presently my hand will cease its grasping,
And presently my breath will cease its gasping,
And I shall sink beyond your tardy clasping,
For I shall die.

Ah! you have left me, who would never leave you,
And you have taken me, who did never grieve you
But I—at least, at least, I love you
Before I die.

HOWARD GLYNDON.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book V.

CHAPTER III.

MRS. FLEW.

"An illustrious house, Sir!" the vicar was saying, as Maud entered. "A family renowned in the history of their country. My wife was a scion of a subordinate stock than many landless squires and squiresses who patronized and looked down upon the vicar's lady!"

Mr. Flew was unusually with his hat in one hand and his umbrella in the other, beside the fire-place, and evidently in the vicar's chair. Maud had already seen him several times; but looking at him now, with the governess's words ringing in her ears, her opinion was not to be altered. There was the impress of care and suffering on his pale face. Mr. Flew was, on the whole, a rather ridiculous-looking little man. His insignificant features and light blue eyes were by no means prepossessing, and were quite common. He had, too, a provincial twang in his speech, and his tones were rather coarse and loud, and certain mastery over the letter h. Nevertheless, more intrinsically ignoble individuals than Benjamin Flew have been placed in less onerous position of fatness both in fact and fiction.

"How do you do, Miss Beaufoy?" was all he said.

Maud gave him her hand. His was ungloved, and its touch was cold as ice. The vicar had abruptly ceased speaking when Maud came into the room. But after a short pause he resumed what he had been saying, with a coarser and less show of not having been in the least disconcerted by her entrance.

"The last Lord Lovel—the late baronet have thrown themselves entirely willing to receive her with every respect. Sir Michael seems quite fond of her, and so forth. But she will have no need of people of that stamp. 'The prince's position is in all respects very different to that of us mere nervens."

Mr. Flew stood bravely to listen, though with a dolorous visage. Maud was silent. The vicar's tone pained her inexpressibly. It was overbearing, triumphant, and yet, somehow, not like the tone of a man who is contradicting his better self.

"If," said Mr. Flew, without raising his eyes from the ground—"if Miss Le—if Veronica is happy and contented, and has put right with the world, we shall all have reason to be truly thankful. She must have gone through a great deal of suffering."

"She gone through a great deal of suffering!" cried the vicar, with a strident note of mood. "And what do you suppose her suffering has been to compare with mine, Sir? We shall all have reason to be thankful if Miss Le—Veronica that no one can associate himself with my feelings in this matter; no one! I do not think can put his feelings in comparison with mine!"

Maud glanced up quickly at Mr. Flew, fearing that he might resent this insult; but he had soon showed neither surprise nor anger. He passed his hand over his face once or twice, and forehead like a man in pain, but he said no word. The vicar proceeded for some time in the same strain. His daughter was ever ungrateful to him as he had suffered? He, a gentleman by birth, and breeding—a man of extraordinary talent—he blemished honor! Had not his life, passed among stupid peasants and uncultivated country squires, been cheery enough all these years, but for misery and disgrace must come to crush him utterly? Maud was speaking, and discerned his mood measure. Mr. Flew remained passive. Presently the vicar, who had been walking about the room, stopped suddenly before Maud, and, self into a chair, he covered his eyes with his hands.

Then Mr. Flew turned to Maud, and said, "Miss Desmond, I am glad you came in before I went away, for I should like to say to you, to have a message to deliver to you from my mother."

He spoke quite quietly, only his face betrayed the agitation and pain which the vicar's tirade had caused him.

"A message from Mrs. Flew? What is it?" said Maud, trying to echo his calm tone.

"My mother hopes you will excuse the liberty she takes in asking you, but she is almost entirely unable to go out now. Very often she can't get as far as the church for weeks together. As she can not go to see you, will you come to see her, Miss Desmond? It will be a charitable action."

"Surely I will, if she wishes it."

"She does wish it. Poor soul! she has not many pleasures, and makes, of course, no new friends. The sight of your kind face would do her good."

"When shall I come?"

"Would you drink tea with her this evening? I will see you safe home."

"I don't know whether—" Maud was beginning hesitatingly, when the vicar interposed.

"Go, go, Maudie," he said. "I see that you are hesitating on my account. But I would rather that you went, my child. I shall be busy this evening."

Thus urged, Maud consented, promising to be at Mr. Flew's cottage by six o'clock. And then the surgeon took his leave. Maud was surprised to see the vicar shake hands with him, and bid him, as usually, an unceremonious and rather harsh or unpleasant word had passed his lips. But as she walked to Mr. Flew's cottage that evening with Joanna, Maud learned from the lips of the old servant that it was no new thing for her gentleman to be "mortal civil" to "master" with Mr. Flew.

"Lord bless you, Miss Maudie, don't I know, now? I see it all, think ye? I'm old enough to be your grandmother, Miss Maudie, my dear. And you mark my words, that little man, for all his soft ways, and bein' in some respects but a poor creeter, he's gone through a deal for the sake of his own troubles, has Mr. Flew, Miss, and it isn't for me to say any thing about them. But I do declare he never saw any mortal man talk with another as he bears with the vicar, except it was a woman, of course, you know, Miss Maudie. A woman'll do as much for them as she's fond of. But to see his patience, and the way he goes through with his ministering between his sick folk could spare him, and talk, or be talked to, and never say a word about himself, but go on helping the vicar with his work in the worst used and hatefu' put upon mortal in the world—which I'm sure you must have seen with half a mind of pride in it, if you can make that out, Miss Maudie. Lord bless you, my dear, it was all to be seen, and like a wonder. For a man in general won't have the sense to pretend a bit, you see, if he loves a body."

Mrs. Flew received Maud with many demonstrations of gratification at her visit, and many apologies for leaving her alone. She was propped round a deal evening with a lonely old woman. But Mrs. Flew's guest was not a person, mild-eyed, fair, and small. She was somewhat of an invalid, and sat all day long, sewing or knitting, in her big chair, and seemed to have spent eye over the household operations of the little orphan from the work-house, who was her slave and drudge. She went to church twice, and frill framing her face all round, and a "front" of false hair, and was very particular about her cap, both in color and texture, as the outside fibres of a cocoa-nut. Maud could scarcely repress a smile as she looked at Mrs. Flew's head-gear her, and recalled Miss Turtle's grandiloquent comparison. Mrs. Flew received Maud with a kind home for tea. His portion of home-made cake, and a small pot of strawberry-jam, were got ready for him on a table by himself, and covered with a snow-white cloth. The little servant was instructed to wait on Maud on the grand; but to that when her master should return a cup of hot, fragrant tea should be prepared for him without delay.

"There," said Mrs. Flew, contemplating these arrangements, "I do like to see things tidy. It takes strawberry-jam better than any thing you could give him. I always have some in the house."

Maud felt that it was somehow right and characteristic that Mrs. Flew should have kept strawberry jam, although she would have been puzzled to say why. Then the old woman sat down with a great sigh of satisfaction, and, folding her hands, and began to talk. Her talk was all of her son. "Poor Benjy" was the theme she thought furnished an inexhaustible source of interest to her life.

"Ah, I wish I'd known more of you in days past, Miss Desmond, love," which Mrs. Flew invariably pronounced leave. "Well, well, bygones will be bygones, and talking mournful don't. Mrs. Flew passed, heaved a deep sigh, and proceeded.

"To-day Benjy went to the vicarage to ask you here, and, when he came back, I saw in his face that matter had been ill. Has he been in the wrong wrong at Shipley Vicarage, Benjy? I said, Mrs. Mother, love, for I'm a bit free with him. With that he went up stairs into his own room. I heard his step on the boards overhead; and then I looked and saw a light in the window. Soon after that he came down and stood, with his hat in his hands, as if he was at the door of the parlor. And he said, 'There's good news for Mr. Lavincourt, mother. And then he told me—what I have no need to tell you, Miss, for you know it already. And as soon as he'd told it he went out. And he came home for his dinner, but for all he kept his face in shadow, and spoke quite cheerful, I could see that he'd—he'd been touching here. He had been sad love"

"Oh, Mrs. Flew!"

"Ay, it is dreadful to think of a grown man crying, my dear. But it was so. Though I never set up to be a clever woman, there's no need to stirp a man's heart to know what ails him. If ever you're a mother yourself, you'll understand that, my dear. But I was not mistaken after he was gone. And I thought to myself, 'well now this one thing is certain: she's far and away out of his mind. And I grieved for him, now, perhaps, that things have turned out so, that there's no need for any one to fret and pine about what's to become of her, it may be that Benjy will put his mind at rest, and pluck up a spirit, and think of doing what I've so long wanted him to do."

Maud knew not what to say. She felt ashamed for Veronica before this man's mother, as she had not yet felt ashamed for her. At length she faltered out, "What is it you wish your son to do, Mrs. Flew?"

"Why, to marry, my dear young lady: I don't one of those mothers that wants their children to care for nobody but them. It isn't natural nor right. If my Benjy could but have a good wife, to take care of him when I am gone, I should be quite happy."

The recollection of Miss Turtle came into Maud's mind, and she said, impulsively (thinking violently that the woman had spoken out), "I saw Mrs. Meggitt's governess this afternoon."

Mrs. Flew had put on her spectacles to see her knitting, and she glanced over them at Maud with her pale blue eyes, half surprised, half displeased.

"To be sure: Miss Turtle. She's a very good young woman, is Miss Turtle. I'm sure she has been very kind and attentive to me, and we don't make any bones about it. For a young person won't have the sense to pretend a bit, you see, my dear."

Mrs. Flew received Maud with many demonstrations of gratification at her visit, and many apologies for leaving her alone. The vicar had spared a deal evening with a lonely old woman. But Mrs. Flew's guest was not a person, mild-eyed, fair, and small. She was somewhat of an invalid, and sat all day long, sewing or knitting, in her big chair, and seemed to have spent eye over the household operations of the little orphan from the work-house, who was her slave and drudge. She went to church twice, and frill framing her face all round, and a "front" of false hair, and was very particular about her cap, both in color and texture, as the outside fibres of a cocoa-nut. Maud could scarcely repress a smile as she looked at Mrs. Flew's head-gear her, and recalled Miss Turtle's grandiloquent comparison. Mrs. Flew received Maud with a kind home for tea. His portion of home-made cake, and a small pot of strawberry-jam, were got ready for him on a table by himself, and covered with a snow-white cloth. The little servant was instructed to wait on Maud on the grand; but to that when her master should return a cup of hot, fragrant tea should be prepared for him without delay.

"There," said Mrs. Flew, contemplating these arrangements, "I do like to see things tidy. It takes strawberry-jam better than any thing you could give him. I always have some in the house."

Maud felt that it was somehow right and characteristic that Mrs. Flew should have kept strawberry jam, although she would have been puzzled to say why. Then the old woman sat down with a great sigh of satisfaction, and, folding her hands, and began to talk. Her talk was all of her son. "Poor Benjy" was the theme she thought furnished an inexhaustible source of interest to her life.

"Ah, I wish I'd known more of you in days past, Miss Desmond, love," which Mrs. Flew invariably pronounced leave. "Well, well, bygones will be bygones, and talking mournful don't. Mrs. Flew passed, heaved a deep sigh, and proceeded.

"To-day Benjy went to the vicarage to ask you here, and, when he came back, I saw in his face that matter had been ill. Has he been in the wrong wrong at Shipley Vicarage, Benjy? I said, Mrs. Mother, love, for I'm a bit free with him. With that he went up stairs into his own room. I heard his step on the boards overhead; and then I looked and saw a light in the window. Soon after that he came down and stood, with his hat in his hands, as if he was at the door of the parlor. And he said, 'There's good news for Mr. Lavincourt, mother. And then he told me—what I have no need to tell you, Miss, for you know it already. And as soon as he'd told it he went out. And he came home for his dinner, but for all he kept his face in shadow, and spoke quite cheerful, I could see that he'd—he'd been touching here. He had been sad love"

"Oh, Mrs. Flew!"

"Ay, it is dreadful to think of a grown man crying, my dear. But it was so. Though I never set up to be a clever woman, there's no need to stirp a man's heart to know what ails him. If ever you're a mother yourself, you'll understand that, my dear. But I was not mistaken after he was gone. And I thought to myself, 'well now this one thing is certain: she's far and away out of his mind. And I grieved for him, now, perhaps, that things have turned out so, that there's no need for any one to fret and pine about what's to become of her, it may be that Benjy will put his mind at rest, and pluck up a spirit, and think of doing what I've so long wanted him to do."

Maud knew not what to say. She felt ashamed for Veronica before this man's mother, as she had not yet felt ashamed for her. At length she faltered out, "What is it you wish your son to do, Mrs. Flew?"

"Why, to marry, my dear young lady: I don't one of those mothers that wants their children to care for nobody but them. It isn't natural nor right. If my Benjy could but have a good wife, to take care of him when I am gone, I should be quite happy."

The recollection of Miss Turtle came into Maud's mind, and she said, impulsively (thinking violently that the woman had spoken out), "I saw Mrs. Meggitt's governess this afternoon."

Mrs. Flew had put on her spectacles to see her knitting, and she glanced over them at Maud with her pale blue eyes, half surprised, half displeased.

"To be sure: Miss Turtle. She's a very good young woman, is Miss Turtle. I'm sure she has been very kind and attentive to me, and we don't make any bones about it. For a young person won't have the sense to pretend a bit, you see, my dear."

"Miss Turtle seems very fond of one—who," said Maud, involuntarily recalling the "Mother of the Gratchy."

"Why, I do believe she likes me, poor little thing! She talks a bit of nonsense now and again about my being so noble-minded and devoted to my mother, and one she said, that if she was in my place she was sure that she could never have the heart to give up her son to her affections to another woman, be she ten times his wife."

"The—the what virtue?"

"Sparkling. I think she said. But my hearing is a trouble sometimes. But, be, no matter, that's only her flummery. She means no harm. And she's good-tempered, and healthy, and industrious, and—and—there, Miss Desmond, love," continued the old woman, laying her withered hand on Maud's arm, and lowering her voice mysteriously: "you have heard Miss Turtie talk. Any one can see with half an eye how fond she is of Benjy. She makes no secret of it. Now, if whenever you've a chance to speak to Benjy—I know he goes to the vicarage pretty well every day—you would just say a word to put a flea in his ear, and try to advise him like—"

"Oh, Mrs. Flew, how could I?" cried Maud. "I am not old enough, nor wise enough, to take the liberty of offering my advice to Mr. Flew, especially on such a subject."

"But I don't want you to say it plain right out, you know. Just drop a word here and a word there, now and again, in favor of Miss Turtle. Won't you, now? Benjy thinks a deal of your opinion."

Thus the old woman prattled on. By-and-by Mr. Flew's step was heard on the gravel path outside. And his mother hastily whispered to Maud a prayer that she would not say a word to Benjy about the confidence she had been making. Then the surgeon came in, and had his tea at the side-table. And they all sat and chatted very softly in the twilight. It was such a peaceful scene; the little parlor was so clean and fragrant with the smell of dried lavender; the cosy, old-fashioned furniture shone with such a spotless polish; the clear evening sky was seen through window-panes as bright as crystal, and the little surgeon and his mother looked the embodiment of cosy domestic comfort. How strange it was, Maud thought, to consider Mr. Flew in the light of an object of romantic attachment! Strange, that Miss Turtle was having a victim to hopeless love! He at his strawberry-jam with as quiet a relish as though the beautiful Veronica Lavincourt had never dazzled his eyes, or made his pulse beat quickly. Surely it would be good for him to have a little wife to take care of him!

When she was walking home through the Shipley lanes with Mr. Flew, Maud endeavored to lead the conversation on to the subject of Miss Turtle's love for him. Mr. Flew, however, replied absently and monosyllabically to her shyly adventured remarks. At length, as they neared the vicarage, Mr. Flew stood still. He took off his hat so as to let the evening air blow on his forehead, and looked up at the transparent sky where in a few stars twinkled faintly.

"Miss Desmond," he said, "I have not had an opportunity of saying a word to you since this morning. I should not have mentioned her to you had not the vicar told me that you were to see her in London. It was very good of you to do so. Good-by, for now, Miss Desmond."

This was so unexpected that Maud could find no word to say in reply.

"You are going to-day? Is she changed?"

"Very little changed, I think; certainly not less beautiful."

"And did you see—the—the—man she is going to marry?"

"No."

"Did she speak of him to you? Look here, Miss Desmond, you need not be afraid to talk to me of Veronica freely and openly. I understand your kindness and delicacy. You think, perhaps, that I might pain me to hear certain things. But, indeed, to think that she will be happy, gives me great comfort. I am not selfish, Miss Desmond."

"I think that you are most unselfish, most generous, and it only pains me very much to think of your goodness being unappreciated."

Maud spoke with warmth, and a tear came into her eye. She was remembering the vicar's harsh, unfeeling behavior in the morning.

"Oh, you pain me a great deal too highly," said Mr. Flew, looking at her with some surprise. "The fact is that I always knew Veronica to be far above me. I never had any real hope, though I—I— Sometimes she liked to talk to me, and I was fool enough to fancy for a moment— But that was not her fault, you know. She was not to be held responsible for my vanity. When she went away," he pursued, in a low voice, almost like one talking to himself, "I thought at first that I had got a dead relief. For weeks I believe I did not rightly know what I was myself doing. I suppose there was some kind of instinct in me that kept me from doing any thing wild or outrageous enough to get me locked up, half surprised, half at the worst, my grief was more for her than myself; for it was not to God's credit that I am not a fierce man by nature, but if I could have got hold of—of that villain, I would have killed him with no more remorse or compunction than I'd crush a viper. But we man that marries her and treats her well, there's nothing I wouldn't do to serve him—nothing! All love is over for me. I know my own shortcomings, and I blame no one. But she was the first and the last. I know my poor mother wants me to marry. But it can't be, miss Desmond. I'm sorry for her disappointment—poor soul! I try to be good to her. She has been a very good mother to me, bless her! But if it had been possible for Veronica to come back for me, and to have held out her hand to me, I couldn't have taken it. She could never be the same woman to me. I loved any more. But neither can I love any other. I dare say you don't understand the feeling. I can not explain it to myself. Only I know it is so, and must be so, for as long as I have to live." Then suddenly breaking off, and looking earnestly at Maud, he said, "Oh, forgive me, Miss Desmond! I shouldn't not have spoken to you as I have here I am wearying you with talk about myself. I hope you'll excuse it. The truth is, I have no one that I can speak to about her. I will not say to the vicar what I have said to you. And of course I don't mind because my trouble can be no much of his own to bear. I was led on to talk almost unawares. You listen so patiently and kindly. Here we are at the garden gate. Shall I come up the pathway? There is Joanna at the door. Good-night, Miss Desmond."

Maud's own eyes so blurred with tears that she did not at first perceive that old Joanna had hastened to the door in order to be the first to give her a letter which she now held up triumphantly as Maud entered.

"A letter, Miss Maudie! One as you'll be glad to have!"

It was from Hugh. Maud took it, and ran to her own room to enjoy her treasure.

After a few fond lover's words of greeting, the first thing that met eye lighted on was, "I have had a long interview with Lady Gale."

CHAPTER IV.

AN UNEXPECTED ARRIVAL.

"I HAVE had a long interview with Lady Gale.

It was a minute or so before Maud recollected Veronica's unannounced intention of receiving a marriage portion on her, and of speaking to Hugh on the subject. Then Maud had warned her not to expect that Hugh would yield, and yet Veronica had persisted in her intention. It was, doubtless, in order to effect it that she had sought Hugh. The further perusal of her letter confirmed this supposition. Maud might, of course, have satisfied her mind at once as to the correctness of her guess; but, instead of doing so, she had sat for a minute or two, her face in hand, vaguely wondering and supposing—a wayward reminiscence of what most people have occasionally experienced under similar circumstances.

"I told her that it could not be," wrote Hugh; "that I knew you had already answered for yourself, and that I must entirely approve and confirm your answer. Was I not right, dearest? She tried, when her first attempt had failed, to take a different tone, and to plead for me. I was right and just that you should have a portion of the wealth left by Sir John Gale. She even said a word about the duty of carrying out her late husband's intentions! Think of that, Maudie! But I told her that I knew you better than to think that if that were her object, she must make over every farthing to you without loss of time, since it was clear that Sir John Gale had never intended that any portion of his wealth should be spared for her. I don't think she liked to such plain speaking, and she looked mightily astonished."

That was all in the letter relating to Veronica, except a word at the end. "I forgot to say that her Ladyship did me the honor to make me a confidence. She informed me that she was to be married to Prince Barletti almost immediately. For obvious reasons the announcement is to be quite quiet. I saw the said prince; not an ill-looking fellow, although there is something queer about his eyes. Veronica told me that Sir Matthew Gale had consented to remain in town in order to give away! I had a strong impression that she was telling me all this in order that it might be communicated to you, and by you to Miss Lavincourt. Oh, my own, my great, Maudie, what a perfume of goodness seems to surround you! Only to think of you, after being with that woman, refreshing one's very soul."

Maud ran down stairs, after reading her letter through, to communicate to the vicar that part of it which related to his daughter. But Mr. Lavincourt was not within. It was past nine o'clock, yet Joanna said that it was very likely her master would not be at home for another hour or more.

"Do you know where he is?" asked Maud.

"I don't know for certain, Miss Maudie," said the old woman, dryly; "but I'll lay a wager he's at Meggit's. He hasn't been there yet since you've come back. But, for better than three months before, he's been there constant, evening after evening. They're no fit company for such a gentleman as master, farmer folks like them. I wonder what he can find in them! But they flatter him and butter him up. And Mrs. Meggit, she goes boasting all over Shipley how thick her and hers is with the vicar. Good Lord! if men ben't fools in some things!"

"Hush, Jane; you must not speak so. The vicar knows better than you or I either where is his power and fit for him to go."

But although she thus rebuked the old servant, Maud did not, in her heart, like this new intimacy. It was part of the general lowering she had already noticed in the vicar's character. She sat down alone in the room to re-read her dear letter. There was but little news in it. Hugh was well; was working hard; and although he had not yet succeeded in finding the necessary money for the purchase of the business in Lowmore, he by no means despaired of doing so. His mother sent her fond love to Maud, and missed her sadly. The remainder of the epistle was full of words of the fondest and most tender affection. They were very precious and interesting to Maud, but would scarcely be deemed so by the reader.

It may as well be mentioned here that Maud was in ignorance of Mr. Proud's offer to Hugh. He had debated with himself whether he should or should not make her acquainted with it; and he had decided in the negative, reasoning that it would be impossible to do so without revealing his mother's story, and that he received it had no right to do without her permission.

Maud sat and read, and re-read her letter. And then she took out the little Italian writing-desk she had used as a child, and set herself to begin an answer to it. More than one hour had passed thus. It was half past ten o'clock, and still no vicar!

Maud at last began to think that Mr. Levincourt might prefer not to find her sitting up on his return. She had an instinctive feeling that he would a little shrink from saying to her that he had been passing his evening at Farmer Meggit's. At last, however, it occurred to her that she alluded to the growth of his intimacy with the farmer's family. With this feeling in her mind, she resolved to write on the words she had written, Jack's marriage, stating that she copied them from Hugh's letter, and so lay the paper over them, so that the vicar could not fail to see it when he should come in. Just as she had finished her task he returned.

"You up still, Maud?" said he. "Why did you not go to bed?" He spoke with a kind of querulous tone, very unusual with him when addressing his ward, and made no allusion as to where he had been. Maud was glad that she had written what the vicar had to learn. She slipped the paper into his hand, kissed his forehead, and ran quickly up to bed.

The next morning the vicar was as bland as usual, perhaps a trifle more bland than he had been for a long time. He asked Maud how she had passed the evening at Mr. Hugh's, and seemed quite amused by her account of Mrs. Flew's anxiety that her son should marry.

"That little Miss Turtle, hey? Ha, ha, ha! How absurd it seems to look upon Flew in the light of an object of hopeless attachment! There is an incongruity about it that is quite ludicrously ridiculous."

"I think," said Maud, rather gravely, "that Mr. Flew well deserves to be loved. He is very kind and unselfish."

"Oh yes, child. That' of course. That is all very true. There is a great deal of homespun, simple goodness of heart about Flew. But that does not prevent his being extremely comic when considered in a romantic point of view. But you are a wee bit matter-of-fact, Maudie. You don't quite perceive the humor of the thing. Which of our modern poets is it that observes that women very rarely have a sense of humor? Well, why in the world don't Flew marry little Miss Turtle? Upon my word I should say it would do admirably!"

"I'm afraid, sir, that Mr. Flew is not in love with Miss Turtle, Uncle Charles."

"My dear Maudie! How can you be so intensely—what shall I say?—naïve? Is the idea of a 'grande passion' between a Flew and a Turtle is too funny?"

"I think, Uncle Charles," said Maud, resolutely, and not without a thrill of indignation in her voice, "I do believe that, strange as the word seem, Mr. Flew has felt a true and great passion; that he feels it still; and that he will never overcome it so long as he lives."

For one brief instant the vicar's face was clouded over by a deep, dark frown; a frown not at all much of anger as of pain. But almost immediately he laughed it off, stroking Maud's bright hair as he had been used to do when she was a child, and saying, "Pooh, pooh, little Maudie! Little soft-hearted, silly Maudie thinks that because she has a true lover all the rest of the world must be in love too! Set your mind at rest, little Goldilocks. And—go whenever you can to that poor old woman. It will be but charitable. Don't think of us. Your meditations, and duties, and—besides, I must learn to do without your constant companionship, Maudie. I can not have you always with me. Don't mope here on my account, my dear child. And to visit the sick and aged is an act, positively, of Christian duty."

Again Maud had the painful perception of something hollow in all this; and the sense of being ashamed of the perception. The suspicion would force itself on her mind that the vicar purposely shut his eyes to the truth of what she had said of Mr. Flew; and, moreover, that in urging her not to stay at home on his account, the old man was providing against her being a check on his full liberty to pass his own time how and with whom he pleased. Mr. Levincourt said no word about the contents of the written paper Maud had given him. And at the close of the above-recorded conversation he rose and took his hat, as though about to go out according to his custom after breakfast.

"Uncle Charles!" cried Maud, in a low, pleading voice, "you have not said any thing—did you read the paper I gave you last night?"

"Yes, oh yes, I read it, my child, you, my dear child. I—I was not wholly unprepared to hear that the mistress of Lowmore was dead. I—I—my daughter's letter to me—she said—justly enough—that there was no real reason for a very long delay."

Then the vicar sauntered out of the house, and Maud saw him, presently, walk with unconcerned air as he could assume.

"He seems not to care," thought Maud, "more favorable than I dared to hope. There is much less than he did about every thing."

"Oh, Jane," said Maud, that night, Miss Maudie," said Joanna, as she cleared away the breakfast things. This was not her usual task. Catherine and another village maid generally performed it; and, indeed, Joanna very seldom now left her own domain of the kitchen. But it seemed that on this occasion she had come up stairs purposely to say those words to Maud. "Oh, Jane, I'm afraid master's unhappy, once," asked at Maud's silence, and changing the form of her affirmation as though she conceived emphasis to be an interrogative.

"Well, Joanna?"

"Oh, you know, of course, Miss Maudie! It's all right enough, I dare say. Bless your sweet face!" added the old woman, with sudden compunction that she was ill-using her favorite—thankful as you'll have a good husband to take care of you and a home of your own, my dear."

Maud was pained and shocked at the way in which she did so.

She was, of course, not positively unhappy, unconsciously cut short by Joanna, who demanded to know what she meant by positively unhappy, and before her betters. She was further informed that some excuse might be made for her ignorance, since having had the misfortune to be connected with "country families" not but what she might have picked up a little information, such as she did a real gentleman like the vicar, and a real, right-down, thorough-bred lady like Miss Maudie!—And we have seen that Maud was somewhat indignant and very much astonished.

Maud was pained and shocked at the way in which her mind dwelt more and more on the change she observed in her guardian. There was only one person (always excepting her cousin Hugh) But then Hugh was far away. And, besides, her affection was of quite a static character. He was cheerful, and not to add to his cares)—there was but one to whom she could venture to hint at this source of trouble.

The friend in whom she could unhesitatingly confide was Mr. Sheardown; and Maud longed for an opportunity of talking with her. But here, again, things had become different during her most short twelve months' residence at Shipley. The vicar had withdrawn himself from the Sheardowns, as he had withdrawn himself from other friends and acquaintances. Maud's certain and his wife still came to St. Gildas, but the latter, now, however, she reported to have for the sweetness of Nelly Sheardown's womanly sympathy, and the support of Nelly Sheardown's womanly arm, that she could not bear to be left in her House, asking what day she might go over there as usual, and begging to see and talk with her master and mistress. A reply came back as quickly as it was possible for it to come. This was the answer:

"DARLING MAUD,—How sweet of you not to mistrust us! We have not been to see you, dear girl, but the wherefores (various) must be explained when we meet. We are not ill, thank God, sleep. We will bring you back when we drive in to church next Sunday. Meanwhile, my love to Jack and Bobby send you their best (Bobby amends my phrase. He insists on very best) love. Present our respects to the vicar.

"Ever, dear Maud,

"Your loving friend, N. S."

This was on Monday. Maud easily obtained the vicar's permission to spend Sunday with her down's invitation.

"Oh, certainly," he said. "Go by all means. It would be hard to expect you to give up your friends and share the loneliness of my life."

The fact was that the vicar's life was not lonely. Maud, as she thought of the companions he chose, and the society he had voluntarily abandoned, felt that a lonely life would have been better for her guardian than that which he led. However, she looked forward eagerly to the visit to Lowater.

But before the appointed Saturday arrived an event happened which put every thing else out of Maud's mind for a while. She had been out one morning, visiting some poor sick people in the village, and her way homeward lying in the neighborhood of Mrs. Flew's cottage, she had called there, to have a chat with the old lady. It was rather later than she had intended when she left Mrs. Flew's; and she hastened home, fearing to be late for the two o'clock dinner. When she reached the vicarage, the house door stood ajar. That was no new thing. Maud entered quietly and looked into the dining-room. There was no one there, nor in the study. As her guardian had not yet come in, then. The house was very silent. She called Joanna. No one answered, and there was no sound of voices in the kitchen. Maud ran down stairs, and found the kitchen empty; but through the latticed window she saw Joanna, Catherine, and Joe Downes, the groom, gravel-walk, with an unconcerned air as he could assume.

"He seems not to care," thought Maud, "more favorable than I dared to hope. There is much less than he did about every thing."

"Oh, Jane," said Maud, that night, Miss Maudie," said Joanna, as she cleared away the breakfast things. This was not her usual task. Catherine and another village maid generally performed it; and, indeed, Joanna very seldom now left her own domain of the kitchen. But it seemed that on this occasion she had come up stairs purposely to say those words to Maud. "Oh, Jane, you know, of course, Miss Maudie! It's all right enough, I dare say. Bless your sweet face!" added the old woman, with sudden compunction that she was ill-using her favorite—thankful as you'll have a good husband to take care of you and a home of your own, my dear."

Maud was pained and shocked at the way in which she did so.

She was, of course, not positively unhappy, unconsciously cut short by Joanna, who demanded to know what she meant by positively unhappy, and before her betters. She was further informed that some excuse might be made for her ignorance, since having had the misfortune to be connected with "country families" not but what she might have picked up a little information, such as she did a real gentleman like the vicar, and a real, right-down, thorough-bred lady like Miss Maudie!—And we have seen that Maud was somewhat indignant and very much astonished.

Maud was pained and shocked at the way in which her mind dwelt more and more on the change she observed in her guardian. There was only one person (always excepting her cousin Hugh) But then Hugh was far away. And, besides, her affection was of quite a static character. He was cheerful, and not to add to his cares)—there was but one to whom she could venture to hint at this source of trouble.

The friend in whom she could unhesitatingly confide was Mr. Sheardown; and Maud longed for an opportunity of talking with her. But here, again, things had become different during her most short twelve months' residence at Shipley. The vicar had withdrawn himself from the Sheardowns, as he had withdrawn himself from other friends and acquaintances. Maud's certain and his wife still came to St. Gildas, but the latter, now, however, she reported to have for the sweetness of Nelly Sheardown's womanly sympathy, and the support of Nelly Sheardown's womanly arm, that she could not bear to be left in her House, asking what day she might go over there as usual, and begging to see and talk with her master and mistress. A reply came back as quickly as it was possible for it to come. This was the answer:

"DARLING MAUD,—How sweet of you not to mistrust us! We have not been to see you, dear girl, but the wherefores (various) must be explained when we meet. We are not ill, thank God, sleep. We will bring you back when we drive in to church next Sunday. Meanwhile, my love to Jack and Bobby send you their best (Bobby amends my phrase. He insists on very best) love. Present our respects to the vicar.

"Ever, dear Maud,

"Your loving friend, N. S."

This was on Monday. Maud easily obtained the vicar's permission to spend Sunday with her down's invitation.

"Oh, certainly," he said. "Go by all means. It would be hard to expect you to give up your friends and share the loneliness of my life."

The fact was that the vicar's life was not lonely. Maud, as she thought of the companions he chose, and the society he had voluntarily abandoned, felt that a lonely life would have been better for her guardian than that which he led. However, she looked forward eagerly to the visit to Lowater.

But before the appointed Saturday arrived an event happened which put every thing else out of Maud's mind for a while. She had been out

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

TO SHARPEN PEN ANYTHING.—Swallow a whetstone, or eat a dollar's worth in New York restaurants.

If you want to get a sure crop and a big yield, sow wild oats.

A printer's devil wanting to kiss his sweet-heart, addressed her as a "type of beauty." Miss Lucy, is there the pleasure of placing my 'imprint' upon your bill?"

A Nevada editor returns thanks to his friends for the Christmas present of a pair of boots, a bottle of whisky. He says he has pierced the latter with the boots and subdued the former with the bottle.

Did any body ever see a "train of thought" on a railway?

A candidate for medical honors having thrown himself into a fever from his incapacity to answer the questions asked: "Give me a recipe for a fever person for the rheumatism?" He replied: "I would put him into the Examining Board."

WORDLY OBLIGATIONS.—The dever of the earth.

A clergyman at Cambridge preached a sermon which one of the auditors commended. "Yes," said the gentleman to whom he spoke, "it was a very good sermon, but he stole it." This was repeated to the preacher, who replied, "I do not think it any plagiarism to retort. "I will," replied the aggressor. "I said you had written a sermon." "No," said he, "I meant for on referring to the book whence I thought it was taken, I found there."

Elevated railways will be a good field for highwaymen.

A little fellow has just been going to the public schools. His mother is very desirable him to attend to her business and wish to have him learn to be a carpenter and study hard, you may some day become President of the United States." "Oh, mother, Washington. Who knows?"

"I don't like to be called being President?" explained he: "every body's going to be President. When we go to school, the first day we are asked to tell what we want to be, and every boy said—Secretary. At what time would it be agreeable to you to be hanged, Mr. Green?"

A SAVAGE TAR.—Tartar.

"Well, Patrick, what have you to say about stealing the pig?" "Why, your honor, I only took the pig. Pig took upon him to sleep in my bit of a garden of three nights, yer Honor, and I just seized him four the tin!"

CHANGE IN THE MONEY MARKET.—Silver.

With regard to articles of merchandise, we find that in the 13th, 14th, and 15th years of the reign of Philip, Chloroform is still a drug in the market, and millionaires are difficult to meet. Gunpowder tea were opened quietly, and ultimately went down still lower. Lead is rather dear, but tin is cheap. Specimens of prospects has been issued of a new Agamim Company, and the Bank of Elegance is quite cold water upon it. The Tobacco Leaf still remains popular, borrowers of cigars hardly ever refused.

COURTSHIP.

Glass, I love thee and thine eyes
(Thus sighed the tender youth);
Oh, how they, like, ogle me!
With trembling lips, in earnest tone;
Indeed I speak the truth.

He paused—the blush o'erspread her cheek,
She let him draw her near;
Scarce two minutes could she speak,
Yet all that could be said,
Was, such he had a year!

Where would you look for a coarse race of men?—In a rural county.

A Boston writer, in alluding to the musical taste of the Hub, says: "Our ears have been cultivated until they overshadow our eyebrows."

THE MISER'S DISEASE.—Money-mania.

A soldier was wounded by a shell from Fort Wagner. He was going to the rear. "Wounded by a shell?" some one asked. "Yes," he quickly answered. "I was right under the darned thing when the bottom dropped out."

A WOMAN OF METAL.—A belle.

Philosophers say that closing the eyes makes the sense of hearing more acute. A magazine that closes its eyes to the many eyes that close in our churches on Sundays.

INITIATION OF A BENEDICTINE MONK.—[SEE PAGE 219.]

HOLY-WATER FONT IN SAINT PETER'S CATHEDRAL, ROME.—[SEE PAGE 219.]

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN THE WITNESS-BOX.

THE MORDAUNT SCANDAL.

THIS painful domestic scandal, which for some weeks past has filled the English newspapers, derives its principal interest from the fact that it involved the character of a Prince of the Blood and several persons of high rank. The details of the trial, as given in the English press, are so grossly indecent that the Pall Mall Gazette, after publishing the whole, makes a humble confession of its crime against society and morals, but endeavors to excuse its course on the ground that but for the "dread of public scandal—that potent dread—it is by no means improbable that in a few years what Lady MORDAUNT is said to have alleged in excuse would really have truth and validity: these crimes would only be what "every body" permitted themselves to enjoy in gay society now and then. Lord PENZANCE himself seems to have hinted some such opinion, and it is one which we certainly hold." "For it is no doubt true, adds the Gazette, "that for offenses such as are implied in this trial, especially when they are committed among such great people, or what is called 'society,' publicity is the direst punishment, and the surest warning and safeguard." This is not a very flattering picture of the condition of English society.

Without going into these details, the main facts of the case are as follows: In 1866 Sir CHARLES MORDAUNT married a daughter of Sir THOMAS MONCREIFFE. The marriage proved an unhappy one; and several months ago Sir CHARLES commenced a suit for divorce, charging his wife with criminal familiarity with the Prince of Wales, Viscount COLE, and Sir FREDERICK JOHNSTONE. The defense was, that Lady MORDAUNT was insane, and unable to instruct her attorneys; and her mental condition was the issue before the court. It was given to the jury after a long and painful trial, and the verdict was that the lady was insane. The question of her guilt was not touched, and the jury were instructed that their finding in the present issue need not affect the main question of Sir CHARLES MORDAUNT proceeding with his suit for a divorce. If the lady was out of her mind now, and in the course of one, two, three, four, or five years she regained her reason, Sir CHARLES would have as good a right to sue for a divorce as if his wife had remained sane.

The great sensation of the trial was the appearance of the Prince of Wales in the witness-box, to answer the serious charges made against him. In the most solemn manner he asserted his innocence of all complicity in this miserable business; and his exculpation was received with great satisfaction by the English public. It is said that his mother wrote him a most affectionate letter of congratulation immediately after his examination, and invited him to call upon her with the Princess.

In connection with this outline of the most painful scandal that has occupied the English courts for many years, we give a portrait of the Prince of Wales as he appeared in the witness-box, and one of Lady MORDAUNT. We also give an illustration of Walton Hall, Sir CHARLES MORDAUNT'S seat in Warwickshire. Walton Hall is a large, spacious building, designed by the celebrated architect Mr. GILBERT SCOTT, and constructed at a cost of £60,000. The Hall is beautifully situated; the grounds are splendid and well kept; and the surrounding neighborhood is exceedingly picturesque.

LADY MORDAUNT.

GOING ALOFT.

(See Illustration on Page 217.)

ONE evening a party of old ship-masters met at a social supper. After the cloth was removed, and the wine began to circulate freely, some of the older captains commenced spinning yarns about their own adventures at sea. Among the number was Captain Suttee, as fine a man and good a sailor as ever trod a deck. It was observed that he drank nothing but water; and when it became his turn to entertain the company with a story, he began as follows:

Well, shipmates, to show you why I don't and can't drink with you, so that you won't take my refusal as a mark of coldness or disrespect, I will give you a chapter from the story of my early sailor life. It is a very important chapter, too; for on the incident I am about to relate the whole of my subsequent manhood was built.

I was very young when I first went to sea, and at the age of fourteen I considered myself quite a sailor. When I was eighteen I was shipped on board an East Indiaman for a long voyage. There were six of us on board of about the same age, and we had about the same duties to perform. The ship—the old Lady Isadore—was a large one, and our crew was large in proportion, there being forty-two, all told. We "boys," as we were called, messed together, and in all other respects were separate from the rest of the crew, just as much as the officers were. Our captain was a noble-hearted, honorable man, kind and generous, but yet very strict.

Now we boys had learned, in the course of our travels, to drink our grog as well as any sailors. When we could get on shore we would invariably indulge in our cups, and not unfrequently would we come off in a state any thing but sober. I said "we," but there was one of our number who could not be induced to touch a drop of any thing intoxicating. His name was John Small.

New Jack Small not only refrained entirely from drinking himself, but he used sometimes to ask us to let the stuff alone. He grew that job up, however; for we made such sport of him that he was glad to let us alone. But our captain had sharp eyes, and it was not long before he began to show Jack favors which he did not show to us. He would often take him on shore with him to spend the night, and such things as that, while we were kept on board the ship. That wasn't all. He learned faster than we did—he was a better sailor and had learned more of navigation. It got so at length that Jack was called upon to take the deck sometimes, when the officers were busy; and he used to work out the reckoning at noon as regularly as did the captain. Yet Jack was in our mess, and he was a constant eyesore. We saw that he was reaching rapidly ahead of us in every useful particular, and yet we wouldn't open our eyes. We were envious of his every fortune, as we called it, and so seized on every opportunity to tease him. But he never got angry in return. He sometimes would laugh at us, and at others he would so feelingly chide us that we would remain silent for a while.

WALTON HALL, THE SEAT OF SIR CHARLES MORDAUNT.

At length the idea entered our heads that Jack should drink with us. We thought that sooner or later in the mess, when Jack was absent, and we mutually pledged each other that we would make him drink at the first opportunity. After this determination we each one treated Jack more kindly, and he was happier than he had been for some time. We were on many occasions in Singapore, by the way of Brazil, and our ship stopped at Rio Janeiro, where we were to remain a week or so. One pleasant evening we six youngsters received permission to go on shore and spend the whole day; and in consequence we rigged up in our best togs and were carried to the landing.

Now was our chance, and we put our heads together to see how it should be done. Jack's very first desire, as soon as he got on shore, was to go up and examine the various things of interest in the city. He wanted to visit the churches and such like places, and he proposed to us to come with him if he would go and take dinner with us. He agreed to this at once, and we thought we had him safe. We also planned that after dinner was eaten we would have some light, sweet wine brought on, and that we would endeavor to get rum enough into what he drank to upset him; for nothing on earth would please us more than to get Jack "half-seas over," and very low in hand in that condition. Then we fancied the captain's favorites would be at an end, and the poor boy would no longer look upon our rival with more preference than upon ourselves.

Dinner-time was at length. It was a capital dinner, and we came to it with sharpened appetites. But the wine was not forthcoming. Jack not only refused to taste it, but declined to remain in our company. We cried out against him as a mean, stingy fellow, who thought himself too good to associate with us, and accused him, at last, of being a favorite and spoiled child of the ship, and all the unpleasant things we could think of to make the poor fellow unhappy.

But he seemed to be inclined for no such return to this ship alone; but suddenly, in a quiet tone, he said, "Shipmates, there is a row in a tavern. Since matters have come to this pass I have resolved to tell you something which I never meant to reveal. My story is a short one. From my earliest childhood I never knew what it was to have a happy home. I can remember no father and I once he had been a good man and a good husband, but rum ruined all his manhood and made a beast of him. I can remember my poor cold and cheerless the winter used to be. We had no fire—no food—no clothes—only no one thing—nothing but misery. Oh! how my mother prayed to God for her husband; and I, who could but just speak, learned to pray too.

"When I grew older I had to go out and beg for bread. I was ragged and barefoot. I walked through the deep snow, with my clothes in rags, torn and freezing feet almost bare. And I saw other children of my own age, well-dressed and comfortable, and I knew they were happy, for they laughed and sang as they bounded along toward school. The sweet boys had mothers, and I knew that their fathers were no better than mine had been once: for my mother had told me how noble my father could be if rum were not in his way.

"Time passed on and I was eight years old, and those eight years had been years of such sorrow and suffering as I pray God may never again experience. At length, one cold morning, in the dead of winter, my father was not at home. He had not been at home through the night. My mother sent me to the tavern to see if I could find him. I had gone half way when I met a man something in the snow by the side of the road. I stopped, and a shudder ran through me, for it looked like a human form. It was that. In it, and turned the head over and brushed the snow from the face. It was my father, and he was dead and cold! I laid my hand upon his pale brow, and it was like solid marble. He was dead!

"I went to the tavern and told the people there what I had found, and the landlord sent two of his men to carry the corpse home of my father home. Oh, shipmates, I can not tell you how my poor mother wept and groaned. She shook upon her knees and prayed that the corpse to her heart, as though she would have given it life from the warmth of her own bosom. She loved her husband through all his errors, and her love was all-powerful now. The two men soon went and left the dead body still on the floor. My mother whispered to me to come and kneel by her side. I did so. She prayed, she said to me, and the big tears were yet rolling down her cheeks, 'you know what has caused all this.' And so I was once said and hoped true and true as man can be, but oh! see how he has been stricken down. Promise me, my child, and promise, here, before God and your dead father, and your broken-hearted mother, that you will never, never, never touch a drop of that fatal poison that has wrought for us all this misery!'

"Shipmates, I did promise all my mother asked, and God knows that to this moment that promise has been kept. Soon after the boxes, we buried, and some good kind neighbors helped me through the winter. When the next spring come I could work, and I earned something for my mother. At length I found a chance to ship; and every time I go home I have some money for my mother. Not for the wealth of the whole world would I break the pledge I gave my mother and my God on that dark, cold morning. That is all, shipmates. Let me go now, and you may enjoy yourselves as you will, for I believe that you will again urge me to drink."

As Jack thus spoke he turned toward the door, but one of us stopped him.

"Hold on, Jack," said he, wiping his eyes. "You shan't go alone. I have got a mother, and I love her as well as you love yours, and your mother shall not be happier than mine; for I swear that she shall never touch a drink here on. I'll drink no more."

"Nor I, nor your hand, old fellow!" exclaimed the rest of us in chorus, starting from our seats; and before many minutes we all agreed to imitate our more resolute brother. We called for pen, ink, and paper, and made Jack draw up a pledge to which we all signed our noble names, and when the deed was done I know we were far happier than we had been before for years. The wine on the table was not touched, and the hope we had drank during the forenoon was now not such as its effects.

Toward evening we returned to the ship. There was a frown upon the captain's brow as we came over the side, for he did not know anyto use come off from a day's liberty sober. But when we all came on board, and ranged ourselves to him his countenance lighted up. He could hardly give credit to the evidence of his senses.

"Boys," said he, "what does this mean?"

"Show him the pledge, Jack," whispered we.

Jack had our pledge, and without speaking he handed it to the captain. He took it and read it, and his eyes grew moist. He seemed several times. At length I saw a tear start to his eye.

"Boys," said he, "I am glad of this, very glad. "let me keep this, and if you stick to your noble resolution you shall never want a friend while I live."

We let the captain keep the paper, and when he had put it in his pocket he came and took each in turn by the hand. He was much affected, and I know that the circumstance made him happy. From that moment the whole ship's company, Jack Small no more had our envy; for he took hold and taught us in navigation, and we were happy as kings. On the next voyage we all initiated as able seamen, and received full wages, and we left our noble-hearted shipmate ashore and he left to become officers on board other ships.

Jack Small is now one of the best masters in the world, and I believe that not three of our party are still living, honored and respected men. Three years ago we met in a whale ship, six of us, at dinner again, and not one of us had broken that pledge which we made in the hotel at Rio. We had all been to the sea, and were then captains-masters of good ships.

That is my story, and now you know why I can't drink with you, and, as I s ll at first, will not take my refusal as a mark disrespect or want of good-fellowship.

METHODIST BOOK CONCERN.

HEAR BOTH SIDES.

"One word, Sir, with regard to the manner in which the minority report got into the secular press. Having presented and considered their report, and it had been rejected, they held a meeting and resolved that it should be read over before the public through the secular press, but through the first occurring Annual Conference. Next morning, Dr. Lanahan came out of my room into the study of Mr. Daniel Drew, with whom I happened to be boarding near the New York Tribune, saying: 'Here is the report of the majority of the Committee. I thought it was no time, Sir, to waste matters when the majority could not wait even for the official paper, and I sent out to Bedford-Corwin, the Secretary, who had the minority report, that I might send given it at once to the secular press. 'Will you take the responsibility?' I asked him, to whom I spoke. I answered: 'Yes, Sir; these gentlemen are in the hot haste to employ the secular press against the majority, and they shall have their ill of it.' If there is any thing wrong, then, in the publication of the report in the New York secular press, just put it on my head; I can stand it. Never in my life, Sir, did I stop to ask: 'What is popular?' I ask, 'What is right?' and when I see the right I will do it, though the heavens fall. I felt that the time had arrived when a bold countenance to act, in the firm conviction that the Church will demand that these wrongs be righted.

"I found myself compelled, Mr. Chairman, to be in favor of the report of the Committee against my judgment, to renew an investigation over which two weeks had been spent last November, at the request of the Bishops and great inconvenience to the work. I was there representing the Methodist Episcopal Church from the Delaware line to the coast of Florida, and bound to maintain the rights of this district. Two gentlemen, Messrs. Crane and Lanahan, representing Episcopal districts, thought it our conscientious duty to present the minority what we had said in November, and not to submit ex-parte before the Church and the American people.

"The book Committee, through Dr. Lanahan to make his communications in writing, and although Dr. Lanahan complied, the Senior Agent, Dr. Carlton, although required to do the same, never furnished an item, but, when the investigation was closed, Dr. Lanahan was read, got up and said he had no written statement, and could refute the statement of his colleague. The truth is, he was not compelled, as were the members of the Committee, by the startling facts presented and the evidence sustaining them.

"Now, Sir, what do we see? The editor of an official paper throwing his iron flail at one of the publishers of the paper, and attempting to put down the minority of the Committee, to honestly spoke their sentiments to the Church. It is about time that the editors were taught that they are not the proprietors of the several Conference papers, but simply the servants of the Church. They are subject, as you know, Sir, to the authority of the same Book Committee, who, in the absence of the General Conference, have the power to suspend them.

"It is represented to the country that the Book Committee accepted the report of the minority, which is contrary to the truth; for they rejected it by a vote of 8 to 5, and afterward, when they proposed to reconsider it, I just reached my hand to the Secretary's table and put it in my breast-pocket, where it was in a tiny, Mr. Chairman,' says one, 'I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the document sealed and sent with the rest of the papers and forward to the General Conference.' I saw then that they intended to go by the law of judgment, and, whether they had shown their hands, I got up and said: 'Mr. Chairman, Sir, is it not the right way, for brethren to spend their time in reconsidering what is not before them. You had a paper before you, and you have voted it out; and now I give you notice that you will meet it at the Annual Conference.' Some member said, 'I am surprised that my venerable friend should clutch a paper that belongs to the Committee;' to which I replied, 'I regret to say I know I am not supposed to clutch any thing that does not belong to me.'

"Now him, Sir, is whispered in this way, to get in the minority report, and said: 'You will certainly, as Christian gentlemen, extend the same courtesy to the majority report which you intended to a minority of that body.' But I had not yet spoken, and in a whirlwind or tubal of a tornado. The minority were treated in this unfair manner all through the examination; but, as I had given them my word my wishes, I determined to stay and see the end, regardless of the wrongs I suffered. And now, Sir, I do not hesitate to say that if you fail to put the mark of this Conference upon the proceedings in this case, and to censure the editor of the New York Christian Advocate, no man who goes hereafter to that Book Concern from this Episcopal district will ever be responsible for the amount of defalcation that may occur, though it be as black as night. If you do not censure, and stand by a Conference member in this affair, you need not expect that any man will have back-bone enough in the responsible position of Book Agent to reveal any amount of wickedness and wrong that may come to his knowledge.

"Why, Sir, after the adoption of this majority report, this Committee did solemnly, upon the election of their members, adopt a resolution by the same vote that passed this majority report, declaring that neither no investigation should be permitted which extended beyond December 1, 1869; so that what they did see they glossed over, and what they did not see they covered up. What does such action mean?"

Speech by Rev. B. P. Brown: "Was there a single member of the Committee representing the minority placed upon the sub-committee to audit the books?" Answer: "No one."

Question: "Not one; nor on the Committee to report to General Conference either. The members were treated as if they had no rights in the Committee. When the Lawyer was called, Brother Price, of New Hampshire Conference, and myself, entered a written protest against his coming; but it proceeded to no effect. The Book Committee seemed more anxious to get the Assistant Agent out of the way than any thing else. They were to investigate the facts which he had before them. I hope never to witness the repetition of the scenes enacted in Committee."—Extract from a Speech made by Rev. H. Slicer, D.D., before the Baltimore Conference, Tuesday, March 8.

TAKING A WIFE ON LEASE.

A young and sprightly widow once appeared at a Bath masquerade with a paper pinned to her bosom bearing these lines:

To be let on lease, the charms of my life,
I, Sylvia J——, in the shape of a wife:
Not to dislike, and husbanding, good-natured, though thin.
For further particulars pray inquire within.

In the Gentleman's Magazine for 1788, the taking a lady on lease is treated as a sober reality in a Birmingham settlement of Mr. Urwin's writing: "Since my residing in this town, I have met with a case which is a method of obtaining a wife's sister upon lease. I never could learn the method to be taken to get a wife upon lease, or whether such conditions are sanctioned by law. But there is an eminent manufacturer in this place who has had the sole management of his wife's sister upon lease for ninety years and upward; and I know she went by his name, enjoyed all his privileges, and received all the honors due to the respectable name of wife. Nevertheless, I suppose to have a specialty for extraordinary contracts of this nature. In 1858, a woman who succeeded her husband of establishing him in business before the execution of the contracts of that town, said she was not living with the officers, but was married to another woman. For the satisfaction of the bench the agreement was produced; it ran thus: 'Memorandum, that I, Samuel Clarke, have agreed on this second day of October, in the year of our Lord 1751, with William Charles Capes, of Charles-Henry Street, in the borough of Birmingham, in the county of Warwick, carpenter, that I, the said Emily Hickson, of Bristol, in the Street, Birmingham, aforesaid, spinster, of the other part. Whereas the said William Charles Capes and Emily Hickson have mutually agreed with each other to live and reside together, and to mutually assist in supporting and maintaining each other during the remainder of their lives, and also for the agreement hereinafter contained to that effect. Now, therefore, it is hereby mutually agreed upon, by and between the said William Charles Capes and Emily Hickson, that they shall live and reside together during the remainder of their lives, and that they shall mutually exert themselves by work and labor, and by following all their business pursuits to the best of their abilities, skill, and understanding, and by advising and assisting each other, for their mutual benefit and advantage, and also to provide for themselves and each other the best and proper supports and comforts of life which their means and income may afford. And for the true and faithful performance of this agreement, each of the said parties binds himself and herself into the other finally by this memorandum, as witness their hands and seals the day and year above written." For this precious document five-and-thirty shillings had been paid to some unscrupulous limb of the law. It may be hoped it is unique; but one must allow for the appearance, so far as it is not a first one, and is just such a deed as may be expected to be drawn up between man and wife in the happy coming age, when the almost-as-peculiars of the equality of both sexes of man shall have almost the love of liberty common to the utmost of their desires, and established conjubiality upon a proper commercial basis.

A Splendid Prize.—A large engraving of the celebrated picture, "The Picnic on the Fourth of July," by Mr. Thomas Hicks. Size copies of this magnificent picture, on heavy plate paper, worth $10 each, are to be given away as premiums to each subscriber to HARPER'S Monthly Magazine. Yearly subscriptions only three dollars. Any person sending a club of ten names (and subscription) for the postage on the engraving (which will be delivered at once) may have three up to a dollar. Address Dresser's Monthly Magazine, 638 Broadway, N.Y. Now ready.

Corsets and Cords are often overlooked. A corset is useless for any length of time unless irritation of the Lungs or Kidneys is the result. Dr. Brown's Sarsaparilla Bitters will correct both. Use the confidence in their efficacy, giving a thorough, healthy cure and immediate relief.

Owing to the good reputation and popularity of the Tonics, many worthless and cheap Imitations are offered, which are good for nothing. Be sure to obtain the "Dr. Brown's Bronchial Troches." Sold everywhere.—(Com.)

Cesar covered his bald head and gray hair with a laurel crown. Ayer's Hair Vigor covers gray heads with the still more welcome locks of youth.—(Com.)

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Eight per Cent. Gold

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

OF THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY R. R. CO.,

In denominations of $1000 and $500, coupon or registered, interest at Eight per cent. per annum, payable 1st of January and July, in the City of New York, free of United States Government tax. The bonds have thirty years to run, payable in Gold. The bonds are Secured by a Land Grant of 1,500,000 acres, now in market. The road is now completed to Wathena, 45 miles west of St. Joseph, Missouri, which secures these bonds as the first mortgage

REMOVAL.
S. W. GEERY & CO. will remove to southeast corner of 04th Street and Broadway, 1st of May. Importers and Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Teas, Wines, Liquors, and
CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES.
Formerly L & W. Geery, No. 19 Broadway,
Established in 1850. New York.
The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.
Constantly in hand a full assortment of every thing appertaining to a first-class Family Wine and Grocery business. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.
Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS
OF THE
ST. LOUIS
AND
ST. JOSEPH
RAILROAD CO.
—THE—
LAST OF THE ISSUE OF $1,000,000
NOW READY FOR SALE
AND DELIVERY,
AMOUNTING TO $250,000,
AND ARE
THE ONLY BONDS EVER ISSUED BY THIS COMPANY.

They are secured by a first and only mortgage upon the entire property of the Company, including Franchises, Rights of Way, &c., and at the sale rate of $15,000 per mile on a complete and equipped and successful operation.
Trustee for the Mortgage: Farmers' Loan and Trust Company of New York.
This Road connects St. Louis with St. Joseph by the most direct and the shortest route.
They are Coupon Bonds, in denominations of $1000, payable Principal and Interest in Gold, in the City of New York.
The Principal is payable 25 years from November, 1868, in Gold.
The Interest, at the rate of Six per Cent. per annum, is payable 1st of May and November in each year, at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, free of tax.
We are authorized to offer these Bonds for sale at 87½ and accrued interest in Currency. We do not ask a full knowledge of the perfect security upon which they are issued, and with this knowledge we unhesitatingly recommend them as a safe and reliable investment.
TANNER & CO.,
No. 49 Wall Street, New York.

Reliance Wringer,
IMPROVED.

Keyed Rolls. White Rubber Spiral Cogs. Easy Working. Forced Clamp. Fits any Tub. The Best. The Cheapest. TRY IT.
KEYED ROLLS.
PROVIDENCE TOOL CO.,
29 Beekman St., N.Y.) PROV., R.I.
"CONSIDER THE LILIES."

BOTANY
Wood's American Botanist and Florist.
866 pages, royal 12mo, postpaid, $2 50.
This new and eagerly-expected work is the result of the author's experience and life-long labors in Classifying the Science of Botany. He has in this work made the realization of his hopes by a wonderfully ingenious process of condensation and arrangement, and presents to the world in this single moderate-sized volume the substance of a 3 or 4 70 doctavine pages he has actually executed and published during 1869 specie. The treatises on Descriptive and Structural Botany, models of concise statement, which leave nothing to be said. Of entirely new features, the most striking are the Synoptical Tables for the blackboard, and the distinction of species and varieties by variation in the Type. Sample to teachers for examination, half price.
A. S. BARNES & CO., 111 & 113 WILLIAM ST., N. Y.

$20 A DAY! Business new. For circulars and samples, address J. C. HAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.
C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,
of MARION, N.J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York. Cir. Call or send for Price-List.

ESTB.'. ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS' 1806.
(311 Washington St., N.Y.)
SAPOLIO
THE BEST THING OUT
FOR CLEANING
Windows (without Water), Paint, Oilcloths, Floors, Tables, and all Woodwork, China, Earthen, and Glass Ware, and for General House-Cleaning Purposes.
FOR POLISHING
Knives, Tin Ware, Brass, Steel, Iron, and all Metallic Wares. REMOVES, as by Magic, Stains and Rust, leaving a brilliant surface, equal to New.
Removes Stains from Marble, Paint, and Wood.
Is not injurious, and QUICKER, and much CHEAPER than Bath Brick, Rotten Stone, Acid, or Lye; it will be found, on trial, the most perfect, reliable, and indispensable article ever offered to the public of this or any other country; in fact, a preparation no individual or family can afford to do without.
We refer to the many testimonials in our possession, from families, hotels, and manufacturers; also to more than persons who have it in daily use in house and shop. It will cost you little to test our claims—do it.
FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND
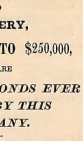
For Sale—Wholesale and Retail—by Grocery, Drug, and Notion Houses throughout the United States.

THE AMERICAN FAMILY
KNITTING MACHINE
is presented to the public as the most Simple, Durable, Compact, and Cheap Knitting Machine ever invented.
PRICE ONLY $25.
This machine will run either backward or forward at the equal Rate of Speed, and knits a perfect heel, but for superior in every respect. WILL KNIT 10,000 Stitches per Minute, and will knit Coarse Work, Fine Work, and all kinds of Goods, from Hose to Shirts, Jackets, Hoods, Nubias, Shawls, Scarfs, Mittens, Gloves, Leggins, Fancy Articles, &c., &c., in Cotton, Yarn, Silk, Linen, or Zephyr. It will knit stockings with double heel and toe, drawers, hose, socks, stockings, caps, comforts, purses, mufs, fringe, afghans, nubias, undersleeves, mittens, shirting, cuffs, bosoms, collars, cord, underskirts, shawls, jackets, cradle-blankets, leggins, suspenders, wristers, tidies, tippets, tatting work, and, in fact, an endless variety of articles in every day use, as well as for ornament.
FROM $5 TO $10 PER DAY can be made by any one with the American Knitting Machine, knitting stockings, &c., while expert operators can even make more, knitting fancy work, which always commands a ready sale.
FARMERS can sell their wool at only forty to fifty cents per pound; but by getting the wool made into yarn, and then knitting it into stockings, it will bring two or three dollars per pound can be realized. Receipt of $25 we will forward a machine as ordered.
We wish to procure active and efficient AGENTS EVERYWHERE, to whom the most liberal inducements will be offered.
Address
AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE COMPANY,
BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

A RARE OFFER.
THE NORTHWESTERN FARMER.
The Largest, Handsomest, and Best Rural Magazine in America, and cheapest in the World.—Inter Journal.
It will be sent three months on trial, for only 25 cents. Address T. A. BLAND & CO., Indianapolis, Ind.



CHAS. A. DANA, Editor and Proprietor.
The cheapest, smartest, and best New York newspaper. Terms: DAILY SUN, $6 a year; SUNDAY SUN, $1 a year; WEEKLY SUN, $1 a year. Address THE SUN, New York City.

GREGORY'S SEED CATALOGUE.
MY ANNUAL CATALOGUE, containing a list of the 2 new kinds of vegetables, and 300 of the choicest varieties of flowers, 100 of which are of my own production, with a choice list of Flower Seed, will be forwarded gratis to all. I warrant my seed shall prove as represented. I warrant it shall reach each purchaser. I warrant all money forwarded shall reach me. Send for catalogue.
JAMES J. H. GREGORY, Marblehead, Mass.

LIGHTNING SHORT-HAND.—Eight Lr Words a Minute after a week's practice. A child can learn it. Send for circular. Address PROF. GURLEY, H. W. HASKELL, 164 South 4th St., Philadelphia.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Composed entirely.) These justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is well established as to require no recommendations. Price: Solid Enameled Patent Levers, $15, equal in appearance and time-keeping qualities to Gold Watches of extra fine finish, usual to $200 gold cases. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled patent lever, equaling in appearance a $200 gold watch. For these magnificent watches we charge only $18. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All our watches are in hunting cases, gents' and ladies' size. Chains, Collins Metal, $10 to $15. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.
The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have ever seen. Try one.
The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.
One of the best Watches worth the money we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Saturday's Press.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!

The reputation of the NOVELTY JOB PRINTING PRESS is thoroughly established, as meeting all the requirements of a first-class press, with which to "do your own printing," and as being second to none for the use of general Job Printing. Manufacturers are using them, and find them most admirably adapted for job work. Many young men have bought them, and are doing the printing for their whole county, thereby materially adding to their salaries. Teachers find pleasure and profit in adding them to their list of studies. Principals of Schools are finding them very useful assistants, and boys are finding them a never-failing source of instruction, pleasure, and profit. Most inks of fourteen days' old Glues process and a few dollars' worth of material, are perfectly capable of doing all the printing for their schools, business, and all kinds of amateur instruction. Prices of Presses, $15.00, $32, $35.00. Send for descriptive illustrated circular, with testimonials from all parts of the country, and specimen of plain and ornamental printing done by the press. Send 3 cents in stamps for postage, &c., to BENJ. O. WOOD & CO., Printers, Typefounders, and Dealers in everything in the line of printing materials; or to the following Agents in the United States: The Cleveland Type Foundry, Cleveland, O.; C. J. Peck & Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.; A. Zeese & Co., Cincinnati, O.; C. Kelsey, Detroit, Mich.; Kelly, Howell, & Ludwig, 97 Market St., Philadelphia, Pa.; A. C. Kellogg, 66 West Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

MADAM FOY'S
COMBINED

Corset, Skirt Support
AND
HEALTH-PRESERVING BUSTLE.
It just the article needed by every lady who consults
HEALTH, ELEGANCE, AND COMFORT.
"Testimonials in its favor are constantly being received from all parts of the country.
Lady Agents wanted in every county of the United States.
Address MADAM FOY,
Sole Manufacturer, New Haven, Conn.

NOW READY.—The Consolidated Magazine for July, 1870, of the HYDROPATHICAL JOURNAL and PACKARD'S MONTHLY, in one, 80 cents, or 10 cents per No. Address, postpaid, S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.
With one of our presses, the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., sent on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 59 Murray Street, New York.

ROGERS'
GROUPS OF STATUARY.
These groups, suitable for wedding presents or ornaments, will be delivered, with all express charges prepaid, to any point in the great east of the Mississippi, on receipt of the price, viz., from $10 to $50, according to size and finish. Illustrated Catalogue and Price-List, 10 cents. JOHN ROGERS, 213 Fifth Ave., New York.

ONLY 25 CENTS.
A HANDSOME ALBUM holding 39 card pictures. Full gilt edges, Morocco, new and novel style. Sent free on receipt of 25 cents.
SAMUEL BOWLES & CO., Springfield, Mass.

Agents! Read This!
WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

FOR FAMILY USE—simple, strong, reliable. Knits Every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and sample stocking FREE. Address HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, or SUGAR. 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address P. L. SAGE, Vinegar Factory, Worcester, Mass.

WILL CURE IN 5 MINUTES.

My AMAZON ROOT will cure Head-ache, Tooth-ache, or Earache in Five Minutes. Sure cure for Catarrh. Will be sent, postage paid, on receipt of 50 cents, to any part of the world. Address
G. E. ALDRA, M.D.,
No. 825 Broadway, New York.
Box 5695.

$25 A DAY! 40 new articles for Agents. Samples sent free. E. ELLIS, Ashland, Mass.

CHAMELEON, or French Magic Top, sent on receipt of $1 10. Lewis P. Tibbals, 419 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Its materials are drawn from sources of special and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly engaged in the department of Illustration, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographers in all the large cities of North and South America and the East for prompt and valuable contributions. As a Literary Journal, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the only illustrated newspaper which has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a claim to pre-eminence.

The Serial Story of HARPER'S WEEKLY constitutes one of the most prominent features: it includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Social Progress.

In No. 473, for November 26, was commenced the new story "MAY AND WIFE," by WILKIE COLLINS, the Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Dead Secret." Subscribers commiting $4 00 for each single subscription will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of this story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is pretty sure to subscribe for life.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF
FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and wonderful ever known in the annals of Journalism, and is now conceded as far the most attractive family paper ever issued. As an illustrated chronicler of Fashion it is unrivaled, and as a literary sheet of special arrangement, involving great expense, with the assistance of the best writers in the leading journal of fashion in Europe—its fashion-plates are published in Paris—it commands a degree of literary appreciation in Berlin and Paris.

The Literary Department of HARPER'S BAZAR is every week devoted to Instructive and Entertaining Tales, Sketches of Travel, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Household Department is conducted by a lady of wide experience in the duties of domestic life. No effort and no expense will be spared to make HARPER'S BAZAR, as it has from the victory which it has won so rapidly, and which it is so well deserves.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in this country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has nearly completed its FIRST QUARTER OF A CENTURY, and has attained to that of any other monthly periodical in Europe or America. Its aim has been to furnish entertaining and instructive reading for the people, at the very lowest price consistent with securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions. The English and American press and its profusely illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration, Fiction and Correspondence, authentically and popular treatment of its papers upon scientific subjects, upon the mechanical improvements of the age, and upon current topics; and to the variety and interest of its miscellaneous literature, which has recently received a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record, in which the progress of the most recent sciences of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be carefully kept up to the level of the times. Attention has been also bestowed attention to the wants of the reading public themselves. It will be also as heretofore unobjectionable in every respect.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY, or WEEKLY and BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE or BAZAR, 24 cents a year; for the WEEKLY, 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscribers from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with the name and address of the Postmaster to whom the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, he should state not only the name of his P. O. but also necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting, a Check, Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the subscriber.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Weekly, Three Cents a Line. Page, $150: Half Page, $75: Quarter Page, $38—each insertion. Eight lines (a line) space), $1 00 a line.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line: Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Magazine, Five Cents a Line. Space and Display, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 382 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

$25 Capital, $2000 Profits. Partner wanted to carry money. C. W. GRINNS, Rochester, N. Y.

ARMENIA SEMINARY, Argenta, N.Y. Term begins April 5. Apply to T. Frost, Principal, or Prof. Hyde.

EMPLOYMENT.—$396 a month with Stencil Dies. 2 Samples free. S. M. Spencer & Co., Brattleboro, Vt.

ST. PATRICK IN NEW YORK

Pat.
Biddy, me Darlin,
Come, lave that hash,
And gird upon me
Me sword and sash!
Me noble war-horse
Neighs at the door;
(Sure, 'twas a car-horse
The day before!)

Biddy.
Och, sure, you'll lak splinded
In all thim things!
Sure, you're descinded
From tin Irish kings!

Pat.
Hurry, me Darlin!
Sure, be the powers,
One day in the year, at laste,
New York is ours:
We'll block the streets,
Kape the cars back,
And all we meets
Must clear the track.

Och, sure, whin the Irish
Has all their own way,
'Twull be still better
Nor 'tis to-day:
We'll have no policemen
To make us quail,
No more o' thim schools,
And divil a jail.
We'll let 'em see,
Be all the powers,
What New York 'll be
The day it is ours!

Woodward's National Architect. 1000 Working Plans, Elevations, Sections, Detail Drawings, Specifications, Estimates. Postpaid, $15.

Harney's Barns, Outbuildings, and Fences. 300 Designs, including Stables, Gates, Gateways, and Stable Fittings. Postpaid, $10.

Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses. 138 Designs and Plans. Postpaid, $1.50.

Illustrated priced catalogue of all books on Architecture and Agriculture mailed free.

GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,
191 Broadway, New York.

THE LADIES' SOROSIS CLUB,
of New York, recently changed their discussions from woman's suffrage to Hair Preparations and Pimple Banishers. They declared that where nature had not endowed them with beauty, it was their right—yea, their duty—to exit it where they could. So they all voted that MAGNOLIA BALM overcame Sallowness, Rough Skin, and Ring-marks, and gave to the complexion a most delicious (Sorosian) and marvellous appearance (dangerous to men, no doubt); and that LYON'S KATHAIRON made the hair grow thick, soft, and awful pretty, and, moreover, prevented it from turning gray. If the proprietors of these articles did not send the sisters an invoice, they are not smart.

PAPER-BOATS.

For exercise, pleasure, racing, travelling, and healthful Spatial instruction for young ladies, ladies, tourists, & sportsmen. Descriptive pamphlet, with price-lists and application. WATERS, RALCH, & CO., 303 River St., Troy, N.Y.

PATENTS to inventors who wish to obtain out Letters Patent, are advised to consult with MUNN & CO. Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for Twenty-three Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. A pamphlet, containing full instructions to inventors, is sent gratis. Address MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, N.Y.

NEXT OF KIN.—Gunn's Index to 22,000 advertisements. Price 50 cents.
JOHN HOOPER & CO., No. 41 Park Row, New York.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,
NEW YORK.

SELTZER APERIENT.

The Agonies of Bilious Colic, the indescribable pangs of Chronic Indigestion, the debility and mental stupor resulting from a costive habit, may be certainly prevented by adopting the system with that agreeable and refreshing Standard Preparation, TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

PROCURABLE AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

$20 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE Agents to introduce the RICKEY'S $30 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $50. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Circular Free. Address W. A. RICKEY & CO., Cleveland, O.

FOLLETT & SON, Manufs. of Germania Metal-clean Goods. Store: 219 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel. 27 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular or Letter-Box Seal. Repairing and Rolling also done.

$5 Portable Printing Offices, with Press and Type complete. For Druggists, Physicians, Dentists, and others. Send stamp for descriptive circular.
EUREKA PRESS CO., Suffield, Conn.

For New Book and Latest Map of Kansas, send 50 cents to G. W. HAMILIN, Publisher and Gen'l Land Agent, Ottawa, Franklin Co., Kansas.

FISHERIES.—For sale in the trade, 1000 Nets & Seines, for Rivers, Lakes, or Sea Fishing. 50,000 for Fish Netting, for export or domestic use, ½-6 inch sq. mesh. Amer. Net and Twine Co., 61 Commercial St., Boston.

A NEW DISCOVERY ! !
PHALON'S
"VITALIA;"
OR,
Salvation for the Hair.

For Restoring to Gray Hair its Original Color.

PHALON'S "VITALIA" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or flaky sediment matter, requires no shaving up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, A NEW DISCOVERY in Toilet Chemistry.

☞ Phalon's "VITALIA" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the direction being carefully observed.

IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!
AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.

Price, One Dollar per Box,
CONTAINING TWO BOTTLES.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.

PHALON & SON,
517 Broadway, N. Y.

Prince of Wales's Visit TO THE EAST.

JOURNAL OF A VISIT to Egypt, Constantinople, the Crimea, Greece, &c., in the Suite of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By the Hon. Mrs. WILLIAM GREY. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

Perfectly simple and unaffected.—Spectator.

"It is more than we have the privilege of traveling with royalty, and witnessing how kings and princes conduct themselves when relieved from the restraints of court etiquette. This privilege is accorded to the general reader in this book, which would be exceedingly entertaining irrespective of the peculiar circumstances under which it is given."—The Hon. Mrs. Grey was a companion de voyage of the Princess of Wales in her recent Eastern tour, and kept a daily journal of their experiences for her family friends at home. Subsequently, at the request of the Prince, with the concurrence of any possibility of future publication, which, of course, was not contemplated, she has revised and added to the most charming book upon the interior life of royalty, and a very popular picture of Oriental travel, that has appeared. The book's attestation of fine writing, possesses a good deal which is of unusual excellence by reason of its very simplicity."

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 50.

WARNER, PECK, & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS OF Children's Carriages,
Springfield, MASS.

Stammering
Cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, address SIMPSON & CO., BOX 5076, NEW YORK.

THE SHOOTING Bourbon Co., 61 Broadway, mails 7 receipt, with full instructions, for instantaneously destroying taste of new rectified whisky or highwines, making them deliciously smooth, silky, old. Expense 50c. a barrel. Fortunes to Liquor men. Price $2.

The New Books of the Season
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. History of the American Civil War. By JOHN W. DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York. In Three Vols. Vol. III. just ready. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50 per vol.

A BRAVE LADY. By the Author of "JOHN HALIFAX, Gentleman," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. Together with a Statement of the Intimations of Science respecting the Primeval Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

THE UNKIND WORD, and Other Stories. By the Author of "JOHN HALIFAX, Gentleman," &c. 18mo, Cloth, $1 00.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By JAMES ORTON, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Equatorial America and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

GARIBALDI'S NOVEL. The Rule of the Monk; or, Rome in the Nineteenth Century. By General GARIBALDI. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. New Edition. 102d Thousand. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY. A Novel. By MRS. A. C. SWAZEY, Author of "Gardenhurst." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of MARY RUSSELL MITFORD, Authoress of "Our Village, &c." Told by Herself in Letters to Her Friends and Anecdotes and Sketches of her most celebrated Contemporaries. Edited by the Rev. A. G. L'ESTRANGE. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By Miss CLAVE, Author of "Maggie Lynne." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 90 cents.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth, his Life and Teachings," &c. Elegantly illustrated from Designs by DORÉ, Delaroche, Durham, and Parsons. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00; Gilt Edges, $3 50.

BIDDEL. A Novel. By the Author of "Adel Drake's Wife," "Bound to the World," "Martin Pole," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By JAMES GRANT WILSON, Author of "The Adventures of Harry Danbiger," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Heroines of London," &c. With 167 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

KITTY. A Novel. By M. BETHAM EDWARDS, Author of "Kitty's Inheritance," "A Winter with the Swallows," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations. For Universal Reference. Edited by BENJAMIN VINCENT, Assistant Secretary and Keeper of the Library of the Royal Institution of Great Britain; and Editor of the Tea of Admiralty Readers. 8vo, Cloth, $6 00; Sheep, $6 00.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; or, The Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE POLAR WORLD: a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. G. HARTWIG, Author of "The Sea and its Wonders," "The Tropical World," "The Harmonies of Nature and Inspired Word," With Additional Chapters and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 00.

PLAUTUS'S PLAYS. T. Maccī Plauti Captīvi, Trinummus, et Rudens. With English Notes, Critical and Explanatory. By C. S. HAMMOND, M.A., Professor of Latin in the Wesleyan University. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

ADVENTURES OF CALEB WILLIAMS. By WILLIAM GODWIN, Esq., Author of "St. Leon," "Cloudesley," &c. Complete in One Volume. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE ODES AND EPODES OF HORACE. A Metrical Translation into English. With Introduction and Commentaries. By LEONARD MACKAY. Text from the Editions of Orelli, Macleane, and Dillenburger. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

MEDORA LEIGH: a History and an Autobiography. Edited by CHARLES MACKAY. With an Introduction, and a Concluding Chapter in Vindication against Lord Byron by MRS. Beecher Stowe. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FAVORITE ENGLISH POEMS. With 220 elegant Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 00; Gilt, $3 50.

MY ENEMY'S DAUGHTER. A Novel. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, Author of "The Waterdale Neighbors." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

COMFORT'S GERMAN COURSE. A German Course, adapted for use in Colleges, High-Schools, and Academies. By CHARLES COMFORT, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Alleghany College, Meadville, Penn. Cloth or Half Leather, $3 00.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. A Novel. By the Author of "False Colors," "Denis Donne," "Playing for Love's Regard Stakes," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

LOST IN THE JUNGLE. Narrated for Young People. By PAUL B. DU CHAILLU, Author of "Discoveries in Equatorial Africa," "A Journey to the Equator," "Journey to Ashango Land," "Stories of the Gorilla Country." With numerous Engravings. 18mo, Cloth, $1 75.

THE ROMANCE OF SPANISH HISTORY. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The French Revolution," "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

AGENTS WANTED for Willson's New School and Family Charts.
To canvass every state in the Union. Men of ability, and some measurement of time and business profit. For particulars and terms, address
HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 693.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

BISHOP THOMPSON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY MES. U. C. GOES.]

MR. W. W. CORNELL.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

BISHOP THOMPSON.

DR. EDWARD THOMPSON, a Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose portrait is given on this page, died March 22, at Wheeling, Virginia. Doctor THOMPSON was born near Portsmouth, England, in 1810. His parents belonged to the wealthier middle class, and the circumstances of his family secured him the advantages of an early education. While he was still very young, his father emigrated to this country, and settled at Wooster, Wayne County, Ohio. He received the best mental training the schools of the new country could afford, and ranked as an excellent Latinist. He studied medicine at Philadelphia, and commenced practice in the village where his parents resided. At this time he was a skeptic in religion, and with several other young men of similar convictions he formed an Infidel Club, to meet weekly and to seriously read and refute the Bible. The experiment resulted in THOMPSON'S conviction of the inspiration of the Scriptures, and resulted in his embracing the faith which he had rejected. He entered the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in 1833, at the age of twenty-three, began work as a minister in what was then the Ohio Conference. From this time forward he was closely identified with the history of the Methodist Church in this country. In 1845 he was elected first President of the newly-founded Ohio Wesleyan University, at Delaware, Ohio, the first Methodist College in the State. He remained there fifteen years, [illegible] institution to the leading position in the education of the West. In ceded DR. ABEL STEVENS, the [illegible]hurch historian, in the editorship [illegible]es Advocate, in New York. The [illegible]ergence of 1864 elected DR. THOMP[illegible]piscopacy. He had been a mem[illegible]General Conference since 1840, and [illegible]doctorate of divinity from Augusta [illegible]ucky, in 1844, and that of Iowa [illegible]eleyan University, Connecticut, in man ever elected to the Methodist brought to his place a higher reputer for learning or eloquence. His n this position was a voyage around n a visit to the Methodist missions y, Bulgaria, India, and China. On se passed in review the work of the alifornia, Oregon, and the new Territ published volumes of DR. THOMPSON ks.: "Educational Essays," "Moral ous Essays," "Biographical and Inketches," and "Letters from Eu-

MR. GULIAN C. VERPLANCK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

MR. W. W. CORNELL.

THIS gentleman, a "self-made man," and well known and esteemed for his Christian liberality and influence, died at Fort Washington, on the 17th of March, at the age of forty-seven. He was born on Long Island, January 1, 1823, and came to New York city when only twelve years old. His first employment here was as a blacksmith's apprentice. Fortunately for his future welfare his master was a religious man, and took him to the Jane Street Sunday-school, where he became a convert and joined the church with which the school was connected, of which in after-life he became the Superintendent. When still quite young, he established, with his brother, the iron-foundry in Centre Street which bears his name. With his increase of wealth his liberality kept pace; and he regularly bestowed a certain portion of his annual income in religious charities. He was also especially known to be the friend of struggling poor young men, remembering that he was like them once. His connection with the Sunday-school and Missionary Society of this city is well known to most of our readers, as its President and liberal benefactor. Ten years ago he joined the Fourth Street Methodist Episcopal Church, and gave a large sum of money to its Sunday-school, of which he was Superintendent until a year ago, when he resigned the office. His liberality was bounded only by the limits of his means. On one occasion he purchased a lot, built a neat brick church in West Thirty-fifth Street, near Ninth Avenue, and on the day of dedication handed the deeds of the whole to the trustees. Another time he presented $2000 to the East Eleventh Street Church; and most of the benevolent enterprises of the Methodist Episcopal Church have received material aid from him. MR. CORNELL'S income amounted to about $215,000 a year. He had a fine horse, No. 41 Grove Street, and his residence at Fort Washington, which he recently purchased.

GULIAN C. VERPLANCK.

We give on this page the portrait of the late GULIAN C. VERPLANCK, whose death, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, was mentioned in our issue of last week. A descendant of one of the old Dutch families that originally settled Manhattan Island, he was born in New York city in August, 1786. He graduated from Columbia College in 1801, studied law, and, after being admitted to practice, passed several years in Europe. On his return to this country he was elected to the State Legislature, and took active part in the exciting political discussions of the time. His powerful pamphlets, directed against DE WITT CLINTON and his friends, attracted general attention. He was again a member of the State Legislature in 1820. In the following year he was elected to the chair of the "Evidences of Christianity" in the General Protestant Episcopal Seminary of this city. Soon after he published essays on the "Nature and Uses of the various Evidences of Revealed Religion," and in 1825 a work on the "Doctrine of Contracts." The same year he was elected a Member of Congress, and held that position eight years. He was an earnest advocate of the extension of the term of copyright from twenty-eight to fifty years—a measure which was passed in 1831. His most important literary work was the large edition of SHAKSPEARE, the first volume of which appeared in 1844, and the last in 1847. After the close of his Congressional career Mr. MCFARLANE held several important offices of trust in this State. He was President of the Board of Emigration Commissioners from the time of its organization in 1847, and one of the Governors of the New York Hospital. The Century Club of this city counted him among its founders and most efficient supporters. His last literary appearance was on the 4th of July, 1868, when he delivered the oration on the dedication of the new Tammany Hall in Fourteenth Street. As decided and earnest Democrat, Mr. VERPLANCK never descended to the arts of the small politician. He never sought office; and, when office was conferred upon him, it was always done in view of his acknowledged ability and unquestioned integrity. A genuine Knickerbocker—a gentleman in the true sense of that much-abused word—his memory will be pleasantly cherished by all with whom he came in personal contact.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 9, 1870.

THE NEW FACE OF AN OLD PARTY.

IT is sometimes naked why, of all the religious sects in this country, the Roman Catholics excite the most hostility, and are oftenest most severely denounced. How they are to be asked, exactly the same rights as all other sects? Certainly they have; but the difficulty is that the Roman clergymen are not content with it. They are determined to be a political party also. Indeed, not only have all the sects equal rights before the law, but the uniform action of the press—except, of course, the religious press, which naturally advocates its various theological views—is equal and impartial in its communions. Neither the Methodists, nor the Baptists, nor the Presbyterians, nor the Unitarians, nor the Episcopalians, nor the Congregationalists, nor the Roman Catholics, nor the Quakers, can justly complain that, as sects, they are treated with the utmost fairness and impartiality and respect in all newspaper discussions. What is called the attack upon the Roman Catholics is only the attack of the Roman Catholic clergymen upon an integral part of our political system. The government absolutely severs itself from State connection, and body in dealing with the State leaves his sectarian views behind him, except the Roman priest. The rest of us are not Presbyterians and Baptists and Methodists when we take part in politics; we are American citizens only. But the Roman priest insists that he and his sect shall be regarded by the State as Romanists. It is the instinctive opposition to that claim which is called the attack upon the Roman Catholics.

The Roman Church, which for so long a time constituted the chief government of the world, has never relinquished the theory that the ecclesiastical, or what it preferred to call the religious, authority was necessarily superior to the temporal. Hence the Pope claimed the right to dethrone kings and release subjects from their allegiance. This was the doctrine and the practice of GREGORY VII. CLEMENT VII. absolved the subjects of HENRY VIII. from their duty, as LINCOLN'T II. has absolved those of King JOHN. Thus the Roman Catholic leaders have always chosen to be a political party, while they have claimed the sanctimony of a religious sect. It was this fatal folly that led to the execution of CAMPIAN and the Sacramentaries in England under Queen ELIZABETH. The country was full of the emissaries of PHILIP II. and the Pope, stirring up conspiracy against the Government. It was simply a question of life and death. CAMPIAN would not say that he believed the Pope could not absolve the political allegiance of the subject. That was the notorious doctrine of his Church; and, therefore, in those ones exclaimed, "In your Catholicism all treason is contained!" he expressed a very general feeling. CAMPIAN declared that he was executed for being a Roman Catholic. The truth is that he was punished for inculcating, at a most critical moment, the doctrine that a Roman Bishop was the political superior of the English Queen—a doctrine which, at the time and under the circumstances, was intolerable.

When the English Roman Catholics sought release from their political disabilities a century ago they repudiated this doctrine, and the "seminaries" upon the Continent also expressly denied it. But the Pope now reasserts it, and unquestionably with great logical force. The clergy of his Church in this country support his position by demanding that one of the fundamental conditions of this government—namely, the total separation of Church and State—shall be abolished. They deny, indeed, that they demand it. Rev. Mr. FERRESTON says, in urging a division of the school fund: "The State has nothing to do with religion; it only recognizes it as it does the right to marry children who belong to a particular communion, and gives to them their proportion of the fund." But what Mr. FERRESTON does not say is that the State does this it recognizes sects, while nonrecognition of sects is the very essential point. When the State recognizes what he regards, it educates the children not as citizens but as Methodists, Baptists, and Romanists. And precisely because separation is taught by people the deplorable consequences of doing this very thing did they prohibit the State from knowing who belonged to one "particular communion" and who to another. The people have imperatively declared that neither pope, cardinal, archbishop, bishop, priest, nor deacon shall or next, nor any person whatever in a sectarian capacity, shall meddle with politics.

Do we therefore deny the right of Roman Catholic priests, as American citizens, to do what they can to persuade the people to change the law, and to establish the State become sectarian? Not at all. They may and they do argue for it, precisely as we argue against it. But while they are doing this they are trying to talk about persecution and religious liberty and the rights of conscience. The State now offers secular education, shall be freely provided for all children. The Roman Catholic priests say that they think secular education is irreligious, and claim to have a certain share of the money raised, or to be released from taxation. The latter request that it is impossible, for it is without failing into insuperable difficulties; but, of course, it does not oppose any kind of religious instruction under proper regulations. It simply declines to give it. It can not abandon its system of free and unsectarian schools because of a few Roman Catholic priests who think irreligious, any more than it can abandon its laws against bigamy, and the taxation that enforces them, because of a few Mormons who assert which holds polygamy to be a part of its religion. The State will interfere with no such religion. They were just such pleas as this class of citizens may raise a point of conscience against the teaching of this branch of knowledge, singular as it may be. But the universal sense of all shows that as all must be educated, and can best be educated at the common expense, the only practicable way in which this method is tf provide an elementary secular education for all, and to leave religious instruction to the direction of the parents. This is what the Roman priests as politicians oppose, and insist that not to yield to them is to coerce their consciences. They have just such a right used to urge that to forbid slavery in the Territories was to deny equal rights and to withhold Christianity. They were just such a plea the new party will discover that it is mistaken also.

AN UNKIND BLOW.

ECONOMY is a good thing, but gratitude is a better. If there is any class of faithful servants of this country who do their duty well and silently, and if there ever was a Government, it is the military and naval officers. Of none are more serious sacrifices required. None, as a rule, are more cheerfully paid. And none bear with more uncomplaining fortitude the blows that are aimed at them. A few weeks since we called attention to the fact that officers while retired army officers to be detailed for certain duties for which they were especially qualified—a prohibition which deprived them of part of their incomes, and in announcing which General SHERMAN could not help expressing his sympathy and regret. It was a law which said to not more than a hundred men who had given their lives to the honorable defense of the flag, and who had no other possible resource: "If you want to save a few thousand dollars, and you may go to—gutters. There was not one officer unconscientiously grudged the saving by that law who would not be justified in regretting that he had ever entered the service of the United States.

But, as if this were not enough, the 11th section of General LOGAN'S Army bill, which passed the House unanimously the previous week, strikes this class of officers another blow. This section forbids such officers to accept any civil office, under penalty of vacating their commissions. We are very glad to see that General SHERMAN, in a letter to Mr. WILSON, the Chairman of the Senate Military Committee, protests earnestly against this further outrage. It has been uniformly the custom for such officers to fill certain civil offices, for which their personal disability was no disqualification, and for which their exact habits and training peculiarly fitted them. Nor has their discharge of such duties been discreditable to them or injurious to the country. Indeed, as General SHERMAN says, any other countries rather seek out those officers who have been honorably retired, to elevate them to civil posts of profit and honor. The other day it was proposed in Portland to nominate General FESSENDEN, who lost his leg in battle, and is retired, as Mayor. Had this been done, and had General LOGAN'S bill become the law, General FESSENDEN, whose misfortune is the monument of his patriotic service, and who has been disabled and impoverished under the law of which we spoke the other day, must have declined, or resigned his commission.

When such objections were made in the course of the debate upon the Army bill, some Representative Mr. FRENCH rose don't like the law, let them resign their commissions." We do not like to characterize such a remark as it deserves. It is not fair officers only who dislike such a law. The people will not like it when they know it; for it is a harsh and unkind law. Anxious for economy as it is not by paring the lean salaries of a few faithful officers, partially disabled in the service of the country, that the people wish to save money. We have learned in desperate extremity the value of trained and devoted officers. When they are old and can not change their profession, let us not accept how we may reduce their means and their opportunities. Let us rather be careful to show that we gratefully remember their services and their long fidelity.

AN "AMERICAN CHURCHMAN."

THE American Churchman is the organ of the Episcopal Church established in Chicago and Milwaukee. It is what is called a "religious" newspaper; and as such commends itself to Christian generosity and charity, and the love of truth, by unclean aspersion upon a neighbor's good name, what dirty work is left for an American Church?

The American Churchman, under the head of "Fame for Sale," alludes to a portrait of the editor of the Times, the low which was recently published in this paper, and then says:

"Now, the newspapers inform us, the proprietor of the World paid Mr. DANA for so unusual and fine from him for their publication of his picture and his life!

"So it turns out that these flattering estimates of character and genius which are printed under the name of their subjects are advertisements paid for by the gentlemen interested, as other people pay for their advertisements of dry-goods."

The story which the American Churchman thus adopts, and the conclusions to which it jubilantly springs, are equally false. And the next time the American Churchman sees a suspicious calumny in a newspaper, instead of snatching it up as a delicious morsel for Sunday reading in religious families, suppose it should borrow a little Christianity, and reflect that a story is not necessarily true because it is injurious.

THE MILLENNIUM POSTPONED.

THE comedy of expecting a real reform and purification of the government of the city of New York from the "honest Democracy" is only surpassed by the farce of their total discomfiture. And thus it was. A dozen years ago the police was appointed by the Mayor, and the consequences of the system were so disastrous and menacing that citizens of all parties demanded a new system, and the Metropolitan Police was established. It has been one of the most admirable and efficient bodies for its purpose ever known in the country; and its service in the most perilous moments of the history of the city—the riots of 1863—is a subject of the justest pride. Every good citizen has but to reflect what would have been the situation of affairs at that time under FERNANDO WOOD'S police.

It has been a favorite theory of the party to which we owe those riots that the Metropolitan Police was inconsistent with "local self-government, and they have sometimes said that when they obtained power they would restore to the opposed city the right of choosing its own police. They obtained power by fraud, and instantly it appeared that it was divided into two factions—those who "managed matters" reaped the profits of power, and those who did not but who wished to. The latter made the air resound with omnious cries. They would destroy the thing that would wage war to the knife, and so on. They were the "Young Democracy"—the "honest Democracy"—and their organ affected surprise that those who were perfectly familiar with these gentlemen did not take their word that they were very much honester than other people. Politics were to be purified. Elections were to be honest. The city was to govern itself. The police were to be the creature of the voters. Rings were to be broken.

Those who believed the Millennium to be at hand avowed themselves in robes of expectation and went out upon the house-tops. Those of less faith looked quietly on, heard the vociferations of honesty and reform, saw the suspicious communications between the camps of the factions, and finally beheld, as the method of political purification and annihilation of corruption offered by the "honest Democracy," a proposition that FERNANDO WOOD'S police system should be restored! At that revelation the expectants of the Millennium removed their robes and descended. It was then that the single question whether honest Mr. O'BRIEN or honest Mr. SWEENY should control the plunder of the city; and when the issue was made that Mr. O'BRIEN had the worst of it. For one day his organ was speechless; the next it waved its hat and shouted. "This is honest work!" So thought Mr. SWEENY. Both were apparently satisfied. And as the Metropolitan Police, the only security for order in the city, remains undoubtedly think all good citizens.

Of course so violent a party tempest will have various consequences. The success of Mr. SWEENY and his friends indeed has been so signally demonstrated that, for the nonce, some kind of truce will probably be made, and the factions will continue. Mr. TWEED has been thrust out of the office of those who he holds, and will certainly be reengaged. The honest Mr. TWEED will fight, and the "honest Democracy" will fight. They will be in the party until the dominant faction is overthrown. Meanwhile it is in vain to seek for any principle in the contest, for there is none. Mr. O'BRIEN is of the same school of political morality with Mr. SWEENY. Tammany Hall, with the honest Mr. O'BRIEN, or one of his friends, as chairman, would be precisely Tammany Hall with the honest Mr. TWEED, or one of his friends, as chairman. Both are the professional party managers who have devoted themselves to the character of their party; and their party is not one that demands honest elections nor a pure administration.

THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND DANGERS TO NEW YORK

THE common school system of the State of New York is so extensive and so excellent, and it is of such primary importance to the welfare of the State, that we wish, for the information of the whole country, as well as of New York, the report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction might be more widely and more generally universally diffused. As it will probably, however, share the fate of most legislative documents, and disappear from the shelves of libraries for possible future consultation, we will rescue a few of its figures and facts for the reflection of our readers. Mr. WEAVER presents clearly the exact situation. He tells us that the whole amount spent during the past year for the support of the schools—academies, including, besides the expenses of the common schools, the State appropriations for academies, teachers' institutes, normal schools, colleges, the Cornell University, the Board of Regents, the current expenses of the Department of Education, the Agricultural College, and excluding the appropriations for charitable institutions with schools, was $10,107,289 35. Of this sum $4,092,103 79 were applied for teachers' wages, and $2,455,455 01 for schoolhouses, sites, furniture, repairs, etc.

Mr. WEAVER further tells us that the whole number of persons in the State between five and twenty-one years of age is 1,463,239, and the whole number who were taught and boarded the public and private schools and academies for some time during the year is $1,160,766; so that there are between two and three hundred who attend no school whatever. We have yet something to learn of the Old World; for in several of the German States it is very difficult to find any person of either sex who can not read. The German children are compelled to go to school, and they do go to school. Of the whole number who have been to school for some time during the year, 998,664 were to the public schools; but the average daily attendance was only 468,421. The number that have been at private schools, colleges, etc., is 162,102. The whole number of teachers in the public schools was 28,310, of which 22,080 were women, and 6230 men. The average salary of these teachers is $33 monthly pittance. In the cities the average weekly wages of the teachers was $15 16; in the country, $7 86; average in the State, $10 06. These figures are startling, as we wish he had, whether the women are paid equal wages for equal time and labor with the men.

The Superintendent's views, which are very forcibly stated, upon the question of a change in the organization of the common schools, provision of education, and his remarks upon the proposed abolition of the Board of Regents of the University, will be considered next week. To the citizens of this State, and indeed of the country, the grave fact mentioned in the report is that, with a generous school system wisely administered, there are three hundred thousand children in the State of New York who are growing up without any school instruction whatever. Other education, and of the most dangerous kind to the public order, they are of course constantly acquiring. And if any young political aspirant in the State is looking for an object of vital importance, let him devote himself to getting those three hundred thousand children into school.

The Superintendent does not speak directly of the Bible question. But he says, with great truth, "The strength of the system consists in the general conviction of its necessity, and in the unoffending fairness with which its advantages are dispensed. Nothing is taught by authority in the public schools except plain elementary truths and principles, which it is good for all to know, and which, if the State has any right to educate, may properly be inculcated. Whenever an attempt may be made to introduce exercises which are objectionable, either because they are intrinsically bad or because they are foreign to the true purpose of the schools, the power to restrain and correct the irregularity is ample and convenient." This is remarkably well said; and the State is fortunate in having so sagacious an officer at the head of one of its most important departments.

TRADE.

A COMMISSION house would sell the extra-super carpets of a manufacturer on Long Island, and informed the latter a few days ago that, owing to the fall in gold and the corresponding decline in the price of foreign carpets, his make could be sold at not exceeding one dollar per yard, two off for cash in ten days, which was a fall of about seventeen cents per yard within the last six months. His reply was: As soon as my looms are emptied—which is done when the respective pieces are completed—I shall hand off, so there is no necessity for business at any price. At Kensington, which is the principal seat of the manufacture of ingrain carpets, nearly one-half of the establishments, large and small, have either stopped their looms or diminished their production. The larger establishments for the manufacture of carpets in the Eastern States still go on; they are have the financial strength which permits it, and in time the stoppage of other mills accrues to their benefit.

The Kensington carpet weavers, in the latter part of 1869, refused to take more than half of the manufacturers were willing to pay, and struck for a higher rate. After a long-continued contest the weavers submitted to the terms of the manufacturers, owing to the price of wool, the fall in gold, and the inability to dispose of their products, could not furnish employment. The weavers have been great sufferers, but have saved many losses the very heavy losses which would have been made had the production continued at its former height.

Flour is as low now as in ante bellum times. Petroleum, of which we exported in 1869 over [illegible]'s millions of gallons, is down for refined who[illegible]o about 26½ cents per gallon; and cotton, which at this time last year was selling at 29 cents for middling, sells now at 22½. It is almost useless to say that, with these serious causes at work, trade is very much disturbed in all quarters of the Union.

There are many in the receipt of fixed compensation who congratulate themselves that a large portion of the articles of consumption and wear are reduced in price to their advantage. This view is unsound, inasmuch as the present state of trade reaches those who, like the carpet weavers, produce neither food nor clothing. It is always to the true interest of producers and consumers that their relations to each other should be beneficial to both.

The grain producer of the vast Northwest has been unable for several months to sell his wheat at a profit; and what is the consequence? If he holds on to his crop, or sells it at a loss, in other case his bills to the store-keeper are unpaid. At the present moment there is universal complaint of trade from that quarter. The retail merchant of the West says that his fall stock has been so badly and unprofitably sold that he cannot pay for purchases that he made in the [illegible]s, therefore, to supply only immediate wants. The effect of this on the laborer appears in the fact stated in Western newspapers, that farm hands have been discharged in unusual quantities. No class in the United States can felicitate itself at this condition of affairs. The farmer, however, who obtains our great exports of cotton, grain, and petroleum at low prices, has a greater advantage than direct consumers in the depression here which produces this because his customers embrace all commercial nations; and our wealthy farmer is consequently less appreciated, although vastly affects him.

question is one of great interest when pression will terminate and trade shall ed. There are few subjects on which ach diversity of opinion; but whatever are any signs of real improvement we ment them with great satisfaction.

ly individuals suppose that we are now road to specie payments; and they cordially agree that, until that position is ed, and its full effects felt and overcome, will be no improvement in trade. And a still more extensive and more sagacious suppose that gold will not fall much, if any, y its present price; that it will remain n only temporarily; that its fall to nearly a level with legal tenders has been discounted in the price of many commodities; and they have acted on this view, and given partial activity to trade during the past week.

If we shall resch specie payments by any process now on foot, the former class will come out right; if not, then the latter class will become the wiser. It is material, therefore, to know precisely how the case stands.

Mr. SECRETARY BOUTWELL, in his December report, made to Congress, stated that it will not be wise to resume specie payments while so large a part of the interest-bearing debt of the country shall be represented by five-twenty bonds, and held by European merchants, bankers, and manufacturers. He asked authority from Congress to be permitted to redeem the legal-tender currency at the rate of two millions of dollars per month, in order to bring us gradually and safely to resumption, on a condition when the resumption of specie payments will be easy, if not unavoidable." It can scarcely be supposed, therefore, when the Treasury Department, in its recent policy of putting down the price of gold, intends to reach specie payments without delay, what was deemed necessary in December. The Funding bill contains some provisions which look to this end; but the opinion widely prevails that it will not be adopted by the House of Representatives. It is safe, therefore, to conclude that to reach specie payments during the present administration is not only not expected, but impossible. The apprehension that we are going there stands in the way of trade; its removal must have the effect to promote activity.

The circumstances favorable to some activity seem to consume, while there is that apprehension as a low, with the exception, perhaps, of cotton, as they are likely to be; thus no advantage will be derived from a delay in resumption, that Europe will be obliged to take our surplus of grain and petroleum at improved prices, and could not do exactly the proper conclusion and that the supply of our forty millions of population is an immense affair, although their consumption is not at the highest standard.

A conversation with a distinguished merchant from Berlin, who arrived only a few days ago, he said, "Gold is ordinarily down to par here, owing to the harvest of last year, and the very cold and changeable weather of the winter, we shall need from you." This is the opinion and the cereal markets for grain have stiffened; and it is clear that there will be a still larger improvement in the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, has been reached, and that the better part of the country, and that the present, has been reached, and that the better not let the occasion pass without stating that the condition of affairs is not satisfactory.

AN INSTANT DUTY.

THE case of Mr. Consul PHILLIPS, at Santiago de Cuba, as stated in a letter to the Tribune, is one that requires the active interference of the Government. Mr. PHILLIPS appears to have done the State Department expressing views which were distasteful to some persons in Santiago. Those persons, through the Spanish Consul, if not to assassinate him. He applied to the Governor for protection, and the Governor told him that he had no authority, and that, as he could not protect him. Thereupon the American Consul, under protection of the English Consul, went on board a French steamer and departed.

If this story be true it is inexpressibly humiliating. And there is no doubt that it is true. Nothing is thus done a serious injury to the Cuban cause. But assuming it to be true, the Government should at once relieve the Governor-General of Cuba that as his subordinates are unable to protect American citizens and officers, that more competent persons should be sent. If this story be true, would an apology be a sufficient atonement. The circumstances show that it is an offense which will not be permitted upon the first occasion; and, therefore, the United States should require the punishment of those whose conduct drove the Consul to find safety in flight. If civilized government has disappeared in Cuba we certainly need no longer consult it. It has ceased to exist by its responsibility. The stories of the ferocity of the Spanish volunteers are not new. It is not for the Government that they have to be masters of the Governor-General; and it is very important that we should sift such reports when we receive apparently reliable.

No better opportunity can offer than this. Let the Government show that it will not tolerate the slightest disregard by Spanish officials of an indifference to the smallest right, not only of the representatives of the country, but of the most private and friendless American citizen. And while it is inquiring let the Government also investigate the statement from Cape Haytien that an officer of the United States steamer SCORN boarded by force a Danish schooner in that port, under pretense that the republic of San Domingo is under the protection of the United States, and that the Danish vessel was carrying contraband of war. While we take care that our citizens are not oppressed, let us see also that they do not oppress. The remembrance of the affair at Greytown is by no means a proud one.

NOTES.

THE Christian Union is correct. Technically the United States have not been neutral between Spain and Cuba. Our laws, as we have continually stated, permit Spain advantages in our ports which they deny to Cuba, because Cuba is not an independent Power nor a recognized belligerent. But money has been remitted, in such amount as we have shown no hostility to either party, and has simply existed upon a faithful observance of our own laws.

SENATOR CREAMER, a Democratic politician in the city of New York, whose sources of income are unknown, and who is ample, said the other day in the New York Legislature, "I trust that all other legislation will in a manner cease until we have passed a bill that will protect the people in ballot-box, and give the people of New York in fact what they have not only in name—a republican form of government ——. What a farce it is for us to sit here and legislate as representatives of a republican government, when the election system upon which such a government rests has been undermined, and is as corrupt as hell!" Last September the World said that its editor "saw by what shameless and cunning frauds the corrupt politicians of the Ring as WILLIAM M. TWEED and GARET HALL cut down below its level the rightful majority of the election of GEORGE SEYMOUR. Yet Mr. CREAMER and the World now claim to be "honest" Democrats because they have voted with that gave the name "GARET HALL" the appointments of Police Commissioners.

CONGRESS has decided, and wisely, not to pursue polygamy with fire and sword. There are always against bigamy, and if these can not be enforced in a polygamous community the consequences of defying them by the secret police will be disastrous. There is no proof that the Mormons are seeking to defy the subject; and it is probably clear that the resistless Westward roll of civilization, and time, which will presently remove Brigham Young, will also peacefully dispose of this "twin relic of barbarism."

THE editor of a certain Magazine in Philadelphia (not Lippincott's) read an anonymous remark in the Galaxy, that Thompson Chapel was the known literary gentlemen, by name, as the writer, and a quantity of gross plagiarism. He proceeded to lecture him upon "copying blunders" and "stolen apples." The gentleman in question, and a gentleman of wholesome views. What right, he demands of the editor, had you "to suppose" in such a matter? We think that to be treated as a criminal impersonality, and to make a supposition the ground of a public accusation of literary dishonesty is the most unwarrantable. The castigator chooses his words, and each one rings and tells. The offense which he punishes, as he justly says, "casts a taint on professional feeling." Let us who are of the literary profession in the least respect our calling, if we can not shine in it.

THE College Review reported a speech of the Rev. MR. FROTHINGHAM'S at the dinner of the Harvard Club, and was promptly denounced by him certain views in regard to the Indians. The error was pointed out to the editor, and he corrected it with an apology. Mr. FROTHINGHAM he had added that MR. FROTHINGHAM held peculiar views on "certain social topics," which, had it been true, could has been mentioned for no other purpose than to excite prejudice against MR. FROTHINGHAM. The editor's explanation, being drawn to this point, he says that, as he "unequivocally condemned" the sentiments attributed to Balaam, he was "surely justified" in alluding to the newspaper reports of the speaker's views upon other subjects! Let us suppose that a newspaper, hating B's views upon the tariff, should consider himself justified in remarking that B was popularly supposed to be inclined to stealing, or we "justified" in repeating scandal about persons whose supposed views we do not like?

GOVERNOR CHAMBERLAIN of Maine lately returned a bill to the Legislature prohibiting the sale of liquors, which he says seemed to him in its provisions "extraordinary and tinged with grave doubts" even in his mind; but as the bill had passed both Houses without opposition, he had signed it. Now it seems to us that this was precisely the case for which the veto power is provided. The intention of that power is not to defeat, but to perfect legislation. If, therefore, serious objections occur to the Governor which, presumably, have not occurred to the Legislature, he returns the bill with the objections. If the Legislature is of opinion that they are valid, it does not pass the vote. If not, it would—in this case—affirm its previous opinion, and the law be enacted. The veto power is because the objections would have been weighed. It is urged in defense of GOVERNOR HOFFMAN'S signature of the Erie bill in the State, that he had received very little opposition in the Legislature; but that was a fact which, under the circumstances, should have made it still more suspicious to the Governor.

A VERY striking complement to SENATOR REVELS'S statement of the Southern condition of affairs during the war is furnished by MR. EDWARD A. POLLARD in an article in Lippincott's Magazine for April. MR. POLLARD was one of the most thorough of rebels; but he says of the freedman, that he shows "a capacity for education that has astonished none more than his former masters; that he has given proofs of good citizenship which are constantly increasing; that his development since emancipation is a standing surprise to candid observers among the Southern whites themselves; that his condition since then has been, on the whole, that of progress, and in the face of difficulties that would soon have tested and broken down that progress had it been factitious or dishonest; and that, so far from being a stationary barbarian or a hopeless retrograde, the formerly despised black man promises to become the foremost follower of the highest civilization, a new object of interest to the world, and an exemplary creation of the Almighty."

THE great popularity of Paris with Americans who visit the continent of Europe, and make that magnificent capital their head-quarters while abroad, has drawn to it quite a large colony of American bankers, whose houses offer not only the necessary financial facilities to our traveling countrymen, but furnish pleasant reading rooms, where the principal American newspapers and magazines may be found, and information afforded for receiving and writing letters, social intercourse, etc. Among the houses recently established in Paris is that of DREXEL & CO., Philadelphia banking firm of DREXEL & CO. Their Paris office is situated in the Rue Scribe, where they propose to transact all kinds of banking business, with special reference to the wants of the traveling public. They also take charge of correspondence or papers directed to their care, and of sundry baggage, specie, and other valuables that may be deposited with them. Travellers who intrust their affairs to them will find them fulfilled in other dealings, and in every way worthy of confidence.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 21.—In the Senate, the greater part of the day was taken up in debate on the Georgia bill, the question being upon MR. DRAKE'S amendment, admitting the State only on condition that any section of the State represented to be in insurrection, should have been taken.——In the House, a large number of new bills were introduced, among them several to aid the Pacific railroads, and one to repeal the act of 1862 and 1867, and one for the protection of commerce and amity with Mexico, by encouraging our own citizens to aid the Juarez party.——Adjourned to Monday.

March 22.—In the Senate, a bill was reported to promote the civilization of Indians, and to prepare them for the rights and duties of citizenship. In the case of General ARMY, as Senator ELLIOT from Mississippi, was elected in January, but whose seat was not admitting to discuss treaties in open session was rejected.——In the House, a bill to aid the Pacific railroads, which was discussed at length, but not acted on.

March 23.—In the House, a bill to the Senate, and very little to the House, and numerous petitions received. Resolutions offered in reference to the decline of American commerce, and to the Cuban question, but not on the Speaker's table. The consideration of the Utah Territorial bill was resumed, and after brief discussion the bill was passed by a vote of 94 to 52.

March 24.—The Senate spent the session on the San Domingo treaty.——The principal business in the House was the bill to amend the Internal Revenue laws on the sale of cadetships, the substance of which was that there would be no sale of cadetships.——The Committee reported a bill requiring cadets to reside one year in the district.

March 28.—Among the bills introduced in the Senate was one to provide for the reduction of the army.——A large number of petitions were received by the House, but provides further for reducing the number of the army to 25,000.——Among the bills reported was one to increase the mail steamship service between this country and Brazil and Japan.——In the House, the debate on the Tariff was resumed, and occupied the principal part of the day.

March 30.—The Senate was not in session.——The House gave the whole day to debate on the Tariff bill.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

The only business of general importance in the New York Legislature, since our last issue, was done on Thursday, March 24, when the Metropolitan Police Act of New York city and county was repealed, and the Governor's bill, which was in a third reading in Committee of the Whole, was passed by a majority of 16.——Another measure of importance was the House to reconsult the Police bill, with instructions to strike out the enacting clause. The question was divided, and the enacting clause was stricken out by a vote of 73 to 56, an effort to reconsider the vote failed. The Supervisors bill and the new Charter were passed the same day, enacting clauses being stricken out by a vote of 67 to 48. A motion to reconsider the vote was lost by 70 to 48 and on the Supervisors bill was refused. These results will have very important consequences, and are followed by a combination of Democrats and Republicans to defeat measures which the Governor was freely said to influence for the benefit of the Democratic party, and at one time a serious division in their ranks was imminent.

General Pleasonton has been confirmed as Collector of Internal Revenue for the New York district, in place of Bailey, removed.

Pierre Soulé died at New Orleans March 26, aged sixty-nine.

The mine which broke out in the Gold Hill mines, Nevada, a year ago, is said to be still smouldering among the timbers, 700 feet below the surface.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Emperor of France has written a letter to M. Ollivier, suggesting a number of important civil reforms, decidedly liberal, and therefore distasteful to France. They relate mainly to the division of legislative power between the Chambers. The Ministers, it is said, indorse the plan, and one of the opposition journals declares it to be "the complete of the parliamentary regime," while another terms it "an act of abdication of the Emperor's power."

The trial of PRINCE PIERRE BONAPARTE, for the murder of VICTOR NOIR, before the Peers, the jury returning a verdict of not guilty in the absence of malice, held in custody under a demand for damages amounting to 100,000 francs, which he is unable to command. The news of his acquittal was received in Paris and elsewhere with much excitement.

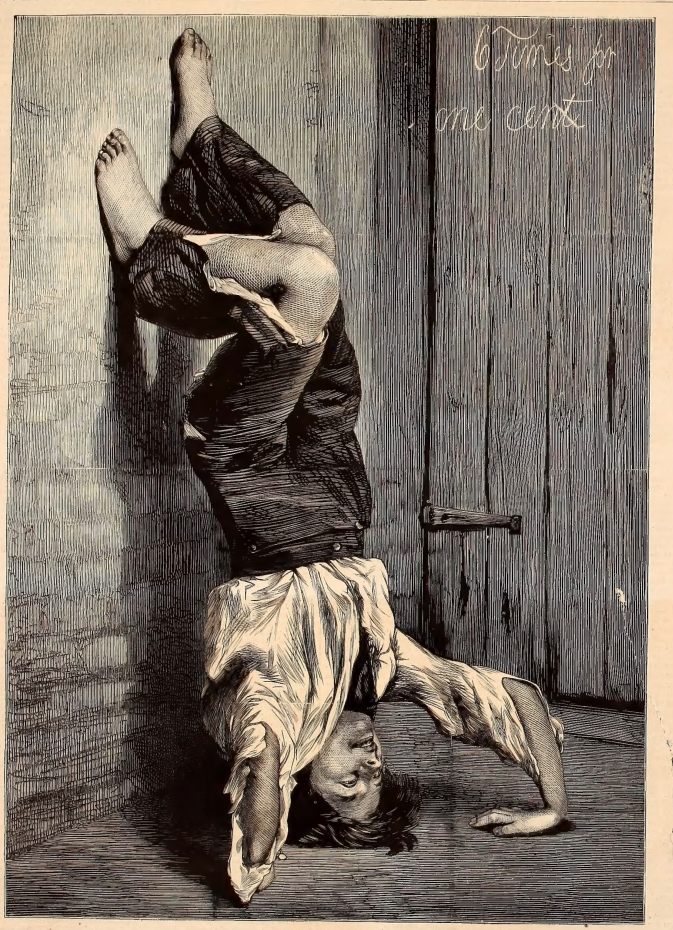
Another strike among the workmen at La Creuzot, France, has occurred, and the Government have a political tendency.

The cause of persons accused of conspiracy in the recent plot against the life of Napoleon are to be brought before the court now in session at Tours.

In the British House of Commons a bill for the suppression of disorders in Ireland has been under discussion. A stringent clause, providing for the prosecution of the press of that country, has been adopted by a majority of 35.

The Irish Church Convention at Dublin has decided to invest a portion of their funds in American securities.

In Belgium, Count Theodul Meeüs has instructed the Catholic General to order elections for Deputies from Ghent to the Senate, should the condition of affairs in the island permit.



SIX TIMES FOR ONE CENT.

MODERN ART.

IF the Arts are to flourish among us, says John Ruskin in one of his Oxford lectures, we must recover for the mass of the nation three requisites which they at present want: 1. Wholesomeness of food. We must no longer allow them to eat and drink poison instead of food; every thing provided for their daily sustenance must be good and pure as well as plentiful. 2. Wholesomeness and decency in dress. It must be such as becomes their rank—serviceable and good, and, at the same time, becoming and in good taste. 3. We must improve their lodgings. All ecclesiastical architecture is developed for civil and domestic building, and its highest achievement may be said to be a "glorified roof." Now in this our modern architects are strangely at fault; they seem hardly to know what to do with a roof. Roofs ought never to be built of iron, but always of wood or stone. And we must remember that the little roofs must be built before the large ones. We must see that the poor have houses suited to them, built as strongly as possible, and daintily decorated.

All arts are founded on agriculture by the hand, and on the feeding, dressing, and lodging of the people. Christian Art was only possible where kings and knights were compelled to care for their people, and it disappeared when kings became tyrants, devourers of the people. The health of Art depends on its reference to industrial use. It is from this use that it first arises. In order to eat and drink, we must have the cup and platter, and especially the cup. In order that we may use this cup conveniently, it must have a handle. To fill the cup, we must have a pitcher of some sort; this pitcher, if it is to be carried safely, must have two handles. Now in these same articles of use have been developed the most beautiful lines and types of severe composition that have ever been attained to in Art.

We can not have any right architectural Art, or morality, or happiness in cities such as now deface our country. They are not built, they are rather dotted and congealed in shapeless, hideous blotches over the land which they consume. We must, if we would have Art, have beautiful cities, not overgrown in size, encircled with gardens and shaded with trees: we must banish far from us all the manufactures which need the aid of huge furnaces of fire; or at least we must reduce them to the smallest possible limit. At present England triumphs in her commerce: she is deaf with spinning-wheels, yet her children have not clothes to wear; she is black with fuel, yet they cry aloud for food; she has sold her soul for gold, yet they die of hunger.

Religious Art can not be used unless if we remember that God inhabits cottages as well as churches, and that in the former as well as in the latter He ought to be well lodged. Put the Arts to universal use, and we shall find in them a universal inspiration and benediction; let every thing be equally sacred, equally divine—Art will be divine wherever it is truly fair and serviceable. God has made every thing beautiful in its kind and in its proper place; His will is that all His creatures should be happy. His Spirit teaches the ant her path and the bird its flight, and men whatever noble Art is possible for them. It dwells in light and in strength; in the possession of It is all your peace and all your power. But there exists also an evil spirit, whose dominion is in blindness and cowardice; which tells us that evil things are pardonable, and that we shall not die for them; and that good things are impossible, and that you can not live for them. Good things are impossible only to those who listen to this evil spirit, and so despair of attaining to what is good. Remember always that all things lovely and righteous are possible, if only you believe in their possibility, and manfully set to work to promote them with your very heart and soul.

GRAND PONTIFICAL PROCESSION PASSING THE CASTLE OF SAINT ANGELO.

SCENES IN ROME.

THE first of our illustrations on this page represents a grand pontifical procession, on the fête day of the Madonna, passing the bridge of the Castle of St. Angelo. It shows the state carriage of the Sovereign Pontiff, preceded by his cross-bearer mounted on a richly-caparisoned mule.

The second illustration represents the Pope in the act of saluting the foot of the celebrated statue of St. Peter, which stands in the great cathedral that bears his name. A metallic halo surrounds the head of the statue, and in his right hand is grasped the emblematic key. In all the great pageants which occur within the cathedral this colossal statue rises conspicuous above the heads of the crowd, like the presiding genius of the place. There is a dispute among antiquarians whether this is an authentic statue of the Apostle, or one adapted to the purpose from among the heathen relics of Rome; but the faithful, ignorant of the controversy, pay their unquestioning devotions at the foot of the statue, and signify their reverence by devoutly kissing the projecting toe of the left foot. Before applying his lips the votary wipes the toe with his cuff, by way of preparation, and the effect of this contact, incessantly repeated through many ages, is visible in the very sensible diminution and the polished smoothness of its extremity.

ADORATION OF THE STATUE OF ST. PETER.

HOME.

HOMEWARD from my work returning,
Lo! a lamp with steady ray,
In my distant window burning,
Welcomed me at close of day;
O'er the darkening fields it gleamed,
And of rest the symbol seemed.

Thankfully I saw that token—
Shining on me from afar—
Of domestic peace unbroken;
And I hailed it as the star
Which through all my life had shed
Cheering radiance on my head.

Oh! the joy of fireside blessings,
Children's voices, smile of wife—
Bliss of infantile caressings,
Heart-refreshing wine of life—
Purple glow of off-to-the-duties
Lingering still about our skies.

On the wall the fire-light dances,
As joy dances in our hearts;
Interchange of kindly glances
Mutual happiness imparts:
Heavenly watchers from above
Hover o'er that scene of love.

Now the long day's labor ending,
Under our own roof are we,
And the brow of Care unbending
By Love's hand is smoothed and blest:
One such hour may well repay
Hardest toil of longest day.

Blessed be the God of Heaven,
God of all earth's families,
Who to weary men has given
Homes of comfort—sweet ones,
Wells and palm-trees, smile and song—
As to Heaven they match along.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by LEARY & BROTHER, in the Office of the Librarian of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.)

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

Continued.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-THIRD.

SEEDS OF THE FUTURE. (THIRD SOWING.)

The dance had reached its climax of animation when Blanche reappeared in the scene of its duties; and the ranks of the company had been recruited, in his absence, by the last person whom it was now his foremost object to approach.

Receiving, with supple submission, a reproof for his prolonged absence from the child of the servants, Bishopriggs—keeping his one observant eye carefully on the look-out—busied himself in promoting the circulation of ices and cool drinks.

While he was thus occupied, his attention was attracted by two persons who, in very different ways, stood out prominently as marked characters among the rank and file of the guests.

The first person was a vivacious, irascible old gentleman, who persisted in treating the undeniable fact of his age on the footing of a scandalous false report set afloat by Time. He was unmistakably proud and padded. His hair, his teeth, and his complexion were triumphs of artificial youth. When he was not occupied among the youngest women present—which was very seldom—he attached himself exclusively to the youngest men. He insisted on joining every dance. Twice he measured his length upon the grass; but nothing daunted him. He was whizzing again, with another young woman, at the next dance, as if nothing had happened. Inquiry revealed the effervescent old gentleman might be, Bishopriggs discovered that he was a retired officer in the navy; and, consequently (among his relations) was "The Tartar;" more formally described in society as Captain Newcombe, the last male representative of one of the oldest families in England.

The second person, who appeared to occupy a position of distinction at the dance in the glade, was a lady.

To the eye of Bishopriggs, she was a miracle of beauty, with a small fortune for a poor man, carried about her in silk, lace, and jewels. The woman present was the object of such special attention among the men as this fascinating and priceless creature. She sat fanning herself with a matchless work of art (supposed to be a handkerchief) representing an infant Bacchus in the midst of an ocean of lace. She was surrounded by a little court of admirers, who fetched and carried at her slightest nod, like well-trained dogs. Sometimes they brought refreshments, which she had asked for; only to refuse taking them when they came. Sometimes they brought information of what was going on among the dancers, which the lady had been eager to receive when they went away, and in which she had ceased to feel the smallest interest when they came back. Every body busy but one ejaculation of distress when she was asked to undertake the chief direction from the dinner, and answered, "My poor nerves." Every body said, "What should we have done without you?"—when she doubted if she had done wisely in joining the party at all. Inquiring who this favored lady might be, Bishopriggs discovered that she was the niece of the indomitable old gentleman who would dance—or, more plainly still, no less a person than his contemplated customer, Mrs. Glenarm.

With all his enormous assurance Bishopriggs was daunted when he found himself facing the question of what he was to do next.

To open negotiations with Mrs. Glenarm, under present circumstances, was for a man in his position, simply impossible. But, apart from this, the prospect of profitably addressing himself to that lady in the future, was by no means free of it, beset with difficulties of no common kind.

Supposing the chance of disclosing Geoffrey's position to her to be found—what would she do when she received her warning? She would in all probability apply to one of two formidable men, both of whom were interested in the matter. If she went straight to the man accused of attempting to destroy her, at a time when he was already engaged to another woman—Bishopriggs would find himself confronted with a witness on that terrible fist, which had justly terrified him even on a distant and cursory view. If, on the other hand, she placed her interests in the care of her uncle—Bishopriggs had only to look at the captain, and to calculate his chances of exposing terms on a man who owed Life a bill of more than sixty years' date, and who openly defied time to recover the debt.

With these serious obstacles standing in the way, what was Bishopriggs to do? Any alternative left was to approach Mrs. Glenarm under shelter of the dark.

Reaching this conclusion, Bishopriggs decided to ascertain from the servants what the lady's future movements might be; and, thus prepared, to startle her by anonymous warnings, conveyed through the post, and claiming their answer through the advertising column of a newspaper. Here was the certainty of alarming her, coupled with the certainty of not compromising himself. Until Mrs. Glenarm drawn, when she capriciously stopped a servant going by with some glasses of lemonade, that the wretched old creature who offered the tray contemplated corresponding with her leader in any way—or with any body—was the letter of her "Well-Wisher" and her "True Friend."

The evening advanced. The shadows lengthened. The waters of the lake grew pitchy black. The gliding of the ghostly swans was less easy. The gilding of the flowers of the party thought of the drive home. The juniors (excepting Captain Newcombe) began to flag on the dance. Little by little the comfortable attractions of the house—tea, coffee, and candle-light in snug rooms—recovered their influence. The guests abandoned the glade; and the fingers and lungs of the musicians were relieved at last.

Lady Lundie and her party were the first to send for the carriage and my farewell: the breaking up of the household at Windygates on the next day, and the journey south, being sufficient apology for our early departure. Before half an hour more the only visitors left were the guests staying at Swanhaven Lodge.

The carriages from the neighborhood of Kirkandrew were paid and dismissed.

"I've got my six concerns to think of," was the reply returned to the servant who had enumerated and addressed to him. The "concerns" alluded to, comprehended, among other matters, the return of the guests from Kirkandrew the next day—with a reference, in case of inquiries, to his convenient friend at the Kirkandrew Arms. As for the actual destination—to be kept a secret from every body —was Perth. The neighborhood of this town, dependent on the safety of her own maid—was the part of Scotland to which the rich widow contemplated retiring, when the London season was in two days' time. At Perth, Bishopriggs knew of more than one place in which he could get private information—and at Perth he determined to make his first anonymous advances to Mrs. Glenarm.

The remainder of the evening passed quietly enough at the Lodge.

Lady Lundie, sleepy and dull after the excitement of the day. Mrs. Glenarm retired early to Perry's room—the professional duty of only person left up in the house. He was understood to be in his study, preparing an address to the electors—and at Perth he remained to make his first anonymous advances to Mrs. Glenarm.

The remin

"Who is he?"

"Your friend, Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn."

Arnold sprang to his feet in ungovernable surprise.

"I appear to astonish you," remarked Sir Patrick.

Arnold sat down again, and waited, ir speechless suspense, to hear what was coming next.

"I have reason to know," said Sir Patrick, "that Mr. Delamayn is thoroughly well acquainted with the nature of Miss Silvester's present troubles. What his actual connection is with them, and how he came into possession of his information, I have not found out. My discovery begins and ends with the simple fact that he has the information."

"May I ask one question, Sir Patrick?"

"What is it?"

"How did you find out about Geoffrey Delamayn?"

"It would occupy a long time," answered Sir Patrick, "to tell you how—and it is not at all necessary to our purpose that you should know. My present obligation merely binds me to tell you—in strict confidence, mind!—that Miss Silvester's secrets are no secrets to Mr. Delamayn. I leave to your discretion the use you may make of that information. You are now entirely on a par with me in relation to your knowledge of the case of Miss Silvester. Let us return to the question which I asked you when we first came into the room. Do you see the connection, now, between that question, and what I have just said since?"

Arnold was slow to see the connection. His mind was running on Sir Patrick's discovery. Little dreaming that he was indebted to Mrs. Inchbare's incomplete description of him for his own escape from detection, he was wondering how it had happened that he had escaped unsuspected, while Geoffrey's position had been (in part at least) revealed to view.

"I asked you," resumed Sir Patrick, attempting to help him, "why the mere report that your friend was likely to marry Mrs. Glenarm roused your indignation, and you hesitated at giving an answer. Do you hesitate still?"

"It's not easy to give an answer, Sir Patrick."

"Let us put it in another way. I assume that your view of the report takes its rise in your knowledge, on your part, of Mr. Delamayn's private affairs. Am I on the rent of us don't possess—Is that conclusion correct?"

"Quite correct."

"In what you know about Mr. Delamayn connected with any thing that you know about Miss Silvester?"

If Arnold had felt himself at liberty to answer that question, Sir Patrick's suspicions would have been satisfied, but Sir Patrick's resolution would have forced a full disclosure from him before he left the house.

It was getting on to midnight. The first hour of the wedding-day was at hand, as the Truth made the last effort to struggle into light. The dark Phantoms of Trouble and Terror to come were waiting near them both at that moment. Arnold hesitated again—hesitated until Sir Patrick paused for his answer. The clock in the hall struck the quarter to twelve.

"I can't tell you!" said Arnold.

"Is it a secret?"

"Yes."

"Committed to your honor?"

"Doubly committed to my honor."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that Geoffrey and I have quarrelled since he took me into his confidence. I am doubly bound to respect his confidence after that."

"Is the cause of your quarrel a secret also?"

"Yes."

Sir Patrick looked Arnold steadily in the face.

"I have felt an inveterate distrust of Mr. Delamayn from the first," he said. "Answer me this. Have you any reason to think—when we first talked about your friend in the summer-house at Inglegrave—that your opinion of him might have been the right one after all?"

"He has bitterly disappointed me," answered Arnold. "I can say no more."

"You have had very little experience of the world," remarked Sir Patrick, "or you must have just acknowledged that you have had reason to distrust your experience of your friend. Are you quite sure that you are acting wisely in keeping his secret from me? Are you quite sure that you will not repent the course you are taking to-night?" He laid a marked emphasis on those last words. "Think, Arnold," he added, kindly. "Think before you answer."

"I feel bound in honor to keep his secret," said Arnold. "No thinking can alter that."

Sir Patrick rose, and brought the interview to an end.

"There is nothing more to be said." With those words he gave Arnold his hand, and, pressing it cordially, wished him good-night.

Going out into the hall, Arnold found Blanche alone, looking at the barometer.

"The glass is at Set Fair, my darling," he whispered. "Good-night for the last time!"

He took her in his arms, and kissed her. At the moment when he released her Blanche slipped a little note into his hand.

"Read it," she whispered, "when you are alone at the inn."

So they parted on the eve of their wedding-day.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FIFTH.

THE DAY.

The promise of the weather-glass was fulfilled. The sun shone on Blanche's marriage.

At nine in the morning the first of the proceedings of the day began. It was essentially of a clandestine nature. The bride and bridegroom evaded the restraints of lawful authority, and presumed to meet together privately, before they were married, in the conservatory at Hum Farm.

"You have read my letter, Arnold?"

"I have come here to answer it, Blanche. But why not have told me? Why write?"

"Because I put off telling you so long; and because I didn't know how you might take it; and for fifty other reasons. Never mind! I've made my confession. I haven't a single secret now which is not your secret too. There's time to say No, Arnold, if you think I ought to have my room in the house for you to-day. Say No, uncle tells me I am obstinate and wrong in refusing to have you here. Say No, and leave him, say the word, dear, before you make me your wife."

"Shall I tell you what I said to Sir Patrick last night?"

"About this?"

"Yes. The confession (as you call it) which you make in your pretty note, is the very thing that I myself should have come to tell you, in this room before I went away. He told me your heart was set on having me here. And he asked me what I meant to do about it when we were married."

"And you said—?"

Arnold repeated his answer to Sir Patrick, with fervid embellishments of the original language, suitable to the occasion. Blanche's delight expressed itself in the form of two unlooked-for interruptions, two unexpected disclosure succession. She threw her arms round Arnold's neck; and she actually kissed him, there in broad daylight, in presence of the old Church sanctioned her in taking that proceeding. But a woman's privilege is not blame her. These are the consequences of free institutions.

"Now," said Arnold, "it's my turn to take you to task. I have a letter to show you before we are married as well as you. Only there's this difference between us—I want you to help me."

"Who are you going to write to?"

"To my friend in Edinburgh. There will be no time unless I do it now. We start for Switzerland this afternoon—don't we?"

"Yes."

"Very well. I want to relieve your mind, my darling, before we go. Some one has got to know—while we are away—that the right person is on the look-out for Miss Silvester? Sir Patrick has told me of the fix she is in, and she has been traced to—and my lawyer will set to work to-morrow. Can you suggest how to put it in the proper language, and the whole thing will be in train."

"Why, Arnold, can I ever love you enough to reward you for this?"

"We shall see, Blanche—in Switzerland."

They audaciously penetrated, arm in arm, into Sir Patrick's own study—entirely at their disposal for the hour, at the request of the host himself. With Sir Patrick's pens and Sir Patrick's paper they composed the letter of instructions, deliberately reopening the investigation which Sir Patrick's superior wisdom had closed. Neither pains nor money were to be spared, it was directed in at once taking measures (beginning at Glasgow) to find the lost girl. A report of the result was to be addressed to Arnold, under cover to Sir Patrick at Ham Farm. By the time the letter was complete had decided it was nearly ten to ten o'clock. Blanche left Arnold to array herself in her bridal splendor—after another outrage on propriety, and many consequences, I fear, to institutions.

The next proceedings were of a public and avowable nature, and strictly followed the customary precedents on such occasions.

Village children strewed flowers on the path to the church door (and sent in the bill the same day). Village women dropped curtsies (and got drunk on their money the same evening). There was the proper and awful pause while the bride's name was being written in the vestry. There was the proper and pitiless staring of all the female spectators when the bride came out of the altar. There was the clergyman's preliminary look at the license—which meant official caution. And there was the fee, duly handed over to the bridegroom—which meant official fees. All the women cried (except the bride's aunt and agent); and all the men appeared to be out of it.

Then the service began—rightly-considered, the most solemn and beautiful of ceremonies—the service which binds two human beings who know nothing of each other's natures, to risk the tremendous responsibility of living together till death parts them—the service which says, in solemn truth, Take your leap in the dark: we sanctify, but we don't insure, it!

The ceremony went on, without the slightest obstacle to man its effect. There were no unforeseen interruptions. There were no ominous mistakes.

The last words were spoken, and the book was closed. They signed their names in the register; the husband was congratulated; the bride was embraced; they received the guests at the house, with more flowers strewn at their feet. The wedding-breakfast was hurried; the wedding-cake was cut; the bride's aunt was seen to be wasted, if the young couple were to catch the tidal train.

In an hour more the carriage had whirled them away to the station, and the guests had given them the farewell cheer from the steps of the house. Young, happy, fondly attached to each other, raised securely above all the sordid cares of life, what a golden future was theirs! Married with the sanction of the Family and the blessing of the Church—who could suppose that the time was coming, nevertheless, when the lighting quietness would fall on them, in the spring-time of their love: Are you Man and Wife?

TEETH AND THE TOOTHACHE.

MOST of us are concerned at the loss of teeth which we fain would preserve, and we dread the remedy—artificial teeth. The immense number of dentists, and the importance to which the science of dentistry has attained, are very strong arguments in support of the theory that our teeth are deteriorating. That the dental profession must be a profitable one needs no argument beyond a glance at the fancy flowery advertisements which crowd our papers, arguing very numerous and well wadded purses. No one who has been compelled to wear false teeth can understand to what an extent they are at once a comfort and a nuisance. The improvement in appearance, in articulation, and the great advantage of better mastication, are benefits evident to require further mention. These benefits, of course, depend very much on the fitness of the material employed, a point on which ingenuity has proved to find the best-looking and hardest substances for teeth; I have known at least two persons who patronized no invention whatever. One gentleman had a very fine molar drawn, in consequence of aching unendurably; but when next he looked as white and sound as a tooth could look; so, with great presence of mind, my friend stopped the dentist as he was about to close the forceps, and asked him to reinsert the tooth. After a little manœuvre, this operation was accomplished. The tooth did service beautifully, and I have it still a dozen years afterward as useful and tightly-fitting a molar as any in the whole set. But this is much exceeded in the case of a gentleman very well known to me, who, having suffered a great deal from toothache, and had, at intervals, several teeth extracted, resolved to be preserved, and, at last, being forced to revisit the dentist, and finding that it was necessary for him to lose two more, he heroically determined on the loss of the whole left row. He had them with these, and the teeth already "in stock," so that in a very capital set fitted, which he wore for many years.

The extraction of so many teeth at once seems a great trial to nerve; but some persons have such a horror of toothache that nothing causes more terror in their estimation; and, not very many years ago, a young fellow in the neighborhood of London hanged himself in sheer despair at the continual pain he suffered—pain which is, I must be excused for here depressing, intolerable to restless, than any other I have known.

It must be admitted that our dumb animals suffer from toothache. Every one has read how Jumbo, the elephant at the old Exeter Change, went mad from it; and it is popularly supposed that it is often a cause of madness in dogs, and I really think it very probable. Then, how many seek the sympathy and aid of their masters; for I have known a poor old cat come moaning time after time to me for attention to her teeth—a surgeon who was visiting at the house first suggested cod-liver oil as the means of dissolution of one person, more skilled then the others, possibly, in the management of our dumb companions, had the animal held, and rather heavily too, and relieved the poor creature. I once knew a man who was noted as the terror of a pack of hounds, as he was the head of a very different cat—the patient being a fine leopard in the Regent's Park Gardens. An advertisement in the papers of the time, I think, I may be excused from any lengthy detail. When the animal was secured, and the mouth of course, which ailed the animal, they had a small but very strong sack made, and with this, after much trouble, succeeded in bagging the leopard. His mouth, of course, was left out, the sack being drawn tightly round his neck. The operation was attended with complete success by the dentist; his tooth was drawn, and he recovered; but, unhappily, he died a few days after, having got plunge he burnt the sack, and, thrusting his head through the opening, drove his talons deep into the arm of a keeper, tearing and lacerating the man fearfully.

I have seen this subject without advising my readers that the following recipe, for which I am indebted to the Lancet, and which ought to be made as widely known as possible, will really cure the most maddening toothache: One drachm of chloroform added to two drachms of Calvert's carbolic acid; a gelatinous mass is precipitated, a small portion of which inserted in the cavity of a decaying tooth invariably gives immediate relief. Observe, this is for the teeth only, not the gums.

The worst of a slight flaw in the tooth is that the tongue will never leave it alone; but, although it will not benefit itself by the practice, it will sit on poking away at it until more and more mischief is the consequence. It is impossible to say to unresponsible to some persons, that they employ artificial means to excite it. A frequent picking of the tooth is very common and very dangerous way; but in the case of a musician I was once acquainted with, and a great deal with dangerous and lunatic-like plaything in his mouth. For thirty years he persisted in the practice, picking the pin every few weeks, by which time it would have become almost black. Over and over again was he remonstrated with, but in vain; and at last one pin slipped down his throat, and he was found dead in his bed.

This anecdote recalls the fact that false teeth are not all comfort, and some little care must be taken to prevent such a catastrophe as that just alluded to; for instances have occurred of suffocation where the teeth have been pulled out by the food; soft food, such as batter-pudding or mashed potatoes, is what should be chiefly guarded against. It is impossible to avoid, in describing accidents of this kind, a certain ludicrous quality, however opposite the sentiment ought to be the person concerned; thus, when I mention that I have known a dog run away with two most expensive teeth, which had been detached by the adhesive qualities of some soft pudding, I know the reader will smile, although at the moment the incident was most alarming, and the teeth were only coughed up in time to save their owner from suffocation. Such is a gentleman very well known, and ranking very high as a tutor and a conductor of aspirants successfully through those examinations which are such barriers to the ambitious; he will remember, if he sees these lines, that I was staying at a strange house he left his teeth on his dressing-table, and how the house-maid threw them away, so that he had to be fed and sought after all over the dustbin.

Most wearers of false teeth take them out on going to bed, but some are obliged to remove them whenever they eat. This latter being the most spontaneous course, of course, would, I thought, their removal seems absurd—but it is true in many cases. Under the mouths of some persons are more difficult to clean than those of others I can not say; but it is certain that many who have lost their teeth go to a never-ending expense in trying to supply the loss, and in vain, while others are content to let existing substitutes as useful as it is possible for circumstances to be without delay or any but the first outlay. As my easily can imagined, this is the most economical of the pagliats, were frequent wearers of false teeth, that their finances allowed the outlay, and the contrast between those supplied with the borrowed incisors and the same man when they were out was often very whimsical—the most unlikely set of ten years would be made to his age by their absence. It is on record that in the middle of a "round" one of a gladiator contests lost his fictitious teeth, and so, with a word of apology to his adversary, who was engaged, he ran to a pal, who second and deposited in his care the costly invisories.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AN Irishman was seen at the trenches before Sebastopol, and asked what was the matter with him. His captain asked: "What are you doing out in Fatigue Party?" "Faith, captain, I gets out every night of the week, I'st sea feelin' for a furlough, sure." "Just there's no furloughs to-night," said the captain, as he briskly drawing it down, and grasping it with the other hand by the middle of the blood, a quiet exclamation of pain and humor passed over his face as he exclaimed, "An' faith, it's a double one!"

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Old Master Brown brought his favorite down,
His fine new Spitz dog, to the town;
"Anthony Blair, go sit you there
Among the ladies," he said.

So Anthony Blair, with a mortified air,
And his head hung down on his breast,
Went right away and sat all day
By the side of the ladies, as he was told.

ASSESSOR. "How is it, miss, that you are year age to the Register as only twenty-two? I was born in the same year myself, and, being thirty-nine, it must be—"

MISS. "Yes, sir." "Ah! but you see, Mr. Assessor, you have lived much faster than I."

A lawyer at Saco, Maine, is addressing a jury recently. Speaking of the patient way in which they divided his property among his two sons and then said: "Gentlemen, to-day is your birthday. You are, said, I go, but didn't: the other refused, and afterward changed his mind." The counsel on the other side and jury convinced the advocate that quoting Scripture was not his forte.

PARLOR SEWS—Chairs.

A WOMAN'S rights advocate insists that divorced women have a right to vote under the Fifteenth Amendment. She kindly provides that a bill of refuge shall not be denied or abridged on account of the color, or previous condition of servitude.

"Look here, captain," said an old Hooker Democrat addressing a colored brother the other day, "I don't want no Republicans." "Can't help dat, sir; de darkey can read."

A young man up a Western youth, who had been wheedled into a marriage which his subsequent judgment did not approve, consulted a sage for divorce. When the wife heard of it she was naturally indignant, and hastily provided herself with counsel to assign a reasonable cause for his proceedings. "You have married her," he said. "You know that before we were married," was the indignant answer. "Then," said the lawyer, "you have no case." "Why not?" "Because," said he, "you knew it."

"What time is it, Sambo?" "Good hair, sirree, and waterfall more than real hair, sir." "Why, you black rascal, I don't want to know what time it is, but what is the time of day?" "Oh, dat's what you call it, is it? Well, I'm sure I don't know, for I never wear one myself, and the youth were all dat I ever see."

HIGH WORDS—Dialogue in a balloon.

A YANKEE one day asked his lawyer how an heiress might be carried off. "You can not do it with safety," was the answer. "But I'll tell you what you may do. Let her mount a horse and hold a bridle in her hand. Then mount behind her, and you are safe, for one runs away with you." The next day the lawyer's client left with his own daughter who had run away with his client.

A person desiring a situation as teacher in Norwich advertised that he had "a large family." "I'll inform myself to you for that piece to the bound which I am well satisfied for any salary of most pleasing dualities, &c.

A YANKEE is said to have obtained a patent for a new safe. N.B.—It locks up the cashier as well as the cash.

A newly-married lady in Chicago complained to her me that on her reception-day her card-basket was overrun with visitors. "Why, my dear, misunderstanding terms for divorce. "So absurd, you know, me, to buy our house ready to live in." "True, dear," replied me (who had been twice divorced), "but I'd put them in a safe place: you may find them very useful in a year or two."

ADVICE TO A TOPER—Don't let your spirits go down.

FRENCHMAN. "Madame, you charge ver much too much for one fat room."

LANDLADY. "Oh, you know we at the watering-place must make hay while the sun shines."

FRENCHMAN (indignant). "Madame, you shall never make no hay of me. You must not shine, because all flesh is grass and you can make hay of me."

"TIME WORKS WONDERS."

IAGO. (JEFF DAVIS.) "FOR THAT I DO SUSPECT THE LUSTY MOOR
HATH LEAP'D INTO MY SEAT: THE THOUGHT WHEREOF DOTH LIKE A POISONOUS MINERAL GNAW MY INWARDS?" — OTHELLO.

MOONLIGHT AT SEA.

OUR illustration on this page is taken from a very beautiful painting by the late CLARKSON STANFIELD, who stood among the foremost of the great marine painters of England. The scene is supposed to be near the mouth of the Thames, looking out to sea. The oblique line of the bows shows that the anchored ship, which forms the most prominent object in the composition, is not of modern build. She is evidently a trader, also, and has dropped down the stream preparatory to going out to sea. The details of the composition are executed with that minute attention to correctness of drawing that characterized all of STANFIELD'S work; and the gray, quiet, and tranquil tone that pervades every part throws the spirit of true poetry over sea and sky, which may also be taken as the presage of a happy and prosperous voyage.

MOONLIGHT AT SEA.—[FROM A PAINTING BY CLARKSON STANFIELD, R.A.]

PARISIAN FENCING-SCHOOLS.

THERE are few places which would afford more amusement to the thinking foreigner, who prefers to study men rather than stone, and qualities rather than peristyles, than the Paris fencing-schools. Here you meet the men of fashion, the men of the boulevards, downy-lipped aspirants for army commissions, students from the Latin quarter, but above all, ambitious journalists. Access as a spectator is easily obtained, and you may go far and hunt a great deal before finding an exhibition which lets you so far into French characteristics. There are many fencing-schools of all grades of fame, price, and accommodation. These are little rooms in darksome quarters where you may learn, after a fashion, for a trifling fee; and there are spacious, elegant saloons, kept by celebrated masters of the art, where the prices are relatively as high as are those of Sardou's comedies. The maitres d'armes, the awe of youthful beginners, and the admiration of the aptest of their scholars, betray in every look and motion their pride and conceit in their art, and seem to exhibit a sort of independence and bluffness arising from a consciousness that they can maintain their ground against all comers. They are the champion knights of the modern chivalry, and stride about their domain with much the same hauteur of physical prowess which of Victor Hugo for his novels, or of Gustave Doré for his illustrations. These saloons are decorated in a fashion appropriate to their use. They have suits of armor along the walls, elaborate collections of rapiers, swords, and sabres crossed athwart each other, pictures of tournaments, duels, and battles. But curious above all are the specimens of human nature which you see there. A fencing-saloon is a little theatre where there are quite as many originals as in the best of the knights of old used to show. Still, their amour-propre is not unamiable: they are burly, gay, "good fellows and brave fellows," devoted heart and soul to their pupils, and especially proud of those who have pinked their man in the wood of Vincennes. They are loquacious, and if you happen to go in when half a dozen of the scholars are preparing for their lesson, you will hear the maitre regaling them with wonderful stories, in which he is always the hero; nor er flaying, if you will believe him, been hit with rapier or foil. It is odd to watch the countenances of the pupils as they parry and thrust with monsieur the maitre.

The best masters use the foils without buttons after the pupil has reached a certain stage of proficiency. Then it is that you may judge of the real quality and "grit" of the man. Pretending is out of the question when one has the naked foil in his hand. Hypocrisy abandons the coolest. The polite and polished man of the world dissolves before your eyes into the true man of nature, cool or rash, timid or bold, cunning or frank, sincere or subtle. A gentleman well known as skilled in the art relates that one day he fenced with what he regarded as good results to himself. He tells us that he had a bout with a very extensive agent of wines and liqueurs, who, previous to the sport, had offered to furnish him with some excellent wine, which our academician had most gratefully accepted. Moreover, the narrator went to the matire, and said to him, "I will buy the Champagne of you, my gentleman." "Why?" "His wine must be adulterated; he denies that he was struck!" He applies the principle to prospective son-in-law. "When a pretender-to your daughter's hand presents himself, don't worry yourself about asking yourself of him, information of this sort being often unreliable: say simply to your future son-in-law, 'Will you have a bout?' At the end of a quarter of an hour you will know more of his character than after six weeks of intimate acquaintance." The art of fencing, as it is in France, has its antagonistic schools, as well as the arts of painting and letters. Those who practise the art as it was practised half a century ago are called the "old school;" who declare that the system of the "reformers" of fencing, Roussil and Lozès, pride themselves on being the "new school." The admirer of the old system thinks they see in it a revival or reform analogous to that which took place at about the same period in music, painting, and literature. What Rossini and Meyerbeer were in opera, Hugo and Scribe were in letters, and De la Rochefort and Contemporaries in painting, Roussel and Lozès were in fencing—founders of a new school. "Fencing," he had, says a French writer, "its romanticism and its contests of schools." The "old school" of fencing was in harmony with the old manners, the old order of society and régime. Elegance and grace were the requirements and distinguishes. It was an ornamental and polite art. Did your life hang in the balance, you must not be awkward.

To be "risked" was a slight offense compared to falling out of the line of harmony. Awkwardness was worse than death. The very language of the old fencing-schools hinted their ideal: to be shined as "Academe." "Let a man can went to take lessons, he went to the "academy." A fencer could not be formerly met in a thrashing, nor dew back the hand in thrusting, nor seek, nor bend over, nor engage body with body, nor "take a stroke in order." That is, at the time of the "old school," it was in verity an art, having as its object the harmonious and elegant. The "new school" is a science, whose object is to produce a practical effect than an artistic one. To hit is its great purpose. The means were all in all in the old; they are insignificant in the new. The new proposes a real combat rather than a gentlemanly exercise, and even assaults-at-arms is not tabooed. It permits lying down, putting the head behind the knee, thumping or parrying with the sword, taking aim at the belly, giving strokes beneath; it reduces the whole art to one sole position—the lunge. The "old school" is still professed by many distinguished amateurs of fencing, and still holds to the use of the most aristocratic and "gentlemanly" method. The "new school" is resorted to by "young France," and by the professional dentist, who usually either hears, or would have it appear that he means, business. Between these two schools is a third, which aims at a compromise, and at uniting the excellences of both. Of this school, the most celebrated living fencing-teachers-masters, Bertrand, was the inventor. He introduced a system of fencing at once regular and rapid, elegant and effective.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In The Home Monthly.—Book V.

CHAPTER V.

PRINCE AND PRINCESS.

At the Crown Inn in Shipley Magna there was intense excitement. Nothing like it had been known there within the memory of man, for, although the house boasted a tradition that a royal and gallant son of England had once passed a night beneath its roof, no one living in the old inn at the period of our story could remember that glorious occasion. Now there occupied the best rooms a foreign prince and princess! And there was the princess's maid, and the prince's valet; who were extremely superior, and troublesome, and discontented. And there had arrived a pair of horses, and a gorgeous carriage, and a London coachman, who was not quite so discontented as the maid and the valet, but fully as imposing and aristocratic in his own line. And as if these circumstances were not sufficiently interesting and stirring, there was added to them the crowning fact that the princess's name was Blanche Lady, born and bred in the neighborhood, and that the scandal of her elopement was the chief topic of conversation—was yet fresh and green in the chronicles of Shipley Magna. What had they come for? The hunting season was over; and the hunting was the only rational and legitimate reason why a stranger should ever come to Shipley Magna at all. At least, so opined the united conclave of stable-yard and kitchen who sat in permanent judgment on the actions of their social superiors.

"Mayhap she have come to see her father," hazarded an apple-cheeked young scullery-maid, timidly. But this suggestion was scouted as highly improbable. Father, indeed! What did such as her care for fathers? She wouldn't ha' gone off and left him the way she did if so be she'd had much feeling for her father. She'd a pretty good check to come back there at all after the way she'd disgraced herself. And this here prince—if so be he were a prince—must feel pretty uncomfortable when he thought about it. It 'ud be to see how a Lunnun, and, so, much in the way of mortal indignation couldn't be expected from him. And then, you know, the mother was a foreigner. Certainly Mrs. Levincourt had never been nothing saint, so for the united establishment of the Crown, "it were to come out in the daughter. Once a foreigner always a foreigner," was the general verdict of all.

Nevertheless, in spite of the opinion of that critical and fallible pet audience that contemplates the performances of the stable-yard, the horses and hermes who strut and fret their hour on the boards, the Crown Inn establishment dispatched in a fly to Shipley-in-the-Wold, on the first morning after the arrival of the Prince and Princess, a man-servant. This personage was the bearer of a note addressed to the Reverend Charles Levincourt, Shipley Vicarage. The mysterious words that induced Veronica to revisit Damshire were not entirely clear to herself. It was a mystery, she said. And they were a secret that she ought to try to see her father. Unless she made the first advance, he probably would not see her more. He would not make the advance. That she felt the advance easier to make, considering the peculiar ground of property she did not utter aloud.

Then there was in Veronica's heart an unexpressed longing to startle, to surprise, to overwhelm her old acquaintances with her new grandeur. She knew, she said, that even the old county magnates as Lady Alicia Renwick would receive her with the consideration due to a Princess de Barletti. Lady Alicia was capable of motives for her visit to Shipley Magna most far from the desire for a visit of charity and friendly excitement. She had been married to Count Barletti for days, and was bored to death. As to Prince Louis Barletti, he was the man among all Veronica thought it good to go. He would fain have entered society on the grandest of the London season that was just beginning, and have recompensed himself for his enforced dullness during the first weeks of his union by a bit of gaiety. But he yielded readily to his bride's desire to go to Shipley Magna, and to the unyielding that it would be but decent and becoming on her part to present herself to her father.

Veronica, reclining on a lounge-chair, having sat full length on a broad squab sofa in the best sitting-room that the Crown could boast. Her husband sat opposite to her, half buried in an easy-chair, whence he rose occasionally to look out of the window. At his feet on a small Spitz dog that lay curled up on a cushion on the broad window-sill. Veronica gave a quick, impatient sigh, and turned restlessly.

"Anima mia," said Cesare. "What is the matter?"

"Nothing! Faugh! How stuffy the room is!"

"Shall I open the window?"

"Nonsense! Open the window with an east wind blowing! Are you trying to kill me then? You don't know the Shipley climate as well as I do!"

"How delicious it must be at Naples now!" observed Cesare, wistfully.

"I hope I may never see Naples again! I hate it!"

"Oibò! Never see Naples again? You don't mean it!"

"What a time that man is gone to Shipley!"

"Is it far to your father's?"

"I told you. Five English miles. It is no distance. I could have walked there and back in the time.

"It is a pity, cara mia, that you did not take my advice and go yourself. I should have been delighted to accompany you. It would have been more becoming toward your father."

"No, Cesare, it is not. I have told you do not understand."

"I can, in truth, see no reason why a daughter should not pay her father the respect of going to him in person. Especially after such a reconciliation."

"I tell you, simpleton, that papa would rather himself go to the option of coming here if he prefers it instead of my walking to the vicarage unexpectedly, and causing a fuss and an excitement, and—who knows," she added, more gloomily, "whether he will choose to see me at all?"

"See you at all! Why should he not? He—he will not be displeased at your marriage with a prince?"

"No—no. I do not fancy he will be displeased at that!" returned Veronica, with a half-compassionate glance at her husband. In truth Cesare was very far from having any idea of the real reason of his wife's visit to Damshire. He was a poor devil; she a wealthy widow. Per Bacco! How many of his countrymen would jump at such a chance! It was no mention that the lady was a young and beautiful Englishwoman, and a Protestant to boot.

"Very well then, mio tesoro adorato, then I maintain that it behooved us to go to your father. As it is, he will, of course, believe that we made some agreeable excitement in seeing you once more in your own home!" said Cesare, to whose imagination a "fuss" that involved no personal exertion on his own part was by no means a terrible prospect. After a moment's silence, broken only by the ill-tempered "yap" of the sleepy little Spitz dog, whose ears he was pulling, Cesare returned: "What did you say to your father, Veronica mia? You would not let me see the note. You have told me that it was expressive of my respect and desire to see him."

"That doesn't matter. You can say all your pretty speeches viva voce."

The truth was that Veronica would have been most unwilling that Cesare should see her letter to her father. It was couched in terms more like those of an enemy tired of hostilities, and willing to make peace, than such as would have become a daughter and affectionate daughter. But it was not ill calculated to produce the effect she desired on the vicar. She had kept well before him the facts of her princess-ship, of her wealth, and of the brilliant social position which she was prepared to take amounting to. The original son, who should have returned in rags and disgrace, had been handed to the house-door, would have had a much worse chance with Mr. Levincourt than one who should have appeared in her own person with the respectful homage of every jackey in his father's hall. People have widely different conceptions of what is dignified. Then, too, Veronica had clearly conveyed in her note that if her father would come to see her he would be welcome as a visitor." No existent demands should be made on his emotions. A combination of circumstances favored the reception of her letter by the vicar. He was alone in his garden when the fly drove up to the gate. The maid was absent. There was even a servant's eye upon him, under whose inspection he might have deemed it necessary to assume a rigid and dignified mien. He ceased to feel. That was the carriage waiting to take him back at once if he wished to. He felt that if he did not seize this opportunity, he might never see his daughter more. After scarcely a minute's hesitation, he opened the house door, called to the man that he was going to Shipley Magna, and mounted the box-seat beside the coachman. A reader is aware, that his servants knew as well as he did who it was that awaited him at Shipley Magna. But the fervent had not been the libid bond hostler of the Crown Inn, at Sack's Farm, that morning, and the arrival of the prince and princess had been fully discussed between them. But of this the vicar was in happy ignorance. He was driven along the winding road across "the hills" to Shipley.

"Have you ever seen a prince before?" exclaimed Barletti, suddenly, as from his post at the window he perceived the fly jingling up the High Street. "No, I see. I recognize the knee by fatness. Somani dei, is he fat, that animal! And what a figure some one inside the carriage. Ah—yes! It is, it must be your father!"

Veronica sprang from the sofa, and ran to the window with a cry of delighted recognition.

"Stay, dearest; that is not the way!" cried Cesare. "Come, here is the door of the corridor, come, we will go down and meet him together."

But that had been by no means Veronica's intention. In the first agitation of learning her father's approach she had started up with simply an instinctive, unreasoning impulse to run to him. At Cesare's words she strove to command herself, and sank down again in a sitting posture on the sofa.

"No—no, Cesare," she said, in a low breathless voice. "I—I was crazy to think of such a thing! It would never do to meet papa in the inn yard before all those people. He would not like it. Stay with me, Cesare."

She took his hand in hers, and held it with an almost convulsive grasp. Thus they remained silently, hand in hand. Her emotion had increased. Cesare, who had turned quite pale, it was probably not more than three minutes from the moment of Cesare's first seeing the fly that they waited for, that it seemed to Veronica as though a long period had elapsed between that moment and the opening of the sitting-room door.

"The vicar of Shipley," announced the prince's valet, who had been commanded to act on occasion as groom of the chambers.

"Papa!"

"My dear child! My dear Veronica!"

It was over. The meeting looked forward to with such fearful feelings had taken place, almost without a tear being shed. The vicar's eyes were moistened a little. Veronica did not cry at all, but she took the false color on her cheeks would let her be, and she trembled, and her hand shook, and she knew it, and she did, and she strove to hide it. She had put her arms round her father's neck and kissed him, and he had held her for a moment in his embrace. Then they sat down side by side on the sofa. Both had been perceived, for the first time, that Prince Cesare de Barletti, who had retired to the window, was crying in a quite unconcealed manner, and noisily using a large white pocket-handkerchief, which filled the whole room with an odor of a perfumer's shop.

"Cesare," called Veronica, "come hither. Let me present you to my father."

Cesare knew that the odoriferous handkerchief into his pocket, and advanced with extended hands to the vicar. He would have embraced him, but he conceived that this would have been a solecism in English manners; and he was sufficiently aware that although his knowledge of the language was yet imperfect, he had very happily acquired the outward bearing of an Englishman.

"It is a moment I have long desired," said he, shaking the vicar's hand, and then between both his. "The father of my beloved wife may be assured of my truest respect and affection."

There was a real charm and grace in the way in which Cesare said these words. It was entirely free from awkwardness or constraint; and uttered in his native Italian, the words themselves appeared thoroughly simple and natural.

Mr. Levincourt was favorably impressed by his son-in-law at once. He warmly returned the grasp of Cesare's hand, and said to his daughter, "Tell Prince Barletti that, although my Italian has grown rusty on my tongue, I fully understand what he says, and thank him for it."

"Oh, Cesare speaks a little English," returned Veronica, smiling. She was growing more at her ease every moment. The reaction from her brief trepidation and depression sent her spirits up rapidly. She recovered herself sufficiently to observe her father's face closely, and to think, "Papa is really a very handsome man still. I wonder if Cesare expected to see a person of such distinguished appearance." Then in the next instant she noticed that the vicar's dress was decidedly shabby, very careful but worn and she perceived in his bearing—in the negligence of his attitude—more traces of habitual personal deterioration which it had so pained Maud to discover. But she was seeing him under a better aspect than any Maud had ever contrived since her return to Shipley. The vicar was not so far changed from his former self as to be indifferent to the impression he was making on Prince Barletti. They all three sat and talked much as they might have done had Veronica paid from her father to go on a wedding-tour with her bridegroom, and was meeting him for the first time after a happy honeymoon. They sat and talked almost as though such a being as Sir John Gale had never crossed the threshold of Shipley vicarage. In Cesare this came about naturally enough. But Veronica, despite her languid princess air, was ceaselessly on the watch to turn his indiscreet tongue from dangerous topics.

And so things went on with delightful smoothness. The vicar, being pressed, consented to remain and dine with his daughter and son-in-law, and to sleep in the home by him in the evening. Down stairs the united conclaves were greatly interested in the new set of the drama, and criticised the performers in it with considerable vivacity.

CHAPTER VI.

HOME, SWEET HOME!

"Ah how long do you purpose remaining here?" asked Cesare, next afternoon, of his son-in-law, as they sat at table. "I presume this is a visit merely by way to some other place. Do you go northward? It is too early for the Lakes, and still more so for the Highlands."

Veronica looked at his wife.

"Well, how long we remain will depend on several things," she answered, slowly. "We were not en route for any special destination. I did not know that Shipley Magna could be en route for any place. No; we came down here to see you, papa."

"Yet you have had no change since down, you say?"

"Ah, yes; an 'ones," put in Cesare; "I-a, wen-t, a-n-d, s-a-w."

"Don't be alarmed, papa. Cesare is not going to drive us this evening. We have a pretty good team at home, I believe."

"Then you had some intention of making a stay here?"

"Well, yes, I suppose so. But really I don't think I ever have what you would call an intention. I have always such a vague appreciation of the mind. We shall stay if it suits us. If we don't, I suppose we shall go."

"Is she not strong?" said the vicar. "She used to be very healthy."

"Oh, I am well, papa. Only I get so tired," drawled out the princess.

Her husband looked at her more attentively. Her skin was so artificially colored that there was small indication of the real state of her health. Nevertheless, he said, "But she looks round her eyes were naturally. Her figure was also somewhat slimmer, but that seemed wasted, and there was a slight puffy fullness about her cheeks and jaw.

"She does not look very strong," said the vicar; "and—I have observed that she eats nothing."

"No! Is it not true? I have told her so, have I not, mia cara? You are right, Signor Vicario: she eats nothing. Nothing, capisce? Don't take it. Who knows what stuff it is made of?"

"Cesare, I beg you will not be absurd," returned Veronica, with a frown, and an angry flash of her eyes. "It keeps me in a state of nervous stimulants. Don't you remember the doctor had a required stimulants?"

"A propos of doctors," said the vicar, with an amused smile, "you have not asked after little Sally."

"Oh, poor little Elve! What is he doing?" asked Veronica, with a subdued sigh into her nonchalant air, temporarily interrupted by the flash of temper, and asked after Mr. Flow and the considerable consequence of a superior being.

"What - a - Phoo?" demanded the prince.

The vicar explained. And, being cheered by a good dinner and a glass of very fair sherry (he had prudently eschewed the Crown Champagne) into something as near jollity as he ever approached—for the vicar was a man who could smile, but rarely laughed—he treated them to a burlesque account of Miss Turtle's passion.

"How immensely comic!" said Veronica, slowly. She had reached such a point of princess-ship that she could barely take the trouble to part her red lips in a smile at the expense of those lower creatures. Nevertheless there was in her heart a movement of very vulgar and plebeian jealousy. Jealousy! Jealousy of Mr. Flew? Jealousy of power; jealousy of admiration; jealousy of the hold she had over this man; jealousy, yes, jealousy of the possibility of the village surgeon coming here to her drawing-room with any other woman, and giving to that other something that, with all his flattery of old days, she felt he had never given to her—sincere and manly respect. She would not have him feel for any woman what he seemed to feel for his honest wife.

"I suppose," she said, after a pause, "that poor little Flew will marry her."

"Oh, I suppose so," returned the vicar, carelessly. "If would do very well. Maud thinks he will not; but that's nonsense. Flew is not very enterprising or ardent, and if the lady will but persevere he'll yield: not a doubt of it!"

"Ah!" exclaimed Veronica, toying with her bracelet, and looking as though she were not wholly weary of the whole subject. In that moment she was foreseeing a glance of wished-for excitement in Shipley.

After dinner—which had been expressly ordered a couple of hours earlier than usual—Maud all drove along the winding turf-bordered road toward Shipley-in-the-Wold. It was a clear spring evening. The distant hills appeared cut away into faint blues and grays. A shower had hung bright drops on the budding hawthorn hedges. The air blew sweet and fresh across the rolling wold. Not one of the three persons who occupied Prince Cesare Borgia's handsome carriage was specially previous to the influences of such a scene and hour. Jael sat stiff, from whatsoever motive, kept silence for a time. Bartleti enjoyed the smooth easy motion of the well-hung vehicle, but he thought of other matters around him very dull. And, besides, he was the victim of an inordinate ambition to appear at the high box and drive. He was speculating on the chances of Veronica's permitting him to do so as they drove back from the vicarage, and then, even if she consented, what was to become of Dickinson, his man, who was seated beside the coachman? He could not be put into the carriage with his mistress, that was clear. To be sure the distance was not great, but he might—he might perhaps walk back! But even as this idea had passed through Cesare's mind he dismissed it as knowing to appertain to the category of day-dreams. Dickinson was a very opportune person in his gravity, severity, and machine-like impertinability kept poor Cesare in subjection. Not that Cesare had not a sufficient strain of the aristocrat in him to have asserted his own will and pleasure, with perfect disregard to the opinions of any servant of his own nation, but he relied on Dickinson to assist him in his endeavor to acquire the tone of English manners.

His first rebuff from Dickinson had been in the matter of a set of drab gaiters which the prince had bought on his own responsibility. These he had put on to sally forth in at St. Leonard's, when he had gone out alone, and immediately on his marriage; and Dickinson in conjunction with a tactful look-out, bestowed by a gold key in the head with garnet eyes, they had given him, he flattered himself, the air of a distinguished member of the Jockey Club. At the same time Dickinson's disapproval of the gaiters was, however, so pronounced, that Cesare reluctantly abandoned them. And from that hour his valet's dominion rule over his wardrobe was established.

On these and such-like weighty matters was Prince Barletti pondering as he rolled along in his carriage. Veronica leaned back in an elaborately easy attitude, and while apparently occupied in elegant languor, was keeping a sharp look-out in case her exercise of marking a distant face of acquaintance on the road should chance to be fulfilled. The vicar was busy with his own private thoughts and specifications. His mother was to be deserted until they neared the village of Shipley. Then the noise of the passing carriage would cause one or two faces to the cottage windows, and a dog or two barked violently at the heels of the horses. Only of the denizens of Shipley was Prince Barletti's equipage stared at it until it was out of sight. It was all so big and grand—coach and brand-new. Very different from the solid, well-preserved vehicles in which most of the neighboring gentry were seen to drive about the country. There was a great blazon of arms on the shining panels. The coachman's wig was one of outlandish gorgeousness, and the harness glittered with silver. A vivid recollection darted into Veronica's mind, as the carriage dashed through the village street, of that moonlit night when the English flag from the Crown Inn, which she and her father occupied, had refused aside to let Dr. Beghie's carriage pass, as they drove home from the dinner-party at Lavender House.

"Who is that respectable signora?" asked Cesare of his wife, at the same moment giving his hat and executing a bow with much suavity.

"Eh? Where? What respectable signora?"

"There—that rotund, blooming English matron. What a freshness on her cheeks!"

It was Mrs. Meggitt to whom Barletti alluded. The worthy woman's cheeks were indeed ad nglow with excitement. She stood by the wicket side, nodding and smiling to the vicar, who slightly—one might almost say furtively—returned her salute. From behind the ample shelter of Mrs. Meggitt's shoulder appeared the pale, pinched countenance of Miss Turtle. Her eyes saw nothing but Veronica. Their wide, steady stare took in every detail of the beauty's rich garments; the delicate, costly little bonnet sitting so lightly on a coquettish crown of jetty coils and plaits; the gleam of a chain around her neck; the perfection of her gray gloves; the low, elaborate waves of hair on her forehead; and so sure that Miss Turtle did not fail to observe that the prisoner was painted!

"Cesare! Per carità! What are you doing? Sit down, be quiet!" exclaimed Veronica, quickly, as she saw her lord about to pull off his hat once more.

"Ma come? Cosa c'è? Why may I not bow to the respectable matron?"

"Nonsense; be quiet! She is a farmer's wife. And I must say, I never saw a more presumptuous manner of saluting her clergyman. What has come to the peasantry? She is nodding and grinning like a ridiculous old china image!"

"She did not nod and grin at you, Veronica," returned the vicar, with unexpected heat, and in a flurried, quick way. "I—I bowed, Cesare, and—and—respect—a great respect—for Mrs. Meggitt. I have received kindness and comfort from her and hers in the days when I was alone. Yes, quite lonely and miserable. And let me tell you that you would have done you no harm to return her salute. If you expect Shipley people to ko-tow to you, you are mistaken. Your husband, who was to be their master, understands how to play prince a great deal better than you have yet learned to play your part."

Veronica was too genuinely surprised to utter a word. But silence was in keeping with the tone of disciplined nonchalance she had lately chosen to assume, and eked out by a slight waving of the head and a slow and scornful shrug of the shoulders, it was sufficiently expressive.

Cesare did not understand all that had passed between the husband and wife; but he knew he had paid but slight attention to it, being occupied with going over his own affairs. And he was lighted with the good lady's appearance, as approaching more nearly than any thing he had yet seen to his ideal of the English, and that size of a thorough-bred, average Anglishwoman.

He had not got over his fit of admiration when the carriage arrived at the corner of Shipley Lane, which, as the reader knows, was skirted on one side by the vicar's own premises. The coachman pulled up his horses, and Dickinson, but in hand, looked down into the carriage for directions.

"Which way is he to take, your 'ighness?" demanded Dickinson.

Suddenly it rushed upon Veronica that she could not bear to be driven up Bassett's Lane to the bedside of Mrs. Bassett. That, in the emotion, or scarcely any, so far, on receiving the old house, she would not be able to control. Her many glooming were so indissolubly associated in her memory with that one special spot that she shuddered in prospect of it. The thought was an instantly present to her mind—the chill murky light, the long dead floor, the sick face looking the trembling horse, and on the ground Joe Dorsett, with that unconscious, scarlet-coated, mudbespattered figure in his midst.

She sank back shivering into a corner of the carriage, and spoke in a voice little louder than a whisper, "Not that way, papa!" Her husband partly understood her feeling. But he could not understand why she should feel it, that alone of all the numerous places and persons connected with the past she had hitherto seen, should be there. She bent forward, and motioned why; but it indubitably was so.

Cesare waved his hand, giving face and voice. He leaned forward and took her hand. "Cara mia diletta," he murmured, "you are child! Your delicacy of sense is too fine. Do I saw you shiver! Did not your maid put a shawl into the carriage? Let me wrap you more warmly."

Veronica accepted his assumption, and suffered herself to be enfolded in the shawl. And in the meanwhile explained to Dickinson the road which he was commanded to approach the vicarage by the side of St. Gildas.

"You will see a specimen of our ancient church architecture," said the vicar, politely to his son-in-law, in labored and highly uncollocial Italian.

Cesare professed himself much interested. But when his eyes lighted on the squat tower of St. Gildas, and on the ruins of the minor graveyard, he stared around him as though he had in some very singular way lost his wits. He was bidden to look at, and as though that could be surely be the specimen of ancient church architecture.

"Ah, Veronica!" he cried, in a loud voice for me," said the vicar. "How surprised she will be! And who is that with her? Is Edwin at it?" "Yes, positively it is Mr. Flew!"

THE WIVES OF GREAT MEN.

THE large number of eminent descendants from illustrious men must not be looked upon as expressing the results of their marriage with mediocre women. For the vivacious habits of the wives of such men is above mediocrity, contrary to the commonly supposed opinion that great men marry silly women. It is not easy to prove my point without a considerable mass of quotations to show the manner in which the wives of a large body of illustrious men were held by their contemporaries, but a few striking facts or guments are not without weight. First, the lady whom a man marries is very commonly one whom he has met at the houses of one of his friends, and therefore not likely to be a silly woman. She is also usually related to some of them, and therefore has a probability of being hereditarily gifted. Secondly, as a matter of fact, a large number of eminent men marry eminent women. Philip II. of Macedon and Olympias; Cosmo de Medici and Contessina; Shakespeare and his most able wife; Helvetius married a charming lady, whose hand was also sought by both Franklin and Turgot; Wilhelm von Schlegel was heart and soul devoted to Madame De Staël; Necker's wife was a blue-stocking of the purest hue; Robert Stephens, the learned printer, had Petronella for his wife; the Lord Keeper Sir Nicholas Bacon and the great Lord Burleigh married two of the highly accomplished daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke. All these names are those of decidedly eminent women. They establish the existence of a tendency of "like to like" among intellectual men and women. On the other hand, there is no evidence of a strongly marked antagonistic course of those men liking really half-witted women. A man may be interested in their defects in his character, and select a wife to supplement what he wants, as a why man may be attracted by a woman who has no other merits than those of a talker and manager. Also, a young awkward schoolboy may accredit the first girl who cares to show an interest in him with greater intelligence than she possesses. But these are exceptional matters, and by no means to be taken alone. Men take pleasure in the society of intelligent women, and, if they can find such as would in other respects be suitable, they will marry them in preference to mediocrities.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE readers of Miss Dodge Cook's charming "Cord and Creese" will be glad to learn that a new story, "THE CROTTONDALE," by the author of those popular works, will be commenced in the next number of Harper's Bazar. This story is one of great dramatic power and thrilling interest, and we would call the attention of the public to its opening chapters.

"Hope defeared maketh the heart sick," seems a problem both as serious days and weeks are concerned, by, and no wew has come of the misting steamer City of Boston, "the latest bable a melancholy record of wrecked ocean steamers. Though the total disappearance of a vessel, with the loss of all on board, is a rare occurrence. The steamship City of Boston, Liverpool to Halifax, and an invaluable book of reference, contains long list, as to the number of steamers, of casualties, wrecks. Some, which have occurred within the last fifteen years, that only promises to be the dismal catalogue. The President sailed from New York, March 11, 1841, with many passengers. Two days after she encountered a terrible storm, and was never heard of afterward. In September, 1854, the United States Mail steamship Arctic, Capt. Luce, left Cape Veals, a French steamer, off Newfoundland, and over 300 lives were lost. The City of Glasgow left with 480 persons on board, disappeared in November of the same year. The Pacific, Collins steamer, left Liverpool for New York, January 23, 1856, and was never heard of afterward, and is supposed to have struck an iceberg; 186 persons were on board. The Lyonnais, Tweed, with 191 persons and a valuable cargo on board, was wrecked near Sydney, August, 1857. Only one escaped to tell the tale—he was rescued after having been many days on the wreck. The Central America foundered at sea, September 12, 1857, and of the 476 on board only 152 were saved. The Austria, a steam emigrant ship, was burned at sea, September 13, 1858, and of the 538 on board but 67 escaped. Steamer Lyonnais foundered on her way Liverpool to New York, with 410 on board, was wrecked on April, 1860, only 9 lives were saved. The same year 345 lives were lost by the wreck of the Royal Charter. In September, 1865, the steamer Evening Star foundered at the sinking of the Lady Elgin, by collision, on Lake Michigan. The Evening Star was wrecked in 1865, and the Londres in 1866, by which disasters many hundred lives were lost. Such are some of the red records of the past. The record of wrecks occurring every year is far greater than is generally supposed.

At the recent sale of the Rice Library in this city an illuminated copy of Dibdin's "Bibliographia Antiquarian, and Picturesque Tour in France and Germany," in 4 volumes, brought the remarkable price of $1920. The finest known copy of Elliot's Indian Bible, published in 1663, was sold for $1850—a fifty years' rise. It is finished in a book which only one man in the American continent can read.

We understand that Governor Hoffman has signed the bill empowering the city of New York to build a bridge between Sixty-eighth and Sixty-ninth Streets to the Battery of Central Park, the purpose of erecting a great founding hospital thereon.

The Bombay Gazette tells a little anecdote of the Duke of Edinburgh. "At Agra he inquired whether there was a Masonic temple. On being informed that such an institution would be of no utility in the place, he promptly inquired if he was hidden in it, wherever there was one they invariably took him in one, and he never found the word 'welcome' in large letters over the entrance."

The first edition of Charles Dickens's new novel will consist of 70,000 copies.—It has been reported that Pere Hyacinthe is about to marry in Paris. A "Paris statement is now contradicted; but it is said that he will satisfy the curiosity which is soon to exist in Europe in connection with several ecclesiastical and literary figures.—Count Piper, the Governor-General of Finland, is to be published in six magnificent volumes.—"Feathers and Arrows" is the name of a new volume of Dr. Holmes's poems, now in press.—A new publication bindly spoken of by the English papers is Mexico, Illustrated in Photography of the Country and its People, illustrated with photographs printed in permanent pigments.—Dudley Buck is reported to be about to make an artistic tour through the United States.

The West Side Elevated Railway is now completed to the Harlem River Depot on Seventh Street, and will soon be opened to the public. The road commences at the lower end of Greenwich Street, running along its west side to Vesey Avenue, where it curves and continues on the west side of the Avenue to Thirty-fourth Street. It is supported by iron columns strongly bolted together. The engines are situated at Cortlandt, Franklin, and Twenty-second streets. The cars are similar to those on the ordinary street railroads.

Not many months ago a peasant woman ordered a church near Tivoli, in Italy, and standing before an altar dedicated to St. Antony of Padua, addressed the following prayer, uttered excited sensations: "Dear saint, a cheat," she exclaimed; "a thief, a villain! I have bread and candles, I have grain and oil and wine, and yet thou hast permitted my child, the son of a widow, to die. Thou art a villainous cheat." An English visitor in the church, concerned for the safety of the woman, applied to a priest who was praying from his breviary. "Sir," replied the priest, "I will pray for you that the peasant woman is right in acting as she does, but she is not entirely in the wrong. She really has made St. Antony a number of presents, at some personal inconvenience to herself, for the service to poor, and yet the saint has done nothing for her—her child is dead. What more can any other woman to speak her mind freely, for her complaints are just."

AN Cambridge (Mass.) scholars worse than the general run of mankind. On a basis of a deficiency of moral power among the teachers, that is the natural tendency to restrain the discipline of the rod? Report says that the old policy, somewhat modified, is to be readopted.

Death at a gaming-table! What scene could be more fearful? A gentleman of Kentucky once was entered the gaming-saloon at Keethen, in the principality of Anhalt. He sat down at a table and soon won one thousand ducats. The bank-keeper passed over to him, but he did not take it up. Presently some one touched him on the shoulder, which he at first wished to continue. The men continued immovable, and it was observed that he was dead! The man in charge of the tables then raked up the gold, saying that it belonged to the bank, as no stipulation could have been entered into with a corpse. The heirs of the deceased are not content with the soundness of this reasoning, and they have commenced an action for the recovery of the sum.

It is talented to erect a suitable monument to Lieutenant Hinsdale, who died in the town where he is buried. It is hoped it will be completed before November 15, 1888, the four-hundredth anniversary of the Reformer's birth.

The increase of pauperism in London is spoken of as "alarming." A generation to nearly one hundred thousand poor who are in receipt of relief, and there are nearly as many more "casuals"—persons who spend the day in lodgings.

Rev. Ariel Backus, the first President of Hamilton College, was well known as a wit in his earlier days; and while connected with the college in various stages were a constant source of amusement. Once, on being asked his opinion of a brilliant but rambling and incoherent sermon, he extinguished at once by the young preacher who had delivered it in the college-pulpit, by the reply, "I am unable to say that an think of the text and the sermon simultaneously. They were so far apart that I could not find the text the small-jest, the sermon would never have caught it."

A fund, likewise, who believed in the immortal ness, sent his son to President Backus with a letter, in which he stated that while he has boy would seem to be a little backward and slow, and not pecuniarly fitted for the freshman class; but he trusted the President would not refuse to receive him, for finding a talent or two hid away in the napkin. When the slow freshman presented for his examination he carried to his father a written assurance from the President that he had "always found his boy in the corners, without seeing the first sign of a hidden talent."

There are in the city of New York no less than seven thousand saloons whose exclusive business is to serve up to their customers the vilest kind of wines, ales, roads, bools, or sears. Every body eats oysters at one time and another, and regrets when he is not, for twelve. The richest oyster-beds are found along the inbrated coast of the Atlantic States. In the vicinity of New York they are abundant. It would be a most important service to the public interest to societies that are brought to market, although a few favorite kinds are most in demand. Not less than ten thousand persons are employed in the oyster business in New York; and thousands of bushels are annually sold in Europe.

Many persons believe that various little personal peculiarities are strongly indicative of character. The Phrenologs, Dr. Redfield, has made the style of lounging in an index of character; that "He, he, leans the laugher to be frank, fickle, noisy, and nervous. He, he, he" is the index of a phlegmatic or lymphatic person, or of one timid and irresolute. "Ho, ho" betokens a man of strong passions and feelings, and "ha, ha" a man who is over-sensitive, hypocritical, and take to deceit.

Coarse black hair and dark skin are said to denote great force of character; fine black hair indicates not only strength of character, but also delicate and goodness. Stiff black hair indicates a coarse, strong, rigid character; soft black hair is indicative of gentleness and harshness. Coarse red hair indicates powerful animal passions, with a corresponding strength of character. Auburn hair, with florid countenance, denotes a sanguine temperament, with the highest capacity for enjoyment or suffering. Straight, even, smooth, glossy hair denotes strength, harmony, and firmness of character. Fine, silky, supple hair is the mark of a delicate and sensitive temperament. Crisp, curly hair denotes a warm, impulsive, sensitive character. White hair denotes a lymphatic and indolent temperament. Premature whitening or changing in the coloring matter of the hair-tube which naturally gives hair color often denotes premature age. This is proved by analysis to contain a large amount of sulphur, while very little is evident with regard to pure carbon. The presence of these matters in the blood points to peculiarities of temperament and feeling which are sometimes unevenly associated.

The gait is sometimes regarded as an index of character. Generally persons are said to move slowly. Careful people lift their feet high and place them down with great care. Calculating persons generally walk with their hands in their pockets and their heads slightly inclined. Thoughtful persons step lightly for fear of being observed. The timid often step off the sidewalk on meeting another, and always go around a person instead of passing over it. Bashful persons have a long swing to their arms, while they shake their shoulders considerably. Awkward persons stumble along their toes. The lazy scrape about loosely with their heels. Very strong-minded persons have a kind of stamp movement. Unstable persons walk fast and slow by turns.

Concerning eyes, it has been said that "a woman with a hazel eye never sleeps from her husband, never chats around, never ramifies her husband's comfort for her own, never talks too much or too little, and is always sympathetic, sweet, and a good conversationalist."—Doubtless—but we know women with blue, black, brown, and gray eyes of whom as much good may be truly said.

STEERAGE BUNKS.

STEERAGE BUNKS.

THE discomforts of a long ocean voyage are sufficiently trying to the nerves, even when alleviated by all the luxuries and comforts of the first-cabin. To be sure, the first-cabin, or saloon, as it is now generally called, is small and cramped, and the state-rooms are narrow, dark, and close; but these accommodations are palatial in comparison with the steerage—the quarters where the poor emigrants are huddled together like beasts in pens. Their Atlantic voyage is any thing but a holiday trip. They are literally packed together in a dark, cavernous part of the vessel; they have their food doled out to them in rations; they have but little space among the ropes and beams of the forward decks wherein to "take the air;" and they must live during the voyage in an atmosphere which is close at best, and is too often tainted with disease. See, in the picture, how they are crowded up together, and how rude are their berths and surroundings! The poor ill woman in the corner has scarcely space to move; one man's berth is so narrow that his feet project over it. Still, the emigrants make the best of things. Some one has given the shaggy-haired little girl a toy, which she exultingly displays to her sea-sick mother; another little girl is unraveling a string puzzle; and the interested faces of the two women who are watching her show that even in this dark hole there are cheerful, contented souls. On calm nights, when the sea is still, and the steamer rolls steadily and gently across the waves, you may hear songs rising from the steerage, and see the emigrants standing in groups on the forward deck, the men smoking and chewing, and the women, their arms burdened with infants, chatting together and watching the spray and the surging sea.

SHEEP IN WINTER-TIME.

THE pretty winter pastoral on page 237, engraved from a drawing by Mr. HARRISON WEIR, is thoroughly English in general character and detail. Few American farms present the picturesque material to be found on those of England; the graceful rows of hedges, the cottages and outbuildings, with their thatched roofs and projecting eaves, offer a striking contrast to the angularly fences and the prim, unromantic country architecture in which American farmers delight. It is to be hoped the time may come here when these simple but enjoyable elements of beauty will not be considered incompatible with thrift and enterprise.

SUBTRACTION.

THE illustration with the above heading, on page 237, engraved from a clever drawing by Mr. J. MAHONY, a young English artist of considerable promise, hardly requires explanation. The two boys are evidently on their way to school, sauntering slowly along through the snow, and making up for lost time on their arithmetic lesson, which, as the title suggests, involves the mysteries of subtraction. The younger boy appears to be the quicker at figures; and his duller or lazier companion quietly "subtracts" the results of his calculations while looking over his shoulder.

THE KING OF SIAM.

THE KING OF SIAM.

SOMDETCH-PHRA-PARAMENDZ-MAHA-CHULALOK-KORN, the reigning King of Siam, whose portrait is given on this page, is only seventeen years old. He is the fifth sovereign of the dynasty of which he is the representative. From his European education, the young King is well calculated to carry on the enlightened progress made in that strange Oriental monarchy under the auspices of his father; but the Regent is still more advanced than was his late master. This Regent, chosen to the post for his eminent qualities, is CHOW-PHYA-SRI-SURY-WONGSE, close friend and companion of the late King, and Minister of War, in which capacity he is in direct communication with, and has enormous influence over, the council of mandarins. It is of this celebrated Siamese statesman that Sir JOHN BOWRING gives so complimentary an account in his work on Siam, where he says that in all his conversations with the "Kalahome" he found in him great judgment, and profound experience in men and things.

SUBTRACTION.—(SEE PAGE 236.)

SHEEP IN WINTER-TIME.—FROM A DRAWING BY HARRISON WEIR.—[SEE PAGE 236.]

"OUT OF THE DARK."

A—"John Anderson, my Jo."

BY FRANCIS S. SMITH.

John Alcohol, my Jo John,
When we were first acquain',
My eyes were bright with health, John,
My heart was free from taint;
But soon my eyes were bleared, John,
My face was full of woe,
And all because I stuck to you,
John Alcohol, my Jo.

John Alcohol, my Jo John,
My sky was very clear
Until I met with you, John,
Then it was black and drear;
But now the pledge is mine, John,
And I am safe I know—
I'm fairly raised "out of the dark,"
John Alcohol, my Jo.

John Alcohol, my Jo, John,
My wife and children dear
Are glad to meet me, now, John,
Whenever I appear.
But while I kept with you, John,
Alas, it was not so,
They ran and hid away from me,
John Alcohol, my Jo.

John Alcohol, my Jo, John,
Let all your cronies mark
And inwardly digest, John,
The tale "Out of the Dark,"
'Tis in the New York Weekly,
And all will wiser grow
Who heed the lessons taught by it,
John Alcohol, my Jo.

NED BUNTLINE'S

GREAT PRIZE TEMPERANCE STORY.

Out of the Dark.

A TEMPERANCE STORY.

By NED BUNTLINE
(E. Z. C. JUDSON).

CHAPTER I.

"Oh, could caress slab him to perdition, I would rather one or every breath. The heart of one and the of a beggar is to applaud me in my love, attain the fortune which should have been mine—took down on her. It drives me mad to think of it."

"What is the matter, Mr. Nevitt? What are you raising about? Were not your face so white, I would fancy you had been drinking, even at this ambitiously early hour."

And Mr. Selden, the princely gambler of — Square, approached a young man, fashionably dressed, who, in a state of great agitation, had just entered the back parlor of the establishment.

"Matter! Look there, Selden, read that, and then wonder why I do not look on my own brain, or kill somebody else!"

The young man thrust a crumpled note into the hands of the genteel gambler.

"Why, it is only an invitation to a wedding. One Eugene Westcott is to be married to Miss Florence Pendleton—secretary at the house of Mr. Pendleton."

"Do you know who she is?"

"The daughter of Mr. Pendleton, I suppose."

"Yes: but more, she is the girl, the only girl I ever loved. My marriage with her would have reconciled my father to me, made him willing to pay my debts and set me up in any business that I desired. He told me so much. Yesterday, on my knees, I poured out my passionate declaration of love—pleaded for her hand—but never was pleaded before.

"She was too. I wept hot, scalding tears. She smiled sweetly and said that I could get an engagement at Wallack's, I did it so naturally. I grew desperate and vowed I would blow out my brains. She suggested that it would be a pity to disgrace such a fine head of hair.

"I swore I would drink myself to death.

"She said that was the most fashionable mode of suicide, she was sure, but hoped I would not commence until after receiving a new set of jewelry she placed in my hands to-day. I began to hope that she had been merely flirting with me, and waited. Then the note—an invitation to her marriage with Eugene Westcott, his son of a man who implored me to handle by drink. Westcott has come up, step by step, in Pendleton's employment, until he is the cashier, and now, marrying his daughter, will undoubtedly become a partner. Oh, it is not enough to make one crazy—to be supplanted by an upstart like him. I will be revenged, if it costs me my life. I would rather die than drink, and I'll shoot him down in his tracks."

"No: you'll not commit any such folly. You'll want—you'll be patient: and if you want revenge, you'll make it sure, and not lay yourself liable to swing from the gallows. This father and son shall both be can be dragged down. He has won her hand, or will have it, and must help her to it. He can be robbed of both."

"How, Selden, how? Oh, if that could be so!"

"Contrive to get me invited to that wedding, and I'll enable you to have your revenge."

* * * * * * *

The wedding-day came. It had dawned without a cloud. And all day there was a busy hum of preparation until the hour of four in the afternoon arrived.

Then carriage after carriage drew up before the grand mansion, and people from the fifth avenue and the city began to crowd into the parlors.

At five the company invited were all present, and the minister, one of the most noted and eloquent in the city, stood ready to perform the ceremony.

They came—preceded by Mrs. Westcott on the arm of Mr. Pendleton.

In a moment, while a deep solemn silence fell over all in the room, the lovely bride stood side by side with the man of her heart's choice.

So far left, May Westcott, as beautiful as a poet's dream, stood without a tremor or a blush, fair as the fairest, pure as the purest.

On his right, the hero Colonel D——.

The ceremony, brief but affecting, went on and was concluded.

Then friends pressed forward to offer their congratulations. Eugene among the young men who did no was Alfred Nevitt. He disguised his envy and his hate, and appeared earnest and sincere when he wished the happy couple many blessings.

And now servants hurried forward, bearing cake and wine on silver salvers.

First to the minister, then to the bride and groom, the wine was tendered.

Alas, for one of his high calling and his position, that minister was one who did not think total abstinence among his list of virtues. Eugene Westcott died and revered him. He had been a guide and counsel to raise his glass, and drink to the health of the bride.

"I hope that he is as fanatical as to forget that there was wine at the marriage feast of Cana, when Christ was present, and approved," he said. "But perhaps you belong to the Good Templars, or Sons, or Rechabites?"

"No sir; I belong to no society. But I have lived for three years without wine, and do not see the need of taking any now to add to the joy which fills my heart," replied Mr. Westcott.

"Eugene, my boy, and you, my sweet daughter, I drink your health and happiness as a mother. Our friends right to refuse to take this glass, and to drink it. I here with to pledge you in their good wishes would be give place to cold water, if they chose."

But not a single friend refuse the father of her husband, and he had no obligation to decline drinking that one glass! Oh, had he but belonged to some order, and could he have said:

"I can not, sir, even for your sake, break my solemn pledge!

Then he might have been saved from—a future, oh, so dark!

"For your father, Florence, my new son-in-law, and for no other reason, I drink this wine," said the minister, as he handed the first glass and took the second.

But the smile which passed over her face when all the friends took up their full glasses, and the bride and groom took up their full glasses, and the bride and groom took up their full glasses, and the bride and groom filled up to all around the room.

"Alas!" the minister were two who did not, would not touch the tempting glass.

Mrs. Westcott, pale, cold and suffered too much in the long years which had linked her with a drunken husband, and a son, while a young daughter died a deadly poison. May had heard too much from her mother's lips, not to have imbibed a horror of the cold, and hunger, and suffering which those had to bear, brought about by the drunkard's hard days, not to dread and turn from the seeming cup.

Eugene Selden stood by the brimming glass, and as the bride and groom left the room with a party of friends around, and it seemed as if he was translated into a realm of ecstasy.

Strangely did one pair of eyes glitter when they noticed the effect of a single glass of wine upon Eugene Westcott.

"I have him—I have him. The milk-sop, in spite of his stingy years of temperance, likes drink. Selden and his other friends—surmised Alfred Nevitt—do not know where his weak spot is, but I do. I never drank, or would have done so till after I left college, never do."

The next hour was enjoyed by the company invited, with wine passing to the lip, and then the bride and pair went down to the carriage which awaited them to take them to the depot.

The pre-matrimonial remained, for the old merchant had a banquet, prepared in honor of the occasion, worthy of the host, and to the daughter whose hand he had given away, the one who had come onto him.

Feasting and wine-drinking went on late into night, and while the happy wedded ones were speeding off to view the grandeurs of the far West, and the Pacific cities of the fairest, richest land on earth—dear California—the festivities and harmonious song made the old mansion ring with joy and melody.

* * * * * * *

"What makes you look so gay to-night, Neville? Your face is flushed, your eyes bright, as if aroused to two, to enable you to do better or worse?"

It was Eugene Selden who asked the first question of Alfred Neville, as the latter entered the parlor of the gambler's princely establishment on 5th or "Shoo Fly."

"Why, I have had a glass of wine with Westcott, Eugene Westcott has come back from California with his daughter-in-law, Lady she elected to remain with much as she did, and he blooms a good deal more, or has been doing so since he left."

"What, does he drink already?"

"Not to excess, I suppose, yet, but I think he goes in heavy on that. He says he has ten cases with him, and has given away some to friends, but reserves a yard, all for his own use."

"Ah, indeed! Well, I will tell him to drop in here with you some night. I have California wine, too, and I will be glad to see what these glasses will set him up till he thinks of his own home. Come, Neville, let us have a game of billiards. Fisk, and Stewart on one check. Let him be invited to play a little for a while, and then drain him. You shall go me halves."

"I will, with pleasure, Selden, for remaining but revenge on him and her. And I'll have it, if I have to kill him. I will not be balked in my purpose, and he is to be fell."

"Count on your head, my boy. I like a good hater. You must see to an idea. Where does he stay—a hotel?"

"No, he is to remain with his son-in-law, Eugene, for a time, and make him a full partner, and I guess things will rattle before Eugene Westcott leaves the city."

"Then I must see what his way mean him off from it."

"A child that has an appetite for milk will take it as soon as it can obtain meat to satisfy it, and so with drink—I think it was born in him, for his father was a confirmed drunkard, and I believe that from birth the appetite can be inherited.

"I have seen the nurse which had drinkers throw out, but it is only an excuse. I don't believe a word of it, and it will only be a matter of time, I think, until you indulge to-night?"

"I will not say. I feel so happy since I've seen and talked to Eugene Westcott—so confident that I shall win my suit, that I may drink. I thought, when I saw his eyes glisten at the sight of delicious wine, that I had found the appetite can be inherited.

"I will not promise what I am hard

Nurses falling teeth nor the peeping wrinkles of time so forcibly tell of advancing years as your gray hair. Ayer's Vigor restores its color and makes your appearance more agreeable to others as well as yourself. With fresh, luxuriant hair, the infirmities of age are far less noticeable.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE

ST. LOUIS

AND

ST JOSEPH RAILROAD CO.

—THE—

LAST OF THE ISSUE OF $1,000,000

NOW READY FOR SALE

AND

DELIVERY,

AMOUNTING TO $250,000,

AND ARE

THE ONLY BONDS EVER ISSUED BY THIS COMPANY.

They are secured by a first and only mortgage upon the entire property of the Company, including Franchises, Rights of Way, &c., and at the sale rate of $13,000 per mile on a complete and equipped road in successful operation.

Trustees for the Mortgage: Farmers' Loan and Trust Company of New York.

This Road connects St. Louis with St. Joseph by the most direct and the shortest route.

They are Coupon Bonds, in denominations of $1000, payable (Principal and Interest) in Gold, in the City of New York.

The Principal is payable 25 years from November, 1895, in Gold.

The Interest, at the rate of Six per Cent. per annum, is payable last of May and November in each year, at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, free of tax.

We are authorized to offer these Bonds for sale at 87½ and accrued interest in Currency. We do so with a full knowledge of the perfect security of every bond they are issued, and with this knowledge we unhesitatingly recommend them as a safe and reliable investment.

TANNER & CO.,

No. 49 Wall Street, New York.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!

The reputation of the NOVELTY JOB PRINTING PRESS is thoroughly established, as regards the requirements of a first-class press, with which to do your own printing, and as being second to none for the use of general Job Printers. Many printers are using them, and find them most admirably adapted for job work. Many young printers have made them, and are doing all the printing for the house which employs them, thereby materially adding to their salaries. Tradesmen and Manufacturers are using them for their own work, and Superintendents of Schools are finding them useful. Merchants and boys are finding them a never-failing source of instruction, pleasure, and profit. Most lads of fourteen, with one of these presses and a few dollars' worth of material, can perfectly execute all orders for printing for their father's business, and will be thereby gaining instruction. Prices of Presses, $15, $30, $32, $50. Send for full descriptive illustrated circular, with testimonials from all parts of the country, and specimens of plain and colored printing done on the press, and specimen sheets of type, rule, &c., to BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer, 361 Broadway, New York. Instruction in every branch of the art of Printing. Also, for sale the following Books: C. C. THURSTON, No. 16 College Place, New York.—BECKER, HOWELL, & WILLIAMS, No. 27 Frankfort Street, Philadelphia, Pa.: A. C. KELLOGG, 60 West Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

NOW READY—HITCHCOCK'S MAGAZINE for April.

CONTENTS:—Madame Peron Rosa, Illustrated Biography: N. P. Willis, Biography and Illustrations: Eight pages of new Piano Music, and eight pages of select reading.

A first-class magazine in every particular, $1 per year. Specimen copies by mail, 10 cents. Newsdealers can return unsold copies to News Co., address as above.

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,

94 Bedford St., New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Presses and printing materials for sale by the manufacturers, GOLDING, manufacturers of printing materials, &c., mailed free on application. Specimens books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 32 Murray Street, New York.

WHISKERS, MOUSTACHE, or HAIR Warranted to grow on man or boy in 6 weeks, or money refunded. Sent free for 30 cents. Address E. B. COLVIN, Modleyr Station, Illinois.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

$25.

One of the $20 Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

HAVE OPENED

THEIR STORE,

COVERING THE ENTIRE SQUARE BOUNDED

BY

Broadway, Fourth Avenue, Ninth and Tenth Streets,

REPLENISHING ALL THE VARIOUS STOCKS

with

FRESH GOODS,

IMPORTED AND SELECTED EXPRESSLY for

THE OCCASION.

ELEGANT NOVELTIES WILL BE OFFERED,

AND

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS.

THE CELEBRATED

BRAND BLACK ALPACAS!

This Brand of Alpacas is unique, on account of its absence of cloth and richness of color, has become the Standard Alpaca now used in the United States.

These Goods are greatly improved for the Spring and Summer wear, being of the richest and purest shade of fast Black, and made of the very finest mohair, as they are now manufactured to any LARGE EXTENT over sold in this country, and are now one of the most reliable goods manufactured in the world.

These beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in New York City, Brooklyn, &c., &c. The leading retail trade throughout all the States.

Ask Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Buffalo, precisely like the above.

WM. I. PEAKE & CO.,

46, 48, and 50 White St., New York,

Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

ART PRINCIPLES.

THE

AMERICAN DRAWING-BOOK,

By J. G. CHAPMAN, N. A.

A Manual for the Amateur, and Basis of Study for the Professional Artist. Adopted for Schools and Private Instruction.

Price $6 00.

To be had of Dealers; or, from the Publishers, by remittance, on receipt of price.

A. S. BARNES & CO., 111 & 113 William St., N. Y.

ROGERS'

GROUPS OF STATUARY.

These groups, suitable for wedding or birthday presents, are for sale by all, with all express charges prepaid, at the following prices: "Uncle Ben's Return," $30. "Checkers," $30. "Fishing," $28. Send for illustrated Catalogue and Price-List. JOHN ROGERS, 212 Fifth Ave., New York.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N. Y.,

Will dispose of SIX HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, AND ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for Cash during the month of this month, or will take from $5 to $35 monthly until paid for. Every Piano warranted for six years if purchased. Chickering Pianos are included in the above offer.

FOR FAMILY USE—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits everything, from Hose to Shirts, Nubias, Comforters, &c. Send for circular. Address HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., 323 Broadway, N. Y.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

AGENTS WANTED to sell the Life of Geo. Peabody, illustrated, and a complete History of the United States. Now is the time to make money. B. B. RUSSELL, Publisher, Boston, Mass.

$25 A DAY! 40 new articles for Agents. Sample free. S. M. SPENCER & CO., Boston, Mass.

STEEL SHIRT COLLAR, superbly enameled white (English), 8c.; American, three WEEKS, 31. Mailed receipt of price. HENRY CLUTH, Newburgh, N. Y.

I WAS cured of Deafness and Catarrh by a simple remedy, and will send the receipt free.

H. NICHOLSON, Bridgeport, Chenango Co., N. Y.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 357 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Inks of all kinds at low prices.

A MENIA SEMINARY, Ameria, N.Y. Term begins April 19. S. T. Frost, A.M., Principal and Prop't.

EMPLOYMENT.—$200 a month with Stencil Dies. Circulars free. S. B. STENCIL & CO., Boston, Mass.

Hunting-Case Watches, are manufactured with the most recent improvements as to style, finish, and durability; and are sold at less than the cost and wear by the best and most costly Gold watches. Fine Swiss Movements, full jewelled, $12; Fac-Simile Waltham, Elgin, and U. S. Watch Co.'s Movements, Patent Levers, $20; Chronometer Balance, $26. Ferguin's Patent "Pivot" Gold Watches, $30 and $35; Stem Winders, $40 and $45. After a fair trial, if not satisfactory, exchanged or money refunded, with 6 per cent. Every customer presented with the Patent Detector, which detects counterfeit Watches. Parties ordering Watches will please state whether for Lady or Gentleman. Circulars sent free. Address tomers must pay all charges, and allowed to examine what they order before paying bill, on paying to Express agent the amount charged. All orders accompanied with $10 or over, sent free of Express charges. Send Post Office Order for amount of order, will forward free of charge. Latest styles of Ladies' and Gentlemen's Chains, $9 to $10 00 each.

JOHN FOGGIN, Importer, 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

REMOVAL.

S. W. GERRY, Jr., will remove to southeast corner of 34th Street and Broadway, 1st of May. Importer and Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Tea, Wines, Cigars, and

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,

Formerly I. & W. Gerry, No. 719 Broadway,
Established in 1851. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years. Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent on application. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE ISSUE OF

$1,500,000

BY THE

ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY,

Bearing Eight Per Cent. Interest in Gold, Free of Government Tax.

The St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company (Eastern Division) offer, through the undersigned, the remainder of their First Mortgage Bonds of the issue of $1,500,000.

The Eastern Division of this road extends from St. Joseph, Mo., to Marysville, Kansas, a distance of 111 miles, of which 48 miles are now completed and in actual traveled use, and the remainder is being pushed forward with energy and dispatch.

Sufficient Iron has been purchased to complete the road, a portion of which has arrived, and the remainder is contracted for.

These bonds are issued in denominations of $500 and $1000, and have thirty-seven years to run, while the principal and interest are payable in New London, or Frankfort. The bonds have thirty-six coupons attached being due on the 1st of May and November, Interest, Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, New York.

The Mortgage securing these bonds is at the rate of $12,351 per mile, covers a completed road for every bond issued, and is a first and only Mortgage.

This line, connecting St. Joseph and Fort Kearney, will make a short and direct transit route to California, connecting at the latter point with the Union Pacific Railroad.

The Company have a Capital Stock

of.....$10,000,000

And a Grant of Land from Congress of 3,840 acres to the mile, which, at the lowest estimate, will realize.....1,000,000

First Mortgage Bonds.....1,500,000

Total.....$15,500,000

Price of bonds, 97½ and accrued interest in Currency.

These bonds, being so well secured, and yielding a large income, are desirable to parties seeking safe and remunerative investments.

Pamphlets, maps, and information furnished on application to

WM. P. CONVERSE & CO.,

COMMERCIAL AGENTS,

No. 54 Pine St., New York.

TANNER & CO.,

FISCAL AGENTS,

No. 49 Wall St., New York.

SPIRIT MYSTERIES.—Marvelous Feats of the Spirits, with Communications. Fully exposed, and explained in HARPER'S JOURNAL, of any newsdealer, or sent by mail for 10 cents. Send for subscription; only $3 ea. JESSE HANEY & CO.,

119 Nassau St., N. Y.

$100 CASH will be given for Original Puzzles.

DAINTY MANUAL gives best methods and latest improvements in Cookery, Confectionery, Preserving, Pickling, Carving, Dressing, Shaking, gliding, glazing, silvering, gilding, &c. Price 25 cts. Packard's book of Fancy Dances, 25 cts., of any bookseller, or JESSE HANEY & CO.,

119 Nassau St., N. Y.

NOW READY.—The Consolidated Magazine for April. THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL AND SCIENCE OF MAN, with 64 pages, 20 cts., or $2 a year. For sale by all newsmen. S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, New York.

AGENTS WANTED for Wilson's School and Family Charts.

To canvass in every state in the Union. Men of ability, and well recommended, can realize handsome profits. Address, for particulars, SHELDON & CO., HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

$20 A DAY! Business new. For circulars and sample, address with 3 stamps, C. MACDONALD, Mc. Grawville, N. Y.

The New Books of the Season

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. History of the American Civil War. By Lieut.-Colonel WM. PITT KELLY, Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of Virginia. 8vo, Vols. I. and II. Vol. III. just ready. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50 per vol.

A BRAVE LADY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. To gether with a Statement of the Doctrine of Scripture respecting the Primordial Condition and the Subsequent Changes of the Material World. By PHILIP HENRY GOSSE, A.M., Professor of Geology, Natural History, and Botany in the Royal Canadian Institution. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

THE UNKIND WORD, and Other Stories. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c., &c. 18mo, Cloth, $1 00.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON: or, Across the Continent of South America. By JAMES ORTON, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With Maps and numerous Illustrations on wood, numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

MY WIFE AND I. A Novel. By MRS. A. C. SWAYNE, Author of "Gardenhurst." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FREEMAN & BURR, MERCHANT CLOTHIERS, TAILORS, and Outfitters in Men's and Boys' Clothing and Furnishing Goods, 138 & 140 Fulton Street, New York. Best Materials, Best Styles, Best Workmanship, and Lowest Prices.

CLOTHING OF EVERY description, ready-made or made to measure, for all ages, all occasions, and all seasons.
An immense assortment of SPRING AND SUMMER CLOTHING, IN THE MOST NEWEST DESIGNS AND MATERIALS, at FREEMAN & BURR'S.

ORDERS BY MAIL attended to with care and punctuality. The easy and accurate system of self-measure introduced by FREEMAN & BURR enables them to guarantee Perfect Fitting in all cases.

RULES FOR SELF-MEASURE, Price-Lists, Samples of Goods, and Fashion Sheet, with full directions for ordering Clothing, sent free, on application, to any part of the country.

DREXEL & CO.,
34 South Third St., Philadelphia;
DREXEL, WINTHROP, & CO.,
15 Wall St., New York;
DREXEL, HARJES, & CO.,
3 Rue Scribe, Paris,

AMERICAN and FOREIGN BANKERS,

Issue Drafts and Circular Letters of Credit, available on presentation in any part of Europe. Travelers can have all their financial arrangements through us. We will collect their interest and dividends without charge.

All correspondence or papers directed to the care of DREXEL, HARJES, & Co., PARIS, will be promptly forwarded to any addresses that may be ordered by travelers; and, also, arrangements may be made for having surplus baggage with them.

American Exchange of the various Cities always on file at the Paris office.

SMITH'S

AMERICAN ORGANS!

Elegant in appearance—thoroughly constructed—with powerful and steady bellows—with exquisitely-voiced reeds—finely contrasted qualities of tone, and ingenious mechanical contrivances for increase of power and for expression.

No second-class work tolerated, and none but the best materials employed.

Every instrument warranted for Five Years.

GET THE BEST!

TWENTY YEARS ESTABLISHED.

30,000 IN USE!

 Illustrated Circulars to be had on application.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH,
Boston, Mass.

Woodward's National Architect, 1000 Working Plans, Elevations, Sections, Detail Drawings, Specifications, Estimates. Postpaid, $12.

Handy Barns, Outbuildings, and Fences. 200 Designs, including Stables, Gates, Hennery, and Stable Fittings. Postpaid, $15.

Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses. 150 Designs and Plans. Postpaid, $1.50.

Illustrated priced catalogue of all books on Architecture and Agriculture mailed free.

GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,
191 Broadway, New York.

COLLECTIONS OF FLOWER SEEDS BY MAIL.

The following Collections contain the most showy varieties in our large assortment, with full directions for culture. Each packet contains a mixture of the different colors and varieties of the species, so that a greater display can be made at a much less price than when ordered in separate packets. Those marked with Flowers, as well as the experienced cultivator, may order without fear of disappointment.

COLLECTION A—	contains twenty choice varieties of Annuals.....	$1 00
" B—	contains twenty choice varieties of Biennials and Perennials....	1 00
" C—	contains ten extra varieties of Annuals and Perennials, embracing many of the new and choice.	1 00
" D—	contains five very choice varieties, selected from Price Flowers, of English Pansies, German, Carnation, and Picotee Pinks, Verbenas, Truffaut's French Asters, Double Hollyhocks.....	1 00

Any one remitting $5 00 will receive the four Collections postage free.

COLLECTIONS OF KITCHEN-GARDEN SEEDS BY MAIL.

A Complete Assortment of Vegetable Seeds for One Year's supply, for a Large or Small Garden.

The following Collections are made up in the most liberal manner, care being taken to give a sufficient quantity of all the finest varieties and most useful sorts of Vegetables required in the Kitchen Garden.

ASSORTMENT No. 2	contains 25 varieties.....	$3 50
"	No. 1 contains 31 varieties.....	5 00
"	No. 2 contains 38 varieties.....	7 00
"	No. 3 contains 16 varieties.....	1 00

Larger Collections, which can be safely sent by express (freight must be prepaid) to any part of the country, as follows: No. 1, $10 00; No. 2, $15 00; No. 3, $20 00; No. 4, $25 00. For a list of the contents of each Collection, see Catalogue.

The Sixteenth Annual Edition of their Illustrated Seed Catalogue and Guide to the Flower and Kitchen Garden, containing 100 pages, will be mailed to all applicants enclosing Twenty-five Cents; regular customers supplied without charge.

Bliss's Gardener's Almanac mailed to all applicants upon receipt of a three-cent stamp. Address

B. K. BLISS & SON,
41 Park Row and 151 Nassau St.,
P. O. Box 5712, New York.

45,000 Now in Use! Geo. A. Prince & Co.'s ORGANS and MELODEONS will be delivered in any part of the United States carriage free, or free of charge, on receipt of list price.

Send for Price-Lists and Circulars.

Address GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Buffalo, N. Y.,
or GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Chicago, Ill.

POTASH & SON, Manufacturers of Dental Mechanical Goods. Store—No. 49 John St., New York. Factory—No. 9 and 11 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter-Box 5045. Repairing and Boiling also done.

MICROSCOPES,
For Scientific and Popular Investigations. Illustrated Price-List forwarded to any address.
T. H. McALLISTER, Optician, 49 Nassau St., N. Y.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,
OFFER FOR SALE
DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,
Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS,
and other
FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.
WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.
We call particular attention to our fine assortment of
CORAL JEWELRY.

THE RICE DIVORCE SUIT,

For fraud in age, is causing great excitement in Boston. It should warn young men not to marry in haste. Rice is but 22, his bride 37. He swears that she made him believe she was but his own age, by using Magnolia Balm upon her face, neck, and hands. Poor youth! He probably found her elbows weren't quite so soft and pretty. Ought Hagan to be indicted? We know of many similar cases. This Balm gives a most wonderful pearly and matural complexion, to which we don't object. We like pretty women. To finish the picture, they should use Lyon's Kathairon upon the hair. With pearly chin, rosy cheeks, and soft, luxuriant tresses, they become irresistible.

PAPER-BOATS.

For exercise, pleasure, racing, traveling, and hunting. Special models for young ladies, lads, tourists, & sportsmen. Descriptive circulars & price-list sent on application. WATERS, BALCH, & Co., 303 River St., Troy, N. Y.

FISHERIES.—For sale to the trade, 1000 Nets & Seines, for Brook, River, Lake, or Sea Fishing. 60,000 Gas Fish Netting, for export or domestic use, 4-6 inch sq. mesh. Amer. Net and Twine Co., 43 Commercial St., Boston.

UNITED STATES WATCH COMPANY,

MARION, N. J.,

Manufacturers of all the AMERICAN Watches, Pendant Winders and Key Winders,

BOTH NICKEL AND FROSTED MOVEMENTS.

The Box grades all having three pairs Conical Pivots, Cap Jewels, in Gold Settings, and accurately adjusted to Heat, Cold, and Position; and all, even in the cheapest grades, have the STRAIGHT-LINE Escapement, with Exposed Pallet Jewels, and Hardened and Tempered Hair Springs; and for our late improvement in STEM-WINDING mechanism, we claim a STRENGTH, SIMPLICITY, and SMOOTHNESS hitherto unattained in any other manufacture, at home or abroad.

Constantly on hand, full lines, all sizes, in Gold, Silver, Diamond Set, and Magic Cases, Minute Repeaters, Independent 1-4, 1-5 Split and Fly-back Seconds, for taking three different times.

Wholesale Warerooms, 13 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK,
And GILES, BROTHER, & CO., 142 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

NEW YORK, Jan. 17, 1870.

☞ WATCH No. 1089 (Stem Winder)—bearing Trade-Mark "Frederic Atherton & Co., Marion, N. J.," manufactured by United States Watch Co., has been carried by me from December, 1868, to January 17th, 1870; its total variation being only two seconds in the entire time.

L. E. CHITTENDEN, Late Register U. S. Treasury.

GILES, WALES, & Co., 13 Maiden Lane, New York.

☞ Price-Lists furnished the trade on application, enclosing business card. For sale by the trade generally.

WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,
OF MARION, N. J., retailed and sold to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.
☞ Call or send for Price-List.

DRESS REFORM.

Messrs. NICOL & DAVIDSON, will continue the business at 656 Broadway, next Great Jones St.

If Eating were a Felony it could not be more terribly punished than by the tortures of indigestion. Why suffer from Dyspepsia, Heartburn, or ought to know, that TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT is a specific for the complaint. Why, then, suffer? It is sheer folly.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE and Claverack College. For both sexes. Term opens April 4. Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., President, Claverack, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1870.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Number for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to return the old wrapper.

Remittances should be made by Money Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS if practicable in the locality. Notes, since, should they be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250 : Half Page, $125 : Quarter Page, $70—each insertion ; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 40 per Line : Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line : Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BROTHER JONATHAN (Jay.) "Ah, Specie! Glad to see you, Specie! Been looking for you for some time. Your substitute, Greenback, was very well in his day; but, fact is, I wanted some Change!"

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 694.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

GENERAL PRIM

GENERAL PRIM.

GENERAL PRIM, who has occupied the foremost place in Spain since the expulsion of Queen ISABELLA, was born in December, 1814, and is consequently now in his fifty-sixth year. His romantic and adventurous career commenced when he was a little more than eighteen years of age, with active service in the civil war which followed the succession of ISABELLA II. Throwing himself heartily into the arms of the CHRISTINA party, he rapidly made his way through the inferior grades, and at the age of twenty-three was already a full Colonel. On the flight of MARIA CHRISTINA, PRIM became one of the leaders of the Progressista party, vehemently opposing ESPARTERO, by whom he was at length expelled the country in 1842. Escaping to France, he again renewed his allegiance to MARIA CHRISTINA, and returning to Spain in the following year, on his election to the Cortes by the city of Barcelona, effected a coalition between the Christinos and the Progresistas; and after a struggle of varying fortune, in the course of which he more than once narrowly escaped capture, succeeded in upsetting his great rival ESPARTERO, and was rewarded by CHRISTINA with the Governorship of Madrid. His triumph, however, like most modern coups de Espose, did not last long. Moved partly by PRIM'S own injudicious action, and partly by the ceaseless machinations of the host of intriguers by whom what in Spain passes for politics is carried on, the Queen herself was soon turned against him; and for some years the name of PRIM seemed almost to have dropped out of the history of Europe. The Crimean War, however, at length drew him from his retirement; and at Silistria and elsewhere he gave good proof of the talent and courage which six years later reflected so much credit on the Spanish arms in the highly successful war with Morocco. His next command, though somewhat less glorious, can hardly be considered less successful. Intrusted with the leadership of the Spanish contingent associated with France and England in the ill-fated expedition to Mexico, PRIM was one of the first to recognize the error that had been made, and to execute a wise, if not perhaps a very chivalrous retreat. Of this the country no doubt reaped the benefit, but PRIM's own star appeared for some time after to be somewhat under a cloud. Three years of incessant intrigue and agitation culminated in 1866 in an abortive insurrection, followed the year after by a failure, if possible, even more complete; and the conqueror of Morocco found himself once more in exile, in London, damaged in credit, and almost bankrupt in pocket. In this connection he remained for nearly two years, till another turn of Fortune's wheel placed him once more at the head of affairs, apparently, at least, the arbiter of the future destinies of Spain.

In the course of his eventful life General PRIM has come in for a full share of honors. Twice he has sat in the Cortes for the important town of Barcelona—a manufacturing community in which and he has been made at different stages of his career Count de Reus, his native place, and Marquis de Castillejos and Grandee of Spain, these latter titles being conferred in recognition of his distinguished services in Morocco. In person he is about the middle height, grave, reticent, and reserved, and, notwithstanding his numerous exiles, speaking but little French, and no English. His favorite amusement, like that of most Spaniards, is gambling, of which he is passionately fond.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1870.

THE NEW NATION.

THE last few years of our national history have been so full of astonishing events, all tending to one end, that the formal completion of the cycle is saluted not with excitement, but with tranquil gratitude and satisfaction. The President has most wisely chosen to signalize the occasion by a special message, and thus to record, by the hand of the chief executive officer, the nation's sense of the significance and grandeur of the event. With simple impressiveness, conscious that the plainest statement of the fact is the most eloquent, he says:

"A measure which makes a nation of millions of people voters who were heretofore declared by the highest tribunal in the land not citizens of the United States nor eligible to become such, with the assertion that at the time of the Declaration of Independence the opinion was fixed and universal—in the civilized portion of the white race regarded as an axiom in morals as well as in politics—that 'black men had no rights which white men were bound to respect,' is indeed a measure of grander importance than any other one act of the kind from the foundation of our free government to the present time."

It is most fit that in announcing this great act of the people the chief Executive should recall that most false and odious decision of the Supreme Court which was intended to wither the hopes of a race, and to commit a government founded upon equal rights to a policy of the foulest injustice and the most cruel oppression. How gloriously vindicated is the faith of those who in the darkest days of the supremacy of slavery never faltered, and who, although unable to see the way of deliverance, were unalterably convinced that an intelligent, moral, united people, loving liberty, and taught liberty from the cradle, and teaching liberty, and trained by liberty, however for a time temporarily and confused by sophistry and apparent interest, would at last emerge from the clouds, and behold the truth like the sun in the heavens! It is the truth to which we are pledged is equal rights—fair play for all men. And if at this moment half of the land is scarred with the terrible wounds of war—if one part of the nation has been fiercely alienated from another—if in a myriad homes and hearts the light has gone out forever—it will bear the heavy burden of enormous debt—it is because those who denied equal rights and refused fair play to every man as a human soiled the government, and fixed their grasp so firmly that it could be relaxed only with infinite suffering and blood.

"And when he came to himself," says the parable, "he arose and went to his father." The act which the President solemnly commemorates shows that, after the lapse almost of a century, those country has come to itself; to its great principle; to its true idea. That great birth it remains for us, as the President suggests, to study the conditions which will alone enable us to continue to be masters of ourselves. Intelligence and honesty, these are the charmed lance and shield. Without these there may be a vast nation, but only with these can there be a free and progressive people.

ST. DOMINGO AND ST. THOMAS.

WE presume that the obligation which makes the executive debate upon the St. Domingo treaty secret will be removed, and that the speeches will be published. The annexation of foreign territory, with an alien population, a debt, and a civil war, is a subject of sufficient importance to be very fully presented and considered. As we write, it is understood that the treaty will not be ratified by the necessary two-thirds vote of the Senate. We hope so. But as we have now apparently entered upon our era of West Indian acquisition, or propositions of acquisition, it is most desirable that the country should become familiar with the advantages and disadvantages of territorial expansion in that direction; and with the extent and character of the "rings" and "pools" that have been formed in expectation of favorable action, and to compel it. St. Domingo contains about 140,000 inhabitants. General TATE writes that, even if the debt of the country were 30,000,000, it would be a fair bargain. Senator MORTON says that he thinks the expense of the purchase would not be more than $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. An entertaining picture of two or three millions of natives in earlier days basking in the genial sun of the island, and reposing without labor on the rich fruits that "spontaneous grew there," as in the pleasant groves of Blarney.

Now, fortify yourself. Conclusiveness alone are not conclusive reasons for buying more territory and adding to our population than of St. Domingo. We have said that the most productive territory already, waiting only for our own sparse population to develop. There is also foreign influence and movement of various kinds in our population, and there is no imperative necessity of increasing it. There must be some particular and powerful reason for annexing the United States in extending themselves into the Gulf. Is there any such reason, and if so, what is it? The reason alleged is the necessity of a naval station in the West Indies. This was the ground of the negotiations opened by Mr. SEWARD with Denmark for St. Thomas, and it is understood that a naval station is very desirable. But the arguments that prove the desirability of obtaining the island—and they are so prodigious as that which is involved in absorbing St. Domingo are yet to be made public. Certainly, a naval station in the Mediterranean sea from a naval station can overcome the disadvantages of the acquisition.

Besides, there is the climate. We need not repeat what has been said upon that subject in these columns and elsewhere. It is enough that the fevers of Africa again and again smite Denmark, and that Denmark, with the full information, but, as appears, mistaken, understanding that it was exempt by the treaty of cession, ced the question of separation to the inhabitants of St. Thomas, who decided that they would be transferred. But the loyalty to Denmark and most friendly power assented only upon the extreme pressure of our Foreign Secretary, has been regarded with the utmost suspicion by the Senate. The extension of the term of ratification expires on the 18th of April, and the treaty will probably fail. Meantime the executive will be very difficult for any foreign power to satisfy itself that our negotiators have any authority whatever, or that the work of the Executive Department of the United States—one of the ablest that the country has known; and we shall be in the situation of an offended suitor who spurns but honest and faithful friend. When the St. Thomas treaty is rejected, it will be only proper that Congress shall fully discuss the whole matter after to initiate negotiations of such a character.

Meanwhile, having refused to buy St. Thomas, for which we have made an offer, we await the reasons for buying St. Domingo, at an incalculably higher price, if we consider the probable debt, the jobs, the foreign complications, to Hayti, the domestic troubles, the ignorant, superstitious, and utterly alien people.

DEFENDING THE CITADEL.

THE meeting at the Cooper Institute to protest against the diversion of the public school money of New York to sectarian purposes, was the stream of petitions against the same abuse which pours into the Legislature, show that the public mind is fully conscious of the danger. It is not a subject upon which any citizen can afford to be silent. The influences which press for this violation of the fundamental political principles of the government are both subtle and powerful. The purpose will not be relaxed. It is founded in the conviction of the Roman Catholic clergy that an absolute separation of church and state is not favorable to the increase of their authority. Experience has told that they are tenacious and skillful; and every body should remember that the great securities of our government do not defend themselves, and that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

There has recently been an immense increase of voters in this country and among the most ignorant classes. At the same time there is a pressure, which is likely to grow rather than diminish, for NET Indian annexation, and a consequent further increase of ignorance in the population. Meanwhile the extent of corruption, of a kind which especially depends upon ignorance, corruption upon a scale which menaces the whole American system, becomes one of the gravest subjects of apprehension. For these difficulties there is one practicable remedy, and that is education. Intelligence is the primary condition of a permanent and peaceful popular government, and therefore the common school is the citadel of America. It is the consciousness of this fact which leads Congress to propose the continuance of the educational department of the Freedmen's Bureau, and which inspires the timely words of the President in announcing the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment. It is the same consciousness which brings the country to its feet when it hears the report of the first faint shot at the common school system.

But if the common school system is to be a blessing and not a curse, it must be a united and unsectarian system. The separation between church and state, which is observed in every other department of the government, must be rigorously maintained here. It would be clearly most unjust if schools are established for the public welfare, and that, in a community of countless sects, it is impossible that the public welfare can be considered if the schools undertake to teach sectarian views. If, therefore, any sect declares that it will not send its children to schools where its particular tenets are not taught, we must say to it that, as all sects are taxed for the schools, the peculiar tenets of no sect can be inculcated in them. If the sect declares that the tenets of certain sects are now taught in the schools, and can establish the truth of such a charge, it will be an imperative duty to reform such an abuse. But it is not enough to establish the charge to protest that not to teach its own views is to teach other views.

The hostility of the Roman Catholic clergy to our public school system is not founded upon the fact that the Bible is read in them, but that religion is not taught in them. The very existence of the schools—for every object that was most strenuously sought and achieved by them—is made the ground of opposition. It is not the fact that the schools are godless which is the cause of the religious education of their youth. When, therefore, the Roman Catholic clergy say that, if religion is not taught in the schools, it is an injustice to tax Roman Catholics for their support, they advocate the overthrow of the whole system, which, as we said last week, while they may do this as citizens just as they may advocate the establishment of a church and an ecclesiastical worship of the press, their assertion that they are persecuted as a religious sect, if their political opinions do not prevail, is the merest folly.

If there be one just pride and glory of the American government greater than another, it is that it has never, in the least degree, persecuted any religious sect. Its impartiality has been absolute and austere. Its popular elections, indeed, have proved to religious sects sometimes been made, as when Mr. JEFFERSON was denounced as a French infidel, and a DAVY-NOLDING by those who opposed the elected against Mr. FREMONT as a Roman Catholic. But the government itself has been untainted by this spirit. It has known neither Jew nor Gentile, neither Trinitarian nor Unitarian. And he who, in the ghastly history of belief or persecution, and other times, is familiar with the tragical consequences of the opposite policy, will need no other exhortation to be vigilant and strenuous to oppose the least attempt to change the wise and beneficent practice of our own government.

POLITICS UPON THE BENCH.

ELSEWHERE we consider the general question of reopening the late legal-tender decision. It is a warm subject by those who oppose the proposition that it is to be deplored as a political movement, and that the Supreme Court should not always display supreme and serene wisdom, doubtlessly it should. But is it not a painful truth that, when Mr. LINCOLN nominated Mr. CHASE for Chief Justice, he unwittingly made politics upon the Supreme Bench? It was supposed that he chief of the Judiciary Department, and that, having accepted it, he would be expectation? Alas! the Chief Justiceship has been infatuated with the Presidential fever, and not the touch of the softest ermine can assuage that fire.

The evening of two years ago are not forgotten. They were incredible, but they were true. He would be a bold man who should deny that, when Mr. SEYMOUR accepted the nomination at Tammany Hall, he had in his pocket the speech with which he meant to urge the nomination of Mr. CHASE, with the express consent of that gentleman. The Chief Justice of the United States, theoretically superior to the turmoil of politics, was in communication with those who sat in convention with WADE HAMPTON and his fellows, ignoring that they were unchanged, and was arranging with them the terms upon which he would be a candidate against the party that had successfully ended the war and emancipated the slaves. It was the most disastrous illustration of the demoralization produced by Presidential ambition which can be found in our history. We doubt if any equally conspicuous man ever so suddenly forfeited the confidence of the best part of a nation.

Perhaps a man who has once become the victim of this Presidential poison ought not to be considered responsible. Certainly all those who with us had so long respected and trusted the Chief Justice would gladly think so.

Whether it was after or before this communication with his political opponents we do not now recall, nor is it of any importance, but Mr. CHASE announced that he had withdrawn from politics. But if the Democratic Convention of 1872 should nominate him for President, would he decline? Does any one familiar with his career believe he would decline? The peculiar impropriety that the Chief Justice should negotiate for a nomination must have been, of course, as evident to him in 1868 as it will be in 1872. The prospect of the Presidency itself would certainly not be less alluring. It is not probable that a public man who has been always aiming at the Presidency would refuse the chance when at last it came; and we must, therefore, believe that the Democratic nomination in 1872 would be at least extremely agreeable to the Chief Justice. He waves a purely decorative hand indeed; but Mr. SEYMOUR also took great pains to announce that he could not and would not be a candidate. But when the Convention met, and its love, the gentle HORATIO blushed, and faintly whispering, he would as'er consent—consented.

The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court must be considered still a candidate for the Presidency. We do not say, therefore, that he should resign from the bench, nor consent to one of the legality of which, we have not pretended. But unquestionably, when a decision is announced in consonance with party decisions in lower courts as that upon the Legal Tender act, and so agreeable to those who declared the conduct of the war to be unconstitutional in some most vital points, it is not unnatural to seem to the country a decision superior to political feelings and influences, when it is known to have been adopted by a majority of one, and when the political situation is what it is to-day, and the Chief Justice is mentioned as a probable candidate for the Presidency. It is of this is—as undoubtedly it is—a general feeling, it is the fault of no country, which has always wished to believe the Court beyond Presidential ambition, or of the Chief Justice who negotiated for a nomination.

We said at the time that the precedent was deplorable; and one of the chief reasons that we urged was that the confidence of the country in the Court would necessarily be shaken if it were not kept absolutely free from suspicion of personal political aspiration. The decision that is sought to be reversed is not free from that suspicion; and surely it is not necessarily, in an open case, a political movement which seeks to set aside such a decision, when it declares, as the Attorney-General says, that it is "unconstitutional to have a rebellion beyond a certain magnitude."

THE RING-BREAKERS.

IT would be difficult to mention a more illustrative contest than the political crisis of the past month in New York and Albany. The discussions which always attend a party in unprecedented supremacy have been unknown to the Democratic party in this city, whose government is the perpetual monument of the party principle and character. A certain clique, called the Ring, turned the Democratic ascendency to its own peculiar advantage. Other members of the party rebuked at this monopoly of power and plunder. Suddenly war was loudly declared by the chief Democratic paper in the city upon the Ring. It alleged that "bandicapped" with the Ring the Democratic party could no more succeed at the next election than in 1864 with the Chicago platform and letters, or in 1868 with the Tammany repudiation and broad platform. But the party was to be saved by the Ring must be destroyed. Simultaneously in the Legislature hostilities began. It was announced that it was the enthusiasm of the movement that Messrs. SWEENY and TWEED, the representatives of the Ring, were sinking into the undistinguished minority, and soon disappear. The reply went up from the party paper

"No quarter; the black flag; war to the knife!"

The Ring-breakers at last displayed their plan of campaign, which had evidently been modified by the Ring, showing that the Ring was, after all, master of the situation. But, as if to prove it by covering the self-glorifying assailants with utter contempt, the Ring mercilessly defeated the bills which had been changed to suit its pleasure. Then followed heroics of every kind, and an appeal was made to the Tammany Committee. Mr. TWEED, the Ring-master, should be hurled from the chairmanship of the Committee, and conspicuously disgraced. The King-breakers assembled their hosts, counted a majority, and, forecasting their triumph, proceeded to Tammany Hall. It was dark. It was silent. The police forbade them to enter. The trustees of the Hall had refused to allow the meeting. Leaving a note, it was a dank movement of the King-master so ingenious and dashing that the King-breakers, conscious that they were ludicrously outwitted, disappeared, and the next day, arriving exhausted in Albany, discovered that the indefatigable King-master had taken them over their own bank also, and had made his own bill the special order for the next day.

The next day came. The bill was called up. There was a little more guscoonade from the King-breakers in the Assembly, like the sputter of expiring candles; and then the victorious squad of reformers and saviors of the Democratic party from being handicapped by the King, the heroes of the war to the knife and the knife to the hilt, supported the King-master's bill, and with a rapidity and a ridicule unparalleled in our political annals the luminous King-breakers were summarily broken. It cannot be said that it was the least wool ever known for so great a cry for there was no cry, or visible shred left. The bill for which the King-breakers voted confirms and extends the power of the King; and the vote itself is the most extraordinary evidence of its present power. The action of the King-breakers in the Assembly spiked all the guns of the paper which had been constantly declaring that the supremacy of the King was due to a coalition with the worst Republicans for with two or three exceptions the whole body of its own party in the Assembly voted for the King. And now that the force is ended, the body, probably, is very seriously disappointed nor surprised. The hostility, as was said last week, will smoulder, and there will be many opennesses hereafter. But the judicious Young Democrat who hopes for preferment will be chary of his boasts of breaking the King.

LEGAL TENDER.

In 1866, during the Presidential term of ANDREW JOHNSON, Congress passed an act that no vacancy in the office of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States should be filled by appointment until the number of Associate Justices had been reduced to six, and that thereafter the Court should consist of a Chief Justice and six Associates, any four of whom should constitute a quorum.

At the time of the passing of this act the Court was composed of eight Associate Justices, in addition to Chief Justice CHASE, viz.: JAMES WAYNE, SAMUEL CLIFFORD, NATHAN CLIFFORD, STEPHEN SWAYNE, MILLER, and FIELD; and it was generally supposed, as three of the Court were of great age—WAYNE, CLIFFORD, and NELSON—that vacancies were likely to happen within the term of the then incumbent of the Presidency, and that they would be filled temporarily by appointees in harmony with him. It was deemed expedient to provide against this contingency by declaring that, if the vacancies did occur, by death, they should not be filled. JUSTICE WAYNE, who had been assigned to a Southern Circuit, died in 1867, and in February of that year Justice GRIER resigned.

After the elevation of General GRANT to the Chief Magistracy the power to fill vacancies up to the original number was restored, and nominations and appointments for this purpose were made of Judges STRONG and BRADLEY, who have entered upon the discharge of their duties. During the pendency of these nominations the legal-tender case was argued, Justices CLIFFORD, NELSON, and FIELD uniting with the Chief Justice against Justices DAVIS, SWAYNE, and MILLER.

As this case involved the right to exercise a power in war which Congress can not in time of peace initiate but declares to be essential to success, it would seem that it ought to have been reserved until the Court was full. So far as concerns Chief Justice CHASE, who had urged Congress with great earnestness to pass the bill, there were strong reasons for delay as now he could not be required to declare as void an act which he, as the chief financial officer at the time, had induced Congress to pass. The opinion would have been regarded as painful by those who wished to avoid the suspicion of extraordinary motives.

The relations of the Court to Congress, as prescribed in the Constitution, constitutes a powerful reason for the utmost delicacy in the treatment of questions of Congressional power. The authority to adjudicate upon them belongs to its appellate jurisdiction which gives the power to "have," "with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." The Court itself, when presided over by Chief Justice MARSHALL, decided, in the familiar case reported in 3d Cranch, that although the Constitution specifies the subjects of its jurisdiction, yet when Congress, in an affirmative enumeration of the matters upon which the Court might act on appeals, specified some of those mentioned in the Constitution and omitted others, it amounted to a regulation imperative in the exclusion of those omitted.

Far be it from us to wish to limit in any degree the perfect independence of the judiciary, as we regard this freedom as the sheet-anchor of our safety; but prudence requires that a tribunal subjected so materially to the power of Congress by the fundamental law should continue to use the same delicacy in questions affecting Congressional power which governed the Court when MARSHALL presided over its deliberations. Its dignity and influence will always be promoted by extreme caution. The exhibition of this care will command public confidence, and prevent embarrassment in providing for the regulations which Congress is empowered to make.

We wish that the Attorney-General could have been saved the necessity of a motion to open one of its decisions, on the ground that the Court were not full when it was made. The attention of partisans is warmly directed to the contest, and even the foreign press has spoken of the tribunal as unused and indifferent. But as the decision involves the very essence of the war power, and subjects the country to peril in case of any temporary suspension of operation, so that it may be considered by the full Court, is required for public security.

The statement of the Attorney-General against the Legal-Tender act, in its application to pre-existing debts, is supported by many on the ground that it is a mere question of specie payments. In nearly every loyal State the act was declared legal, by the highest State courts, in the application to debts, upon the ground that Congress had power to determine what means, which promoted the end in view, were "necessary and proper" for conducting war, and that it was for courts to consider the question of necessity and propriety as settled if it was a means, and was not prohibited.

In the argument of the case at Washington, the action of the British Parliament in creating a precedent in this legislation was entirely overlooked. The act of 1797, which legalized the refusal of the Bank of England to pay its bills in coin, and prevented a number of debtors who could show that they had tendered them, was followed, in 1814, by another act making it a misdemeanor to issue notes of less than their nominal value, or gold for more.

This act also provided that, in case of distraint for rent, after the 24th of June then ensuing, the goods seized upon should be returned, but the law left the creditor to his other remedies.

These statutes, in the main, were because they applied to pre-existing debts of the most sacred character, and produced a forced circulation of the bills of the Bank of England, to the utter exclusion of gold and silver for a period of over twenty years. The policy of the act controlling the issue of coin was not involved.

The Parliament of Great Britain passed the act, and ultimately provided for its repeal. Each of these legislative departments said in a great error to suppose that we can with safety rely upon a court to employ a legislative function and restore the country to specie payments.

We are the firm advocates of a return to specie payments as soon as it can be accomplished with advantage. This is a duty which Congress ought not to omit; but its omission does not justify the charge that it is corrupt and polishing the object. If we can not secure a repeal of the law in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, the inflictive law must be borne, as in that case it is the will of the people.

THE BOARD OF REGENTS.

THERE has been a great deal of satirical fun leveled at the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York. The functions of the body are by very little understood, and they have been often represented as a close corporation of useless old fogies. The Constitutional Convention was besieged with petitions for the abolition of the Board; and it debated the proposition of a State Board of Education, to combine the duties of the Regents and of the Department of Public Instruction. The Regents are a body of great dignity, for they are elected by the United States Senators, and by the Assembly, and they are certainly an inexpensive body, for the members are paid nothing but their actual expenses. Some of the most distinguished citizens of the State have been members of the Board, and Mr. VERPLANCK, who recently died in his honors and years, was the Vice-Chancellor.

Last year the attempt to abolish the Board was renewed, but the Superintendent of Public Instruction was instructed to report upon the expediency of such action. In his report he takes the following facts the subject at some length. In brief, the facts are these. There are two systems of education connected with the State: one consists of the public schools, the other of the chartered academies and colleges. The Department of Public Instruction manages the relations of the State to the first, the Board of Regents to the second. The Regents are authorized by the Legislature to grant charters both to colleges and academies, and to distribute money among the latter upon certain conditions. They may grant honorary degrees, and are required to visit and inspect the colleges and academies annually, reporting upon their condition to the Legislature. They have also charge of the State Library and State Cabinet of Natural History, and of the State Normal School at Albany. These are their duties, and the question is whether the discharge of that all the schools of every kind with which the State has relations should be under the control of one body, or whether it is wise to maintain the present separate supervision.

The Superintendent states that the powers of the Regents are very limited, and that practically they can do nothing but visit and report. If greater efficiency is sought in the academic system greater power must be given to the Board. But the Superintendent is of opinion that the time has not come for making the academies more efficient. In other words, he thinks what is called higher education in the public school system; and that to unite free schools with chartered academies charging fees for tuition would make a very incongruous system. He thinks, therefore, that the principle of the present system of a dual supervision should be maintained; but he sees no reason that the Board which has the care of the academies should be at all concerned with matters appertaining to the Legislature. He would have unity of control of all the schools of every kind that depend for their progress upon the State, and to this end there should be a single Department of Education. He consequently recommends that the Regents be made a mere visitors of that Department, charged with their present duties, and that their report be made to the Head of the Department, to be incorporated in the annual report, so that one document may show the operation of the entire system of State relations to education. And he also recommends that the Regents be therefore elected for a limited term.

The Superintendent does not enter upon the question—for it was not submitted to him—whether the State should give any aid whatever to private institutions. There are many in the State of New York twenty-two colleges, about two hundred academies, and eighty Union free schools, which receive a contribution in excess of the districts, of the academy and the common school. There have been altogether forty colleges and two hundred and twenty academies chartered, but many have become dormant or are relinquished. Others undoubtedly would languish, but do not, for the want of aid. Upon the whole, however, it is wisely given. The public money that helps to support an academy is in the districts where otherwise there would be none is probably well spent.

That the changes proposed by the Superintendent would tend to make the management of the relation of the academies to the State more efficient is not very clear. It subordinates the Regents to the Head of the Department of Education, and limiting their term, their dignity is somewhat diminished. And although it is the dignity which is the object of much irreverent satire, to which HALLECK contributed, yet to reduce the dignity of an unpaid body of honorable officers does not seem to be a policy likely to increase their zeal or efficiency. The Superintendent argues forcibly and well in favor of maintaining the substance of the present system; and with great deference for the opinion of an officer of experience and sagacity, it seems to us that, if the system is to continue, the changes proposed would be disadvantageous.

THE PUBLIC MONEY AND THE SECTS.

In the minority report of the Committee on Public Education made to the Assembly and signed by the Chairman, Mr. FRANCIS and three associates, it is asserted that the subject of the diversion of the public money to sectarian purposes has been either misunderstood or misrepresented; and this paper is charged with publishing "vulgar and blasphemous pictures" to arouse the prejudice of the community against a wrong which exists only in its imagination. The report states that the law of last year by which power was given to sectarian schools does not involve any money received for the common school tax; and, consequently, that it will be time enough to defend the school moneys when they are attacked.

Of course the Committee are aware that this is the merest quibble. The act complained of is the tenth section of the New York county tax levy for 1869, which divides as "amount appropriated by county act, on the excise moneys received for said city in 1868" among certain schools. This is not money raised for the common schools, which the constitution secures to the support of common schools; but it is money paid out of the common money levy for the support of sectarian schools, and that is the very point of the opposition. It is public money paid for sectarian education—a measure wholly at war with one of the fundamental principles of the government. And, however earnestly the minority of the Committee may insist that the school moneys have not been touched, they know, as well as the rest of us, the claim now made is that those moneys shall be divided proportionally among the sects. It seems to us unworthy of the accomplished chairman of the Committee on Education publicly to disfigure a quibble as a reply to the demand that the State shall not provide sectarian instruction; and the report merely shows how utterly unjustifiable and dangerous is the act of last year, under which it is done.

THOMAS R. GLEN

ONE of the most faithful friends of the readers of this paper, and one to whom they are greatly indebted for the accuracy and neatness of its engraved "cuts" and type, has, for some months even was unknown to them, has recently died, after a wasting illness of some months; and nowhere more properly than here could the name of THOMAS R. GLEN be mentioned, and with the sincerest kindness and regard. He was born in Scotland, and came to this country in 1840. After some years passed he was in the employment of HARPER & BROTHERS, with whom he continued for twenty-eight years, until his death on Thursday, March 29, at the age of fifty-four. During much of that time he was foreman of the composing-room of the Magazine, Weekly, and Bazar; and no man could be more devoted and able in the discharge of his important responsibility. Indeed his unconquerable fidelity was such that, despite the most friendly remonstrance, he was anxious to assume every burden, and seemed to feel it a reproach rather as a fault of his own. MR. GLEN had all the proverbial sagacity of his nation. Intelligent, perceptive, interested in every generous and humane effort, modest and gentle in manner, an efficient and admirable friend in every relation, he invokes professional devotion, his singularly upright and simple character has left behind him a host always be not only kindly, but gratefully, remembered by those who were his daily companions.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 28.—Nothing of importance was done in the Senate.—In the House, the whole day was devoted to the debate on the Tariff bill.

March 29.—In the Senate, Mr. Sherman reported a joint resolution for the joint commission regarding the census tax, which provides for the taxing of incomes received during the present year. The bill was then established, and thereafter at three per cent. The Texas bill was then taken up, and Mr. Sherman spoke in favor of it. Mr. Sumner opposed the constitutional amendment upon which the State was annexed and admitted, was passed.—In the House, the Tariff bill occupied the whole day.

March 30.—In the Senate, the day was mostly devoted to executive session.—In the House the Delinoge treaty: no action was taken.—In the House, the Senate concurrent bill for the relief of the war, after some discussion, concurred in by a party vote.

March 31.—In the Senate, the credentials of Messrs. Hamilton and Flanigan, Senators elect from Texas, were presented. Mr. Sumner presented a bill to admit Georgia to representation.—In the House, the whole day was occupied in the discussion of the Tariff bill.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

A meeting of the Democratic General Committee was held in the Tammany Hall, on the 5th ult., on the 26th ult., for the purpose of investigating the action of Mr. FIELD, Chairman, and the Democratic General Committee, who was freely charged by numerous Democrats with having acted in bad faith with the party in procuring the defeat of the Mozart for New York. On assembling in answer to the call, the members of the Committee found the Mozart and "Wigwam" closed by order of the Sachems. The reason now assigned for the course was that vacancies had existed which were filled; but the "Young Democracy" assert that the "Tweed" party are afraid of being voted out of the membership if be permitted the meeting to be held. Since the 26th ult. it is reported that efforts to secure final reductions appears to have subsided, and on the 30th ult. another district Court was to have been opened by the assembly with scarcely any opposition.

On the 30th ult. the Governors of both Houses of the Legislature of Georgia communicated the fact of the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, whereupon they voted the closing also the official proclamation of the event.

The Fourth Ward, Chicago, was partially freighted on the 9d inst. by a severe earthquake shock, which lasted about a minute. The rocking of the buildings sent the whole population into the streets, and for a little while his excitement was intense.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE project of a Senates Constitution, drawn up by M. Olivier, in accordance with the Plebiscite of May last, has been presented to the French Senate. It makes some important changes in the existing Constitution. It divides between the Emperor, Corps Legislatif, and Senate the power now held by the latter body alone. It takes from the Chamber of Deputies and former attributes giving the Government greater facilities for arrest. No change can henceforth be made in the Constitution except by the voice of the people on the proposal of the Emperor. The Emperor decreed a vote of the people on this project.

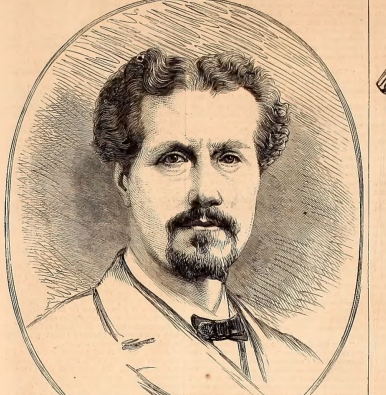
Pierre Bonaparte has been sentenced to pay the family of VICTOR NOIR 60,000 francs, and to suffer a year of the civil cost.

A very serious strike exists among the iron workers at La Creusot, in France, and the ballots have been called out to preserve order.

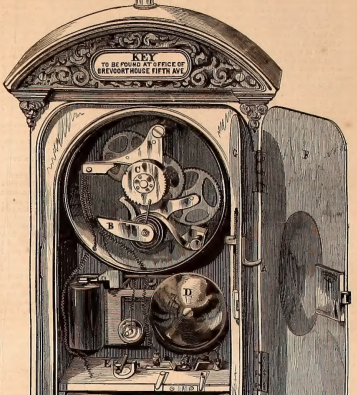
Discontent in Ireland is on the increase, and many evictions against landlords and property are reported. In consequence of the passage of the Irish Force bill by the British Parliament the tide of emigration has greatly increased.

A general movement of Spanish troops against the Cubanesurgents of the Central Department is in full sol. Strong columns left Puerto Principe on the 1st inst., and Las Tunas on the 2d inst., to drive the insurgents from the district. General Goyeneche is the commander. The Cuban Government has issued a decree declaring the capture of Puerto Principe. Five hundred Spanish troops arrived at Havana on the 3d instant.

WATCHING FOR THE MISSING.



PRINCE HENRI DE BOURBON.—[SEE PAGE 247.]



THE NEW FIRE-ALARM TELEGRAPH—SIGNAL-BOX.—[SEE PAGE 247.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SIXTH.

THE TRUTH AT LAST.

Two days after the marriage—on Wednesday, the ninth of September—a packet of letters, received at Windygates, was forwarded by Lady Lundie's steward to Ham Farm.

With one exception, the letters were all addressed either to Sir Patrick or to his sister-in-law. The one exception was directed to "Arnold Brinkworth, Esq., care of Lady Lundie, Windygates House, Perthshire"—and the envelope was specially protected by a seal.

Noticing that the post-mark was "Glasgow," Sir Patrick (to whom the letter had been delivered) looked with a certain distrust at the handwriting on the address. It was not known to him—but it was obviously the handwriting of a woman. Lady Lundie was sitting opposite to him at the table. He said, carelessly, "A letter for Arnold"—and pushed it across to her. Her ladyship took up the letter, and dropped it, the instant she looked at the handwriting, as if it had burned her fingers.

"The Person again!" exclaimed Lady Lundie. "The Person, presuming to address Arnold Brinkworth, at My house!"

"Miss Silvester?" asked Sir Patrick.

"No," said her ladyship, shutting her teeth with a snap. "The Person may insult me by addressing a letter to my cow. But the Person's name shall not pollute my lips. Not even in your house, Sir Patrick. Not even to please you."

Sir Patrick was sufficiently answered. After all that had happened—after her farewell letter to Blanche—here was Miss Silvester writing to Blanche's husband, of her own accord! It was unaccountable, to say the least of it. He took the letter back, and looked at it again. Lady Lundie's steward was a methodical man. He had indorsed each letter received at Windygates with the date of its delivery. The letter addressed to Arnold had been delivered on Monday, the seventh of September—on Arnold's wedding-day.

What did it mean?

It was pure waste of time to inquire. Sir Patrick rose to lock the letter up in one of the drawers of the writing-table behind him. Lady Lundie interfered (in the interest of morality).

"Sir Patrick!"

"Yes?"

"Don't you consider it your duty to open that letter?"

"My dear lady! what can you possibly be thinking of?"

The most virtuous of living women had her answer ready on the spot.

"I am thinking," said Lady Lundie, "of Arnold's moral welfare."

Sir Patrick smiled. On the long list of those respectable disguises under which we assert our own importance, or gratify our own love of meddling in our neighbor's affairs, a moral regard for the welfare of others figures in the foremost place, and stands deservedly as number one.

"We shall probably hear from Arnold in a day or two," said Sir Patrick, locking the letter up in the drawer. "He shall have it as soon as I know where to send it to him."

The next morning brought news of the bride and bridegroom.

They reported themselves to be too supremely happy to care where they lived, so long as they lived together. Every question but the question of Love was left in the competent hands of their courier. This sensible and trust-worthy man had decided that Paris was not to be thought of as a place of residence, by any sane human being, in the month of September. He had arranged that they were to leave for Baden—on their way to Switzerland—on the tenth. Letters were accordingly to be addressed to that place, until further notice. If the courier liked Baden, they would probably stay there for some time. If the courier took a fancy for the mountains, they would in that case go on to Switzerland. In the mean while nothing mattered to Arnold but Blanche—and nothing mattered to Blanche but Arnold.

Sir Patrick re-directed Anne Silvester's letter to Arnold, at the Poste Restante, Baden. A second letter, which had arrived that morning (addressed to Arnold in a legal handwriting, and bearing the post-mark of Edinburgh), was forwarded in the same way, and at the same time.

Two days later Ham Farm was deserted by the guests. Lady Lundie had gone back to Windygates. The rest had separated in their different directions. Sir Patrick, who also contemplated returning to Scotland, remained behind for a week—a solitary prisoner in his own country house. Accumulated arrears of business, with which it was impossible for his steward to deal single-handed, obliged him to remain at his estates in Kent for that time. To a man without a taste for partridge-shooting the ordeal was a trying one. Sir Patrick got through the day with the help of his business and his books. In the evening the rector of a neighboring parish drove over to dinner, and engaged his host at the noble but obsolete game of Piquet. They arranged to meet at each other's houses on alternate days. The rector was an admirable player; and Sir Patrick, though a born Presbyterian, blessed the Church of England from the bottom of his heart.

Three more days passed. Business at Ham Farm began to draw to an end. The time for Sir Patrick's journey to Scotland came nearer. The two partners at Piquet agreed to meet for a final game, on the next night, at the rector's house. But (let us take comfort in remembering it) our superiors in Church and State are as completely at the mercy of circumstances as the humblest and the poorest of us. That last game of Piquet between the baronet and the parson was never to be played.

On the afternoon of the fourth day Sir Patrick came in from a drive, and found a letter from Arnold waiting for him, which had been delivered by the second post.

Judged by externals only, it was a letter of an unusually perplexing—possibly also of an unusually interesting—kind. Arnold was one of the last persons in the world whom any of his friends would have suspected of being a lengthy correspondent. Here, nevertheless, was a letter from him, of three times the customary bulk and weight—and, apparently, of more than common importance, in the matter of news, besides. At the top the envelope was marked "Immediate." And at one side (also underlined) was the ominous word, "Private."

"Nothing wrong, I hope?" thought Sir Patrick.

He opened the envelope.

Two inclosures fell out on the table. He looked at them for a moment. They were the two letters which he had forwarded to Baden. The third letter remaining in his hand, and occupying a double sheet, was from Arnold himself. Sir Patrick read Arnold's letter first. It was dated "Baden," and it began as follows:

"My Dear Sir Patrick,—Don't be alarmed, if you can possibly help it. I am in a terrible mess."

Sir Patrick looked up for a moment from the letter. Given a young man who dines from "Baden," and declares himself to be in "a terrible mess," as representing the circumstances of the case—what is the interpretation to be placed on them? Sir Patrick drew the inevitable conclusion. Arnold had been gambling.

He shook his head, and went on with the letter.

"I must say, dreadful as it is, that I am not to blame—nor she either, poor thing."

Sir Patrick paused again. "She?" Blanche had apparently been gambling too? Nothing was wanting to complete the picture but an announcement in the next sentence, presenting the courier as carried away, in his turn, by the insane passion for play. Sir Patrick resumed:

"You can not, I am sure, expect me to have known the law. And as for poor Miss Silvester—"

"Miss Silvester?" What had Miss Silvester to do with it? And what could be the meaning of the reference to "the law?"

Sir Patrick had read the letter, thus far, standing up. A vague disquiet stole over him at the appearance of Miss Silvester's name in connection with the letter which had preceded it. He felt nothing approaching to a clear prevision of what was to come. Some indescribable influence was at work in him, which shook his nerves, and made him feel the infirmities of his age (as it seemed) on a sudden. It went no further than that. He was obliged to sit down: he was obliged to wait a moment before he went on.

The letter proceeded, in these words:

"And, as for poor Miss Silvester, though she felt, as she reminds me, some misgivings—still, she never could have foreseen, being no lawyer either, how it was to end. I hardly know the best way to break it to you. I can't, and won't, believe it myself. But even if it should be true, I am quite sure you will find a way out of it for us. I will stick at nothing, and Miss Silvester (as you will see by her letter) will stick at no-

"I MUST LEAVE OFF, AND REST A LITTLE" thing either, to set things right. Of course, I have not said one word to my darling Blanche, who is quite happy, and suspects nothing. All this, dear Sir Patrick, is very badly written, I am afraid, but it is meant to prepare you, and to put the best side on matters at starting. However, the truth must be told—and shame on the Scotch law is what I say. This it is, in short: Geoffrey Delamayn is even a greater scoundrel than you think him; and I bitterly repent (as things have turned out) having held my tongue that night when you and I had our supper alone at Ham Farm. You will think I am mixing two things up together. But I am not. Please to keep this subject from Geoffrey in your mind, pet is together with what I have next to say. The worst is still to come. Miss Silvester's letter (inclosed) tells me this terrible thing. You must know that I went to her privately, as Geoffrey's manager, on the day of the boat-race at Wivelygates. Well—how it could have happened, Heaven only knows—but there is some fear that I married her, without being aware of it myself, in August last, at the Craig Fernie inn."

The letter dropped from Sir Patrick's hand. He sank back in the chair, stunned for the moment, under the shock that had fallen on him.

He rallied, and rose bewildered to his feet. He took a turn in the room. He stopped, and rummaged his will, and steadied himself by main force. He picked up the letter, and read the last sentence again. The face flushed red, as it did on the point of yielding himself to a useless outburst of anger against Arnold, when his better sense checked him for the last moment. "The fool in the family is enough," he said. "My business in this deadful emergency is to keep my head clear for Blanche's sake."

He waited once more, to make sure of his own composure, and turned again to the letter to see what the writer had to say for himself, in the way of explanation and excuse.

Arnold had plenty to say—with the drawback of not knowing how to say it. It was hard to decide which quality in his letter was the most marked —the total absence of arrangement, or the total absence of reserve. Without beginning, middle, or end, he told the story of his fatal connection with the troubles of Anne Silvester, from the memorable day when she first found her way to him to Craig Fernie, to the equally memorable night when Sir Patrick had tried vainly to make him open his lips at Ham Farm.

"I own I have behaved like a fool," the letter concluded, "in keeping Geoffrey Delamayn's secret for him—as things have turned out. But how could I tell that he would submit compromising Miss Silvester? Read her letter, and you will see what she says, and how generously she releases me, in the event of saying [am] myself, more cautious. The mischief is done: I'll stick to nothing—as I have said before—to undo it. Only tell me what is the first step I am to take, and, as long as it don't part me from Blanche, rely on my taking it. Meanwhile, I am to you, I remain, dear Sir Patrick, yours in great perplexity, Arnold Brinkworth."

Sir Patrick folded the letter, and looked at the two enclosure lying on the table. His eye was hard, his brow was frowning, as he put out his hand to take up Anne's letter. The letter from Arnold's agent in Edinburgh lay nearer to him. As it happened, he took that first.

It was short enough, and clearly enough written, to invite a reading from the end of it to the again. The lawyer reported that he had made the necessary inquiries at Glasgow, with this result. Anne had been traced to The Northern Hend Hotel. She had left there utterly helpless, four weeks, until the beginning of September. She had been advertised, without result, in the Glasgow newspapers. On the 5th of September she had sufficiently recovered to be able to leave the hotel. She had been seen at the railway station on the same day, and from that point all trace of her had been lost once more. The lawyer had accordingly stopped the proceedings, and now waited further instructions from his client.

This letter was not without its effect in encouraging Sir Patrick to suspend the harsh and hasty judgment of Anne, which any man, placed in his position, situation, must have been inclined to form. After illness chained its small share of sympathy. Her friendless position, poor child, and so sadly revealed by the advertising in the newspapers—pleaded for merciful construction of faults committed, if faults they were, in folly, but not angrily, Sir Patrick opened her letter —the letter that cast a shoal on his niece's marriage.

Thus Anne Silvester wrote:—

"GLASGOW, September 5.

"DEAR MR. BRINKWORTH,—Only within the last weeks since I attempted to write to you from this place. I was seized by sudden illness while I was engaged over my letter; and I owe my time to this I have laid helpless in bed—very near, as they tell me, to death. I am strong enough to be dressed, and to sit up for a little while yesterday and the day before. To-day, I have made a better advance than either of those. I can hold my pen and control my thoughts. The first use to which I put this improvement is to write these lines.

"I am going (so far as I know) to surprise—possibly to alarm—you. You will see my name from it, for you or for me: it must be done.

"Thinking of how best to introduce what I am now obliged to say, I can find no better way than this. I must ask you to take your memory back to a day which we have both bitter reason to regret—the day when Geoffrey Delamayn sent you to see me at the inn at Craig Fernie.

"You may possibly not remember—it unhappily produced no impression on you at the time —that I felt, and expressed, more than once on that occasion, a very great dislike to your pausing me off on the people of the inn as your wife. It was necessary to my being permitted to remain at Craig Fernie that you should do so. I knew this; but still I shrank from it. It was impossible for me to contradict you, without involving you in the painful consequences, and running the risk of making a scandal which might lead its way to Blanche's ears. I knew this also; but still my conscience reproached me. It was a vague feeling. I was quite unaware of the actual danger in which you were placing yourself, and I would have given—no matter what—to undo it. I had what is called a presentiment that you were not acting discreetly—nothing more. I had not the slightest suspicion—perhaps—of a trust in the mercy of God—this is the truth.

"You left me on the next morning, and we have not met since.

"A few days after you went away in my case, letter gave me more than I could bear alone. I went secretly to Wivelygates, and had an interview with Miss Silvester.

"She was absent for a few minutes from the room in which we had met. In that interval I (as Geoffrey Delamayn) was a stranger to her since I had left him at Lady Lundie's lawn-party. He trusted me—and I was a stranger. He told me that he had found out all that had passed between us at the inn.

"He said he had taken a lawyer's opinion. Oh, Sir Patrick, how can I break it to you? how can I write the words which he spoke to me? I must and will. It must be done. Cruel as it is, it must be done. He refused to my face to marry me. He said I was married already. And I am!

"Now you know why I have referred you to me. I had no other means of bringing you and were together at Craig Fernie. If you think hard thoughts, and say hard words of me, I can claim no right to complain. I am a stranger—and yet it is my fault.

"My head aches, and the foolish tears are rising in spite of me. I must leave off, and rest a little.

"I have been sitting at the window, and watching the people in the street as they go by. They are all strangers. But, somehow, the sight of them seems to rest my mind. The hum of the great city is very soothing, and helps me to go on.

"I can not trust myself to write of the man who has betrayed us both. Disgraced and broken as I am, there is something still left in me which tells me above him. He cannot repent, at this moment, and offered me all that rank and wealth and worldly consideration can give. I would rather be—as I am—your friend and his wife.

"Let me speak of you; and (for Blanche's sake) let me speak of myself.

"I ought, no doubt, to have written at once to you at Wivelygates, and to have told you at once what had happened. But I was weak and ill; and the idea of writing to you, and of writing so bravely on me that I fainted. After I came to myself I was so horrified, when I thought of you and Blanche, that I could not compose myself to write. I had but one idea—the idea of running away and hiding myself.

"My mind got clearer and quieter on the way to this place; and, arrived here, I did what I ought and believe was the best thing I could do. I consulted two lawyers. They differed in opinion as to whether we were married or not, according to the law which decides on such things in Scotland. The first said Yes. The second said No—but they both agreed that I ought to tell you the position in which you stood. I attempted to write the same day, and fell ill as you know.

"Thank God, the delay that has happened is of no consequence. I am writing before the letgates, when you were to be married—and that will not occur before the autumn, I suppose, only the fifth of September now. You have plenty of time before you. For all our sakes, make good use of it.

"What are you to do?

"Go at once to Sir Patrick Lundie, and show him this letter. Follow his advice—no matter how it may affect me. I should ill requite your kindness, I should be false indeed to the debt I bear to Blanche, if I hesitated to brave any exposure that may now be necessary in your interests and in hers. You may trust me to be generous, all that is delicate, all that is kind in my letter. I am writing to you in the sincerity of a creet—I am quite sure of it—with the fidelity of an honorable man who has had a woman's reputation placed in his charge. And I repeat, on my whole heart, dear Mr. Brinkworth, from your bridge, I solemnly on my knees, to comfort yourself free to reveal the truth. I will make any acknowledgment, on my side, that is needful under the circumstances—to anybody—to public it may be. Release yourself at any price; and then, and then only, go with Blanche's mother to the miserable women who has laden you with the burden of her sorrow, and darkened your life in a moment—and tell them, if you can!

"Pray don't think th re is any painful sacrifice involved in this. The memory of my own mind is involved in it—and that is all.

"What has life left for me? Nothing but the barren necessities of duty. When I think of my future now, my mind passes over the years that may be left to me in this world. Sometimes I dare to hope that the Divine Mercy of Christ—which once pleaded on earth for a woman like me—may plead, when death has taken me, for my spirit in Heaven. Sometimes I dare to hope that I may see my mother, and Blanche's mother, in the better world. Their hearts were bound together as the hearts of sisters while they were here; and they left to their children the legacy of their love. Oh, help me to say, if we meet again, that not in vain I promised to be a sister to Blanche! The debt I owe to her is the hereditary debt of my mother's gratitude. And what am I now? A obstacle in the way of the happiness of her life. Sacrifice me to that happiness, for God's sake! It is the one thing I have left to live for. Again and again I say it—I care nothing for myself. I have no right to be considered. I have no wish to be considered. Tell the whole truth about me, and call me to bear witness to it as publicly as you please!

"I have waited a little, once more, trying to think, before I close my letter, what there may be still left to write.

"I can not think of any thing left out, the want of information in my mother's letter to you, if you wish to write—or if it is thought necessary that we should correspond.

"One word before I tell you this.

"It is impossible for me to guess what you will do, or what you will be advised to do by others, when you get my letter. I don't even know that you will be able to form a board of what your position is from Geoffrey Delamayn himself. In this event, or in the event of your thinking it necessary to take Blanche into your confidence, I venture to suggest that you should request some person whom you can trust to see me on your behalf—or, if you can not do this, that you should see me in the presence of a third person. The man who has betrayed me has, by my to both, will not hesitate to misrepresent us in the vilest way, if he can do it with impunity. For your own sake, let us be careful to give lying tongues no opportunity of assailing your place in Blanche's estimation. I don't set so far as to risk putting yourself in a false position against Don't let it be possible for him to say that you would have should be roused in the loving and generous nature of your future wife!

"This writing is may now tell you how to communicate with me after I have left this house.

"You will find on the slip of paper inclosed the name and address of the second of the two lawyers whom I consulted at Glasgow. It is arranged between us that I am to inform him, by letter, of the next place to which I remove, and that he is to communicate the information either to you or to Sir Patrick Lundie, on your applying for it personally or by writing. I don't you know myself where I may find refuge. Nothing is certain but that I can not, in my present state of weakness, travel far.

"If you wonder why I move at all until I am stronger, I can only give a reason which may appear fanciful and overstrained.

"I have been informed that I was advertised in the Glasgow newspapers during the time when I lay at this hotel, a stranger at the point of death. Probable this was made me mortified by curiosities. I am afraid of what may happen if I stay here, after my place of residence has been made publicly known. So, as soon as I can, I move. I go away in secret. It will be enough for me, if I can find some quiet little inn in some quiet place in the country round Glasgow. You need have no anxiety about my means of living. I have money enough for the present. I need not say I get well again, I know how to earn my bread.

"I send this message to Blanche—I dare not till this is over. It is to your future wife; and then give her a kiss, and say it comes from Anne.

"Try and forgive me, dear Mr. Brinkworth. I have said all. Yours gratefully,

"ANNE SILVESTER."

Sir Patrick put the letter down with undisguised respect for the woman who had written it.

Something of the personal influence which Anne exercised over her own set in the room with whom she came in contact seemed to communicate itself to the lawyer through the medium of her letter. His thoughts perversely wandered away from the serious and pressing question of Anne's position into a region of purely speculative inquiry relating to Anne. What unfortunate weak element in the best placed that noble creature at the mercy of such a man as Geoffrey Delamayn?

We have no time or inclination in our lives, been perplexed as Sir Patrick was perplexed at present.

If we know any thing by experience, we know that women cast themselves away impulsively on unworthy men, and that men ruin themselves bending for unworthy women. The average of human failure is about equally distributed among us, existing mainly because the two sexes are apt to persist in placing themselves in these anomalous relations toward each other. And yet, at every fresh instance which comes before us, we persist in being astonished and shocked that the man and the woman have not chosen each other on rational and producible grounds! We expect human passion to act on logical principles!—and human philosophy—with love for its guide—to be above all danger of making a mistake! Ask the wisest among Anne Silvester's sex what they see in their husbands—they cannot explain. Ask the wisest among their husbands what they see in their wives—they cannot explain. Look into your own experience, and say frankly, Could you justify your own prudent choice at the time when you irrevocably made it? Could you have put your reasons on paper when you first owned to yourself that you loved him? And would the reasons have borne critical inspection if you had?

Sir Patrick gave it up in despair. The interests of his niece were at stake. He wisely determined to rouse his mind by occupying himself with the practical necessities of the moment. It was essential to send an apology to the rector, in the first place, so as to leave no opportunity at his disposal for considering what preliminary course of conduct he should advise Arnold to pursue.

After writing a few lines of apology to his partner at Epsett—assigning a domestic affair as the excuse for breaking his engagement—Sir Patrick rang the bell. The faithful Duncan appeared, and saw at once in his master's face that something had happened.

"Send a man with this to the Rectory," said Sir Patrick. "I can't dine out to-day. I must have a chop at home."

"I am afraid, Sir Patrick—if I may be excused for remarking it—you have had some bad news?"

"The worst possible news, Duncan. I can't tell you about it now. Wait within hearing of the bell. If the man means to wait, tell him to trot me. If the steward himself comes I can't see him."

After thinking it over carefully, Sir Patrick decided that there was no alternative but to send for Arnold and Blanche, without recommending them back to England in the first place. The necessity of understanding Arnold, in the minutest detail, as to every thing that had happened between Anne Silvester and himself at the Craig Fernie inn, was the first and most pressing necessity of the case.

At the same time it appeared to be desirable, for Blanche's sake, to keep her in ignorance, for the present at least, of what had happened. Sir Patrick saw the difficulty with characteristic ingenuity and readiness of resource.

He wrote a telegram to Arnold, expressed in the following terms:

"Your letter and inclosures received. Return to Ham Farm as soon as you conveniently can. Keep the thing still a secret from Blanche. Tell her, as the excuse for coming back, that the last trace of Anne Silvester has been recovered, and that there may be reasons for her returning to England before the autumn. Further news to-day."

Duncan having been dispatched to the station with this message, Duncan's master proceeded to calculate the question of time.

Arnold would in all probability receive the telegram at Malton, on the next day, September the seventeenth. In three days more he and Blanche might be expected to reach Ham Farm, supposing the journey thus planned for disposed Sir Patrick would have ample time in which to receive Arnold, and to settle on the way to acting for the best in the alarming emergency that now confronted him.

On the nineteenth Sir Patrick received a telegram informing him that he might expect to see the young couple late in the evening on the twentieth.

Late in the evening the sound of carriage-wheels was audible on the drive; and Sir Patrick, opening the door of his room, heard the familiar voices in the hall.

"Well!" cried Blanche, catching sight of him at the door, "I've got Ham Farm!"

"Not just yet, my dear."

"Is there news of her?"

"Yes."

"Am I in time to be of use?"

"In excellent time. You shall hear all about it to-morrow. Go and take off your traveling-things, and come down again to supper as soon as you can."

Blanche kissed him, and went on up stairs. She had, as her uncle thought in the glimpse he had caught of her, been improved by her marriage. It had quieted and steadied her. They were grown to be the most matured which Sir Patrick had not noticed before. Arnold, on his side, appeared to less advantage. He was restless and anxious; his position with Miss Silvester seemed to be preying on his mind. As soon as his young wife's back was turned, he appealed to Sir Patrick in an eager whisper.

"I hardly dare ask you what I have got it on my mind to say," he began. "I must bear it, if you are angry with me, Sir Patrick. But—may I tell my darling I have a way out of it for us? Have you thought of that?"

"I can not trust myself to speak of it clearly and composedly to-night," said Sir Patrick. "In satisfied if I tell you that I have thought it all out—and provided for the rest till to-morrow."

Other persons concerned in the coming drama had had difficulties to think out, and future movements to arrange. Meanwhile, Arnold received, by Arnold and Blanche on their return journey to England. Between the nineteenth and the twentieth of September Geoffrey Delamayn left Swithamley, on the way to his new training quarters in the neighborhood in which the Foot-Race at Fulham was to be ran. Between the same dates also, Captain Brinkworth had taken the opportunity, while passing through London on his way south, to consult his solicitors. The object of the consultance was to find means of discovering an anonymous letter-writer in Scotland, who had presumed to cause serious annoyance to Mrs. Glenarm.

Thus, by ones and twos, converging from widely distant points, they were busily preparing to draw together, in the near neighborhood of the great city which was soon destined to assemble them all, for the first and the last time in this world, face to face.

THROUGH THE BARS OF A CELL.

COURTEOUS READER,—I am the inmate of a State Prison. I have been accused by my friend, at being addressed by such a being. I can assure you I am a special convict, and, perhaps, some of these days when I am free, you may encounter my veritable self in the bosom of your social circle. If your curiosity is awakened, I will breathe to you through the gratings of my cell my eventful history. It is a strange one, respected friend. Indeed I make bold to say that a stranger one was never breathed into you rear. I had an only brother. We had been brought up in a distant village in the State of Pennsylvania. Our father died when my younger brother was born, leaving my mother very poor. She brought us up bravely, however. I being the eldest, was sent off at an early age to fight the battle of life, and, while helping myself, to do something toward helping others. With this noble purpose in my mind I made rapid progress, and finally had the hardihood to set off to New York, rightly imagining that there there were the greatest prizes for an ambitious youth. Full of this most ardent affection for my mother, I tried to make every thing turn to my own advancement. I felt as though every act of my life had an effect upon their happiness. That feeling so inspired me that self-denial was not only easy, but delightful. Feeling as I did, that all my savings benefited them so greatly, how could I do otherwise than save?

I was extremely fortunate in New York. My last employers in the country gave me letters to one of the chief merchants in that city. He received me kindly. Finding out my motives and saving habits, he speedily promoted me. Year by year he added to my salary. At length, after years of labor, I found myself, at the age of twenty-five, the confidential clerk of my employer, with a huge salary, and the control of millions.

Some years before I had conceived the idea of giving my brother a good education. My brother was to me more like a son than any thing else. His nature was widely different from mine. I was bold, resolute, daring; he was gentle, poetical, and full of sentiment. I was stern, practical, and independent; he was quiet, reliant, and meditative. I was fond of a life of warfare and action; he for a life of study and meditation.

He went to college. His progress was remarkable; he was at the head in every thing; he graduated with the highest honors, knew him at the bar, which exhibition were obtained in degree. I admired and applauded more than any one else my young brother. In truth, as he stood there with his fragile form, his pale face, his eye beaming with the light of genius, he was worthy of all the admiration I bestowed. Now, I have his portrait now with me. It resembles the poet Shelley more than any face that I have ever seen.

My brother went home, and, as I supposed, studied for his profession. I corresponded always with my mother. My brother was always irregular in letter-writing, and I never thought much of not hearing from him. I was sometimes troubled, however, at learning that he was unwell. I recommended a trip across the ocean and a tour through Europe, and offered to pay his expenses. After this offer I waited anxiously for tears the effect. I did not hear from him for nearly a month. I grew very anxious, and thought seriously of paying them a visit. Since my departure, fifteen years before, I had never been home, and had only met my relatives on their visits to me at New York.

One day on going to the office I found a telegraphic dispatch. The words of that dispatch have burned themselves into my memory:

"Your brother is dying! Come home!" It was a stranger's name. Great God! my brother is dying! A stranger, too, telegraphing to me! What meant all this? Was my mother also dying?

I never closed my eyes for three days and three nights, nor did I eat a morsel until I came in sight of my native town in Pennsylvania. I waited for two hours trying to overcome my agitation created by fasting and want of sleep. Ordinarily nothing ruffled me; but now I was as weak as a child. I walked up the main street. I came within sight of the old family mansion. The blinds were all down. Great Heaven! I was not prepared for such a blow. I dreaded the worst. The worst had come. A stranger opened the door—a stranger stared at me. I recognized much of the old furniture still in use. My mother would not part. I saw my brother's portrait hanging in the hall.

"Are they in?" I gasped out, not knowing what I said.

No one recognized me. I did not wish to be recognized. Fearful of being an object of vulgar pity, I had determined to see my mother alone. As with all the calmness that I could muster, I asked after my mother by name. Then the blow fell. The woman at the door spoke solemnly:

"She's dead, Sir."

"Hadn't she a son?" I asked, with a frightful attempt at insolference.

"Yes, Sir—his death broke her down. She died next day."

"Unfortunate people!"

"Ah yes, Sir." There's never been a death in the village so unfortunate. Especially poor Henry, Sir. He was a great favorite."

"I used to know a brother of his in New York. Does he know about this?"

"Ah, Sir, I don't know. It 'll be a sad blow for him."

"How did it happen?"

"Won't you walk in, Sir? and I'll tell you."

"No, thank you. It's so close. I'm hot; I'll sit here."

I sank into a seat by the cottage door. The woman told me all. Her story was simply this:

When Henry came home from college he was the pride and boast of the village. People sought his acquaintance who before had overlooked him, and his learning and genius won the regards and admiration of all. Among the young ladies of the place there was one from Philadelphia who appeared to be greatly struck by my brother. She belonged to one of the first families in that city, and was exceedingly beautiful. Her beauty, however, was only in appearance. Stunge to say, with the utmost loveliness of form and features, she combined a hardness of heart and a selfishness of nature frightful to contemplate. She only sought my brother for the sake of making a conquest of the talented young villager. As to love or marriage, she would have laughed at the idea. Her aspirations were far higher than that. By the utmost artfulness, and by the exceeding charm which she was capable of displaying, she completely overcame my brother. With all his intoxication of passion he surrendered himself to her power. With him to love was to give up his soul, his life, his all. It was no light or transitory matter. He was not one to toss thing on earth. As to her, he never doubted her sincerity.

At last he woke from his dream, and only awoke to die. He spoke to her once about his feelings. She treated him coldly. Not sure of his affections she began to try to torture him by jealousy. In this remonstrating, she turned him away forever with a withering scorn. He was stunned at first, but afterward thought it was mistake. He sought her out, and implored her to let him trifle. This time her calm contempt was overwhelming. He saw her as she was. Had he possessed my strong nature, he would have survived this shock. The woman does not live who could kill an iron determinent. But my brother was a gentle soul. When his heart broke, he died. And so he yielded to this blow.

All can be told in a few words. My mother, heart-stricken, overwhelmed, died. The most unlooked-for calamity, and gentle in nature like my brother, sank like him under the sudden stroke.

"And now," concluded the woman, "there both lie side by side beside her husband."

All the time she spoke I did not utter a word.

As she ceased I rose slowly, murmured "Thank you," and staggered away. I proceeded at once hastened to the burying-ground. I knew well where they lay. I soon stood before their newly-made grave—two twin mounds contained all that I cared for on earth—the treasured objects of a lifetime's labor—the ones for whom my success I had been a slave! And they had come to this!

For a time I was frantic. I brooded over plans of vengeance. If they were crimes, I had a deep, I rose under mine and heard their cry for vengeance coming from the tomb. I heard my dead woman's name. She had, under the outward beauty of her fiendish soul, killed my mother and brother. She should suffer! But, then, how? It was the meditation of the night. I took long strides up and down as I paced. I shook the graves, and before the dawn I had decided.

My scheme was one of grandeur. You seldom hear of a man's having the means and find it difficult to take revenge because they are too anxious to take care of themselves. Such I feared nothing for myself. My sole desire was for vengeance. For that desire I was ready to sacrifice every thing.

I started for New York immediately, and arrived there as soon as possible. The head of our house was living at that time in Philadelphia. He left every thing to me. My measures were all taken. I wrote to him that business called me back, and then left the office. But I did not go to Pittsburgh. I calmly returned to my own lodgings, where I wrote some letters. These were letters of introduction to the chief people in the United States and to the chief ministers of Great Britain. With these I knew I could have the entree of any society. Then I went to Philadelphia, and put up at the first hotel in the place. I lavished my money with a liberal hand, ordered the servants attendance, and lived in the style of a centrie nobleman. On the books of the hotel I wrote the name, "Henry Lord Arlington."

On my card there was the same name, and over it a neatly-engraved crest. This nobleman of the Arlington family returned to my own city, where I wrote some letters. These were letters of introduction to the chief people in the United States and to the chief ministers of Great Britain. With these I knew I could have the entree of any society. On the following day I left Philadelphia, and put up at the first hotel in the place. I lavished my money with a liberal hand, ordered the servants attendance, and lived in the style of a centrie nobleman. On the books of the hotel I wrote the name, "Henry Lord Arlington."

On my card there was the same name, and over it a neatly-engraved crest. This nobleman of the Arlington family returned to my own city, where I wrote some letters. These were letters of introduction to the chief people in the United States and to the chief ministers of Great Britain. With these I knew I could have the entree of any society. On the following day I saw the following in the principal paper:

"DISTINGUISHED STRANGER.—Yesterday a distinguished stranger arrived in this city. He is Henry Lord Arlington, and is related to the leading families of England. He comes to this country to visit our institutions, and see the wonders of nature in the United States. He is the guest of Mr. ——, of Sunderland, to which he is heir. When we state that this nobleman is the owner of the elaborate scheme of a rear, and is a gay young bachelor of twenty-five, we have said enough to excite the interest of all the young ladies in the city."

I was soon called on by the chief in the city. I bore letters of introduction to him, and met with an eager welcome. My stately appearance, my calmness, and self-reliance won me respect. I was shortly the lion of the city. I was encountered my victim.

Isabel Nevers, for this was her name, was the daughter of one of the old families. Her father was a man of self-importance, pomposity and conceit. He prided himself on being the son of a Revolutionary officer, and cultivated his lofty feeling of arrogance as a relentless enemy. His daughter was worthy of him. Hard, cold, and selfish. She was only attracted by wealth and distinction. The feeling of ambition and self-importance overrules all other sentiments. Love she could not feel. Marriage she looked upon as a speculation. She sought a husband only for the sake of the position and influence. Wealth and Position were her gods.

Of such exaltation how readily she fell into the snare I had spread for her. No sooner had she seen me than she exerted all her arts to win me. And I—never did any lover appear half so infatuated as I. The reader can foresee the end. The newspapers announced it:

"MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—It is stated that Lord Arlington is about to lead to the Hymeneal alter the daughter of one of our most distinguished citizens. If this be so, we venture to say that the Court of St. James will have no brighter ornament than Miss Nevers."

All this transpired in about a fortnight. The marriage was settled upon. I showed to old Nevers my banker's authority to draw on England for millions. I made deeds of settlement to my bride of estates and lands. I lavished my wealth with a liberal hand. She held instruments with my signature to the extent of millions.

On the evening before our marriage I wrote off to my old employer, anonymously:

"SIR,—The young man in whom you place confidence is a scoundrel. He is now not in Europe but Philadelphia, where he utters bogus checks on the Bank of Arlington. Do not despise this, but come yourself to Philadelphia. Learn all, and save yourself from ruin."

We were married. It was the most magnificent wedding ever known in Philadelphia. All the élite of the city were present. Such splendor as that I had displayed I never before saw.

Three days passed. One morning a loud and peremptory knock was heard at the door. I had been living with my wife at Mr. Nevers's. In confusion, preparatory to taking her to the aristocratic contemporaries of her husband. The crisis approached. Well, I had nerve for any thing. The servant opened the door. Loud voices sounded in the hall. My wife stepped to the door and hurried back. She was white as a sheet.

"His, ha!" she exclaimed, nervously; "they want Lord Arlington. They say he's an impostor, Sir."

"An imposter! Well, that is good!" I cried, gayly.

"I must see him," cried a loud voice.

"Well, it's getting better and better!" I exclaimed, loud, responding, as I went to the door. I saw my late employer. He started back.

"Why, what's this, sir? What can I do for you?" My calmness, my manner, my impudence, were beyond description.

"Are you Lord Arlington?" he has it come to this? Confess all, and I'll forgive you."

Had not my self-control been beyond the reach of pity his tones would have melted me. But I calmly gazed at him.

"My dear Sir, you are laboring under some strange delusion," I said. "Do I resemble any one you know?"

"You will not confess, then?" he exclaimed, sternly confronting me. "Then, officer, I leave him to you."

He turned away. I felt myself seized by officers, with a warrant, and carried away. My employer was so much to be blamed that he had proofs against me too strong to slight, and he held me to bail. He assured me that bail I could not get bonds. I had to go to prison.

On the following day the papers were full of it. To add to the excitement, I was the confession of my misdeeds, which was circulated every where. It was a terrific blow to the Nevers and my wife.

I sent for my employer. I told him all, I handed him the bank draft for millions. I had only used it to show. The money I had spent was all my private savings of years. None of it had gone to my wife, however. I had made her presents of jewels, but they all turned out to be paste. My wife was ruined, but I had not lost a cent through me. He shook hands warmly.

"God bless you, my poor boy!" he cried. "Your desire for revenge has misled you. May you be happy yet. I forgive you!"

He exerted himself for me, but could do nothing. My offense had been too great. I was sentenced to five years' solitary confinement.

Here I am now. My wife has never been near me. My father and her father went to California. Perhaps she has married again. If so, I wish her joy. But I feel also, when I get out of prison I'll track her and take her gay life with a strong hand up again.

Courage and order, through the bars of his cell a felon wishes you adieu.

PRINCE HENRI DE BOURBON.

On page 245 we give the portrait of this unfortunate Prince, who was recently killed in a duel with the Duke De Montpensier. The tragic affair has put the finishing touch to the unfortunate career of the elaborate scheme of LOUIS PHILIPPE, generally called the Spanish Marriages. Conceived in selfishness and carried out in cowardice, that iniquitous conspiracy has been the cause of manifold misfortunes during the last twenty years. Its authors and accomplices conceived, and has at last given rise to a fatal encounter between two princes. The unfortunate Prince Henri has now fallen, and has sinned very freely in his political conduct, but he has, at all events, sincerely atoned against himself. He might have been the husband of ISABELLA, if the ambition of the Orleans family had not stood in the way, and condemned him to the happy Queen to the marriage she was actually forced to contract. Had she been permitted to marry Prince HENRI, whom she loved and wished to marry, she might have spent a happy life with a husband who would have transmitted her crown tranquilly to her children. But it was to the interest of the Orleanists that her sister's husband or his children should inherit her sceptre, and measures were taken accordingly to secure that end. In such a way that all the scandal of a direct succession seemed to be obviated. The Queen was hurried into a deplorable career, and Don HENRI subsided into that favorite refuge for dispossessed princes, Democracy. In the quarrel which cost him his life he was unquestionably in fault. He wrote the Duke a letter, full of insults, which, to a Spaniard or Frenchman, could only be atoned for by blood; and it must be said of him that he met his fate with as much courage and indifference as he had courted it.

NEW FIRE-ALARM TELEGRAPH.

We give on page 245 an engraving of the new fire-alarm boxes, now ready in all that part of New York city lying south of Fourteenth Street. Every officer and member of the Fire Department, every officer and member of the Police Department, and every officer of the Fire Insurance Patrol, is furnished with a key which will open all the boxes. A key is also deposited with the occupant of a building near each alarm-box, the nearest to which will be given to him. The door, G, is kept closed. To give an alarm, open the outer door, F, draw down the catch, A, which winds up a spring, by means of the lever, B, which sets in motion the wheel, C, and registers the number of the box on the gong, D, and on the instrument at the Fire Department headquarters. To give a second or third alarm the lever, G, is pressed, and the wheel, C, is struck ten times. The Fire Department has issued the following directions to be observed when a fire is discovered:

1. Go to the nearest box and open the door, pull the hook down as far as you can comfortably extend the arm, and let it slide back. Remove the key and close the door.

2. If you do not immediately hear the number of the box struck upon the bell which is above the box, repeat the operation. Do not leave the box until you hear the number struck upon the bell, and then repeat the operation.

3. If upon going to a box you find an alarm, and the small bell inside ringing (which is an indication that an alarm is being sent from the Central Police Office), do not open the box until it has done ringing. In such cases count the number of times sounded, and be certain that it is not for the same box.

Key-holders are also cautioned not to open the box except in case of fire; not to give an alarm until certain of a fire; not to give an alarm for a fire seen at a distance; not to pull down the hook more than once in giving an alarm; to be sure, after giving an alarm, that the door is securely closed; not to leave the box; and not to let the key go out of their possession, except when demanded by proper authority. The proper observance of these directions will tend increased efficiency to the Fire Department, and add greatly to the security of property against destruction by fire.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AT a trial in an Alabama town, not long since, one of the witnesses, an old lady of seventy-five years, was closely questioned by the opposing counsel relative to the distance between two houses. "I can't say exactly," said he. "Yes," was answered. "How will you get an idea of it?" continued the lawyer. "Why," responded the lady, "to see that you're neither a negro nor Indian, for a gentleman." The answer brought down the house and silenced the counsel.

The Dutch woman kept a tobacco. One forgot day a traveler asked her, "How far is it to Utrecht?" "Why, mynheer," answered she, "I can't tell, but how far?" again asks the traveler. "Should say, two—three—eight—eightabilly," was the answer, "two, three, four, or five miles?" The good woman imagined eight regular, and abilly irregular.

"What do people mean," said a French lady, "by saying that Rome is not a free city? Why, you may write your letters in the street—the drawing-room window and nobody will prevent you."

The Rev. Mr. Thom, minister of the parish of Govan, had just risen to begin the service, when the congregation in a body arose and left the church. One of the gallery took out his handkerchief to wipe off the tears his terror had called forth, and a pack of cards was grasped up in it, the whole pack was scattered over the breast of the preacher. "Mr. Thom could not resist a sarcasm, solemn as the act was in which he was engaged. "Ah, my friends, my friends! surely your pulpit-book has been awful ill bound."

THE MITTEN.

THE bull-dog took the left leg of the bill,
And the lambs are skipping in glee;
But the wolf has the mitten to-day,
My gal gave the mitten to me.

Ah, where is the heart of the cold man who'd
I feel like a crazy bum-bee;
By thunder! I'll die for my boy
That says the word mitten to me!

The rustic was dagged if I ain't!
I swear I will kill him,
I'll slather and slash, I'll murder that gal—
By thunder! she shall be mine!

No, I won't do that—I'll spite her—I will
I'll beat myself to death,
And then she will cry—she'll die in remorse
For giving the mitten to me.

BEST CLIMATE FOR A TOOTH—The temperate zone.

Why do young ladies whiten their faces?—Because they think the powder will make them go off.

THE Sandwich Islands are the coral districts west to Des Moines to see the grapes. In the seventeenth century Sandwich Islands were the fashion, and every "Sir," replied she, "I don't want any of your impertinence."

ACADEMY OF DESIGN—A young ladies' boarding-school.

"Why do you wail, Bob, when you've got a donkey-ride?" "Cos I'm a-feelin' sentimental to-day." Shave, was walking by the side of the donkey.

THE Sunday-school is the week-day Jail's nursery.

"Certainly, Sir; I do not want it, I am sure."

A fashionable clergyman in Chicago warns the sinners of his congregation that if they don't repent they will go to the "place of eternal uneasiness," Certainly a mild way of putting it.

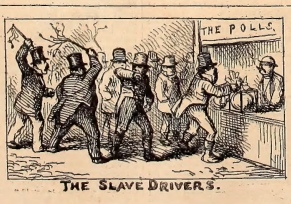
LIGHT TIDINGS—Sunbeams.

A poor man being ill, on being asked by a gentleman whether he had taken any remedy, replied, "No, I can't taken any remedy, but I've taken lots of physic."

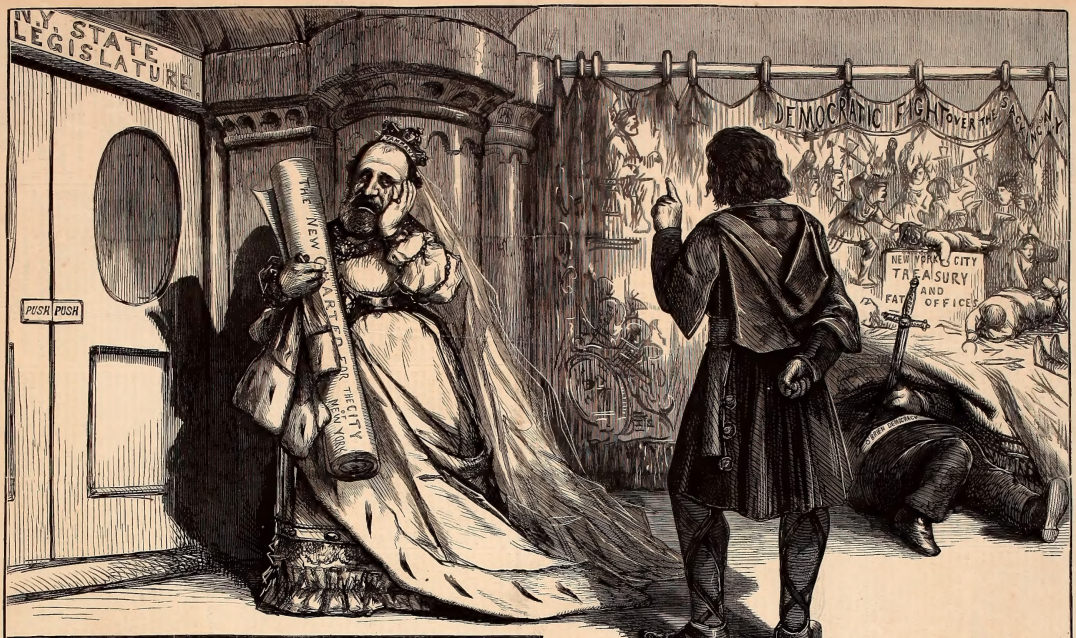
The petroleum men are great bores, but they mean well.

After the principal thing is the interest.

THE CREEK SLAVE.



THE SLAVE DRIVERS.



SENATOR TWEED IN A NEW RÔLE.

THE SILENT BATTLE.

THE war that Spring and Winter wage
Once on a silence, day by day;
Strong youth against decrepid age,
New growth opposed to dark decay:

The strife of hope against despair,
Life against death: and, morn by morn,
A tenderer warmth in in the air,
And fresher blades with brighter green.

And lo, on every side appears
The hurrying host of Spring's advance—
The crowding grass, with bristling spears,
The brook-side rushes' ready lance,

The javelins of daring reeds,
The iris-sprout's keen bayonet-thrust,
With mark and file of sturdy weeds
Rising exultant from the dust.

Each day a fresher guidon flaunts,
Marking the ground's progression by hunts;
The arrow-heads of water-plants,
The hard-clenched fists of valiant ferns.

The willow's pennons, brave and fair,
The white-bug's sharp and slender blades
With every force of earth and air,
Join boldly in the glad crusade,

Till Winter's sullen struggles cease,
And cold and darkness full and flee,
And all the hills are fair with peace,
And green with pulses of victory.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In the Books.—Book V.

CHAPTER VII.

MRS. FLEW SPEAKS HER MIND.

MAUD'S visit to Lowater took place as arranged. Only instead of remaining merely a day with the Sheardowns she stayed in their house a week. Mrs. Sheardown had strongly urged, almost insisted on, this.

"You have not now the plea that you can not leave the vicar to be lonely," she said. "The vicar has no lack of society and excitement at present. As for you, I don't think you desire to share in either the society or the excitement. Do you think you could like that poor man should Stay with us. I shall tell Hugh that I have taken good care of his treasure, and he will be grateful to me."

As to Veronica's presence in Shipley Magna, Mrs. Sheardown did not trust herself to say very much on that score to Maud. She did say a few words useful, but sternly, disapproving of the proceeding. And Maud was unable to gainsay her. But in speaking to her husband, Nelly Sheardown grew courageous to her disgust and indignation quite vehemently.

"Did you ever hear of such a thing, Tom? Did any one ever hear of such a thing? That woman must have lost all sense of decency!"

"Why, Nelly," retorted the curate, "have I not heard you say more than once that if that misguided girl had but to return you would not turn your back on her, but would hold out a helping hand to her in any way that you could? Have I mistaken you, or did I dream it?"

"You know that you have heard me say it. And I do not repent of having said it. But you are not speaking fairly. You know very well, Tom, that my 'helping hand' was to be contingent on a very different state of things from that which actually exists. If she had shown any repentance or remorse for the misery she caused, any consideration for others, I would have done what I could for her: more, I confess, for Maud's sake and the vicar's than for her. But to come back here under the present circumstances: not letting even the decency elapse to soften the memory of her disgrace, flaunting her ill-gotten riches and her contempt-ible husband in the face of every body who has known her from childhood—"

"Veronica was married!" Why, my dear little wife, you know nothing about this at all events!"

"Do I not know the circumstances under which his marriage was made?"

"Certainly not."

"I know, at least, so much of them as suffices to prove that he must be a man without any sense of honor, or dignity, or even decency! That he is, in short, as I said—contemptible!"

The captain had thought it necessary to endeavor to stem his warm-hearted wife's vehemence with a little show of that judicial impartiality which has become a man, and which he is usually so ready to display for the edification of the weaker sex in cases that do not touch his own passions or prejudices. But in his heart Captain Sheardown was little less shocked and disgusted at Veronica's conduct than his wife was, and he warmly concurred with her in declaring that Maud must be removed from under the vicar's daughter. There were other reasons also, why the Sheardowns considered the vicarage to be no longer a pleasant or desirable home for Maud Desmond. But of these they did not speak to her fully.

"Perhaps it may be all idle gossip and rumor," said Captain Sheardown, half interrogatively, to his wife.

"Perhaps it may," she returned, with an expressive shake of the head.

"At all events, there is no need to vex Maud with what may turn out to be all false, vulgar scandal."

"No need at all, dear. But it is not very easy to me to dissemble. Once or twice lately Maud has spoken with some anxiety of the vicar, and I assure you it has been on the tip of my tongue to tell her the report we had heard."

"Only it down again, like a brave little woman."

Meanwhile the reappearance of Veronica in her new character of Princess de' Barletti was the theme of discussion and animadversion in half the houses in the county. Mrs. Begbie had nearly fainted when she heard it. She had said to her maid, and had repeated the same information to her, "No, Tomlins. I can not believe you. I will not, I must not, think so evil of my own son." Subsequently, however, the unwelcome fact had been confirmed, Mrs. Begbie had been thrown into quite a new, nervous state by it. The sight of her innocent Emmie, and the recollection that that pure scion of the united houses of Gaffer and Begbie had been in the same room with, had actually breathed the same air with the creature, was too much for her. But finally Mrs. Begbie had found strength to rouse herself enough to take a stand against the barefaced audacity of continued corruption, as she characterized the visit of the Prince and Princess de' Barletti to the Crown Inn at Shipley Magna. Such, at least, was Mrs. Begbie's own account of the various phases of feeling she had gone through. Lady Alicia Brooke, who was Emmie's godmother on the occasion, Disapproving Veronica's proceeding quite as strongly as Mrs. Begbie disapproved of her ladyship could not resist the pleasure of metaphorically digging her sharp look into the self-satisfied complacency of Miss Emma.

"Ay," she said, dryly. "It's a curious social fact that you brazen fist, without the aid of a trochar, as we say in the north, should have got two husbands. Is she very handsome, this second husband, one a baronet and the other a prince, no less—and the young fellow really and truly sold Lord Barletti's coronet at auction? A rivious line—that that good-for-nothing hussy, I say, should have had wits enough to be attracted by the world but her handsome face, while so many of our virtuous young virgins can't manage to get a husband for the life of them. I always knows it isn't for want of energy in trying, as far as my observation goes."

"Lady Alicia," said Mrs. Begbie, with dignity, "no well brought-up girl would put forth her beauty as a lure to attract a husband. It is to have seen exercised by that—creature! Men have indeed reason to be weak enough to be attracted by that sort of thing."

"Oh, men are fools enough for any thing, I grant you, my dear. But I am thankful to say that I male sex en masse with the greatest liberality.

"They are, indeed," said Mrs. Begbie, who, despite her virtuous indignation, seemed unable to quit the discussion of Veronica's altered fortunes, "that this creature should have had the carriage and horses—splendid horses!—and a suit of servants with her to the Crown Inn. And her dress on Sunday morning was the extreme of audacious. She makes three toilets a day—"

"Three toilets a day!" echoed Mrs. Begbie.

"Emmie! I beseech you not to enter into this topic. Indeed, I regret that it has ever been mentioned before you, my child."

"Oh, I don't think it will do Miss Emmie any harm," Lady Alicia, with an inscrutable face.

"No, Lady Alicia. You are right. I feel obliged to you for judging me child so correctly. But still it is a pity that the bloom of youthful innocence should be rubbed off even by the acquaintance with the wickedness of the world!"

"And they say she paints awfully!" observed Miss Begbie, in whom envy slightly touched her pale—especially to people with daughters—to see that sort of thing rewarding and prospering.

"Vice, Lady Alicia, never prospers in the long run."

"Oh, of course not. To be sure not. We have high authority for that, Mrs. Begbie. But then you see it takes such a very long run."

The above conversation is a pretty fair specimen of the light in which the Princess de' Barletti's appearance at Shipley was looked on by the Danebiire society.

Could Veronica have overheard one evening's chat in any dressing-room or boudoir whose inmates' favor or countenance she desired, she would have seen a very curious sight—a group of her footing as a member of the "county" circles. It may seem strange that she had ever for a moment conceived the hope that the majority of the neighborhood would receive her. But she had an exaggerated idea of the power of her beauty. And she thought that the bright refulgence of her new rank would drive the world from a too close inspection of old blots and spots on her fame. And then it had all been vague in her mind. Direct intercourse with the people in question had not made the world from a too close inspection of old blots and spots on her fame. And then it had all been vague in her mind. Direct intercourse with the people in question had not made her realize the fact that the Danebiire society was entirely unnoticed except by one person.

This solitary exception served but to emphasize more strongly the marked neglect of the rest. Lord George Seagrave called on her. Lord George had taken Hammick Lodge for a term of years. He had never been down there at that time of year before. But his health wouldn't stand a London season: getting old, you know; and that sort of thing. So, as he had to pay for the place, he had come down to the Lodge to spend a month or two. It should be time to go to Schwalbach. And he hoped that Prince Barletti would soon be subscribed on the list. And out of perfectly remembering as Miss Levincourt—were at the Crown. So he had called, and had sent off cards. And he should be uncommonly charmed if the prince would come and have with him some day. The same week Lady Hammick Lodge very soon. This promise he kept, having had a sudden determination to keep his future wife apart from her, that Veronica had chosen not to risk a refusal by asking Maud to accompany her. Maud had not been at her promises on the evening when Veronica had driven up to the door in the vicarage. Veronica had not alighted. She had looked at her old home across the drear little grave-yard, and had turned away from it. She had driven away. But on that same occasion she had seen Mr. Plew. Veronica needed for a small share of feminine acuteness to read in the captain's face the intense and painful emotions which the sight of her former presence in the old life of Plew must evoke in him. She could still play with idle, careless, capricious fingers on his heart-strings if she liked. But she did not intend to play with a heart.

But what she could not see, and had not nebleness enough even to guess at, was the intense pity, the passion of sorrow over the tarnished brightness of her beauty, that had swelled her lover's heart almost to breaking. She had never possessed that power of soul to impose the best reverence that a man can give to a woman. And it may be that in the little surgeon's inmost consciousness he had never been some unacknowledged sense of this. But he had looked upon her with such a blended admiration; he had been so unselfishly content to worship from a humble distance, he had so associated her beauty and brightness with very different and far nobler and beautiful in his life, that her degradation had wounded him with a sense of loss. He had never been to him as other mortals, who must strive and struggle in the evil and weakness. He had not even thought of her as a woman who had clinging to some rock of truth in the great ocean of existence, and supplying her own feebleness by its steady strength. She had been to his fancy a creature to whom it was simply natural and inevitable to be brilliant and stainless as the star on her brow. And now she was smirched and fallen. After the first paroxysms of impotent rage against the man who had taken her from him, the bitterest reflection of all was the reflection how base a bait had tempted her.

When her carriage stopped at the gate of Sir Gildas's church-yard, and he advanced, hat in hand, and Veronica very slightly touched her proffered hand, and stammered a few incoherent words of going in to say, awkwardly, and perished manner, Veronica thought, "He is welcome at seeing me again, and seeing me in the pomp! And this is all." He might be not a bad fellow; and I she'll forget the good turn he had done about my marriage, after. Her gratitude did not by any means go to the extent of relinquishing her power to torture his feelings. But the truth was she have read it in his heart was, that he was crushed by the humiliation of his connection with her, and yet he loved her still. A more perfect being would doubtless have ceased to love that which his moral sense told him ought to be entirely unloved. But Mr. Plew was a very far from perfect being; and from the moment that he saw, and the nature of the man, theve was mingled with his love an almost feminine passion of pity which rendered it indestructible.

You used to have patients in Shipley Magna, Mr. Plew," said Veronica, "princes' had said, graciously.

"Wherever your professional duties bring you there, mind you come and see us!"

But two days after she passed, and Mr. Plew did not appear at the Crown Inn. Veronica, on her security that he would come, given orders that he should be admitted at any hour. Still, he did not appear. Then came Lord George Seagrave's invitation to Cesare. Veronica told him by all means to go, and told herself that it was a relief to get rid of him for a day. Poor Cesare very fond of her; almost too fond of her. It became a bore to have his constant presence. And he was so jealous and suspicious when he was left alone with no companion but her maid, and no resource but the inspection of her jewel-box, she began to feel depressed.

"I'm going into a horrible habit of being low-spirited," she thought. "It is habit, I suppose. I want keeping up. This leaden weight is intolerable. Bah! I won't stay in this odious hole! I always hated it. I don't know whether one always comes back to one's old loves, but I do believe one comes unfailingly to one's old hates. I will go away. But where? Die mio!

Any where! back to town. But meanwhile it positively am not well. I ought to see some one. I'll send for little Flew!"

Miss Turtle happened to be spending the afternoon with old Mrs. Flew, when the Princess de' Barletti's pair, perfumed note was brought into the cottage by a servant from the Crown Inn. Mr. Flew was not at home. He was expected back in the course of an hour or so. Very good, the man said. He would put up his horse and gig in the village, and return in the course of an hour to see if the doctor (as Mrs. Flew was always styled in Shipley parlance) had come in. He had orders to wait, and drive him back to Shipley Magna. Was any thing the matter? Any one ill? Not that he knew, special. The Lady was only called Barley-sowed a bit out or sorts. But he couldn't say much about it. In the moment that the groom's back was turned, the two women pounced upon the note. They felt it, they smelt it, they turned it this way and that.

"It is a lady," said Miss Turtle, reading the monogram. "And a crown above. The paper's all the world like satin. And how it is perfumed!"

"Ah! It smells to me like them yellow lozenges they sell at sweet," said Mrs. Flew, pushing the note away from her with a little dissatisfied gesture.

"What a bold handwriting!" exclaimed Miss Turtle. "Quite the aristocrat. Oh, dear me! I suppose Mr. Benjamin will be taken up with high society now."

The tip of the poor governess's little nose became suddenly red as her eyes filled with tears. Mrs. Flew grasped her wooden knitting-needles more firmly than ever. Tears are catching, and shook her head with the tremulous movement of age.

"If you could but have seen the carriage she was in," whispered Miss Turtle, plaintively. She was by nature and habit so humble-minded that the mere contemplation of herself with Veronica had only resulted in her crushing sense of the latter's overwhelming superiority in all points.

"And the dress! describe it to you, didn't I? And the silver on the horses' harness? Mrs. Meggitt thinks a deal by Benjamin, but he'll. Mrs. Flew, I tell you Mrs. Meggitt's spoons would be but a drop in the ocean if you were to melt them down to make harness for that pair. And the footman she had on. And leaning back with such an elegant kind of a fall against the cushions. She was painted," said poor Miss Turtle, making a faint little protest on behalf of her own self-respect that the fact was never pointed. She also added almost immediately, with a profound sigh, "I had been told they all do it in high life."

Still old Mrs. Flew kept her lips closed, and her head shook tremulously. In a few minutes the governess said, "I must run home and tell my mother as though expecting her to speak of the note from Shipley Magna. But the old woman was not to be drawn.

"There's a—a—note for you, Mr. Benjamin," said Miss Turtle, timidly: and the sound of the stanit his eye lighted on it as it lay on the table. He took it up quickly, and walked to the window to read it in the best light. He was a better judge than any of his back on the two women.

"Ah! it is from Veronica!" he asked, looking round. "There is mention here of a man and gig waiting to take me back."

"Yes, sir," said he'd been again in an hour, Mr. Benjamin. We thought—that is, your mother expected you back by 4 hour."

"I must wait for him then, I suppose," said Mr. Plew, pulling out his watch, and beginning to walk softly up and down the room. "It's a —a—patient. The Princess Barletti, in fact. She is not very well, and wishes to see me. It really is very good of you, Mrs. Flew, to offer me so much of your company, Miss Turtle."

Mrs. Flew unlocked her lips and spake.

"Benjy, love, don't you go."

"Mother!"

"Benjy, darling, don't you go."

"Not go to see a patient when I am sent for!"

"Benjy, darling, I don't believe she is a lot more than you are. Nor so bad either, if feelings could count. And if she's bad let her send for Doctor Brown. Every body's good enough for them that she's treated so heartless, and cruel, and—abandoned."

Mr. Plew had turned ashy pale, and was standing quite still, staring at his mother. The little governess had dropped her head and parted lips, glancing nervously from one to the other. She was not disinclined at first to be scandalized at the boldness and eloquence. The wooden needles clicked and rattled in the old woman's trembling hands. A dull red spot burned on each withered cheek; and she went on in a strained voice unlike her natural accents.

"Shameful, and cruel, and heartless she's treated one that she's not worthy to tie his shoestrings! Let her send for Doctor Brown. He's not ears to break an honest man's heart! A man that might have had a good home here, and good loving children at his knee but for her. Benjy! Why there's women in the world, common, plain-looking women with common names, respected as their backs, that to my eyes seem as beautiful as the saints in the church bow-in! She's had, and wicked, and wotnn't have had, a painted—"

She stopped suddenly with the opprobrious word on her lips. Her son, without uttering a syllable, had dropped into a chair and covered his face with his hands. The governess cowered, awe-stricken, and trembling like a frightened bird. The knitting fell from the old woman's hands. She sat as still as though she had been turned to stone for a minute or so, looking at her son. Then all at once she got up, went to him, and put her hand on his bowed head.

"Benjy," she said, "my own dear boy, forgive your poor old mother! And may God forgive her for saying a word to hurt the best son that ever mortal woman bore into this world!

I don't know what came over me, Benjy. I couldn't help it. 'Twas so! If Iain must speak, I'll not say another word, love; not another word. Oh, my boy, don't be angry with your poor mother. A shot's to be here to trouble you long! And—Benjy—was only because I love you so, my own dear darling." Mr. Plew removed one hand from his face, and put it out to take his mother's. She raised it to her lips and kissed it. "Thank you, my boy," she said, with pathetic humility. And then—with all the agony flesh gone from her face, and only a soul streaming down it—she feebly tottered out of the room. Miss Turtle rose and followed her to the door. When she turned, and said, in a low, quiet, placid, almost cheerful, tone, "You needn't be anxious about your mother, Mr. Benjamin. I'll stay with her, and look after her whilst you're gone. Your mother's used to me. And for me it's a real pleasure to do any little thing for her. I is indeed!"

"God bless you for your kindness. I shall always be grateful to you, and be your friend with all my heart—if you will let me be so," answered the surgeon.

Within a quarter of an hour he was on his way to Shipley Magna.

GREAT EATERS.

BADHAM, in his "Prose Halieutics," tells us that, "among immortal gluttons, Heraclus the beef-eater was the chief; he would eat up the grilled carcass of a cow at a meal, with all the olive coals attached to it. The audacity of Ulysses in comparison is attested in the Odyssey, which carried an ox round the stadium in his arms, and then with as little difficulty in his inside."

If it be alleged that these three ancient worthies never lived except in the pages of mythology, there is no difficulty in finding real ones that will serve the purpose. Lucullus had a room in his house for every kind of supper, each at a particular cost; and even his breakfast alone was worth a moderate fortune. Apicius killed himself when he had only eight hundred pounds sterling left, fearing that he would die of starvation. One picture had sauce for a pair of partridges prepared from them; another, the supplies legs of nation cut up to supply one choice plateful of special delicacy; and a dish prepared at endless cost from peacocks' brains.

Boehmer, a German writer, described something of this sort in a sum which appeared to him for a wager, would eat a whole sheep, or a whole pig, or a bushel of cherries, including the stones. His strength of teeth and jaws and of stomach enabled him to masticate, or at least to munch into small pieces, bones, shells, stones, and flints. He preferred birds, mice, and caterpillars; but when he could not get these delicacies he put up with mineral substances. He has devoured pen, ink, and sand-pounce, and seemed half inclined to feed in the same way on the husband itself. He made money by exhibiting his powers in this way until about sixty years of age, after which he lived upon his savings-years in a more rational way. Although a Latin treatise was published in elucidation of his marvelous powers, it may not be uncharitable to suppose that there was a little chicanery in the matter, as in the case of the fire-eaters and others we are familiar at the fairs and in the streets, and who display to us upon occasion a wonderful diet when not engaged in money-making exhibitions. A story is told of General Kowigsmark, an officer engaged in the wars of many years waged in by-gone times by Swedes against Poland and Bohemia, which illustrates both the big-eating attribute and the fear which the achievement may possibly produce in the minds of others. A peasant came to the General in Sweden's tent during the siege of Prague, and offered to devour a large hog for the amusement of his Majesty. The general, standing by, told him the fellow ought to be burned as a sorcerer. Nettled and irritated by this, the peasant exclaimed, "If your Majesty will but make that old gentleman take off his sword and spurs, I will eat him before I begin the hog." The notion of buying this offer with a vast expansion of mouth and jaws. Brave as he was in fighting battles, mark could not stand this; he beat a hasty retreat from the tent, and hurried to his own quarters.

In the time of Charles the First, Taylor, the water poet, gave an account of one Edward Wood, a Kentish man, who had a power of stowing away a marvelous quantity of food at a meal. He was credited with having on one occasion devoured a whole raw sheep; on another, three dozen pigeons; on a third, seventy rabbits; on a fourth, eighteen yards of black pudding; while on two other occasions the quantities set down were sixty pounds of cherries and a bushel of damsons. But it will be better to dishelieve these statements, and attend to the more moderate though still startling account given by Taylor, that "Two loynes of mutton and one loyne of veal were but as three spoils to him." Also that Sir Warham St. Leger's house, he showed himself so violent of teeth and stomach as that he ate as much as would have served thirty men, so that his belly was like to turn bankrupt and break, but that the serving-men hindered it by locking it and anointed his paunch with grease and butter to make it stretch and hold; and moreover, being laid in bed, he slept eight hours, and fasted all the while, which when the knight understood he commanded him to be laid in the stocks, and there to endure as long as he had lain bedded with eating." In the time of George the First there was a man who, in a fit of religious enthusiasm, tried to maintain a Lenten fast of forty days and forty nights. Breaking down in this resolution after a few days, he took revenge on himself by becoming an enormous eater, devouring large quantities of raw flesh with much avidity. Somewhat over a century ago, a Polish soldier, presented to the court of Saxony as a marvel of voracity, one day ate twenty pounds of beef and half of a roasted calf. About the same time a youth of seventeen, apprentice to a Thames waterman, ate five pounds of shoulder of lamb and two quarts of pease pudding in two minutes. An achievement of about equal gluttony was that of a brewer's man, who, at an inn in Aldersgate Street, demolished a roast goose of six pounds' weight, a quarter loaf, and three quarts of porter in an incredibly short space of time. Early in the reign of George the Third a watch-maker's apprentice, nineteen years of age, ate three-quarters of an ox, roasted whole, a porkwighing six pounds, and a proportionate quantity of bread, in a public-house, and then concludes with a pint of brandy taken off in two draughts. A few years afterward there was the beggar of Gottingen at the fair, who on one occasion ate twelve pounds of meat at a meal. After his dinner-bath, his stomach was very large, was found to contain numerous bits of flint and other odds and ends, which Nature very properly refused to digest, and to feed on. In a setting aside altogether the real or alleged eating of dogs, cats, rats, and mice, the instances are very numerous in which a joint sufficient for a large family has disappeared at a meal within the short-worthy range of one man.

It is clearly evident that many of toe records of voracious eating point to a morbid craving which the person suffers, and which is as much a disease as the opposite extreme—loss of appetite—which being still more common, is more Medical men have at hand a stock of learned Greek names to apply to various manifestations of the disease. Dr. Cooper, for instance, one which came under his professional notice. There were two children possessing remarkable appetites, of which the youngest, seven years old, was the worst. "The quantity of food devoured by her was astonishing. Every day but one she made a hold of, even in its raw state, was seized upon and devoured. Besides this, there was a cooked rabbit, half a pound of candles, and some butter were taken at one time. The mother declared that little girl, as she was styled, was a good health otherwise, took more food, if she could obtain it, than would be the diet of a family, consisting of six besides herself." Such extreme manifestations of the disease are of course very rare.

As to fire-eaters, they have always been exhibitors rather than persons possessing a real liking for this peculiar food. One of the first, if not was one Powell, very eminent in this line of business, brought to Rome by Sir Horace Mann. It used to be jocularly said of him, that "his common food is brimstone and fire, which he picks up as dainty as a hungry schoolboy does a mess of pottage; and such is his passion for this favorite element, that he wears a waistcoat made into your kitchen while a sirloin was roasting, he would eat up the fire and leave the beef." Some of the former pages have given the most certain incidental notices of persons swallowing material substances which, during the course of years that medical men recognize a disease called lithophagy, or stone-eating. Persons have been known to devour mortar, not merely sand and flints, beads and serpents, and other living creatures—not merely cotton, hair, paper, and wool, but feathers, sand, of sticks, fire-wood, glass, pebbles, stone, musket-bullets, and earthen-ware. One man could swallow bilbloid knives and gold and silver watches. There is an accredited case in the medical journals of New York for 1822, of a man who could eat daily, for several days in succession; but on one day he overshot the mark by swallowing fourteen: it killed him. If we should go into the particulars of all these kinds of voracity, we should have to establish three grades—digesting what mankind can, vomiting without digesting; and simply swallowing without digesting or vomiting. Physiology and pathology can trace this matter for himself. As to earthenware, the young women of certain lands are said to eat clay, and to improve their looks and complexions.

Pleas have been known in which the limitation to the quantity of food taken at once is brought about rather by the effects of fumes and vapors upon the brain than by any distension of the deglutitory powers of the eater. One of those persons to whom a whole joint is a mere trifle was compelled to employ a vapor bath, because he could not take three slabbings worth of bread and ale at one time. The man who laid the wager provided twelve new hot penny loaves, and steeped them in several quarts of ale. The effect of the fumes upon the brain of the bold trencher-man is to send off the glutton into a drowsy helplessness long before he had come to the end of his voracious task, and he was greatly mortified afterward at having lost the wager.

If the gourmet be really due to an abnormal condition of the system, a morbid craving which the physiologist may trace to errors in the organic source, the person is no more to blame than other patients suffering under maladies. But if the boasts of the gourmands and makes them the subject of bets, we can have no difficulty in ascribing the degree of responsibility to him. About forty years ago there was an inscription on the window of a small road-side inn, between Exeter and Plymouth, recording such a boast; whether railways and other novelties have swept it away, we can not tell, but Hone described it thus:

March 16, 1816,
Thomas Mount Joint died here.
Sat six pounds of bacon, drank nineteen pots of beer.

It is nonsense, and a libel upon the four-footed races, to call such exhibitions of gluttony brutal or beastly; seeing that real brutes and beasts eat only when they are hungry, and leave off when they have had enough.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

LOVE in the temperate zone is not without its trials as to think the English, in view of the unusual severity of the past winter with them. For eight or ten days all traffic on the Thames was suspended, and when the ice broke up, one night have imagined himself on the banks of some river of the frigid zone: for the flooding for some hours presented the appearance of irregular masses. In Paris the weather seems to have been equally severe. The Seine has been full of masses of floating ice. Rome and Florence have been, according to one account, "almost buried in snowstorms," though the statement is doubtless rather exaggerated. In Danzig the cold has been so excessive that thermometers at an inn, a restaurant, the Baltic was covered with ice, and some adventurous skaters crossed to Hennigdorf, a distance of several miles.

On the 11th of March the case of the ill-fated City of Boston was brought before the House of Commons. Among other facts respecting the disaster of the sea, it was stated that up to that time, since the first of January, nine steamships had been lost, which, with which foundered at sea with great loss of life; and that most of these casualties were due to the want of proper bulk-heads, and a proper check upon overcrowding.

The "Old Fashioned Girl," Miss L. M. Alcott's last work, was published with an edition of 15,000 copies. The authoress is now on her way to Italy, with Miss May Alcott, the artist by whom "Little Women" was illustrated.

A magnificent ball has been given at Paris by Sultan, a Parisian, which cost more than 100,000 francs. His lounges were covered with cashmere embroidered in gold, which he gave away to his guests as souvenirs. Each lady had carring for cashmere, took away a Persian carpet. Supper was served under a gilded trellis, bearing ripe grapes, peaches, and cherries.

For fifteen years Mr. Charles Dickens has been a public character of splendid audiences. Beneath he gave a farewell reading at St. James's Hall, London. He remarked in the course of his address: "I have formly cheered by the readiest response, the most generous support, and the most stimulating sympathy. Nevertheless, I have thought it well, at the full flood-tide of your favor, to retire upon those other associations and duties in which the calmer hours farther back than these, and henceforth to devote myself exclusively to the art to which these made way for me."

Dr. Osgood, in a recently published letter concerning "Americans in Europe," remarks that tisted people speak in each other's presence in a way that only when presenting distinguished persons to others to the full title given. "I think," he says, "that it is gentle-breeding in England to address a distinguished person once by his title, and afterward to say you or 'Sir.' For instance, the philosopher Faraday, when the Prince of Wales at a public meeting, and after calling him 'Your Royal Highness' once or twice, he spoke to him simply as 'Sir;' which I thought was a style of the truest and best breed-manner, and so assured that it was proper even to speak to the Queen as 'Madame,' after addressing her as 'Your Majesty.' These are little matters, but they are sometimes more important as the best-bred people in Europe and America are coming together, and we wish to be naturally agreeable."

Baron Nathaniel de Rothschild, whose death has recently taken place in Vienna, was, for years of eighteen, with an affection of the spine, which caused severe torture and partial paralysis, and finally culminated in loss of sight. Notwithstanding all of this, he maintained a wonderful cheerfulness, and continued to retain an unclouded interest in his wife's affairs. All the journals of the day were read to him; his memory was singularly retentive, and his judgment acute. His opinion in matters of politics and finance was highly valued, and his magnificent charities in Vienna the constant resort of the political and literary celebrities of France and Germany.

Bleeding from the nose is always regarded as an unwelcome event, but in the opinion of Dr. Hall, it always is beneficial, preventing headache or more serious illness, and sometimes averting apoplexy and sudden death. Therefore it should not be immediately arrested. A wise plan is to permit it to flow excessively, it can sometimes be arrested by putting the feet in hot water, or by applying a mustard plaster between the shoulders.

The eagerness of the freedmen for learning is equalled only by their eagerness for food; and they are pushing forward in their brotherly gratitude to help needy Christian teachers whose families have paid for their noble labors. During the last year the Methodists have sent Negroes, and a greater number have put up houses and churches. In the $12,000,000 which the freedmen's banks have taken at least one-half has been saved for actual investment. It is drawn out mainly to buy homes.

Report tells of some barbarism in a west-of-England town, who deserve expulsion from civilized society. During recent electioning a large crowd brought the ice, and a statesman in attendance pulled her half out; but finding that she would not or could not give him any thing if he rescued her, pushed her in again. When, finally, she was rescued by others, a cabman charged her double fare for getting home.

At a criminal trial in France not long ago a witness refused to take the oath, from religious scruples, declaring that he was a Quaker. As no such sect is unknown in France, no provision appears to have been made for such an exceptional case; and, in consequence, had to deliberate on the point, and at length decided—with the consent of the public prosecutor, the jury, and the advocates—to allow him to receive the testimony of the witness as simple information, but not as legal evidence.

The genuine asphalt roads of Paris are admirable, and the material of which they are made possesses points of great interest. The French asphalt is a carbonate of lime or chalk, naturally impregnated with bituminous matter. Extensive beds of this deposit are found at Seyssel and Pyrimont, on the right bank of the Rhone, between the French frontier and Lake Bourget, in the county of Culoz. Large amounts of the rock are quarried and sent to the French capital, where it is used in making the beautiful pavements which now adorn some of the streets of that city. In heating asphalt rock to about 212° it disintegrates, and by the softening of the bitumen it turns into a sort of a brown dust. If in that state, while the dust is yet hot, it is compressed in a mould, the particles will stick together, and the matter will resume again, in cooling, its general appearance, hardness, and all the properties of primitive rock, while it retains the shape of the mould. At the present time the whole surface of Paris asphalt streets comprises about 133,333 square yards.

The day of women's rights and minors' privileges is dawning in Connecticut. At a recent meeting of the Legislature of that organization a church in Norwich, for the purpose of electing deacons, it was contested by some of the brethren and members of churches of the church, were entitled to vote for officers. After quite a stirring debate this question was decided affirmatively were disposed to grant the privilege of ecclesiastical suffrage to any claimants, and a resolution to that effect was passed.

An English earl's daughter has raised a new scandal by eloping with the organist of a Catholic chapel. The organist is a Mr. Bellasis, a gentleman-like boy of twenty-three, and an Irishman. The Lady Blanche is twenty-six, and the marriage has not been celebrated in legal form, causing strange stories to be circulated in the upper circles.

The new fire-alarm boxes have confused the ideas of some unsophisticated country people. The other day a verdant-looking individual was seen attempting to insert a letter in one of the fire-alarm boxes. A policeman, thinking he was on evil bent, valiantly interposed with the remark that at his depot uninjured when explanation was made.

There is very good philosophy in what a poor man once said: "I always endeavor to treat my wife comfort myself with the reflection that it is not myself he loves, and she will probably cast and hat, which, to say the truth, have no particular claim to my admiration. So if my hat and coat choose to fret about it, let them, I say, fret away."

A little fellow of three years was taken to church for the first time. On his return home his father said, "Well, Charley, how did you like church?" "Not very well," replied the child. "Didn't you? Why not?" "Because," he spoke so loud I couldn't hear him," said Charlie, with a grave face. "Why, my child, you now how difficult it is for a young child to understand the sacred truths of religion, and that it may be unable, or even to get any correct ideas from words that are sinmade so by the whole. Another little boy said you remember the text exactly, but thought it was "something about a fool and a number of persons." It was, "Why hait ye between two opinions?"

At the present time, when disasters at sea are awakening so much painful interest, a recently-invented life-boat seems to deserve favorable notice. The invention consists in so constructing a part or the whole of the boat's bottom that it may be readily detached from the vessel if she should sink; and, being buoyant, will serve as a raft, on which the passengers may take refuge. The hurricane-deck is constructed with double-top, and the space between may be air-tight, may be placed to increase the buoyancy of the raft, and it is so secured to the vessel that it may be instantaneously cut loose. A simple contrivance of provisions, and other things necessary, should be constantly kept in wells in the deck. This invention was patented November, 1869.

An exchange says that a great economy in the manufacture of bread is secured by the following process: Gluten to the amount of ten or twelve per cent. is extracted by boiling water from bran, and the flour is kneaded with this infusion, which, when dried by a thirty per cent. more bread is obtained. The bread, moreover, is said to be better, as that of fine quality, but is much more nutritious.

The walls of Schutzpol have now been completely restored, and the ruins of three houses and a house built in place of those ruined by the bombardment. A new church, in the form of a Greek cross, has also been erected in the church-yard of the town. The funds for the construction of this building were raised by a public subscription in the town of Strasbourg. The chief of the subscribers was the Princess Wasiltchi, who, after the siege, gave the whole profits of her year's pension, amounting to 16,000 rubles. A sum of 100,000 francs in all was expended on the building. The principal monument in the church-yard is that of Prince Hohenlohe, who died in 1815, on the following inscription: "Here lie, among warriors, the mortal remains of the man who prevented the enemies of our country from penetrating to the heart." The tombstones of the men are all alike in shape and size, and those of them bears this inscription: "Grave of our brothers."

His Holiness the Pope remarked the other day, referring to the loss of the Pope's temporal power: "In their eagerness to make me infallible they will make me fall!" The bishops cost the Pope somewhere about 30,000 francs (£1200) each, and he has had to pay for two months' barren discussion the pretty sum of 2,000,000 francs.

The Empress's Grand Prize of 10,000 francs, given this year for the first time by the French Geographical Society, was to be awarded on the 15th of March. On receiving the medal which accompanies the prize, M. De Lesseps announced that he would devote the sum of money to the expedition which the Society is about to undertake into Central Africa.

The following anecdote is told of Charles Dickens, who was once asked by a friend whether there a young writer inveighed against the world generally, in a very "gentlemanly" manner. The writer's pause in the philippic against the human race, Dickens said to his friend: "Let me tell you the most remarkable instance: "I say, ——, what a lucky thing it is you and I don't belong to it!" It reminded the novelist of a number of Pickwick, "of two men who on a raised scaffold were swelling the final delicate attention of the hangman: the notice of one was aroused by observing that a bull had got into the crowd of spectators, and was busily engaged in tossing one here and another there; whereupon he said to the other, 'I say, Bill, how lucky it is for us that we are up here!'"

All Pasha Mosbarek, the Minister of the Khedive of Egypt, has purchased 30,000 volumes in London and Paris, to found a public library at Cairo, the only one of the kind in Egypt.

STEAMSHIP LIFE—TAKING IT EASY.

STEAMSHIP LIFE—OILING THE BINNACLE.

STEAMSHIP LIFE.

WE gave last week an illustration of the miseries and discomforts attendant upon a steerage passage across the Atlantic in one of the large steamers that ply between Europe and this country; this week we give several sketches of other scenes to be witnessed on every voyage. The first represents a group of passengers endeavoring to while away the tedious time by sleeping. Protected from the sharp ocean air by heavy shawls and wrappers, the family is huddled together on a bench on deck. They have no sentiment for the poetry of the "dark blue ocean;" and if they sporutophized the waves at all, it would not be to bid them "roll on." Another sketch shows some of the more interested passengers eagerly watching the oiling of the binnacle, while the mate supervises, with a critical eye, the delicate operation.

None of those on board enjoy a warm and sunny day more than the poor steerage passengers, who come up from their close quarters and crowd the forward part of the ship to obtain a breath of pure air and a pleasant outlook upon the sea. Hundreds of them may be seen, on such a day, grouped about on the little prow deck, gazing delightedly on the prospect, sewing, or singing, or smoking, or holding up their children so that they too may have a look over the high steamer's side, and watch the spray, the sea-gulls flapping and cawing about the prow, and the great fish which now and then leap in the broad path of the ship. Some of the faces in the picture are unmistakably German, others as clearly Hibernian: the old man with the little girl is contented, patient, interested, and the German emigrants all seem quiet and hopeful. The Irish in the back-ground are chattering after the custom of their race, not quite so neat as their German companions, but far more boisterous and lively. The group in the centre is evidently composed of disappointed Feninns returning to this country.

A WOUNDED DANISH SOLDIER.

THE picture from which our illustration with the above title is engraved is a reminiscence of the campaign in Holstein, and will remind our readers of many similar episodes of our own recent war. It was painted by Madame JEANCHAU, wife of the eminent Danish sculptor, and is considered one of the most meritorious of the works that have placed her in the foremost rank of female artists. The circumstances of the Prussian war against Denmark are not yet forgotten. Whatever may have been the merits of Prussia's claim to the territory in dispute, it was pressed with an overbearing insolence which no nation retaining its self-respect could admit, except on compulsion; and we all recollect the brave stand made by the little Danish army against the overwhelming odds brought by its gigantic neighbor. But when, in addition to this, we reflect how peaceful, industrious, and virtuous is the modern Dane, yet losing none of his ancient courage—how thoroughly domestic in his habits, yet ever ready to obey when patriotism calls him from the happy contentment of home, we shall then better appreciate the touching story suggested by this picture. We need not stop to point out the true womanly refinement shown in the artist's treatment of her theme. The life of the wounded man, perhaps, still hangs in the balance; but, if he recovers, he will surely owe more to the soothing, gentle nursing of that true-hearted girl now reading to him from the Book of Life than to the surgeon's skill. We may, however, in illustration of the picture, remind the reader that generally on the Continent of Europe the act of betrothal is regarded far more seriously than our American "engagement" between lovers.

THE MOTHERS OF GREAT MEN.

IT appears to be very important to success in science that a man should have an able mother. I believe the reason to be, that a child so circumstanced has the good fortune to be delivered from the ordinary narrowing, partisan influences of home education. Our race is essentially slavish; it is the nature of all of us to believe blindly in what we love, rather than in that which we think most wise. We are indignant when others pry into our idols, and criticise them with impunity, just as a savage flies to arms when a missionary picks his fetich to pieces. Women are far more strongly influenced by these feelings than men; they are blinder partisans and more servile followers of custom. Happy are they whose mothers did not intensify their naturally slavish dispositions in childhood, by the frequent use of phrases such as, "Do not ask questions about this or that, for it is wrong to doubt;" but who showed them, by practice and teaching, that inquiry may be absolutely free without being irreverent, that reverence for truth is the parent of free inquiry, and that indifference or insincerity in the search after truth is one of the most degrading of sins. It is clear that a child brought up under the influences I have described is far more likely to succeed as a scientific man than one who was reared under the curb of dogmatic authority. Of two men with equal abilities, the one who had a truth-loving mother would be the more likely to follow the career of science; while the other, if bred up under extremely narrowing circumstances, would become as the gifted children in China, nothing better than a student and professor of some dead literature.

STEAMSHIP LIFE—STEERAGE PASSENGERS.

GEN. GEORGE H. THOMAS.

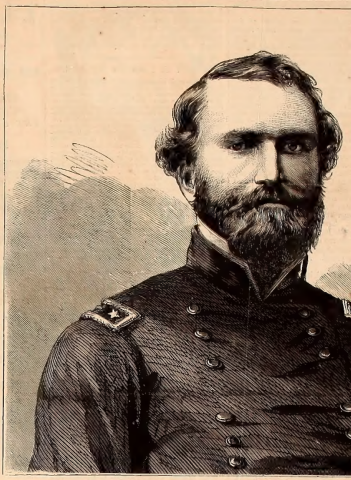
On the 29th of March the sorrowful intelligence was communicated to us of the death of Major-General GEORGE H. THOMAS. He died at eight o'clock on the 28th, from a stroke of apoplexy, at SAN FRANCISCO, his post of duty.

General THOMAS was born on July 31, 1816, in the county of Southampton, Virginia. In his early boyhood he accepted a subordinate position under his uncle, the clerk of the county, and at the same time commenced the study of law. It is worthy of notice that he was a native of Virginia, belonging, as did General ROBERT E. LEE, to a wealthy and respectable family of that State. Like General LEE, also, he was sent from Virginia to West Point, where he graduated June 30, 1840, ranking twelfth in a class of forty-two.

His military career previous to our Civil War is soon told. Immediately after his graduation at West Point he took part in the Indian campaign in Florida, serving as Lieutenant. He took a prominent part in the Mexican War, and for gallant conduct in the several conflicts at Monterey, on the 21st, 22d, and 23d of September, 1846, was brevetted Captain. February 23, 1847, he was brevetted Major "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Buena Vista."

November, 1860, found THOMAS in Texas. General TWIGGS had surrendered, and Major THOMAS at Carlisle Barracks took command of the Sixth Cavalry, and entered into the great conflict for the preservation of the Union. We do not purpose in this brief sketch to follow his military career during the Civil War in all its details. Unlike General LEE, he did not consider it his duty to sacrifice his allegiance to the nation to that which he owed to Virginia. On MAY 3, 1861, we find him Colonel of the Fifth Cavalry (the old Second), in the place of General LEE, who had resigned. He commanded the first brigade of General PATTERSON'S army of Northern Virginia until August 26, 1861, when he was made Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and was ordered to Kentucky. Thenceforth his career was eminently successful, and in many respects more remarkable than that of any other Federal general during the war.

General THOMAS was never defeated. After his victory over General ZOLLICOFFER at Mill Spring, in January, 1862, he moved forward and, after the fall of Fort Donelson, occupied Nashville. On the second day of the battle of Pittsburg Landing he commanded the reserve of the Union army. He was made a Major-General April 25, 1862, and at the close of the year we find him in command of a corps under ROSECRANS'S command. In the official report of the battle of Stone River General ROSECRANS alluded to General THOMAS as "true and prudent, distinguished in counsel and on many battle-fields for his courage."



MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE H. THOMAS.

In the summer and autumn of 1863 General THOMAS especially distinguished himself in the Chattanooga campaign. But for his wise precautions ROSECRANS could never have concentrated his army at Chickamauga, and must have been overcome in detail by BRAGG. ROSECRANS would have it that BRAGG was retreating in confusion into Georgia. But THOMAS knew better. When the army was finally concentrated at Chickamauga General THOMAS commanded the left wing, which he held in position on the 19th of September, retrieving the battle which ROSECRANS had already given up as lost. In October THOMAS was assigned to the command of the Army of the Cumberland, succeeding ROSECRANS.

In the Atlanta campaign, early in 1864, THOMAS took a prominent part. After its successful completion General SHERMAN, setting out for his March to the Sea, sent THOMAS back to Nashville to attend to HOOD, who had succeeded General BRAGG. HOOD's design was to compel SHERMAN'S retreat by a bold march northward, looking to the occupation of Nashville.

The result of the battle of Nashville, near the close of 1864, gave General THOMAS his most characteristic distinction. He will ever be known as "the hero of Nashville." His patience before the battle, when the wiseacres at Washington were clamoring for an immediate advance on his part, was not less remarkable than his tactics on the battle-field after that he had mustered all his forces and entered upon the conflict. His victory over HOOD was the most complete victory of the war. HOOD's forces were utterly demoralized, and the rebel power in the Southwest never recovered from the blow. For this THOMAS was made a Major-General in the regular army.

Since the close of the war General THOMAS has been assigned to department duty in Tennessee and Kentucky, and latterly in California. During the few weeks preceding his death he enjoyed remarkably good health; but on the 28th, at half past five o'clock, P.M., he was seized with a fit of apoplexy while attending to business in his office. In less than three hours after the attack he died. His death is truly a national calamity. As a man and as a soldier his character is unreproached and irreproachable.

A WOUNDED DANISH SOLDIER.—FROM A PAINTING BY MADAME JERICHAU.—[SEE PAGE 262.]

INFALLIBLE RELICS.

ALL men are more or less fond of relics. Do not most of us look with interest on the garments of distinguished people who lived before us? No wonder that the Romish Church, speculating on all emotions and weaknesses of the human mind, should have availed itself of this predilection.

The old Romans and Greeks had their holy relics, and some were almost Roman Catholic: for instance, the egg of Leda. The Indians carried on lucrative traffic with the enormous mammoth tooth of Buddha. The Mohammedans preserve the standard, arms, clothes, beard, and two teeth of their prophet. In the Christian church, however, we find no trace of this relic-culture before the Emperor Constantine. According to the legend, he saw a cross with a victory-promising inscription in the sky, and adopted it as a standard. It conquered, and became the Cross Station. From that time the cross became the symbol of the Christians.

The mother of the Emperor, Helena, discovered the true cross; so, at least, we are told by late papal authors. Contemporary historians, however, do not say one word about this remarkable discovery. According to the legend, not only was the true cross discovered, but also the crosses of the two thieves who were crucified with our Saviour. They were all found together; but as the inscription affixed by Pilate was not forthcoming, the finders were at a loss how to discover the true cross. The priests, however, found a way to solve this difficulty. They laid a sick man on one of the crosses, and, behold! he became worse; from which they concluded that they had struck on the real cross, and thief who taunted Christ. When the sick man was laid on another of the crosses, he became much better; but when he was laid on the third, he jumped up quite well. Then the matter could not be any doubt of which was the true cross and which the thieves'.

The graves of the Apostles were likewise discovered, and the bodies of some of them too. Very pious people were successful in entering into direct communication with the saints. A woman at St. Maurin, for instance, who had chosen St. John the Baptist for her great patron, yoked him for three years every day: imploring him to let her have only a little bit of the water for which he had no further use. The saint would not listen to her prayers. At last the woman got impatient—as even pious women do sometimes, if they can not have their own way—and vowed that she would not feed her ox unless the saint fulfilled her prayer. She kept her vow for seven days, and was nearly at her last gasp, when she found an ale the thirsty ox and the saint: Three bishops wrapped this holy relic very reverentially in three silver drops of blood fell from it—one drop per bishop.

Some saints have had several skeletons. That of St. Denis, for instance, exists in duplicate at the present time; besides a third head in Prague, and a fourth in Munich, where the Munich can boast of a hand of his. This remarkable saint, therefore, had two perfect bodies, four heads, and five hands; if one of them be only be otherwise; for each of these relics has to show the same miraculous movement of authenticity from an infallible Pope.

Albertus Magnus, Bishop of Regensburg, devoted a great deal of learning to researches about the bodily appearance of the Holy Virgin, and to trying to find out the color of her eyes and hair she had. As the present compiler does not feel inclined to read the eight hundred books left by us of this gentleman's writings, he does not know the result of his researches; but, according to the specimens of her hair, inscribed by Popes as genuine, it must have been pinkish; for the infallible relics of it are fair, red, brown, and black.

The most ponderous relic left of the Virgin Mary is her house, now in Loretto. This house stood once, of course, in Palestine; but, according to the legend, angels carried it to Italy. They placed it first at Tersato, in Dalmatia, but in the year 1297 they transported it to Loretto. It is a wonderful circumstance that the houses of Palestine of the time of our Saviour should have so exactly resembled the peasants' houses in the neighborhood of Loretto. It is enshrined now in a magnificent church, and thousands and thousands of pilgrims are there, to stir their rosaries in the tung of the infant Christ, and to depose a more or less considerable sum on the altar.

The credulity of people in the matter of relics really surpasses belief. One monk, by name Eisolin, traveled in 1500 in Westphalia, exhibiting to the faithful a pinion of the wing of the Archangel Gabriel. Who knows what a discourse paid for it) could not be seized by the plague. When saying to the people how at Aldingen this precious relic was stolen from him. Eisolin, however, was not at a loss; before the very eyes of his hearers he took the empty casket with hay, and exhibited it as hay from the manger in Bethlehem. All the faithful thronged to kiss it, and the honest monk then; so that the monk whispered, full of astonishment, to his lay: "Even you, sweetheart?"

At the time of the Crusades the world was overflowed with relics. Whenever a town of the Holy Land was conquered, the crusaders looked first for relics, as more precious than jewels or gems. Lewis the Saint made two unfortunate crusades, but he comforted himself with the relics he brought home. These were: some spinters from the cross, a few nails, the sponge, the purple coat which the mocking soldiers threw over the shoulders of Christ, and the thorn crown. Three holy things he acquired for immense sums. When they arrived he paid his whole court went out barefoot as far as Vincennes to meet them.

Henry the Lion brought many relics to Brunswick: among them the thumb of St. Mark, for which the Venetians offered in vain one hundred thousand ducats.

The whole wardrobe of our Saviour, of the Holy Virgin, of St. Joseph, and of many saints turned up, certified by Infallibility. The holy lance was found, with which the Roman knight Longinus wounded the body of our Redeemer-chief of St. Veronica, which she handed to Christ to wipe his face when he was on his way to Golgotha, and on which he left the impression of his features. This handkerchief must have been at least fifty yards long, as according to the pieces (always certified by Infallibility) which are shown at different places. The dish of emerald was found, which the angels had given present to the Queen of Sheba, and from which Christ ate the Easter lamb in the water-pots were found from the wedding at Cana, and they were still filled with wine. There exist so many splinters of the cross, and so many nails may that there are supposed a man-of-war does not contain more wood and iron. Pictures from the life were likewise in great quantity, and some of them bled every holy Friday. The cup from which Christ drank when he instituted the Lord's Supper was discovered, together with some of the bread left from that repast. The silver dishes which were used for casting lots for the garments were also found, and likewise the unsoaned tunic. There existed tunics of Joseph, Aegrippina, Hagar, Rebecca, and many other places. All have a certificate about Infallibility.

There were also found infallible shirts of the Virgin, as large as carriers' frocks. Her very precious wedding-ring was shown at Perugia, together with a pair of very neat slippers, and a skirt of very large and mighty dimensions, when paying a visit to St. Elizabeth. Milk of Mary was discovered in great abundance, and Divine Mother possesses in single churches fifty times bottled. There exist also the infallible swaddling-clothes, many small caps and bonnets, breeches of St. Joseph, and his carpenter's tools. One of the thirty silver pieces, the price of the sacrificed Redeemer, has also been piously preserved, together with the rope—twelve feet long and rather too thin—by which the traitor hanged himself: also, his very small empty purse. Even the perch turned up on which the cock crew which startled Saint Peter was found in Prince Palaces: even the stone with which the evil one tempted our Lord in the desert; even the basin in which Pilate washed his hands; even the sword of Judas, as on which the entry into Jerusalem was made. There were even pieces of the burning bush of Testament which had lain safely hidden vast numbers of years. For instance: the staff with which Moses, at the head of his people, went to the desert; the beard of Noah; a piece of the rock from which Moses struck water.

The belief of the benighted people in these relics was so strong that the priests could even venture to show, not merely the sacred objects, but manifestly impossible relics; there once were an exhibition, for instance, of the sacred instruments, such relics as the dagger and buckles of the Archangel Michael; something of the breath of our Saviour, preserved in a box; a piece of Egyptian darkness; something of the sound of the Holy Ghost when it descended; the shadow or breath of the Virgin Mary, which she breathed forth when he had to place very knotty words; the thorn in the flesh which so greatly troubled St. Paul.

In German Palace there were nearly one hundred wonder-working images of the Virgin, but the most celebrated is that at Loretto, in the house already mentioned. It is inscribed by St. Luke, and is most carefully cut out of cedar wood, and is dyed black by the smoke of many millions of wax-candles burned before her. Enigma. The next celebrated image is at St. Jago de Compostella, where you might have seen, but a few years ago, thirty thousand pilgrims at once; none of whom dared to approach it empty-handed.

1840 1870

By reference to the dates given above, it will be seen that this remedial preparation has been before the public THIRTY YEARS, and the demand for it at this time, in all parts of the world, is greater than it has been at any former period. No article ever attained to such unbounded popularity. The various ills to which Poor Pain Killer is an unfailing cure are too well known to require a recapitulation here. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine everywhere. 50 cents per bottle. Directions enclosed. It is for sale by Druggists and Grocers generally.

CHURCHMAN & ENGLAND.
FRENCH CHINA
Decorated Dinner & Tea Sets.
42 MURRAY STREET,
NEW YORK.

HICKLEY'S KNITTING MACHINE
FOR FAMILY USE—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits Every Thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and stocking FREE. Address HICKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 178 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENT WANTED.—A good local agent in every town to introduce the sale of the best and most popular FAMILY MAGAZINE. A liberal, wide-awake person, not liberal inducements will be given. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, Wine, Molasses, or Sugar, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
have received, per last steamers,
TWO CASES
OF
REAL INDIA CAMEL'S HAIR SHAWLS,
in
STRIPED, DRESDA, STELLA, and a few of
THE RICHEST YET OFFERED,
at Prices Lower than Ever.
BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH AND 10TH STS.

LADIES' AND GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING GOODS:
VIZ.,
HOSIERY, GLOVES,
UNDERGARMENTS
SCARFS, TIES, HANDKERCHIEFS,
&c., &c., &c.,
Greatly Below Former Prices.
A. T. Stewart & Co.,
BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH AND 10TH STS.

The New Books of the Season
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. History of the American Civil War. By Captain JOHN W. DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York. In Three Vols. Vol. III. just ready. 8vo, Cloth, $3 ☞ per vol.

A BRAVE LADY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

BAZAR BOOK OF DECORUM. The Care of the Person, Manners, Etiquette, and Ceremonials. Illus. Square 12mo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 00. (Just Ready.)

DERBENHAM'S VOW. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "Barbara's History." "Half a Million of Money," "Miss Carew," &c., &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Man and the World we Inhabit. With a Statement of the Intellectual Advance respecting the Primordial Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00. (Just Ready.)

THE UNKIND WORD, and Other Stories. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c., &c. 18mo, Cloth, 60 cents.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By JAMES ORTON, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N.Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Equatorial America and numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00. (Just Ready.)

JOURNAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO THE HOLY LAND. Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Constantinople, the Crimea, Greece, &c., in the Suite of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By Sir CHARLES MURE WILLIAM GREY. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

GARIBALDI'S NOVEL. The Rule of the Monk; or, Rome in the Nineteenth Century. By General GARIBALDI. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations by Eminent Artists, and Portraits. New Edition. 250th Thousand. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY. A Novel. By MRS. A. C. STEELE, Author of "Gardenhurst." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

HAND-BOOK OF THE SULPHUR-CURE, as applicable to the Vine Disease in America, and Diseases of Apple and other Fruit Trees. By WM. J. FLAGG, Author of "Vine Culture in European Vineyards." 12mo, Paper, 50 cents.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford. Related in Her Letters to Her Friends. Edited by Rev. A. G. K. L'ESTRANGE. With Portrait. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By ALTON CLYDE, Author of "Maggie Lynne." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. By Rev. SAMUEL GREGG, Author of "Jesse of Nazareth, his Life and Teachings," &c. Reprinted from Revised Sheets. 12mo, Cloth, Black and Gold Side Stamp, $1 50.

$40,000 SOLD. The Wonder of the World. The Magnetic Time Indicator, or "Dobbs' Watch." A present one—Elegantly cased in Oxide of Gold, Superior Compass Attachment, Enameled Dial, Jewelled Movements, Glass crystal, size of lady's watch. Will decide correct time; warranted five years; superb and showy enough for a present to any lady or gentleman. Sent securely per express, for $500 sold in three weeks. Sun 21 each, three for $5, in neat case, sealed, by mail. Three samples, address the sole manufacturers, MAGNETIC WATCH CO., Bluffdale, N. H.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-Worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions, and Flesh Discolorations on the face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. Sold by druggists. Depot, 49 Bond Street, New York.

For Moth Patches, Freckles & Tan

Use "Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion." The only reliable and harmless remedy known to science. Prepared by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by Druggists every where.

EATING AT A LUNCHEON BAR.

THERE are some persons who enter a luncheon bar with a knowingness and a deliberation which indicate that they are about to lay out the limited space of time available for the luncheon bar to the greatest possible advantage. They select the best bar, and the best bar they select the best things. With a cool, critical eye they run down the bill of fare, and with instinctive judgment make a selection of the dishes most to their taste. But if a man is exceedingly busy, or very much pressed for time, he is not to blame for this. He has perhaps staid at his post until faintness, or the gnawing tooth of hunger, has insolently driven him from his work to the luncheon bar; and thus he has a wandering eye and a preoccupied mind. He has been driven to eat what he is eating, whether roast or boiled, joint or entrée. He satisfies a brute, canine instinct, and retires. He has been driven to come to a luncheon bar with a pen behind his ear, both in one hand, and a bill-head, some memoranda, or a pocketful of letters with him. Such a one has a business friend with him; and they will continue their discussion or negotiation in the brief allotment of time apportioned to refection. Then comes the hasty, unwholesome-looking men, with bodily disorganization, and short setting in, chiefly because they bolt their food whole, and allow no time for digestion. I know of an invalid of this sort, who, in solemn repentance for his ill-advised alacrity in feeding, has stuck up all over his house inscriptions in large letters, "Masticate, masticate, masticate!" A judicious man, who knows that he has a great deal of important work to do, and wishes to do it in a high state of bodily efficiency, generally confines himself to a mutton chop and a glass of sherry, which he transacts leisurely. If there be lunch-room, really requiring mastication, a man is very careful in his diet. You can not be lording two great organs with work at the same time without impeding and impairing their action. This is a most elementary physiological truth.

REMOVAL.

S. W. GERRY & CO. will remove to southeast corner of 10th Street and Broadway, 1st of May. Importers and Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,

Formerly I. & W. Gerry, No. 79 Broadway, Established in 1804. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Coil Wines has been the special business of this house for years.

Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every-thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

THE BEAVER BRAND

SILK-FINISHED

BLACK PURE MOHAIRS.

These GOODS are distinguished for their silky appearance, brilliant lustre, and pure and fast Black, which we warrant them to retain. Being made of the very finest material, these goods may excel all other Mohairs ever sold in the United States.

They are splendid Goods to wear, and are most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in New York, Brooklyn, and the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

Each piece has the above trade-mark, and a stick of same attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Beaver, and the words like the above. WM. T. PEARE & CO.,

140, 142, & 144 White St., New York,

Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK OF FOREIGN TRAVEL.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Northern Australia, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1869. By W. Pembroke Fetridge. Revised Edition: Eighth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK: or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a new and improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. Pembroke Fetridge. Assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 4to, Flexible Cloth, $1 00.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

RAILROAD GAZETTE.

A Journal of Transportation.

Railroad Questions discussed by Practical Railroad Men.

Illustrated Description of Railroad Inventions.

Railroad Engineering and Mechanics.

Record of the Progress of Railroads.

Railroad Reports and Statistics.

General Railroad News.

Railroad Elections and Appointments.

Twenty-four large quarto pages, published every Saturday on and after April 2, 1870.

Every Railroad Man, and every man interested in Railroads, should have it. Terms $3 00 a year, in advance. Address

A. N. KELLOGG, Publisher,

161 Washington St., Chicago.

Reliance Wringer,

IMPROVED.

Keyed Rolls.
White Rubber Spiral Cogs. Easy Working. Has Curved Shape. Fits any Tub.
The Best.
The Cheapest.
Try it.

PROVIDENCE TOOL CO.,

29 Beekman St., N.Y.] PROV., R.I.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER,

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and money. Our presses containing full information, and also those Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., sizes of Chases, Cases, Type, Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., sent to ADAMS PRESS CO., 52 Murray Street, New York.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

WATCHES manufactured by the

CONSOLIDATED STATES WATCH CO.,

Of MARION, N. J., retailed and sold to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewelers, 40 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York.

☞ Call or send for Price-List.

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

OF THE

ST. LOUIS

AND

ST. JOSEPH

RAILROAD CO.

—

THE

LAST OF THE ISSUE OF $1,000,000

NOW READY FOR SALE

AND

DELIVERY,

AMOUNTING TO $250,000,

AND AIR

THE ONLY BONDS EVER ISSUED BY THIS COMPANY.

They are secured by a first and only mortgage upon the entire property of the Company, including Franchises, Rights of Way, &c., and at the safe rate of $13,500 per mile on a complete and equipped road in successful operation.

Trustees for the Mortgage: Farmers' Loan and Trust Company of New York.

This Road connects St. Louis with St. Joseph by the most direct and the shortest route.

They are Coupon Bonds, in denominations of $1000, payable (Principal and Interest) in Gold, in the City of New York.

The Principal is payable 20 years from November, 1880, in Gold.

The Interest, at the rate of Six per Cent. per annum, is payable 1st of May and November in each year, at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, free of tax.

We are authorized to offer these Bonds for sale at 87½ and accrued interest in Currency. We do so with a full knowledge of the perfect security upon which they are issued, and with the knowledge we unhesitatingly recommend them as a safe and reliable investment.

TANNER & CO.,

No. 49 Wall Street, New York.

MADAM FOY'S

COMBINED

Corset, Skirt Supporter, and BUSTLE

Is just the article needed by every lady who consults

HEALTH, COMFORT, and STYLE.

Testimonials in its favor are continually coming in from the most eminent of the land.

Is highly deemed needed in every country of the United States.

HARMON, BALDWIN, & FOY,

Sole Manufacturers, New Haven, Conn.

FOWLE'S PILE AND HUMOR CURE.

Warranted a perfect CURE for all kinds of PILES, SCROFULA, SALT-RHEUM, ULCERS, SORES, RINGWORM, CATARRH, and all diseases of the SKIN and BLOOD. Sent anywhere. In case of failure, please send and get your money. No failures for 12 years. Send for Certificates and Circular. Sold by FOWLE, Chemist, Boston. Sold every where. $1 a Bottle. Send for Circulars.

WONDER! WONDER!!—My MAGIC COMPOUND will force the beard to grow on the smoothest face, or hair on the baldest head, in twenty-one days in every case, or money refunded. Sent by mail, postpaid, for 50 cents a single package, or five for $2. Address I. F. JAGGERS, Box 1748, St. Louis, Mo.

EMPLOYMENT.—$200 a month with Stencil Dies. 2 Samples free. S M Spencer & Co., Brattleboro, Vt.

$25 A DAY 40 new articles for Agents. Samples sent Free. S. HAWK, Alfred, Me.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal," (improved movement,) are now offered at the low price of $15 each. Having sought tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Full-jeweled Patent Levers, $18, equal in appearance and for time to gold ones costing $150. These are Hunting Cases, equal to gold in $200 gold ones. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled patent levers, equal in appearance to $300 gold watch. For these magnificent watches we charge $25. Each and all of these watches fully guaranteed as represented. And our watches are in hunting cases, gents' and ladies' sizes. Also, Silver, Nickel, Sil'er Plate, Aluminum, and all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

One of the best Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

BOOSEY'S "50-CENT" MUSIC.—Boosey's Musical Cabinet. Piano-forte Numbers in Books, each containing 112 pages of Music, viz.: Books 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, Schumann's twenty-two pieces, 25 Chopin, 25 Thalberg, 25 Gottschalk's Parlor-piece selections, 126, Thalberg's Six Fantasies, 121, Sydney Smith's Pieces, 99 Scenes by Jungmann, 99 Musical Moments, 99 Gems, 99 Mozart's twelve National Anthems, 84. Kuhe's eight Fantasies, 16. Boosey's Royal Edition of Operas, 12. Leybach's six Fantasies, 79. Ten popular pieces, 98. Richer's twelve short pieces. Schumann's Album for Children, 68. Fifteen favorite Duets, 16. Twelve Rondo Brillantes, 34. Boosey's Ballad Opera, 72. A load of all Music and Book sellers. Complete catalogue free. BOOSEY & CO., No. 594 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S "50-CENT" MUSIC.—Boosey's Musical Cabinet. Piano-forte Numbers in Books, each containing 112 pages of Music, viz.: Books 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, Schumann's twenty-two pieces, 25 Chopin, 25 Thalberg, 25 Gottschalk's Parlor-piece selections, 126, Thalberg's Six Fantasies, 121, Sydney Smith's Pieces, 99 Scenes by Jungmann, 99 Musical Moments, 99 Gems, 99 Mozart's twelve National Anthems, 84. Kuhe's eight Fantasies, 16. Boosey's Royal Edition of Operas, 12. Leybach's six Fantasies, 79. Ten popular pieces, 98. Richer's twelve short pieces. Schumann's Album for Children, 68. Fifteen favorite Duets, 16. Twelve Rondo Brillantes, 34. Boosey's Ballad Opera, 72. A load of all Music and Book sellers. Complete catalogue free. BOOSEY & CO., No. 594 Broadway, N. Y.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!

The reputation of the NOVELTY JOB PRINTING PRESS is thoroughly established, and many of the improvements of the chase press, with which to-day all printing is done, are being second to none for the use of printers who desire the best adapted for job work. Many young men have bought them, and set up their printing offices, from which employe them, thereby materially adding to their income, and in a few months more than pay for the outlay, and be side to their business. Principals of Schools are beginning to find that their young men and boys are very valuable assistants in the way of instruction, pleasure, and profit. Most lads of fourteen in this one of these presses and a dollars' worth of material, are perfectly capable of doing all the printing for their father's business, and will be thereby gaining instruction. Prices of Presses, $15, $30, $32, $60. Send for full descriptive Pamphlet circular, with testimonials from all parts of the country, and specimens of plain and colored printing done on the press, and specimen sheets of types, cuts, &c., &c. Address KELLY, HOWELL, & LUDWIG, Franklin Square, Boston, Mass., dealer in every description of printing material. Or, for Western orders, address C. SHURTLEFF & CO., 70 Monroe Street, Chicago. KELLY, HOWELL, & LUDWIG, 917 Market St., Philadelphia. C. C. KELLOGG, 60 West Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

ROGERS'

GROUPS OF STATUARY.

These groups, suitable for wedding presents or ornaments, are illustrated, with all express charges prepaid, on receipt of any point east of the Mississippi, on receipt of the price, viz., from $10 to $30. Send for illustrated Catalogue and Price-List, to JOHN ROGERS,

Taking the Oath. 19 Fifth Ave., New York.

Agents! Read This!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY of $30 per week and expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and popular Map. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

C. M. CLAY & CO., manufacturers, by process of Clay & Co.'s patent, of Gilt-edge plastic iron, of plates for use in the fine arts, bank-note printing, &c.; ten times as durable as steel. 41 Liberty St., New York.

$200 per Month guaranteed. Agents wanted in every County in the U. S., to sell Buck's Harpoon Anchor. Price $5. Sells on sight. Address C. H. BECKER & CO., 403 North 3d St., Philad'a, Pa.

DARING, CORING, AND SLICING MACHINE. Four times as fast as by hand. Sold at sight. Send for illustrated circular. Address D. H. WHITTEMORE, Mfr., Worcester, Mass.

$10 A DAY.—Agents wanted. An entirely new and superior article. Address, for particulars, H. A. SMITH & CO., Bridgeport, Conn.

W. B. WILSON & CO., 107 Pearl St., N. Y., Agents wish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

$20 A DAY! Business new. For circulars and sample give, address J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

A MENIA SEMINARY, Amenia, N. Y. Term begins April 19. S. T. Frost, A.M., Principal and Prop'r.

$60 A WEEK, paid agents in a new business. Address SACK MANUFACTORY CO., Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Its first object is to give to its readers a full pictorial and local interest. The best artists in the country are employed to sketch in the department of illustration, and the Editors are also largely indebted to photographers in all parts of the world for many of the fine illustrations which appear in its columns.

As a Literary Journal, HARPER'S WEEKLY has attained a circulation greater than any literary newspaper which has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a claim to precedence.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY contributes one of the most prominent features. It includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Miscellaneous topics.

In No. 475, for November 20, was commenced the publication of a New Story by Miss MARY CECIL HAY, the Author of "Old Myddelton's Money," "Hesba Stretton," "Arranmore," and "The Wonderful Adventures of Mr. Verdant Green." The publication of this story will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of this story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for a Bl—ss'd Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and wonderful ever known in the history of periodicals, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper extant. As an illustrated chronicler of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. By a liberal arrangement entered into with the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of Fashion in Europe—the choicest designs are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the paper is exclusively devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter—Stories, Sketches, Poetry, Biography, and Travels. The Editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every day of social life. The latest fads and new modes will be spared to permanently secure for the journal the widest circulation it has so rapidly, and which it so well deserves.

In the Bazar for April 16 was commenced "The Cryptogram," a serial story of thrilling interest, by the author of "Lena Rivers" and "Dora Deane."

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical out in this country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine

The MAY Number completes the Fortieth Vol. of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and the publishers congratulate themselves that many other monthly periodicals in Europe or America have not been able to reach the same number of volumes. In the continuous line of improvement adopted in securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary and artistic talent, and in the judicious variety and artistic illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration, to the more substantial and valuable historical treatment of its papers upon scientific subjects, upon the mechanical improvements of the age, and upon current topics; and to the variety and interest of its special Editorial and Miscellaneous departments, a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record, which will make up, in the main, the matter of the Old Monthly Record expanded. We will continue to be its leading characteristic; and by a careful study of the wants of the time, and by the attention to the wishes of the reading public they will be able to enhance even the present popularity of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred pages more matter than any similar periodical issued in the English language. Thus the ample space of the Magazine for Illustrations and Literature is a great fully of all the topics embraced in their plan.

The Publishers have no intention of either asking and anticipating for the future a continuance of the favor which has been extended to the work during the past 12 years.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE one quarter a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly in advance by the receiver. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with twenty cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or ten cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions will be received to commence with any. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the first Number of January and July of each year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the first Number of January and July.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200. Half Page, $105: Quarter Page, $55—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Pages, $2 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 50 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

FORESHADOWING OF COMING EVENTS IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

"No, gentlemen, that will not do; and there is no help but in dividing the public schools, or in abandoning the system of public schools altogether."—The Tablet, Roman Catholic.

"It will be a glorious day for Catholics in this country when our school system will be shivered to pieces."—Cincinnati Roman Catholic Telegraph.

"Let the public school system go to where it came from—the devil,"—Roman Catholic Freeman's Journal.

"We ask that the public schools be cleansed from this peace-destroying monstrosity—Bible reading."—Bishop Lynch, of New Orleans, Roman Catholic.

"We can not use the common schools, because they answer not our end nor satisfy our consciences."—Rev. Thomas Preston, Roman Catholic.

U.S. PIANO CO. N.Y.
DISTINCT PIANOS—Overstrung Scale—Agraffe Bridge—Full Iron Frame—Patent Tuning Pins—French Action—four plain—7 octaves—pure, sweet, rich, and powerful tone—tested and sent everywhere for trial—warranted 3 years—Price $270. Circulars mailed free.—address—UNITED STATES PIANO CO., No. 650 Broadway, New York.

DREXEL & CO.,
34 South Third St., Philadelphia;
DREXEL, WINTHROP, & CO.,
23 Wall St., New York;
DREXEL, HARJES, & CO.,
3 Rue Scribe, Paris,
AMERICAN and FOREIGN
BANKERS.
Issue Drafts and Circular Letters of Credit, available on presentation in any part of Europe. Travelers can make all their financial arrangements through us. We will collect their interest and dividends without charge.
All correspondence or papers directed to the care of Drexel, Harjes, & Co., Paris, will be promptly forwarded to any addresses that may be ordered by travelers; and, also, arrangements may be made for having mail letters sent to them.
A directory of the various Cities always on file at the Paris office.

RUSSIAN BRACES.
The best suspenders ever worn. Be sure you get the genuine. Each pair stamped with fides of our Patents. Merchants are continued against imitations and Licensed goods. FISK, CLARK, & FLAGG, Patentees, 86 White Street, N. Y.
Retailed by first-class Furnishing houses in large cities.

PATENTS INVENTORS who wish to take out Letters Patent, are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for Twenty-three Years. Their unequaled facilities for procuring Patents Abroad is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency.
A pamphlet, containing full instructions to inventors, is sent gratis. Address MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, N.Y.

INDIA GOODS,
SCARCE, UNIQUE, AND CHOICE.
The largest and rarest assortment ever offered. Especially suited for Holiday Gifts. Also, Chinese and Japan Goods, and many other articles both useful and ornamental. Catalogues on application or by mail. On exhibition at FOUNTAIN & CO.'S, 666 Broadway.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO
CLEANS, POLISHES, AND IS CHEAPER & BETTER THAN SOAP.
Depot, 211 Washington Street, New York.

FISHERIES.—For sale in the trade, 1000 Nets & Seines, for Brook, River, Lake or Sea Fishing. 50,000 Ins. Fish Netting, for export or domestic use, 5/6 inch sq. mesh. Amer. Net and Twine Co., 41 Commercial St., Boston.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,
NEW YORK.

Woodward's National Architect, 1000 Working Plans, Elevations, Sections, Detail Drawings, Specifications, Estimates. Postpaid, $10.
Harney's Barns, Outbuildings, and Fences, 200 Designs, including Sheds, Gates, Gateways, and Stable Fittings. Postpaid, $10.
Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses, 188 Designs and Plans. Postpaid, $1.00.
Illustrated priced catalogue of all books on Architecture and Agriculture mailed free.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,
191 Broadway, New York.

THE RICE DIVORCE SUIT.
For fraud in age, is causing great excitement in Boston. He should warn young men not to marry in haste. Rice is but 22, his bride 37. He swears that she made him believe she was but six years her senior, by using Magnolia Balm upon her face, neck, and hands. Poor youth! He probably found her elbows weren't quite so soft and pretty. Ought Hagan to be indicted? We know of many similar cases. This Balm gives a most wonderful pearly and natural complexion, to which we don't object. We like pretty women. To finish the picture, they should use Lyon's Kathairon upon the hair. With pearly chin, rosy cheeks, and soft, luxuriant tresses, they become irresistible.

SAFE AS LIGHT FOR OUR HOMES
PERKINS & HOUSE'S NON-EXPLOSIVE KEROSENE LAMP will Save your Lives, Gloss Lamps Explode,
Save your Houses, Gloss Lamps Break,
Save your Money, Gloss Lamps Waste Oil,
Save your Eyes. Gloss Lamps Wear Out.
Prof. W. R. Nichols, Prest Mass. Ag. College, says: "It is perfectly non-explosive. The light is better than is produced by any other lamp. I believe it true economy, in view of the safety, the quality and quantity of the light, and the durability of the lamp, to throw away all other kinds, and use this one only."
Dr. Jacob Bigelow, M.D., LL.D., Prof. of Chemistry, Detroit Medical College, says: "I tried their lamps with coal oil, and they burned well. These tests I am satisfied with; and, therefore, consider it free from any danger of explosion, which can not be said of any other lamp."
Rev. W. E. Tucker, D.D., Prof. in Amherst College, says: I know of nothing that can compare with it. I prefer it to any other burner. For safety, for economy, and for the perfection of the light, it deserves to come into universal use."
Good Canvassers wanted for city and country. One Canvasser cleared $12 the first two days.
Try a Lamp. We will gladly refund the money if you do not like it.
VOTAW, MONTGOMERY, & CO.,
19 Cortlandt St., N. Y.

PAPER-BOATS.
For exercise, pleasure, racing, travelling, and hunting. Specially adapted for young ladies. Info, circulars, & specimen. Descriptive circulars & price-list sent on applicn. Van Vleck, Hall, & Co., 303 River St., Troy, N.Y.

IMPORTANT TO WATCH BUYERS.
THE ATTENTION OF WATCH BUYERS is called to a few facts which should especially influence intelligent purchasers, particularly where it is desired to procure the best AMERICAN WATCH.
THE AMERICAN WATCH CO. of Waltham is the oldest and largest Company in the United States, and, with the advantage of sixteen years' experience, the artisans employed are necessarily more expert and skillful than those employed elsewhere.
THE WALTHAM COMPANY make twice as many Watches as all the other American Watch Companies, and herein lies the secret of the moderate prices at which they are sold.
THE WALTHAM COMPANY make a larger and better assortment, and greatly excel in making Fine Watches, simply because they have ample and improved machinery and experienced and skillful labor.
FOR THE PAST YEAR OR TWO many dealers have advertised WALTHAM WATCHES at low prices, and sold them at small profits. This system, however, can only last in a free country by free to follow if they like, for it would be vain for us to attempt to control the sale of our manufactures after they have ceased to be our property. A newly-organized Western Watch Company, in their unscrupulous efforts to make a market for their goods, instructed its traveling agents to call the attention of Jewelers to the fact that, through these advertisements, but very small profits could be made on Waltham Watches, and to urge them, on that account, to discard our Watches, and recommend theirs instead, and to point out the fact that the public knew but little of the different styles of their Watches, and consequently dealers could make large profits on their movements.
UNDER this pretense of great friendliness for the trade, they sought the indorsement of dealers for their goods, and it was very natural that at least a small portion of the trade should recommend the goods which yielded the largest profits.
IN VIEW of these facts, the AMERICAN WATCH CO., believing the great majority of dealers are perfectly satisfied with their profits on these goods, considering the number sold and the little trouble of selling, would counsel buyers to insist on having WALTHAM WATCHES, which are justly respected, and not allow themselves to be put off with any imitations, either of foreign or domestic make.
For sale by all leading Jewelers.
A descriptive Circular, giving much useful information to watch buyers, furnished on application.
NO WATCHES RETAILED BY THE COMPANY.
ROBBINS & APPLETON,
GENERAL AGENTS, 182 BROADWAY, N.Y.
ASK to see the new FULL-PLATE WATCH, bearing the trade-mark "AMERICAN WATCH CO., Crescent St., Waltham, Mass." It is by far the best Full-Plate Watch made in the United States, and surpasses any thing heretofore made in this country for Railway Engineers, Conductors, &c.

A New Discovery!!
Phalon's
"VITALIA;"
or,
Salvation for the Hair.
For Restoring to Gray Hair its Original Color.
Phalon's "Vitalia" differs utterly from all the "dyes," "colorers," and "restorers" (?) in use. It acts on a totally different principle. It is limpid, fragrant, and perfectly innocuous, precipitates no muddy or flaky matter, requires no shaking up, and communicates no stain to the skin or the linen. No paper curtain is necessary to conceal its turbid appearance, for the simple reason that it is not turbid. It is, to all intents and purposes, a new discovery in Toilet Chemistry.
☞ Phalon's "Vitalia" is warranted to effect a change in the color of the hair within 10 days after the first application, the direction being carefully observed.
IT IS AS CLEAR AS WATER!
AND HAS NO SEDIMENT.
Price, One Dollar per Box,
containing two bottles.
Sold by all Druggists.
If your Druggist has not "Vitalia" on hand, write, enclosing $1.00, and we will forward it immediately.
Phalon & Son,
517 Broadway, N. Y.

English and Foreign Newspapers.
Advertisements received for every Newspaper in Great Britain, India, China, the Colonies, the Continent, and Foreign Countries. Established 1846. References to Bankers and United States Journals.
FREDERIC ALGAR,
8 Clements Lane, Lombard St., London.

Pollak & Son, Manufs of Gentlemen's Morocco Goods. Stores: 119 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 37 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter-Box 3046. Repairing and Boiling also done.

ENGRAVER WANTED.—One who can draw on wood, from models, preferred. Address DEWEY & Co., Publishers SCIENTIFIC PRESS, 509 Pearl St., or BARNES & NEW, 51 John St., N. Y., for particulars.

$732 in 31 DAYS
Made by one Agent, selling Silver's Patent Elastic Brace. Over 80,000 now in use. Recommended by Hon. Horace Greeley and 4 members of Congress. One county reserved for each Agent. C. A. Clegg & Co., 58 Cortlandt St., N.Y., or 176 Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

Stammering
Cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, address SIMPSON & CO., Box 5076, New York.

$20 A DAY to MALE and FEMALE
Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $50. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Gerery Fire Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

TO INVENTORS.
$25,000 PRIZE offered by the Government of India for the best machine. Address, for particulars, T. H. ALEXANDER, Solicitor of American and Foreign Patents, No. 493 7th Street, Washington City, D. C.
N. B.—Send for "Hints to Inventors."

NEXT OF KIN.—Gour's Index to 23,000 advertisements. Price 50 cents.
JOHN HOOPER & CO., No. 41 Park Row, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIV.—No. 695.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE FUNERAL OF GEN. THOMAS.

On the 8th inst. the remains of Major-General GEORGE H. THOMAS, the hero of Mill Spring and Nashville, were buried with appropriate civil and military honors in Oakwood Cemetery, at Troy. The occasion drew together a vast concourse of people desirous of paying the last tribute of respect to one whose services to the Union will ever cause his memory to be held in the highest veneration by his countrymen. The funeral services were held in St. Paul's Church, which was appropriately draped for the occasion. The remains of the lamented soldier, in a metallic burial casket, were deposited on a dais in front of the chancel. A ribbon of immortelles and wreaths of ivy were twined around the edge of the casket in California, and were deposited with it in the grave. As it lay in the chancel an elegant crown of evergreens and roses, surmounted by a cross of immortelles, was placed at the head, and a wreath of japonicas and lilies at the foot of the casket. A plain silver plate bore the simple inscription: "Gen. GEORGE HENRY THOMAS, U. S. Army. Born July 31, 1816. Died March 28, 1870." President GRANT, General SHERMAN, General HOOKER, and many other distinguished men were present to do honor to his memory.

The sketch underneath represents the scene in the cemetery at the moment of depositing the remains in the vault belonging to the family of the deceased soldier's wife. The burial service was read by Bishop DOANE, after which the customary burial salute was fired by the United States Infantry, and the procession left the cemetery, each portion of it wheeling out of line on the return, as it reached its appropriate place. In the evening a funeral oration was delivered, in Dr. BALDWIN'S church, by General STEWART L. WOODFORD, on the life, character, and services of the late General, there having been, at the special request of MRS. THOMAS, no panegyric or eulogy pronounced over the remains.

After a rapid sketch of his military career the orator gave some interesting personal reminiscences of the General, which served to illustrate his character and show the estimate in which he was held by his soldiers. Silent, sedate, never familiar, though always kind, he had none of the petty arts and practiced none of the stage devices that sometimes attract a short-lived popularity. His men had always known him to be thoughtful of their wants and considerate of their comforts. He had never exacted from them useless work. He had never tolerated the slightest evasion of duty, from his brigadiers down to his orderlies. Always, when possible opportunity was afforded, he had visited the regimental hospitals and looked himself after the condition of the sick. Many a hospital steward and company cook in the old Cumberland Army remember the unexpected and personal inspection which the sick-quarters and the company kitchen received from the Major-General himself. And not soon will they forget how once his face hardened into a white heat of passion when he found that a drunken commissary had neglected to provide sufficient food, and how, taking out his penknife, he ripped off the fellow's shoulder-straps, and simply said, "Go home, Sir, by the next train. You may do to feed cattle; you shall not feed my soldiers." His soldiers called him "Old Pap THOMAS." The name was not over-respectful, perhaps; but it fitly expressed the love and fealty of the brave men who followed him from victory to victory. Our hardy volunteers, while as obedient to discipline as they were steady in fight, when off duty and around the camp-fires, retained their democratic habits and their stately personal independence of thought and language. They picked off the shoulder-straps and dissected the uniforms, and looked down below the commission and into the man, and measured his real worth and work with unerring instinct. The judgments they formed of their leaders, expressed in quaint and familiar epithets, have undoubtedly anticipated the graver verdict of the historian.

THE FUNERAL OF GENERAL THOMAS—DEPOSITING THE REMAINS IN OAKWOOD CEMETERY, TROY.—[FROM A SKETCH BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1870.

DICKENS SUPPLEMENT TO HARPER'S WEEKLY.

HARPER & BROTHERS intend to issue with the present number of HARPER'S WEEKLY, and with the next Number, a SUPPLEMENT containing the FIRST MONTHLY PART COMPLETE of

CHARLES DICKENS'S NEW STORY,

THE MYSTERY OF EDWIN DROOD.

WITH

PORTRAIT AND ILLUSTRATIONS.

This Supplement is furnished Gratuitously to the Purchasers of Harper's Weekly.

THE LESSON OF A LIFE.

IF it is pleasant to contemplate the simple, steady, upright character of the late General THOMAS—his silent devotion to duty, his sagacity, his modesty, his tenacity—it is not agreeable to observe the profound and sincere appreciation of that character upon the part of the country. We are a great deal given to rhetoric and extravagant expression, and public men who choose the "sensational" style do not want great applause and troops of admirers. But here was one of the least rhetorical of Americans, and no man could be more truly admired nor more universally honored. Every body felt that the country was stronger because of General THOMAS. The quality that held him "grounding away" at Chickamauga when the rest of the army was in retreat, and the day was supposed to be lost, was precisely the quality which commands the utmost public confidence. Indomitable bravery and good sense, a storm of pretense and bluster, a character steadfast as a rock—these steadied the whole country when it thought of him.

There is this lesson for public men in the career of General THOMAS, and the universal respect and tenderness with which his countrymen have laid him in the grave—that public admiration is surely won by solid and modest merit as by posturing and shouting. He did nothing for effect. He had no newspaper at hand to catch every attitude and every word. He had evidently an antique, soldierly disdain of intriguing for notoriety either in his profession or out of it; and he could hardly have despised any thing more heartily than the conduct of some excellent gentlemen during the war, who did not remain with the staff of newspaper correspondents, and who kept a newspaper reporter always at hand to transmit the heroic and witty remarks at headquarters to an admiring public. Without these appliances and contrivances, without blowing his own trumpet or caring for his reputation, but intent only upon his highest and truest honor, General THOMAS was always at the front of duty; and whether supported or alone, whether the lines advanced or retreated, he stood fast and "pounded away" at the enemy. He was a soldier, indeed; but if some civilians would meditate his career and do likewise, they might be sure of the same respect and regard, if they did their work as he did his.

And the national feeling for General THOMAS has this further and kindred lesson. The conspicuous men, that it shows how catholic the public regard is. It does not require that one man shall deplore another, but only that he shall honestly himself. PLUTARCH says that the young THEMISTOCLES exclaimed that the trophies of MILTIADES would not suffer him to sleep. Many of his had, therefore, aimed to become MILTIADES instead of THEMISTOCLES, PLUTARCH would never have told his story. The public heart is large enough for every kind of excellence. It admires WEBSTER, CLAY, CALHOUN; but the young statesman does not therefore try to model himself upon those men. They did not model themselves upon each other. If the young statesman devotes his powers to the questions of his time with fidelity and industry and the highest purpose, he does all that any statesman can do; and in the degree that those powers are great and well used, not in the degree that they resemble somebody's else, is the measure of public recognition. General THOMAS's career, and the regard of the country for him, are the fullest vindication of the old proverb, often obscure, often unfairly interpreted, but profoundly true, Honesty is the best policy.

THE DAY AFTER THE BATTLE.

THE results of the late political crisis in this State must have been rather inexplicable to the country at large. A body of politicians who were believed to have corrupted the government of the city, and to have grown rich by plundering the people, to whom the frauds in naturalization and the repeating and cheating at the polls were popularly ascribed, who were supposed to scruple at no measure necessary to carry their purpose, and whose name of the "Ring" implied all that is really worst in political management, proposed to the Legislature a charter for the city, for which all its furious opponents within its own party—with one or two exceptions—and all the Republican members, voted. The alleged coalition of ADAMS and CLAY was nothing to this. Every body declared that there was some mysterious "bargain," some profound party finesse, some complicated system of hidden wires, that could alone explain such a result.

The Republicans in the Legislature insist that it was a fair move in the game of politics to offer for a Ring charter for the city, and they justify it in this way. The Democratic party, they say, is the control of the Legislature, and is responsible for legislation. But they were divided into two factions, and it was lawful for us to make the most of the quarrel. Both sides were different to us, and we therefore supported that side whose success would help us most. If we voted with the Ring-wing we should support a new ring, and turned out all our friends, and helped the Democratic party to a victory in the autumn. If we voted with the Reform party—an admirable election law, we abolished the Board of Supervisors, we obtained quiet Sunday, and we virtually abolished the Metropolitan Commission, which is one of the greatest benefits that the party has ever conferred upon the State. Besides this, we accomplished what we separated the division in the enemy's ranks, because the hostility of the "honest" Democracy will be pacified by nothing but the defeat of the Ring. The Republican members, as parties, therefore consider that they have turned the crisis to the utmost advantage for their own friends and principles.

The argument is ingenious, but it is sophistry. It is true that a legislature may do the best he can, but the best he can is always to oppose what he actively disapproves. The Republicans voted against the Ring-Democratic charter, and it was defeated. Had they voted against the Ring charter it could not have been carried. It was, indeed, pointed out that the factions would then unite, but it was not probable. The "honest" Democrats would have felt themselves to be as strong as the Ring. But if there has been a bargain can not be doubted. But in political bargains there is usually a losing side, and it is the side that has the best cause. Moreover, to bargain with the enemy is necessarily to demoralize the spirit of the party. The Republicans have heretofore complain if its principles and candidates of the party are sold by bargains in the city and State. That is why, it is argued, and truly, that the policy of bargaining has the approval of the representatives of the party.

"I must do the best I can," is a phrase which will cover any weakness or treachery. It has never been more widely and unscrupulously made effect than by MR. SEWARD in the Senate when he made his long-expected speech during the secession winter. It was, "I must follow JEFFERSON," said MR. SEWARD, "that in political affairs we can not always do what seems to us absolutely best." It is plausible, but it can be truer. But words are truly interpreted by the circumstances under which they are spoken; and from the moment he said that phrase MR. SEWARD began to lose the sympathy of his own party. It was not, we repeat, because the words were not true, but because they were thought to be uttered at that moment to excuse a weak, halting, unheroic, and therefore fatal policy.

In the present case the Republicans should have kept aloof from both the factions. If what they had always said of the Ring was true, they should not have voted to confirm and extend its power. Neither could they support their opponents, believing that they were not to higher principle, and knowing that the declared object of their movement was the overthrow of the Republican party. "I am between the devil the Frenchman, as he watched the charge of the Light Brigade, "but it is not war." It was not war, they say, of the Republican action, but it was not statesmanship.

A NEW SLAVE-TRADE.

NOTHING has been lately heard of the enterprising MR. KOOPMANSCHOOP—if that was his excellent name—who was busy over here all over the country proposing to open a kind of Chinese slave-trade, against which, of course, we shall presently hear that hopeful proselyte, MR. FERNANDO WOOD, vigorously protesting. MR. KOOPMANSCHOOP—always supposing that to be his name—was for a time the subject of much general subject in the newspapers, and MR. KOOPMANSCHOOP made speeches and was "interviewed," and his opinions were duly published. But we have not heard of any large contracts made with him, nor has the cooly importation to this country yet begun. The Chinese immigrants who arrive in California are not supposed to have suffered much on the voyage. But as the current continues, and as the KOOPMANSCHOOP project may be at any moment ascertained, it is worth while to remark that the cooly trade is but a form of the slave-trade.

The English colonial experience upon this subject should be a warning to us; and we will mention a few facts which it will be worth while to remember whenever the Chinese immigration is mentioned. The cooly trade has been carried on for more than twenty years in the English and other Gulf colonies, and the facts which have been disclosed in regard to it are most melancholy. Rules of many kinds have been laid down by the British Government for the regulation of the traffic. Agents have been appointed to prevent abuses. Abuses have occasionly been drawn to the facts to arouse public interest and indignation. But the great atrocities of the system have not been relieved. Kidnapping and fraud precede embarkation, as in the old Guinea slave-trade, and the horrors of the middle passage, which CLARKSON so forcibly portrayed, seem to be renewed in the suffering of the coolies. This very last winter the Daily Street Sheet arrives with 464 coolies, from Demerara, and arrived with only 364 still living.

The Rev. HENRY CLARKE, who has lived in Jamaica for twenty years, presented a paper two years ago to the Anti-Slavery Conference held in Paris, in which he said: "I know of no cooly immigration to be the most atrocious and cruel form of the slave-trade and slavery that has ever existed, since it is now sought to lure people by fraud than by force, and a slave for life is in a far better position than a slave for a short period, because in the one case it is the owner's interest to care for him when sick, in the other to let him die as soon as possible. No negroes however say that the slaves were ever treated as badly as the coolies."

In Cuba, where negro slavery has existed in its worst forms, the coolies have long been bought and sold like cattle in the open market, and the investigations of those who are peculiarly interested in the subject show that they have been treated accordingly. A Parliamentary Blue-book, published a year or two ago, states that 96,581 Chinese had been imported into Cuba within a period of one year and eight months. And it appears that, of this number, more than 100,000 coolies imported within twenty years, less than 10,000 are now living, and that not more than 100 have returned to their native land.

Of course it is not practicable to obtain exact statistics in such cases; but the general information and tendency may easily be ascertained. In the nature of the case, even with a Kooranschoop, as the importer, the enormous mortality and immense suffering are unavoidable in the transfer across the sea under contract of great numbers of the poorest inhabitants of an overpeopled country, to do the hardest work of another country. And we may well be warned, by no needful use any warning, by the experience of the cooly traffic in the Gulf that the millennium has not arrived, and that care and thought will not be lost if devoted to the possibility or probability of a cooly trade to the United States. Immigration upon fair and just principles is one of the great sources of the prosperity of this country. But a cooly trade, an importation upon the great scale of laborers by contract into a country in half of which slavery has recently been the universal system of labor, should be plainly seen to be a very grave peril.

THE TRUE PRINCIPLE OF PUNISHMENT.

WHILE the law requires that murderers shall be hung, there was no reason that REYNOLDS should escape his doom. His crime was a wanton, cold, homicidal, without the pretense of any kind of extenuation. And yet there is undoubtedly a very general feeling that the object of punishment has not been attained in his case. REYNOLDS was a man utterly friendless and forlorn. He committed a great crime, and the extreme penalty of the law was swiftly followed. Has that fact helped to persuade other men who may be meditating crimes that they will suffer likewise? If not, his execution was a mistake. It has merely shown that where there is no influence, there is no evasion of the law; and the quickness to persecute which is blunted by an act which apparently satisfies the law.

In the long debate upon the reform of the criminal law in England, SIR SAMUEL ROMILLY and his associates made it clear that certainty, not severity, of punishment is the real safety of society. When a score of criminals were "left for execution" by the judge at the assizes—when a desperate girl was hung for stealing a sixpenny loaf to feed her starving children, after the law had impressed her husband into the navy—when the law made almost no distinction in the penalty between the most atrocious crimes and the most excusable offences, the ratio of crimes was steadily increasing. "Strike harder!" cried the dull, indolent public opinion of the time. "Strike wisely," replied ROMILLY and his friends.

There are many murders in New York every year; but it is long since a man was hung for murder until the execution of REYNOLDS. Public morality and order would gain infinitely more if every murderer were punished, even if he were not hung, than if he be tried and convicted and finally escapes. It was found, upon investigation, in England that juries would not convict upon the plainest testimony when they thought the penalty disproportioned to the offense. Consequently not only did laws fall into disrespect, but evidence was deliberately disregarded. And when it is plain, from whatever reason, that the penalty is not enforced even when the crime is proved, the result is the same. There is felt to be an uncertainty in the operations of law which is demoralizing.

There are general truths to which the execution of this hapless man ought to call public attention. There are convicts now lying under sentence, but for some reason execution is delayed. We do not ask for execution, for there may be good reasons for delay; but we do ask for consideration of the fact. If there be reluctance because the punishment is felt even by the Judges and the Executive to be extreme, it is a most significant fact. If there be delay because of "influence," it is still to be considered whether under the same circumstances "influences" could cause punishment if it were less severe and irrevocable. The public demand for the punishment of REAL, for instance, is doubtful and hesitating, because the penalty is the extreme one. If it were something different a pressure might be brought to bear which is now impossible. Such considerations and such facts necessarily suggest the question whether the general feeling in favor of the death-penalty is not such as seriously to imperil public security by making the legal punishment for murder the most uncertain of all.

THE POTOMAC GENERALS.

THE meeting of the Society of the Army of the Potomac in the Philadelphia Academy of Music was one of the finest and most memorable events of the year. GRANT was there, and SHERMAN, and SHERIDAN, and HOOKER, and BURNSIDE, and a score or scores of others well known and beloved. The enthusiasm was unbounded, and was but a faint type of the deep, hearty gratitude of the American people to the Generals who led their armies to victory, and who did all that brave and sagacious men can do. Of course there was an oration and a poem; and of course a banquet, with speeches. How pleasant it would be, after reading SHERMAN, if we could only enjoy ourselves and not make speeches! But there is no unalloyed pleasure, as the old saw has it, and we are warned. The American, like the Englishman, can celebrate his great events only by eating and talking, and he has the sublimest pity for the nations that do otherwise.

The address in the Academy was delivered by General HALLECK, and the poem by MR. BOKER. We merely criticised. The Tribune correspondent said that it was much too long; and certain resolutions, aimed at the author of this article, were laid upon the table by the Society. Indeed it is very hard for an orator to satisfy both his own requirements and those of his hearers upon such an occasion. Its significance seems to him so great that he must not treat it cursorily. It demands careful and elaborate preparation. MR. LINCOLN'S immortal speech at Gettysburg is always compared with the oration by MR. EVERETT, and to his eminent disadvantage of the latter. But if MR. EVERETT had spoken for ten minutes and then sat down, the transatlantic world have been overwhelming. He would have been accused of insulting the country and of desecrating the occasion. If, indeed, he had spoken as MR. LINCOLN spoke, he might wisely have risked the consequences of speaking briefly. But if orators, upon great occasions, are to be limited to fifteen minutes, let it be also understood that they are to speak as MR. LINCOLN spoke.

The resolutions, however, were aimed at the orator not because of the time that he occupied, but of the sentiments that he expressed. They impudently blamed MR. BOKER, the poet, and they pointedly omitted thanking General MARCENDALE, the orator, but requested future orators to avoid politics. Let them talk of the war, said the resolutions, in effect. Let them describe the parade and review and battle. Let them allude cautiously, perhaps, to the Union. But if any orator speaks of the causes of the war, nor applauds and sings the campaign to say that it preserved our glorious Union, let him be ——, or words to that effect. All this is well meant enough, but it is absurd. Suppose there had been a meeting of the Generals of the Army of the Revolution addressed by an orator under injunction to depict the battle of Bunker Hill and the surrender at Yorktown in the most glowing rhetoric he could command, but not to allude to the political doctrine that taxation without representation is tyranny, and not to speak of the independence which the war had achieved. How the country would have rocked and rung with laughter!

The causes and results of the war for the Union are the very legitimate theme of the orator of the Army of the Potomac. He must treat them with common-sense, of course. He must bring to his duty the tact which is always and every where imperative upon those who address others. He must not needlessly offend, nor generally vituperate. But what is his great inspiration but the universal liberty and political equality which the war accomplished, and which have gloriously obliterated the appalling blot that has stained our history from the beginning? Suppose that the war had issued, as possibly the supporters of the resolutions wished, in maintaining the Union with slavery untouched, what kind of oration might we have expected then? Mr. Voorhees, or Mr. Vallandigham, or Mr. Pendleton, or Mr. Wood, might have been the orators. But what generous American heart, even among the officers who would not thank General McClellan, would have burned and thrilled with enthusiasm over a victory that cured slavery more firmly than ever?

It is the misfortune of certain officers that they served in a war which they did not approve. It would not, probably, be difficult to mention several conspicuous military gentlemen who would have marched with great gusto against a rebellion of Yankee abolitionists, but who moved with secret reluctance against a rebellion of slaveholding Southern gentlemen. They know, as well as the rest of us, that halfhearted service is not efficient service. They know also, probably, that politics, of which they complain, were never so influential in the Army of the Potomac, and were never so exacting to the country, as when General M'Clellan was in command. There was a time when it was doubtful whether he would not be made a tyrant by politicians, and his letter from Harrison's Landing was, in every point of view, unpardonable. Surely these gentlemen ought to see that they are not in harmony with the country nor with history. They see that the American Union is now the great source of American liberty. They may regret it. But something must be pardoned to a soldier who has contributed to that result, if he congratulates the fellow-soldiers even with enthusiasm and at some length.

Mr. GLADSTONE AND IRELAND.

The details of Mr. Gladstone's Irish Force bill painfully recall the old English system for Ireland, which was the worst in the world, and the measure seems to postpone indefinitely the fulfilment of the hope that Ireland might at least see the beginning of pacification under a liberal ministry in England — a ministry of which John Bright is part. The difficulty is indeed immense. It is very easy to insist upon a conciliatory policy, and for people to write in newspapers and are active and intelligent, such a policy is most advisable even under adverse circumstances. But what are you to do in dealing with savages? and there seems to be a large savage element in the Irish population. What are you to do with those who not only will not forcibly hit a hard wherever they see it? In Indianapolis it is the utmost necessity that the land be well tilled, and a good system of drainage secured upon it. Individual security is therefore indispensable. It is the first condition. And how can you get peace to begin with among such a distempered people but by the strong hand?

Tide is the reasoning of the English papers. But the difficulty is that this has always been their reasoning, and upon this reasoning the Irish policy has been founded, and the Irish policy has made the Ireland that we know. The progress of civilization, indeed, works vast changes. We do not anticipate under the Force bill of Mr. Gladstone the Irish reign of terror of '94 and '98. But look at the Irish trial before Irishmen of that time truly says that the suspension of the habeas corpus "unlocked the whole people of the kingdom." Mr. Gladstone does not shrink from a similar measure. Under the authority to search for concealed arms the most wanton and unprovoked atrocities were committed—and Mr. Gladstone grants that authority. The press was of course silenced, and the people of course were struck dumb. They could not protest against their oppression. They could not appeal to the conscience and judgment of mankind. They were at once tortured and gagged —and Mr. Gladstone lays his hand upon the press.

Louis Blanc, who is one of the truest friends of liberal England, and one of the shrewdest observers and critics of current affairs, says that the Force bill places Ireland in a state of siege. But it also puts Mr. Gladstone's Government in the same position. The liberal sympathies of the world besieges him. It asks him, "Why is it that with all experience teaching one lesson—why, with Ireland itself the most melancholy monument of the result, do you renew, even in a modified form, the terrible code of '94?" Such a system is a confession of incapacity. What more or worse could the most malignant Tory Government have devised? Indeed what recent Tory Government has for a moment thought of adopting such measures?

It is surprising that there has been no vigorous exposure and denunciation of this bill in Parliament. The occasion was worthy of Disraeli's most fiery invective, and it is hardly possible that even one strong speech recalling and vividly portraying the infamies of the code that made the Irish reign of terror would not have aroused a public feeling that would have affected Parliament. But England seems to be insane whenever Ireland is to be treated, as this country used to be whenever it treated slavery. Nevertheless slavery was our touchstone, as Ireland is England's; and Mr. Gladstone's Government is undergoing its crucial experiment.

PROVING TOO MUCH.

We observe that in the opening argument in defense of M'Farland, his counsel, Mr. Spencer, said that the plea of insanity would be urged. Presently he said substantially that if he had been situated as M'Farland was he should have done the same thing. We do not understand him to mean that if he had been in the same situation he would have been crazed, but that the offense deserved the retribution it received. M'Farland's crime was applauded by the audience; and it is the applause which makes it significant. That an advocate should urge in a jury, in defense of a man charged with murder, that he would be a murderer too under similar circumstances, is not important. It is a kind of plea not unknown. But that the audience should applaud, shows that it is a general feeling.

If it be so, it will be henceforth unnecessary to urge insanity in defense of this kind of homicide. It will be important upon the counsel of the accused only to show the circumstances, and the verdict will necessarily follow. As we write the first trial proceeding, and the argument of the counsel for the Government has yet to be made. But it was hardly well considered in the defense to urge present insanity as an excuse for what, in the judgment of the counsel, was the apology. A crazy man may do any thing. He has drifted beyond reason and conscience. It consequently he may embrace the person whose conduct is alleged to have deranged his intellects as well as broke him. The policy rests on evidence of insanity; and why attempt to show that it is the result of insanity, when, upon the theory, the same result is, and the counsel has just wrath, the more surely he will deal the blow.

In this particular case there has been immense injustice shown by part of the press toward persons who have been associated with the unfortunate man. The public prints, for instance, expressed a hope that the person who really knew most of the facts—that is, the late wife of the prisoner—would tell what she knew; and the paper was immediately branded by another as an apologist for adultery. The trial had not begun; public opinion was already had been proved; but nothing would serve but that the most unhappy of women should be significantly told that she knew what M'Farland did. Mr. Beecher and Mr. Frothingham were assailed as if they had been scoundrels seeking to destroy the reputation of a pure woman. In every word, every act, was tortured into the worst significance. Even the Recorder, in charging the Grand Jury, said that the circumstances of little cheap applause by his covert allusions to Mr. Beecher at a moment when public opinion seemed to condemn him.

We express no opinion, while the trial is yet pending, upon the fact of the homicide. The real question now is whether the evidence than any that will be submitted to the jury. Meanwhile the verdict is undoubtedly anticipated. But let us be just. It shall be decided not that the defendant was insane, which settles nothing except his condition, but if it shall be decided that a man may justifiably do under such circumstances as those alleged, that the counsel may urge insanity, and the jury, in the case of a man charged with murder, that he would be a murderer too under similar circumstances, is not important. It is a kind of plea not unknown. But that the audience should applaud, shows that it is a general feeling.

If it be so, it will be henceforth unnecessary to urge insanity in defense of this kind of homicide. It will be important upon the counsel of the accused only to show the circumstances, and the verdict will necessarily follow. As we write the first trial proceeding, and the argument of the counsel for the Government has yet to be made. But it was hardly well considered in the defense to urge present insanity as an excuse for what, in the judgment of the counsel, was the apology. A crazy man may do any thing. He has drifted beyond reason and conscience. If consequently he may embrace the person whose conduct is alleged to have deranged his intellects as well as broke him, the

IRISH TURF-CARRIERS.

A few years ago it was discovered by some profound English statesman that the true solution of the Irish question was to be found in the peat-bogs of the Green Isle. They were to become mines of wealth, and work the regeneration of that unhappy country. But, though bogs are plentiful, and stacks of peat stand by every cottage door, the desired regeneration is still far out of sight; and the famous cartoon in Punch, representing a jovial well-clad Irishman shoveling peat in at one side of a kiln, while on the other his buxom partner received in her apron a shower of good things in the shape of joints of meat, potatoes, quartern loaves, and candles, remains an unsubstantial dream. There is good stock in the Irish peasantry, which requires only the operation of just laws and the influence of education to give the people the sobriety and industrial thrift which are essential to good order and prosperity. The turf-carriers in the engraving on this page are characteristic types of Irish peasant girls, as well as of that unthrifty sort of industry that always prevails in a country where the working-classes have no hope of ever bettering their condition.

THE DUKE DE MONTPENSIER.

THE Duke De Montpensier, the youngest son of LOUIS PHILIPPE, and a claimant to the Spanish throne, his wife the Infanta LOUISA FERNANDA being sister to the ex-QUEEN ISABELLA, has sprung into an unenviable notoriety by his fatal encounter with his cousin, HENRI DE BOURBON, Infanta of Spain, Duke of Seville, and brother to DON FRANCISCO DE ASSIS, the ex-Queen's consort. For some time before the duel Prince HENRI, a thorough Republican, did every thing in his power publicly to insult and ridicule the Duke, and wrote letters and pamphlets containing such outrageous expressions as are rarely used by a gentleman, even to his most bitter political opponent. The Duke hitherto had apparently disregarded these attacks, although he had several times manifested a desire to fight their author, but had been dissuaded from this by his nephew, the Comte De Paris.

On the 7th of March Don HENRI published in the Madrid journals an article entitled "AUX Montpensieristes," more abusive than any he had yet written. This time the provocation was so great that a challenge was immediately sent, and at once accepted. The seconds of the Duke were Generals CORDOVA and ALAMINOS and Colonel SOLIS. Two Republican Deputies, RUBIO and SANTA MARIA, and an agent of the Bourse, M. ORTIZ, acted for the other side. The preliminaries were easily arranged, the arm chosen being the pistol; the place the little village of ABARCON, a great resort of Spanish duelists. The details and the result of the duel are well known to our readers. If it was fatal to the life of Prince HENRI, it may also be fatal to the pretensions of the Duke, the general opinion in Spain being that he has forfeited every chance of ascending the throne of that country.

THE DUKE DE MONTPENSIER.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

THE Prince Imperial of France, now in his fifteenth year, has put off the knickerbockers and small jacket of his childhood, and assumed the black frock-coat and long trousers and the close shirt-collar of an adult modern gentleman. Rumor speaks well of the youthful Prince, as inheriting the gentleness of his mother, the Empress EUGENIE, with the thoughtfulness of the Emperor, his father. He is said, however, to be more reserved in disposition than most lads of his years. He is fonder of study than of games and exercises in the open air; but he has learned to ride skillfully and boldly. The engraving we present this week, on page 264, shows him mounted on horseback, at the door of that side of the Tuileries where are situated the apartments reserved for his use. He is accompanied by General FROSSARD, his governor, who has the superintendence of his daily life and habits, while another tutor is charged with his literary and scientific instruction.

IRISH TURF-CARRIERS.

THE M'FARLAND TRIAL.

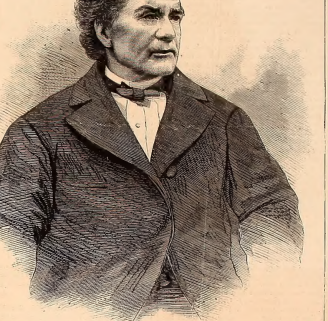
It is many years since a trial in this city has excited such deep and general interest as that of DANIEL M'FARLAND on the charge of having murdered ALBERT D. RICHARDSON, which commenced before Recorder HACKETT on the 6th instant. All the circumstances of the case tended to excite the deepest public interest in the approaching trial. The prisoner's counsel kept their line of defense a profound secret until the trial was actually begun; but it was suspected that the defense would be momentary insanity.

The story of this terrible domestic tragedy is briefly as follows:

DANIEL M'FARLAND was born in Ireland, and came to this country at an early age. Left an orphan at the age of twelve to fight his own way, he rose, by industry and perseverance, to be a member of the bar and a professor in Brandywine College in Delaware. In 1852 he made the acquaintance of the lady who subsequently became his wife. She was young, the daughter of a poor weaver. They were married in 1857, and for some years the course of their domestic life ran smoothly. He had been successful in business, and had acquired considerable property in the West and in this city. But at length affairs took another turn. He became unfortunate, lost his property, and took a position in the Revenue Department.

While on a visit to her early home in New Hampshire, in the summer of 1866, Mrs. M'FARLAND first made the acquaintance of Mr. RICHARDSON, and the acquaintance soon ripened into intimate friendship; and when shortly afterward, for the purpose of earning her own support, she proposed to go upon the stage, Mr. RICHARDSON assisted her in obtaining an engagement at the Winter Garden theatre, where she made her début as Norissa in "The Merchant of Venice." It is alleged by the defense that during this time an unlawful intimacy existed between Mrs. M'FARLAND and Mr. RICHARDSON; that he managed to procure rooms in the house where she and her husband were boarding with their children; that their intimacy was suspected and finally discovered by Mr. M'FARLAND; and that Mr. RICHARDSON persuaded her to leave her husband.

On the 21st of February, 1867, she left home, taking with her their children, who were soon afterward sent to Massachusetts. Mr. M'FARLAND made efforts to discover her and recover the children, without success. He was in the habit of visiting the Tribune office, and one day, while sitting there, a letter was given to him which proved to be from Mr. RICHARDSON to Mrs. M'FARLAND. It is too long to quote entire, and we give only the close:



DANIEL M'FARLAND.—(PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, 839 BROADWAY.)

"I never seek my pillow without wanting to fold you in my arms for a good-night kiss and blessing; and the few months before you can openly be mine will be long enough at best. No grass shall grow under my feet: but I never let public opinion bully me a bit, and never mean to. So, sunbeam, I shall come whenever I can, and stay as long as business will permit. I will decide about the summer just as soon as I can, darling; can probably surmise by Monday or Tuesday.

"Darling, I should be afraid if you had fascinated me in a day or week. The trees which grow in an hour have no deep root. Ours I believe to be no love of an hour or a year, but for all time. Only one love ever grew so slowly into my heart as yours has, and that was so tender and blessed that Heaven needed and took it.

"My darling, you are all I would have you—exactly what I would have you in mind, body, and estate; and my tired heart finds in you infinite rest and riches and sweetness. Good-night, my love, my own, my wife!

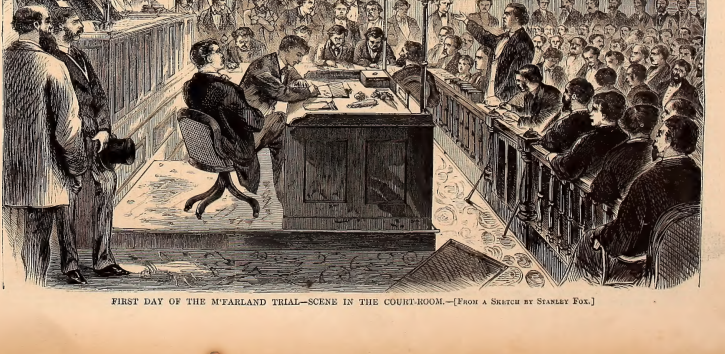
"Burn this, will you not?"

Mr. M'FARLAND, convinced that his wife had left him forever, again sought to recover the custody of his children, but succeeded only in the case of his son PERCY. He afterward heard that a divorce had been procured in Indiana, and that Mr. RICHARDSON was about to marry her.

In a condition of mind which his counsel represent as bordering on insanity, he entered the Tribune office on the afternoon of the 25th of November, and went behind the counter, as he had been in the habit of doing. A short time afterward Mr. RICHARDSON entered, and went up to the counter to receive his mail, directly opposite the place where Mr. M'FARLAND stood, but apparently without perceiving him. The distance between the two men was about four feet. Mr. M'FARLAND, according to the testimony of eye-witnesses, thrust out a pistol and fired at Mr. RICHARDSON; and then, in the confusion that ensued, left the office. He was arrested in the course of the evening, confronted with the wounded man, and identified by him as the one who had shot him.

Mr. RICHARDSON was taken to a room in the Astor House, who e he lingered several days, attended by skillful physicians and carefully nursed by friends, among whom was Mrs. M'FARLAND. When it was no longer doubtful that death would be the result of the wound he had received, he was married, at his own request, to that lady, the ceremony being conducted by Mr. BEECHER and Mr. FROTHINGHAM. A few hours later he died.

Mr. M'FARLAND was formally indicted for murder, and confined in the Tombs to await trial. As the day approached it was evident that great difficulty would be experienced in obtaining a jury, and the number of jurors summoned was unusually large. Three days were consumed in selecting the jury, the defense using the right of challenge very freely. The jury was finally obtained and sworn. The prosecution undertook to prove the killing of Mr. RICHARDSON in the manner narrated above, and there rested its case. On the fourth day Mr. C. S. SPENCER opened for the defense, taking the ground, as above stated, that the act was committed in a moment of temporary insanity.



FIRST DAY OF THE M'FARLAND TRIAL.—SCENE IN THE COURT-ROOM.—[FROM A SKETCH BY STANLEY FOX.]

† Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SEVENTH.

THE WAY OUT.

BENEATH was just over. Blanche, seeing a pleasantly-idle morning before her, proposed to Arnold to take a stroll in the grounds.

The garden was bright with sunshine, and the bride was bright with good-humor. She caught her uncle's eye, looking at her admiringly, and paid him a little compliment in return. "You have no idea," she said, "how nice it is to be back at Ham Farm!"

"I am to understand then," rejoined Sir Patrick, "that I am forgiven for interrupting the honey-moon?"

"You are more than forgiven for interrupting it," said Blanche—"you are thanked. As a married woman," she proceeded, with the air of a matron of at least twenty years' standing, "I have been thinking the subject over, and I have arrived at the conclusion that a honey-moon which takes the form of a tour on the Continent, is one of our national abuses which stands in need of reform. When you are in love with each other (I consider a marriage without love to be no marriage at all), what do you want with the excitements of seeing strange places? Isn't it excitement enough, and isn't it strange enough, to a newly-married woman to see such a total novelty as a husband? What is the use of interesting object on the face of creation to a man in Arnold's position? The Alps? Nonsense, my dear! The most interesting object is the wife. And the proper time for a bridal tour is the time—say ten or a dozen years later—when you are beginning (not to get tired of each other; that's out of the question) but to get a little used and used to each other. Then take your tour to Switzerland—and you give the Alps a chance. A succession of honey-moon trips, in the course of married life—there is my proposal for an improvement on the present state of things! Look into the garden, Arnold; and let us calculate how long it will be before we get weary of each other, and want the beauties of nature for our only company."

Arnold looked appealingly to Sir Patrick. Not a word had passed between them, as yet, on the serious subject of Anne Silvester's letter. Sir Patrick understood the reproachful look, declining the necessary excuses to Blanche.

"Forgive me, dear," he said, "if I ask leave to interfere with your monopoly of Arnold for a little while. I have something to say to him about his property in Scotland. Will you take him with me, if I promise to release him as soon as possible?"

Blanche smiled graciously. "You shall have him as long as you like, uncle. There's your hat," she added, tossing it to her husband. "And I brought it in for you when I got my own. You will find me in the lawn."

She nodded, and went out.

"Let me hear the worst at once, Sir Patrick," Arnold began. "Is it serious? Do you think I am to blame?"

"I will answer your last question first," said Sir Patrick. "Do I think you are to blame? Yes—in this way. You committed an act of unpardonable rashness when you consented to go, as Geoffrey Delamayn's messenger, to Miss Silvester at the inn. Having once placed yourself in that false position, you could hardly have acted, afterward, otherwise than you did. You could not be expected to know the truth—"

"And, as an honorable man, you were bound to keep a secret confided to you, in which the reputation of a woman was concerned. Right. The last and last error in this matter, was the fatal error of involving yourself in responsibilities to which he kneeled exclusively to another man."

"The man had saved my life," pleaded Arnold—"and I believed I was giving service for service to my dearest friend."

"As to your other question," proceeded Sir Patrick. "Do I consider your position to be a serious one? Most assuredly, I do! So long as we are not absolutely certain that Blanche is your lawful wife, the position is more than serious: it is unendurable. I maintain (in my opinion), mind, out of which (thanks to your honorable silence) that unconverted Delamayn contrived to cheat me. I told him, what I now tell you, that your sayings and doings at Craig Ferrie, do not constitute a marriage, according to Scottish law. But," pursued Sir Patrick, holding up a warning forefinger at Arnold, "you have read it in Miss Silvester's letter, and you may now take it from me as a result of my experience, that no individual opinion, in a matter of this kind, is to be trusted to. Of two lawyers, consulted by Miss Silvester at Glasgow, one draws a directly opposite conclusion to mine, and decides that you and she are married. I believe him to be wrong; but, in our situation, we have no other choice than to boldly encounter the view of the case which he represents. In plain English, we must begin by looking the worst in the face."

Arnold twisted the traveling hat which Blanche had thrown to him, nervously, in both hands. "Supposing the worst comes to the worst," he asked, "what will happen?"

Sir Patrick shook his head.

"It is not easy to tell you," he said, "without entering into the legal aspect of the case. I shall only puzzle you if I do that. Suppose we look at the matter in its social bearings—I mean, as it may possibly affect you and Blanche, and your unborn children?"

Arnold gave the hat a further twist with his fingers. "I never thought of the children," he said, with a look of consternation.

"The children may present themselves," returned Sir Patrick, dryly, "for all that. Now listen. It may have occurred to your mind that the plain result of your present position is for you and Miss Silvester, respectively, to affirm what we know to be the truth—namely, that you never had the slightest intention of marrying each other. Beware of founding any hopes on any such remedy as that! If you resolve on it, you reckon without Geoffrey Delamayn. He is interested, remember, in proving you and Miss Silvester to be man and wife. The circumstances may arise—I won't waste time in guessing at them—in which he will be able to produce the person to produce the landlady and the waiter at Craig Ferrie in evidence against you—and to assert that your declaration and Miss Silvester's declaration are the result of collusion between you two. Don't start! Such things have happened before now. Miss Silvester is poor; and Blanche is rich. You may be made to stand in the awkward position of a man who is buying his marriage with a poor woman, in order to establish his marriage with his mistress. Any harvester presumably aiding the fraud, with two strong interests of her own as inducements—the interest of securing the claim to be the wife of a man of rank, and the interest of earning her reward in money for services rendered to him. There is a case which a scoundrel might set up—and with some appearance of truth too—in a court of justice!"

"Surely, the law wouldn't allow him to do that?"

"The law will argue any thing, with any body who will pay the law for the use of its brains and its time. Let the case of Miss Silvester alone now. Delamayn can set the case going, if he likes, without any evidence in the world to back him. He has only to cause a report to reach Blanche's ears which publicly asserts that she is only her brother's wife, and the scandal will do the rest

"And she must tell Lady Lundie we have come back."

"I don't deny it."

"Then what is the objection to her writing?"

Sir Patrick took a pinch of snuff—and pointed with his ivory cane to the bees humming busily about the flower-beds in the sunshine on the autumn morning.

"I'll show you the objection," he said. "Suppose Blanche told one of those inveterately-inquisitive insects that the honey in the flowers happens, through an unexpected accident, to have come to an end—do you think he would take the statement for granted? No. He would plunge head-foremost into the nearest flower, and investigate it for himself."

"Well?" said Arnold.

"Well—there is Blanche in the breakfast-room telling Lady Lundie that the bridal tour happens, through an unexpected accident, to have come to an end. Do you think Lady Lundie is the sort of person to take her statement for granted? Nothing of the sort! Lady Lundie, like the bee, will insist on investigating for herself. How it will end, if she discovers the truth—and what new complications she may not introduce into a matter which, Heaven knows, is complicated enough already—I leave you to imagine. My poor powers of prevision are not equal to it."

Before Arnold could answer, Blanche joined them from the breakfast-room.

"I've done it," she said. "It was an awkward letter to write—and it's a comfort to have it over."

"You have done it, my dear," remarked Sir Patrick, quietly. "And it may be a comfort. But it's not over."

"What do you mean?"

"I think, Blanche, we shall hear from your step-mother by return of post."

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-EIGHTH.

THE NEWS FROM GLASGOW.

This letters to Lady Lundie and to Mr. Crum having been dispatched on Monday, the return of the post might be looked for on Wednesday afternoon at Hom Farm.

Sir Patrick and Arnold held more than one private consultation, during the interval, on the delicate and difficult subject of imparting Blanche to a knowledge of what had happened. The two elder advised; and the inexperienced junior listened. "I trust it," said Sir Patrick, "I could do it." And Arnold thought of it—and left it undone.

Let those who feel inclined to blame him remember that he had only been married a fortnight. It is hard, surely, after that short possession of your wife, to appear before her in the character of an offender on trial—and to find that an angel of retribution has been sent to make the bargain by the liberal destiny which bestowed on you the woman whom you adored.

They were all three at home on the Wednesday afternoon, looking out for the postman.

The correspondence delivered that day exactly as Sir Patrick had foreseen) a letter from Lady Lundie. Further investigations, on the part of interesting subject of the expected news from Glasgow, revealed—nothing. The lawyer had not answered Sir Patrick's inquiry by return of post.

"Is that a bad sign?" asked Blanche.

"It is a sign that something has happened," answered her uncle. "Mr. Crum is possibly expecting to receive some report from Glasgow and is waiting on the chance of being able to communicate it. We must hope, my dear, to-morrow's post."

"Open Lady Lundie's letter in the mean time," said Blanche. "Are you not sure to be you—and not her or?"

There was no doubt about it. Her ladyship's reply was ominously addressed to her ladyship's brother-in-law. "I know what that means," said Blanche, eying her uncle anxiously as he was reading the letter. "If you mention Anne's name you insult my step-mother. I have threatened it freely. Lady Lundie is mortally offended with me."

Rash judgment of youth! A lady who takes a dignified attitude, in a family emergency, is never mortally offended—in a worldly point of view. Lady Lundie took a dignified attitude. "I will know," wrote this estimable and Christian woman, "if I have been all but publicly insulted in the light of an intruder by the family connections of my late beloved husband. But I will gratify prepared to find myself entirely shut out from all domestic confidence, at a time when some serious domestic catastrophe has, it is evidently taken place. I have no desire, dear Sir Patrick, to intrude. Kindly favor me with a line by return of post."

Sir Patrick looked at Arnold; the idea instantly flashing on him that this was the news which Anne had sent.

Sir Patrick gave him a warning look, and picked up the newspaper from the floor.

"I may at least hear the news," said Blanche, and make quite sure that you have missed nothing," she said.

The report to which Blanche had referred was among the paragraphs arranged under the heading of "Fashionable Intelligence." "The fashionable alliance' (the Glasgow journal announced) 'that is pending between Mr. Delamayn, heir of Grey Delamayn and the lovely and accomplished relict of the late Mathew Glenarm, Esq., formerly of this Metropolis.' Mr. Delamayn, we learn, on all probability," he solemnized in Scotland, before the end of the month, and proceeds to the wedding-breakfast, it was intended, "would collect a large and fashionable party at Swanhaven, Cumberland."

Sir Patrick handed the newspaper silently to Arnold. It was plain to any one who knew Anne Silvester's story that those were the words which had found their fatal way to her in her place of rest. The influence that followed seemed to be hardly less clear. But one intelligible object, in the opinion of Sir Patrick, could be at the end of her journey to the north. The deserted woman had rallied the last relics of her old energy—and had started on the journey with the purpose of stopping the marriage of Mrs. Glenarm.

countering a sneer—that the prayers of a lonely woman are offered for the welfare of all?

"Well?" said Blanche.

Sir Patrick folded up the letter, and put it in his pocket.

"You have your step-mother's best wishes, my dear." Having answered in those terms, he bowed to his niece with his best grace, and walked out of the room.

"Do I think it decent," he repeated to himself, as he closed the door, "to leave the widow of the late Mr. Glenarm in the dark? Yes. When a lady's temper is a little ruffled, I think a little more than decent—I think it absolutely desirable, to let that lady have the last word." He went into the library, and dropped his sister-in-law's remonstrance into a box, labeled "Unanswered Letters." Having got rid of it in that way, he hummed his favorite little Scotch air—and put on his hat, and went out to see Arnold in the garden.

Meanwhile, Blanche was not quite satisfied with Sir Patrick's reply. She appealed to her husband. "There is something wrong," she said—"and my uncle believes that I know it."

Arnold could have desired no better opportunity than she had offered him, for making up her mind to the dreaded disclosure to her of the truth. He lifted his eyes to Blanche's face. By an unhappy fatality it was looking charmingly that morning. How would she look if he told her the story of the hiding at the inn? Arnold was still in love with her—and Arnold said nothing.

The next day's post brought not only the anticipated letter from Mr. Crum, but an unexpected Glasgow newspaper as well.

This time Blanche had no reason to complain that her uncle left her in unnecessary ignorance of what was going on. After reading the lawyer's letter, with an interest and agitation of manner which made the contents had taken him by surprise, he handed it to Arnold and his niece. "Bad news," he said. "We must share it together."

After acknowledging the receipt of Sir Patrick's letter of inquiry, Mr. Crum began by stating all that he knew of Miss Silvester's movements—dating from the time when she had left Mrs. Glenarm's Hotel. About a month previously he had received a letter from her informing him that she had found a suitable place of residence in a village near Glasgow—and desiring a strong interest in Miss Silvester, Mr. Crum had visited her some few days afterward. He had satisfied himself that she was lodging with respectable people, and was as comfortably situated as circumstances would permit. For a few weeks he had heard nothing from the lady. At the expiration of that time he had received a letter from her, telling him that she had read something in a Glasgow newspaper, of that day's date, which seriously concerned her. Acting a strong interest in Miss Silvester, Mr. Crum had visited her some few days afterward. He had satisfied himself that she was lodging with respectable people, and was as comfortably situated as circumstances would permit. For a few weeks he had heard nothing from the lady. At the expiration of that time he had received a letter from her, telling him that she had read something in a Glasgow newspaper, of that day's date, which seriously concerned her. Acting on a strong impulse she had resolved to leave her present residence by the next train, and to proceed to Glasgow. She was not sure that she would be able to write again before her arrival. She begged Mr. Crum to take care of any letters or messages which might be left for her. Since the receipt of this communication the lawyer had heard nothing further. He had waited for the morning's post to-day before he could decide what course he had received some further intelligence. The hope had not been realized. He had now stated all that he knew—and there the matter rested. He forwarded a copy of the newspaper alluded to by Miss Silvester, in the chance that the communication of it by Sir Patrick might possibly lead to further discoveries. In conclusion, he pledged himself to write again the moment he had any information to send.

Blanche silently read the newspaper, and opened it. "Let me look!" she said. "I can find what Anne saw here if any body can."

She ran her eye down the proper column after column and page after page—and dropped the newspaper on her lap with a gesture of despair.

"Nothing!" she exclaimed. "Nothing my where, that I can see, to interest Anne. Nothing but an item relating to Mrs. Glenarm's wedding," she went on, brushing the newspaper off her lap to the ground, "and the fashionable party at Swaahaven. Geoffrey Delamayn is going to marry Mrs. Glenarm."

"Have you read Arnold; the idea instantly flashing on him that this was the news which Anne had seen.

Sir Patrick gave him a warning look, and picked up the newspaper from the floor.

"I may at least hear the news," said Blanche, and make quite sure that you have missed nothing," she said.

The report to which Blanche had referred was among the paragraphs arranged under the heading of "Fashionable Intelligence." "The fashionable alliance' (the Glasgow journal announced) 'that is pending between Mr. Delamayn, heir of Grey Delamayn and the lovely and accomplished relict of the late Mathew Glenarm, Esq., formerly of this Metropolis.' Mr. Delamayn, we learn, on all probability," he solemnized in Scotland, before the end of the month, and proceeds to the wedding-breakfast, it was intended, "would collect a large and fashionable party at Swaahaven, Cumberland."

Sir Patrick handed the newspaper silently to Arnold. It was plain to any one who knew Anne Silvester's story that those were the words which had found their fatal way to her in her place of rest. The influence that followed seemed to be hardly less clear. But one intelligible object, in the opinion of Sir Patrick, could be at the end of her journey to the north. The deserted woman had rallied the last relics of her old energy—and had started on the journey with the purpose of stopping the marriage of Mrs. Glenarm.

THE BRETON BLUE-BEARD.

In the ancient Abbey of St. Gildas de Rhuys, in Brittany, may be seen a rude colored print relative to the legend of Comorre, or Conor, the Breton "Blue-beard," in which St. Gildas plays a conspicuous part. The story, as told by Emile Souvestre, is this: Guerech, Count of Vannes, the country of white corn, had a daughter, Triphyna, whom he tenderly loved. One day ambassadors arrived from Comore, a prince of Cornouaille, to demand the hand of Triphyna, demanding her in marriage. Now this caused great distress; for Comore was a giant, and was one of the wickedest of men, held in awe by every one for his cruelty. As a boy, when he went out, his mother used to ring a bell to warn people of his approach. He shot a child in order to prove his gun; and, when unsuccessful in the chase, would let his dogs on the nearest boy to tear them in pieces. But most horrible of all, he had had four wives, and killed them all, each the other, under suspicion of having been killed by either the knife, fire, water, or poison. The Count of Vannes, therefore, refused the ambassadors, and advanced to meet Comore, who was approaching with a powerful army; but he, Gildas went into her oratory, and begged Triphyna would save bloodshed, and consent to the marriage. He gave her a silver ring, which would warn her of any intended evil by turning, in the supreme moment, from white to a leaden hue. The marriage took place with great rejoicings. The first day six thousand guests were invited; on the second as many poor were fed, the bride and the bridegroom serving at table, a page-boy under them. For some time they lived quietly on well. Comorre's nature seemed changed, his prisons were empty, his gibbets untenanted; but Triphyna felt no confidence, and every day went to pray at the tombs of his four wives. At this time there was a great assembly at Nemes of all Breton princes, which Comorre was obliged to attend. Before his departure he gave Triphyna the keys, desiring her to amuse herself in his absence. After five months he unexpectedly returned, and found her occupied in trimming an infant's cap with gold-lace. On seeing her cap Comorre turned pale; and when Triphyna playfully answered, that for the five months he would be a father, he drew back in a rage and rushed out of the room. Triphyna now saw that her ring had turned black, which showed her danger, she knew not why. She descended into the chapel to pray. When she arose she perceived it was midnight, and she saw the four tombs of Comorre's wives open and the dead all standing forth in their winding-sheets. Half dead with fear, Triphyna tried to escape; but the specters cried, "Triphyna, you have lost one hour more to kill you." "I'll save the Countess!" what you will soon become a mother!" "You have told you will soon become a mother!" and, through the Spirit of Evil, he knows that his child will kill him; and so he will kill it." Triphyna, for when we told him what he has just learned from you," "But hope, then, of escape remains for me?" cried Triphyna. "Go back to your chamber," answered the phantoms. "But how escape when Comorre's dog guards the door?" "Give him this poison which killed me," said the first wife, "and you will see how cast a deceived high wall?" "By means of this cord which strangled me," answered the second wife. "But how will guards be overcome?" "By this fire which burned me," replied the third wife. "And how will I make so long a journey?" returned Triphyna. "Take this stick which broke my skull," returned the fourth spectre. Armed with these weapons, Triphyna saw no more of the dog, scales the wall, sees her way through the darkness, and proceeds on her road to Vannes. She swings most morning, Comorre's dog, who is wife fled, and pursues her on horseback. The poor fugitive, seeing he must overtake her, turned off the road and hid herself till night in the cabin of a shepherd, where was only an old negro in charge of the sheep. Comorre, finding her gone up the pursuit, was returning home that road, and he heard the negro engage trying to console her complaints, and calling out, "Poor Triphyna!" He therefore knew his wife had passed that way, and set his dog to follow her track. Meanwhile Triphyna fels she could proceed no further, and lay down on the ground, where she was found by the world a boy of marvelous beauty. As she clasped him to her arms, she saw over her head a golden rain in a silver cup, which she recognised as her father's. The bird came to her and gently sang in the warning tone of his call. She, she told it to fly with to her father. The bird obeyed, and flew with it the lightning to Nemes; but almost at the same instant Comorre arrived. Having parted with her warning ring, Triphyna, who had no means of his approach, had only time to conceal her babe in the cavity of a tree, when Comorre threw himself upon his wife, dragged her with one hand, and smote her head from her body. When the falcon arrived at Nemes, he found the King at council with St. Gildas. He let the ring fall into the silver cup of his master, who, recognizing it, exclaimed, "My daughter is in danger!" Saddle the horses, and let St. Gildas accompany us." Following out of them, they arrived at the cabin where Triphyna lay dead. After they had all knelt in prayer, St. Gildas said to the bird, "Fly, and bring me the head and fly child, and follow us." The dead body obeyed; the bewildered troop followed. But, gallop as fast as they could, the headless body was always in front, carrying the babe in her left hand, and her pale head in the right. In this manner they reached the castle of Comorre. "Count," says St. Gildas, "I bring back your wife such as your wickedness has made her, and thy child such as Heaven has given it thee. Will thou receive them?" Comorre was silent. The Saint three times repeated the question, but no voice returned an answer. Then St. Gildas took the new-born infant from its mother, and placed it on the ground. The child marched along to the edge of the moat, and picking up a handful of earth and throwing it against the castle, exclaimed, "Let the Trinity execute judgment!" At the same instant the towers shook and fell with a great crash; the walls yawned open and the castle sunk, burying Comorre and all his fellow-partners in crime. St. Gildas then replaced Triphyna's head upon her shoulders, laid his hands upon her, and restored her to life, to the great joy of her father.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

TWO Scotchmen, turning the corner of a street very quickly, came into collision. The shock of the latter stunning to one of them. He pulled off his hat, and lying his hand upon his forehead, said: "I am sure my head's a'ringing again." "Nae wonder," said his companion, "I gied it a gude clout wi' my shin; that makes it ring. My head dinna ring a bit." "How could it ring, then, mon," seeing it is cracked?"

TWO Jews in Vienna recently passed an Austrian officer who strutted up and down the street in his uniform, with his sword by his side, swaggering as a peacock. "Ah, Moses," said Isaac, "that officer looks as proud as if he had lost the battle of Solferino all by himself."

A lawyer who was sometimes forgetful, having been engaged to plead the cause of an offender, began by saying: "My lord, before the prisoner at the bar is heard the character of being a most consummate and unblushing villain, I shall immediately employ him in that the prisoner was his client, when he immediately called out: "But what a good man you ever tried who was not calumniated by many of his conscientious?"

"HOW TO PREPARE A GOOSE FOR THE TABLE.—Take your goose quickly by the throat with a sharp carver and kill it, and then break the neck to him as gently as you can. Then pull off his feathers and hair comes round you will find him fully prepared.

The following lines were taken from a young lady's brooch, in which she had engraved, with a diamond, left in church:

"I look in vain—he does not come;
Dear, dear, what shall I do?
I am left alone
Unless he listens too.
He might be here as well as not;
What plagues these fellows are!
I'll look for him
Or smoking a cigar."

Mr. Greeley will write your thoughts in a single book, or, if you do, be careful not to let them lie 'round loose.

SIGNS ENOUGH.—If you want a policeman, it's ten to one you won't find him; but if you don't want him, he is a handful to one he can't get rid of.

When is the wind like a certain fruit?—When it is coconut.

When is it like music?—When it whistles.

When is it like a baby?—When it is a squall.

When like a fruit tree?—When it blows.

When like a person in debt?—When it roams.

When like a newspaper?—When it puffs.

A man was indicted for felony. His innocence was proved, but contributions for his family could not be publicly. The Judge was shocked, and arose and said: "Gentlemen, this is a most extraordinary case you have proven." "Yes," said the foreman, "he is innocent of the crime you charge him with, but he stole my gray mare last Christmas."

A REAL TROPICAL CURIOSITY.—A pair of watermelons.

A young member of the Legislature, who rose to address his constituents on the subject of capital punishment, with a dignified severity of countenance, commenced thus: "Mr. Speaker, the subject of manhood in general are disposed to exercise oppression—to—to—to—(stammering and hesitating). Just at this point, one, who sat immediately behind him, pulled his hat coat tail, and said, in a low, sing, I say: you are coming out of the same hole you just went in at."

"The boy at the head of the class will state what were the dare sons of the world." Boy hesitates, looks down, looks up, looks all round, but won't say. Gets worried. "I guess dare, we're the sons just to be the inventors of gunpowder." "Go to grass!"

They had female voters in Shakespeare's day. Thus:

"And the imperial votress passed on
In maiden meditation fancy free."

NAT M——— was a queer genius. A neighbor found him one day at work at an enormous wood-pile, saw-ing away like a steam engine with an industrious pull saw. "Why don't you sharpen your saw, Nat?" asked the neighbor. "Sharpen my saw!" replied Nat, with great exasperation, "I should think I had work enough to do to saw my wood-pile without stopping to sharpen saws."

Boys are to be bad health; your face is spare," said a friend of ours on meeting an acquaintance. "Very true," was the reply, "for I have a fat family, you are double-faced, so that both of us have spare faces."

CITY RAILROAD CARS.

Never fall, never rise;
Move up, fat men; squeeze in, thin;
Trunks, valises, bundles,
Fill up pass as on sea tumbles.
Market baskets and bundles,
Owners carry, nod in slumber,
Thirty seated, forty standing,
A dozen or more on either landing.
Old man lifts his signal flipper,
Car slacks up, but not a trigger,
Here jerked back, there pushed per shoulder,
Here jerked forward, there pushed per,
Bundles trod on, hats are smashed,
Dresses rudely used, shins crushed.
Tobacco, garlic, cheese, and lager-beer
Perfume the whole compartment.
Old boots, pipes, leather, and tan,
And, if a woman, baby can.
Aren't we jolly? While I stand here
A horse-car hobby with such a dressing!

A member of the Wyoming Legislature, seeking to sustain a point of order, jerked his coat off, with "Mr. Speaker, if some reliable man will hold these duds, I'll teach him that he is out of order." The point was sustained.

"How much water do you put in your milk?" asked a fastidious man of a boy who delivers milk on one of the milk routes. "We don't put any water in it, sir," replied the boy. "What do you put in it, then?" "Ice!" said the candid youth.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL OF FRANCE.—[SEE PAGE 269.]

THE TEMPTATION.—From the Painting by Ary Scheffer.—[See Page 267.]

A DREAM OF SUMMER.

I DREAMED 'twas golden Summer's time,
Although the snow lay deep,
And howling winds and hurricanes
Did through the forests sweep.

The snow-clad plain appeared to me
A mirror clear and bright,
In which I saw the gladdened earth
In verdure's beauty dight.

Dread Frost, the torrent's tyrant king,
Relaxed his icy hold;
And with the stream which he had stilled
His melting sceptre rolled.

The softened sunbeams poured around
A radiance calm and pale;
The scented flowers that gemmed the fields
Breathed odors on the gale.

So in these winters of the soul,
O'erawed by tempests drear,
From Memory's sad and frozen clime
Bright sunny days appear.

Reviving Faith and Hope still show
The soul its living powers,
And how the winter snow conceals
The germs of summer flowers!

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book V.

CHAPTER VIII.

AN AWKWARD ITDEM.

"BUT, I assure you, I suffer unspeakably from nervous depression! You don't know how I sink down like a leaden weight directly the wine sometimes. It is the most dreadful feeling! And besides, I take scarcely any thing. A glass or two of Champagne at dinner is the only thing that keeps me up!"

"It seems to me that the reaction you complain of feeling ought to be sufficient to convince you that even the small quantity of wine you take is far too much harm instead of good."

"Ah, bah! I don't believe you understand the case."

Veronica threw herself back on her chair with the petulsh air of a spoiled child.

Mr. Flew sat opposite to her, very grave, very quiet. He had put aside all her gracious coquettries, and listened with her reason for sending for him in a manner so entirely unexpected by her that for some time she could not credit her senses, but for the opening the moment when he should go back to bring the Mr. Flew of old days. At last, when she found that he persisted in his serious demeanor, she lost her temper, and showed that she had lost it.

But not even this change of mood availed to shake Mr. Flew's steadiness. And gradually a vague fear crept over her. He looked at her so earnestly, with something so like compassion in his eyes! Good God, was she really very ill? Did his professional instinct discern some malady of which she was herself unconscious? Was the weakness and depression of soul from which she did in truth suffer but the precursor of bodily disease, perhaps even of—? She shuddered with a very unaffected terror, and her manner, and archings of the brow, and haughty carvings of the lip and pouty, false grimaces, dropped away from her face like a mask.

"Do you think I am ill?" she asked, with dilated eyes.

"Do not you think so, since you sent for me?"

"Yes, yes; but I mean very ill—seriously ill, you know! You look so strange!"

"I do not think you very well, madam."

"What—is—it?" she asked, faintly. "You must tell me the truth. But there won't be danger. Don't tell me if you think so! It would only frighten me. And of course I know it's all nonsense. I was only mad to see you. You won't you?"

Her self-possession was all gone. The unreasoning terror of disease and death, which she inherited from her mother, had taken hold upon her.

The egotism which enabled her so effectually to resist the sorrows and sufferings of others, beyond a mere transitory movement of dilettante sentiment, made her terribly, exquisitely sensitive to her own.

"Don't be alarmed," said Mr. Flew, gently. "There is no need."

"Why do you look so, then? And speak so? I have never been ill since I was a child—not really ill. It would be too dreadful to be ill now!"

The tears were absolutely in her eyes as she spoke. In the presence of a stranger she might have succeeded in commanding herself more, but with Mr. Flew she did not even attempt to do so.

It pained him greatly to see her tears.

"There is really no cause for your distress," he said. "You are frightening yourself quite needlessly."

"You said I was not well," she answered, in a tone of peevish reproach.

"You have no ailment that a little care and common-sense will not cure. You do not live a healthy life. You do not take sufficient exercise. You were accustomed in your girlhood to walk, and to be out in the open air. There is something febrile and overstrained about you."

"I can't walk. You see that I am easily tired —that I want support. I have no appetite. I am not so strong as I was."

"You will never be stronger unless you shake off the habits of inertness and languor that have crept over you."

"I am not langaid when there is any thing to interest or excite me. But what am I to do when I feel bored to death?"

"Boredom" was not a disease with which Mr. Flew's village practice had made him familiar.

"If you were to get up at six o'clock, and take a walk before breakfast, I am sure you would feel the benefit of it," said he, very simply.

Veronica's pale face grew paler still. A disorder that could be alleviated by getting up and walking out at six o'clock in the morning was evidently, in her opinion, not of an alarming nature.

"My dear Mr. Flew," she said, with a little faint smile, "you are accustomed to prescribe for Shipley constitutions. Now, Shipley people, among other amusing qualities, are famous for robustness; if I were to say rude health, you would think I was malicious. As for me, my violent prostration is as you speak of would simply kill me. Can't you give me something to—keep me up a little? Some—some—what is the proper technicality?—some stimulants—isn't that the word?"

"Fresh air is an excellent stimulant—the best I know."

Veronica looked at his candid, simple face searchingly. She looked once, and withdrew her eyes. Then she looked again, and on the second time she read all hand the tragedy dimming something.

"Let us talk no more of my nonsensical ailments," she said. "I ought to be ashamed of myself for having brought you here to listen to the recital of them."

"No, Veronica—I beg pardon. No; do not say that. I have simply pleased, as wherever you think I can be of use. It would be more to me than, perhaps, you can imagine, to know that I was of real use to you, and that you relied on me."

Her face brightened. This was more like the tone she had expected from her old adorer. Poor little Flew! Yes; she really did like him very much. Also, she was very fond of touching in his humble worship.

She made answer with a soft, liquid, beaming glance of her beautiful eyes: "My dear, good Mr. Flew—we always were good friends in the old days, were we not? Well, I will give you proof once upon a time that I relied on you. I have never had an opportunity of telling you how grateful I was, and am, and always shall be, for your forwarding that letter!"

She held out her perfumed hand to him as she spoke, with a gesture of irresistible grace and spontaneity. She had always had a way of being graceful. He took the slender white hand for an instant, looked at it as though it were some rare flower, and then let it fall, as one might touch might break or injure, and then gently let it go again.

He liked to hear her speak so, to hear her allude to the "old days," and acknowledge so candidly her obligations, regarded the letter he had sent to Maud (the outer cover, with its few words addressed to Lord Ravenscar, inclosed in a little rose-wood box, which was the only repository, except the chest in the surgery containing medicines, that Mr. Flew possessed), as allowed a heart still unspoiled, still capable of generous movements. But he said nothing.

Veronica saw the impression she had made. Without conscious and deliberate duplicity, her mind was always ready to adapt itself, and the tone most of all adapted to win the surgeon's admiration. He was not quite sure whether she was weak, not quite so easily dazzled by tinsel glories, as she had been wont to think him. She had made a mistake in the tone with which she met his princesse" and spoiled child.

Now she was all timid, all candor, all ingenuous confidence. She had suffered much, very much. She had too much pride to appeal to the surgeon's pity or to his regard. To a stranger she presented a front as cold and impassible as their own. She was not prepared for Veronica to be exempt from love of detraction. Her rank! Well, her husband was of her own kindred. Her mother had been a lady. The world knew that her her social elevation did not know that in actual birth she was far superior to many of her ancestors. But all that was of trifling consequence to her. She had married Cesare because he was always kind to her, because he was gracious and really—yes, really—attached to him. No one knew the real facts of her story. Those were between herself and one who was gone forever. If she revealed them the world would understand and believe that she had been cruelly, harshly. No matter. She was incapable of stooping to make a revelation which would place her heart did not value. With a true friend it was different. She had never yet spoken to any one but to this man who was dead to her.

He took his leave in a state of bewilderment, out of which the strongest impression remained, namely, that Veronica Levincourt had been more unhappy than culpable, that her beauty was the basis of her worst and most visible qualities, and that few of her sex would be capable of her magnanimous behavior.

As he stood for an instant, hat in hand, in the doorway, Veronica resolved to put the crowning touch to her endearments.

"Do you know what I mean to do, Mr. Flew?" said she, with a smile of mingled sweetness and melancholy. "I mean to drive over to-morrow afternoon and see your good mother. She must not think I have forgotten her."

Mr. Flew almost staggered. If a reservoir of ice-cold water had been opened above his head he could scarcely have been for the moment more disconcerted.

"Oh, no, no, you mustn't!" he exclaimed, with as hasty an impulse of fright and apprehension as though the Princess de' Barletti had been about to transport herself over his cottage that instant.

"Mustn't!" echoed Veronica, thinking he had misunderstood her. "I must not do what?"

"I don't mean 'must not,' of course. And it is very good and kind of you to think of it. But, I think—I believe—I should advise—in fact, you had better not."

"Why?" demanded Veronica, more puzzled than offended by the unceremonious rejection of her proffered condescension.

"Because—Well—my mother is a dear, good woman. No one ever had a better mother, and I love and respect her with all my heart. But—she is old; and old people are not easily persuaded. She has some notions and prejudices which can not be overcome; and I should be sorry to treat them roughly. I would it were otherwise, but—I think you had better not come to see us."

Veronica understood it all now.

"Poor dear old soul!" said she, with a compassionate smile. "I did not know she had grown too feeble to see people."

"She did not comprehend—she misunderstood my words," said mother," thought Mr. Flew, as he walked slowly and meditatively out of the inn-yard. "Perhaps it is all the better. I would rather she should not know the truth."

Meanwhile, the subject of his reflections was pondering on a sad brows, half-closed, and tightly-closed lips, on the incredible and infuriating circumstance that "that ignorant, lowborn, idiotic woman" should dare to refuse to receive the Princess Cesare de' Barletti!

When Cesare returned that evening from Hamwick Lodge, and gave his wife an account of Lord George's dinner-party, which he said had been unusually pleasant, he appealed to her for enlightenment as to an English phrase which had puzzled him.

"English!" said Veronica, conveying into her voice and manner a skillful mingling of insolence and indifference. "As if I knew whether an Englishman could be unspeakable, and she was by no means in an unspeakable rage. "You don't mean to say that you have spoken English?"

"Yes, I tried!" answered Cesare, simply. "But just now I am trying to learn it well, and so did some of the others. So I was not embarrassed to make myself understood. And, by the bye, Veronica—you, too, like to make progress in my English! Per Bacco, I shall soon be an accomplished Cockney!"

"An accomplished what?—Cockney? How intelligibly about you are, Cesare!"

"Then I will tell you. You spoil one with compliments! But listen: what do they mean when they say that a man was a tight coat?"

"How can I guess what you have in your head? Who says so? I suppose that if any one says so, he means only what the words convey."

"Niente! Not at all! There is another meaning. You shall judge. There was a young man at dinner named Soni. I remembered that I had seen him before. What a comical patronymic! Well, Signor Soni asked me if we had seen much of my friend Miss Dickinson since we had been in this place. He spoke in French. And I told him no; we had not had that pleasure, for she was gone to stay in the house of some friends. Then a man—a great hunter of the Dog, Longwood—he sat by me—he spoke to Soni in English, 'No, no. They took Miss Dickmond out of the way. They did not want her to be seen by me, nor to the princess.' And I—I, too—I can not remember the word, but I know its meaning—"

"Strait-laced?" suggested Veronica, with flashing eyes, and quickly-heaving bosom.

"Strait-laced! Yes. And now what did he mean by saying that the friends in question were tight-laced?"

"He meant—he meant to be insolent, ambitious, and insulting! How could Lord George Ravenscar have invited such a person to his presence?"

"Eh?" exclaimed Cesare, greatly amazed. "I had no idea! I thought it was a jest! Lorgiorgio called out to the man to take some more wine, and he refused. The others did not laugh, it is true," he added, reflectively. "And they looked shy at the word."

"I will not stay another day in this fearful barbarous, boorish den!" cried Veronica. And then she burst into a passion of angry tears.

"Diavolo!" muttered Cesare, staring at her in much consternation. "Explain to me, caramia, what is meant exactly, this accursed tightlacing!"

"I have told you enough," returned Veronica, through her tears. "I don't, for Heaven's sake, desire to tear you to pieces. I can not bear it."

"Listen, Veronica," said Cesare, stroking down his mustache with a quick, little movement which, in a man less strangely suggestive of cruelty, "you must answer me. Ladies do not understand how precious a thing is a good matched chaser of the fox permitted himself an impertinence in my presence at the expense of my wife, I must receive a lesson in good manners."

"Cesare! I hope you have no absurd notion in your head of challenging him!"

"No; I shall merely correct one."

"Cesare! Cesare! you surely are not indulging in any fit of jealousy! Oh, the thing is too ridiculous to be thought of. Entirely contrary to our modern manners and customs—"

"Giuro a Dio!" exclaimed her husband, seizing her wrist, "don't preach to me, but answer, do you hear?"

The sudden explosion of animal fury in his face and voice frightened her so thoroughly that she was for the moment incapable of obeying him.

"Oh, for Heaven's sake, Cesare! Don't look so! You—you startle me. What is it you want?

Oh my poor head, how it throbs! Wait an instant, Cesare. Will—the foolish word means—means —I hardly know what I'm saying—it means strict, proclish, collet-monté. What that man was saying—I dare say he was not quite sober —was that the Shardlowes were too prudish and particular to like Maud to associate with me. There, I have told you. And I'll never forgive you, Cesare, for behaving in this way to me, never!"

Cesare dropped her wrist. "Che, che!" he said. "I let me all? Diamine, it seems to me that the impertinence was to those others, not to you. Is not that the way of proclish and collet-monté? And you cry for that? Women, women, who can understand you?"

Veronica gathered her draperies together and swept out of the room with her face buried in her handkerchief. She told her maid that she had a violent headache. And her maid told Dickinson that she was sure "monsieur and madame" had been having a dreadful quarrel; with announcement Mr. Dickinson received with the profoundly philosophical remark: "Oh! Well, you know, they'll have had to begin some time or other."

And the prince lit a cigar, and leaned out of window to smoke it, partly penitent and partly cross. And as he smoked he could not help liking better very much pleasanter and jollier it had been at Hammick Lodge than it was in the lonely grandeur of the Crown; and how utterly impossible it was to calculate on the capricious and unreasonable temper of his wife.

SUMMER SEVEN.

NUMBER SEVEN is more favored in the world than any other digit. It is true that, in certain conventional sense, Number One is said to occupy more of such man's attention; but, this selfish aspect set aside, the palm must certainly be given in all other respects to Number Seven. In the formation of this number is various explained: Ingpen, in 1624, satisfied himself of the superiority of Seven by reasoning in the following ingenious way: "It is compounded of one and six, two and five, three and four. Now, one is the first being excellent in its perfections (as hath been demonstrated), how can this number be but excellent, since excellent, consisting of them all, and participating, as it were, of all their excellent virtues?" Number Seven was largely used by the Hebrew Biblical writers, as in the plain ordinary sense and in a typical or figurative sense. Seven days formed a week, and the week, there were Jewish feasts or festivals connected with a period of seven weeks; seven times seven years constituted a Jubilee year of rejoicing; the candlestick of Moses had seven branches, and Solomon's temple the usual passages relating in various ways, and at different eras in the Biblical narrative, to the Seven Churches of Asia, the Seven Vials, the Seven Gifts of the Holy Ghost, the Seventh Day of the Creation, the Seven Angels, the Seven Witnesses, etc. The Roman Catholic Church is rich in Sevenfold mysteries, in doctrine and in ritual. There are the Seven Deadly Sins, the Seven Sacraments, the Seven Canonical Hours, the Seven Joys and Seven Sorrows of the Virgin Mary, and the Seven Penitential Psalms. The canonical hours were observed at certain fixed times for divine service in the churches; they divide the ecclesiastical day into seven parts; and, besides having a mystical reference to certain sacred occurrences, they are regarded as symbolizing the seven periods of creation, the seven ages of life in the past man falls, the seven graces of the Holy Spirit, the seven divisions of the Lord's Prayer, and the seven petitions of Seven Sorrows. There is in Lambeth Palace library a manuscript about four centuries old, in which the seven periods of man's life, as marked with the seven periods of nine's life, as follows: morning infancy; midmorning, childhood; midday, youth; mid-day, the haughty age; nones or high noon, the kingly age; midafternoon, elderly; evening, declining. In than at present, a period of seven years' apprenticeship; and many a malefactor has had occasion to know that seven years was a frequent duration for a sentence of transportation. Some years ago there was a Septuagenarian Club proposed, in which every member was to be over times ten years old or upward: all young fellows between sixty-five and seventy entering it simply as cadets. Seven Oaks have, as we know, given a name to a pleasant place in Kent; and Jean Ingelow describes seven oaks growing in a line, at a particular spot in Palestine, associated in the minds of the natives with a very strange legend. When Cain (the legend says) killed his brother Abel, he was punished by being compelled to carry the dead body during the long period of five hundred years, and to bury it in this spot; he planted his staff to mark the spot, and out of this staff grew up the seven oaks.

Who can tell us any thing about the Seven Sisters—the name of seven elder sons of Agamemnon, which have also given their name to the road from thence to Upper Holloway? In Bedwell's "History of Tottenham," written about two hundred and forty years ago, he describes Page Green, by the side of the road from that village, and a group of seven elm-trees in a circle, with a walnut-tree in the centre. He says: "This tree hath this many years been decayed, and it is observed yearely to live and beare leaves, and yet to stand at a stay, that is, to growe neither greater nor higher. This people of the country tell the reason to bee, for that there was one burnt upon that place for the profession of the Gospell." There was also some connecting link between the walnut-tree and the Seven Sisters by which it was surrounded. These were seven elms planted by seven sisters, one by each. The tree planted by the most distinguished of the sisters was always irregular and low in its growth. But now comes another legend of the walnut-tree. There was an eighth sister, who planted an elm in the midst of the other seven; it withered and died when the died, and the walnut-tree grew in its place. But now the walnut-tree is gone, one of the elms is gone, and the others are gradually withering. In Enfield there is a legend connected with a lonely castle on the coast of Kerry, the ruins of which are called the sisters. The lord of the castle was a grim and cruel man, who had seven beautiful daughters. Seven brothers, belonging to a band of Northmen rovers, were cast on that coast, and fell desperately in love with the seven ladies. The romance escape was planned; this being discovered, the heartless parent threw all the seven lovely damsels down a chasm into the sea below the castle. Something more is known about the paradise of bird-cages, that engraving of the three bird-lime, that resort of bird-catchers and bird-buyers, Seven-dials. Evelyn, writing in 1694, said: "I went to see the beautiful Queen's-head, St. Giles's, where seven streets make a star from a Doric pillar placed in the middle of the triangular area." This erection was said to be seven feet square at the top, had seven faces or sides, and seven sun-dials on those seven faces. The seven dials faced seven streets: Great Earl, Little Earl, Great St. Andrew's, Little St. Andrew's, Great White Lion, Little White Lion, and Queen streets. The pillar and its seven dials were removed about three-quarters of a century ago. Were they not taken to Walton-on-Thames, and are they in existence now?

Those friends of our boyish years, the "Seven Champions of Christendom," have been a subject for much learned discussion than boys—even old boys—would suppose. It would seem a daring question to ask whether Shakspere condescended to borrow any of his beautiful language, any of his rich imagery, from this book. Assuredly such a question has been asked. Albert Keightley, author of the "Fairy Mythology," started the subject a few years ago in Notes and Queries. It appears that Richard Johnson, the author of the "Seven Champions," was one of the contemporaries of Shakspere, and that his book was published at about the same time as many of the plays of our great poet. Let us cite three passages pointed out by Mr. Keightley. The Champions say: "As they passed along by the riverside, which, gently running, made a sweet music with the enamelled stones, and seemed to give a gentle kiss to every sedge he overtook in his watery pilgrimage." Compare this with a passage in the Second Act of the "Two Gentlemen of Verona:"

> The current, that with gentle murmur glides,
> Thou know'st, being stopp'd, impatiently doth rage:
> But when his fair course is not hindered,
> He makes sweet music with the enamell'd stones,
> Giving a gentle kiss to every sedge
> He overtakes in his pilgrimage.

The italicised words in the letter show how many are the points of resemblance in the imagery and language. A second passage runs thus: "Where they found the Black Ursin, Death's dun dog advanced in his cheeks." With this compare a passage in the Fifth Act of "Romeo and Juliet:"

> Brenty's eagles yet
> Is crimson in thy lips, and in thy cheeks,
> And Death's pale flag is not advanced there.

Once more: "It seemed indeed that the heavy waggel, as you may behold when Zephyrus with a gentle breath plays with them." Now turn to the Fourth Act of "Cymbeline:"

> As Zephyrus, blowing below the violet,
> Not wagging his sweet head.

We can not go into the critical questions of bibliography involved here; but may simply state that an opinion is held by commentators in favor of Johnson having had precedence of Shakspere in these passages. At any rate, Number Seven is very much honored by such comparisons.

Not the least curious among these associations of Number Seven is that with the seventh son. Whoever has the good fortune to be the father of seven boys, especially if no girl intervene to break the continuity of the series, is to be congratulated forthwith. Let him not talk about too many olive-branches in his garden, or too many arrows in his quiver, or too many little folks around his table: his seventh boy will be a wonder. In the district around Orleans, in France, a seventh son, without a daughter intervening, is called a marcou. His body is (or is supposed by the peasantry to be) marked in some part or other with the fleur-de-lis. If a patient suffering under king's-evil touch the fleur-de-lis, or if the marcou breathe upon him, the malady is cured. Or at least it ought to be cured, under fair faith that it will do so, that the country people will come flocking to him and wish to visit a marcou. About fifteen years ago there was one of these persons named Fouion, a cooper, at Orleans. He was greatly in request for his miraculous healing powers, especially in Holy-Week, and more especially on Good-Friday, when his patients crowded the number of fifty or sixty deep. As to the origin of the name king's-evil, some antiquaries allege the reason to be that kings tells us that "the kings of England and Frannce by a peculiar gift cure the king's-evil by touching them with their hands on the day of the seventh sonne." It is something to say that a seventh son, in Malta, is born to be not a king, but a knight. Mr. Keightley has found among the Welsh folk-lore an account of a family famous in its day. "Jones the Gelert" was said to have lived at a place called Mudcil. In them was said to have existed seven brothers, each with a seventh son, or Septimus, being born for the healing art; as for many generations seven sons were regularly born in the family. The seventh son, when he became the doctor, and wonderful in his proficiency." Steele speaks of his father as having had a half age, in sarcastic relation to another of the troubles with which men are occasionally afflicted: "Upstart, new-fashioned nobility is the cure the king's-evil, but his rascally descendants have it from heaven." Shakspere describes Edward as by a touch upon the shoulder give a man such an ill habit of body that he can never come within a tailor's hands.

But if there happen to be a seventh son of a seventh son, the circumstance is considered marvelous. Mr. Carleton, in his story of the Black Prophet, says that the Irish peasantry entertain a very unbelieving feeling for the luck of these powers. In Cornwall the belief is, in like manner, prevalent. Of the child being that the gifted person should then overlie newly born and affected, thrice blow on it, and repeat certain words. A Belgian record of a seventh son of a man was regularly called Dr. So-and-so, simply because he was the seventh son of a seventh son, and without relation to his name in baptism. Early in the present century a man perambulated the rural districts of Germany, and was known by the sick, and the lame. Numerous cures were attributed to him, and he had quite a large collection of crutches and walking-sticks, said to have been left by his patients who had no longer any need for them. Even in Russia the superstition of how much due to the implicit faith placed in him by the ignorant, it might have been difficult to decide; but he was held in great repute as a specialist on account of his claim to be the seventh son of a seventh son. Through, not very long ago, was to be seen this inscription on a board:

> A. SAPUNOFF,
> The third seventh daughter,
> Accoucheur.

A Yorkshire lad at a school was purposely intended to study afterward for the medical profession, because, as he said, he was a "seventh son." "The seventh of the seventh make the biggest o' fools." Another story is told of a lad in Kent who, as an errand-boy, was frequently censured for being late in his arrival, and dilatory when on his errands. His excuse was invariably that the following form: "I'm sure I wouldn't help it, Sir, I'm sure I wouldn't. I've only bin on an act o' mercy. Ye see, Sir, I'm a seventh of a seventh, an' I touches for sickness, Sir, an' I've got a midder thin message to-day, Sir, I have." It appeared that he had to touch fasting, in order that his wonderful powers might be called into exposed, and his palm was crossed by a piece of silver varying in value from a four-penny piece to half-a-crown, according to the social condition of his patients.

ARY SCHEFFER'S "TEMPTATION."

ARY SCHEFFER, of whose celebrated painting of the "Temptation" the poems of Goethe, Byron, and Dante, and SCHEFFER was at once the pupil and favorite of Queen Hortense, and of many of the most distinguished artists of Romantic School, and many of his earlier works were suggested by poems of Goethe, Byron, Uhland, and other German authors; but his greatest and most characteristic works are those devoted to religious subjects, or suggested by the poetry of DANTE. Among his religious pictures the most widely known are "Christ Consoling the Weary and Heavy-Laden" (Christus Consolator), the "Dead Christ," the "Mater Dolorosa," "The Temptation," and the "Three Marys." His picture of DANTE AND VIRGIL meeting with FRANCESCA DA RIMINI and her lover in hell is one of the most pathetic creations of the imagination ever painted. This picture, and his "Dante and Beatrice," and the illustrations to "Faust," are widely known by engravings. ARY SCHEFFER was at one time Instructor of the children of Louis Philippe. He died in Paris in the summer of 1858.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A BURMESE years hence somebody will offer a valuable relic of 1870 to our great-grandchildren! It is said that before the ink of the Fifteenth Amendment Proclamation was dry, General Grant received a note from a member of the press asking for the pen. It was sent immediately, and when the messenger left the autocrat he was offered fifty dollars for it.

The St. Louis Times reports that more than fifty of the workmen laboring in the caissons of the St. Louis bridge have been stricken with partial paralysis, and four have died, from the effect of the compressed air. This is an instance of paralysis which has attracted considerable inquiry among scientific men. Some suppose that the compressed air is to blame, others that it is occasioned by any one of strictly temperate habits who followed the sanitary regulations established by the engineer.

This is the way Kansas jories lunch. A farmer in that region, who sold a keg of butter to a store-keeper, happened to mention that he had a prime article. A lately send by the latter, who declared that the farmer's statement concerning the quality of the butter was incorrect. On the occasion of the trial the jury took their lunch (which was to court) then; when they went out to deliberate. Some crackers were procured, and the jury then ate, they all "pitched in," and after amply satisfying the wants of the inner man they returned to the court-room and rendered a verdict of no cause of action.

A correspondent of the Evening Post, having, in passages across the Atlantic, been impressed with the inadequate means of safety on our steamers, and with the decidedly suggested several points of reform in this matter, which it is hoped will lead to other suggestions, and result in some practical improvement. In view of the small supply of boats frequently carried, he suggests that they should be made in the long, in number instead of eight, these to be of different sizes, and of such shape and use which may suggest itself to each, but every ship carry at least two life-preservers which shall be of such construction that they can be carried, set a regulation number be carried in the steerage. Third, that every ship be provided with a few tubes about three inches in diameter, about three feet long, weighted with lead at the bottom sufficient to cause them to float upright in the water, corked. These should be painted bright red, so as to be easily seen by night. In case of accident, they should be cast inclined in them and thrown overboard, we might be the means of saving the lives of numerous passengers which "maketh the heart sick." Fourth, a few ordinary lifeboats are useful. Fifth, an improvement in passage would lengthen the voyage from twelve to twenty-four hours: but thereby fogs on the banks and ice would be avoided, and the worst of the gale would be the sea greatly lessened. Certainly, in view of a season like the present record of an unusual number of ocean disasters, it is doing that the public should awake to a sense of responsibility in this matter, and the necessity of ample precautions in every case.

The gate-keeper of one of the Paris cemeteries detected a young lady in attempting to enter the cemetery with a small basket on her arm. The gate-keeper pronounced it a case of infanticide, and the trembling culprit was marched off to the police-station. Another brace of policemen, who, on officially opening the basket, were astounded on finding that it contained the dead body of a sweet little Havana dog!

Some queer cases of smuggling are detected by the directors of customs at Cantz Garden, Java. One day a steerage passenger in one of the German steamers brought as baggage three large cases which he represented to contain specimens of natural history, minerals and other articles of no consequence. Upon opening one of the cases a fine stuffed ape was visible enough. At the bottom of this case was an immense Linlinger stone, and the contents of the case had been packed with bags of prime brandy, surrounded with prunes and dried figs. The second case was found to be similarly filled with grape-vines and peach and pear-tree scions. A woman who observed a sudden rather severely as she came from a steamer one day last week, and she was accordingly invited into the bonder of the Double Imperial. When the examination of her various pieces of clothing was made, it was found that the bonder's suspicions were correct. At the same time the passier of a woman was observed to be quite unusually stout. Upon a closer inspection the stoutness was found to be stuffed with fifty yards of costly silk. The woman was also confined in the same room, and found two whole pieces of silk, while in the legs of her pantaloons were stowed several yards of valuable ribbon.

A pretty cottage for President Grant is nearly stabled a Long Branch, and is already known as "The White House." It is situated on the ocean-front, and the Sixteen House to the new race-course, which is to be called President's Avenue.

Statistics show that in Europe frequency of suicide, in all countries, increases and decreases with the length of the days. In June and July there are more suicides than in any other months. So far as American statistics have been collected on this subject, it is generally supposed to agree with the European. It is thought from facts gathered that in New England suicides have been more frequent in cold weather. It is stated that in every country three-fourths of all the suicides are men, and that the disposition to commit suicide increases with years. The proportion of unmarried persons who kill themselves is decidedly greater than that of the married; the proportion of widowed persons is far larger still: but that of the divorced and separated is incomparably the largest of all, being uniformly five times as great as that of the married.

An exchange remarks: "Maple-sugar, you know, is made by grinding up maple-trees, and squeezing out the juice in a cheese press?"

No less than forty distinct plans of Broadway itself have been laid before the Legislature of New York. These are all varieties of three general kinds—surface, super-surface, and sub-surface.

Some very private details concerning a "private" ball in Paris have just come to light. There were, by-the-way, 11,000 persons invited to this ball, but only 9500 responded! But the "private" details relate to the costumes of the ladies—dresses, jewelry, coiffures, etc., worn on the occasion—the total amount being 1,114,732 francs. It was estimated that the false hair worn weighed thirteen hundred pounds, and that if each lady's length it would reach two and a half miles! These details of the private ball must of course be considered strictly "private."

The following anecdote is related concerning Richard Wagner, or perhaps, more strictly, concerning Offenbach. Wagner had read to Offenbach, who is of the Jewish persuasion, his work entitled "Le Rheingau des Juifs dans la Musique." In reply the latter wrote: "Dear Wagner, you will do better to write music." On receiving this letter the other forwarded the score of his "Meistersinger," which, when the first days, the following answer was returned: "Dear Wagner, on reflection, you will do better, I think, to continue writing books."

Nearly seven hundred citizens of New York were subpœnaed in order to find a jury of twelve men who had not formed a decided opinion in regard to the M'Farland case, and were of sufficient intelligence to render a verdict. It will be seen how exceedingly difficult to find men who do not read newspapers, or who are not conversant on the prevailing topics matters of general notoriety. And yet reading newspapers seems to be decreasing. Circulations are not at present writing books."

An "up-town" physician, who has been in the habit of writing his medical prescriptions in an unusual and blind manner, so that they could be read by no one excepting a particular druggist to whom he has got into difficulty. A man died the other day from the effect of an overdose of morphine taken by his order. When the narcotic began to produce alarming symptoms the physician called upon the man that was by the druggist who had put up the prescription, requesting to know what he had given the man to induce dotes to give. Druggist's clerk refused the copy until it was demanded by the police. Even then he refused to explain the blind writing, but brought told the man was dying. When at length the physician was seen by the druggist's clerk, called it was too late to save the man. Such was the consequences of writing prescriptions contrary to the usual and well-known nomenclature.

"Dickinson Hall" at Princeton, New Jersey, is now nearly locked, and will be ready for occupancy next college year. It will cost about $70,000, and is built mainly by the liberality of John C. Green, a retired merchant of New York. It has ample provision for recitation and lecture rooms. The present recitation rooms are widely inadequate and rudely finished. The new gymnasium is one of the finest in the country, and is to be fitted up by Dr. Dudley Sargent of Mr. Bonner of New York and Mr. Maguire of Philadelphia. Arrangements are being made to erect an elegant dormitory sufficient to accommodate about seventy students.

Ellis Burritt estimates the waste of peas, tea, paper, tobacco, and rice in the city of New York by the use of the letter "t" in words from the Latin—each a labour, favour—where it is not needed, at £10,000 a year.

The prohibitory liquor law of Michigan does not repeal alcoholic liquor as "poison," but it does sign a woman in that State received all the money her husband had spent at a saloon for six years, on the ground that the liquor was sold to the husband "without consideration." It is well for women to understand something of law.

A comic accident—which might have been a fearful one—is reported from Maine. A farmer, quietly crossing the railroad track near Portland, was startled suddenly by the appearance of a train, which quickly made splinters of the cart. The astonished farmer, recovering somewhat, stood gazing at the remnants of his vehicle, and wondering where the pieces of his horse had gone to, when the train came to a sudden standstill, when the engineer, looking out, saw the horse staring at him from the cow-catcher. The train was stopped, and it was found that the horse had been picked up by the cow-catcher and projected on the platform in front of the engine, where, too much stunned or frightened to move, he lay comparatively uninjured.

Mademoiselle Rosa Bonheur, whose fame as an artist is world-wide, was born at Bordeaux, March 21, 1823. She is therefore forty-eight years old. Her father was a painter of animals, and it was from her custom, both in France and in other countries, to visit the slaughter-houses and study the animals there with the decided character of her features, enables her perfectly to draw and paint them, and at a greater length than she could otherwise hope to do. An anecdote may be here be set down to the effect that she was put to the use of the many animals that she has always about her. She has always avowed her intention of never marrying, but to live entirely exclusively to art. Years ago, when she had few opportunities of studying the habits of animals she went to Paris, as her enthusiasm led her to walk the streets of Paris for hours to observe animals that had caught her eye. She even visited slaughter-houses in search of work for her pencil.

It is said to be the intention of Miss Mercedel to receive into the horticultural school at Brentwood, Long Island, lads from fourteen to eighteen years of age. These boys will share alike with the female pupils in the domestic duties of the establishment, and they will be carefully instructed in their out-of-door occupations.

M. Sollel, chief cashier of the Bank of France, and who in that capacity signed all its notes, has recently died.

A Western medical journal seems to intimate that the remedy, chloral hydrate, is nothing new, after all, but the very drug that Shakspere's Friar gave Juliet:

> Take thou this phial, being then in bed,
> And this distilled liquor drink thou off:
> When presently through all thy veins shall run
> A cold and drowsy humour; for no pulse
> Each vital spirit.
> And in this borrow'd likeness of shrunk death
> Thou shalt remain full two-and-forty hours,
> And then awake as from a pleasant sleep."

What will not yet be accomplished by electricity? A machine has been recently invented which, if it works as well on a large scale as it does as now applied, will enable steamships to ply the ocean by its propelling power. We understand that a machine of great capacity is being constructed, and will soon be put in operation in New York. The smaller size will be slightly enough to carry a Crusader to Liverpool, can be secured in a small trunk.

DRAWING FROM LIFE.—[See Page 269.]

FURNISHING VACCINE MATTER TO COUNTRY DOCTORS

especially among the ladies, a fact which he attributes to their vanity and fear of being disfigured! For though it is told of a beautiful Frenchwoman that hearing of the suicide of a gentleman whose suit had been rejected by a woman who was quite the reverse of beautiful, she exclaimed, "I am really jealous of a homely woman who can excite a passion like that!" it would not be safe to accept her word for truth in the guise of a jest. Young and old are vaccinated and re-vaccinated. The municipal authorities of Paris have granted a large sum for the purpose of organizing a bureau for gratuitous vaccination; and every day, from the 2d of March until every one has been attended to, thousands of arms are presented to the doctor's lance in every ward of the city. The utmost care is exercised in obtaining the vaccine matter from a heifer selected by the medical authorities, by whom it is distributed to country physicians.

Recently attempts have been made in England and this country to prove that, so far from being a benefit to the human race, vaccination has been a worse scourge than the plague it is intended to prevent, and that it has brought in its train the most terrible consequences, in the form of scrofula and other diseases; but the weight of evidence and medical authority is in favor of the means of prevention first brought to light by Dr. Jenner and the unknown pastor of Cévennes.

SOLDIERS' CHILDREN WAITING TO BE VACCINATED.

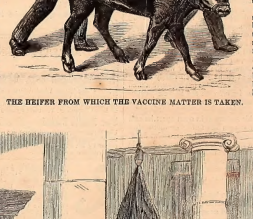
DRAWING FROM LIFE.

This pleasant picture, which our readers will find on page 268, engraved from a painting by Mr. T. Hedderson, an English artist of considerable talent and well-founded reputation as a genre painter, tells its simple story in an appropriately unpretending way. The young artist appears to be pursuing his studies under very agreeable conditions. He has his cottage-studio all to himself; there are no rivals or competitors to distract him; his knees save him the embarrassment of an easel; his slate and pencil render him independent of the artists' colormen; above all, his model seems to be posed quite naturally, and to be displaying exemplary patience. Well may the embryo artist become wholly absorbed in his task under conditions such as these! And if the immediate result may not be commensurate with the effort—if the portrait of Grimalkin should not turn out to be a master-piece—still the art of even a Landseer must have had an equally humble beginning.

VACCINATION AT PARIS.

The ravages of that terrible scourge, the small-pox, date far back in the early history of the world. During the Middle Ages it slew more than the sword; and it was not until near the close of the eighteenth century that its virulence received a partial check through the discovery and general introduction of vaccination. The honor of this discovery is usually ascribed to Dr. Jenner, an English physician, by whom it was publicly made known in 1796; but the French claim it for one of their own countrymen, a simple Protestant clergyman of Cévennes, who, several years before Jenner's discovery was announced, practiced vaccination among the peasantry of that mountain district. While Jenner was rewarded by a national grant of £20,000, and after death was honored with a statue in the cathedral of Gloucester, the French pastor died in poverty and obscurity, and his very name is forgotten.

But whoever may claim the honor of the discovery, vaccination has unquestionably been of immense benefit to humanity. Since its general introduction the ravages of small-pox have sensibly diminished, and in cities where it once raged as a terrible epidemic, sweeping off hundreds and thousands of victims, it is now comparatively unknown. On the continent of Europe vaccination is made compulsory by law, and is far more rigidly enforced than in England or this country. Our illustrations on this page will give our readers an idea of the way in which it is managed in France. There, says a lively French journalist, it is all the rage,



THE HEIFER FROM WHICH THE VACCINE MATTER IS TAKEN.

THE CARNEGIES.

The elder Carnegie was the porter of the Dennistown Bank; and as Dennistown was the county town, and this the only bank, it followed that Roderick Carnegie, having been porter for fifteen years, and always faithful to his duties, was considered to hold a rather responsible position, and was respected accordingly.

It was an old country bank, and the safe was an antiquated specimen of rusty iron-work; but, though all the farmers round about deposited their funds there after harvest, no one thought of questioning the safety of the bank, any more than they would have doubted the medical skill of old Doctor Hyslop, who doctored every body within a circuit of twenty miles, and whose gray pony and battered chaise were as familiarly known as the steeple of the Baptist church.

So when, one morning, the town was informed that the bank safe had been broken open and robbed of gold and silver and bank-notes to the amount of—well, the amount was not settled on for a week, and then turned out to be about twenty thousand dollars—the towns-people, and pretty soon the county farmers, thought the world must be coming to an end.

And so, when rumors began to be circulated—which they did—concerning some connection of Roderick Carnegie with the robbery, people were not so much horror-stricken as they should have been, because that they had exhausted all their capacity in that line on learning of the first catastrophe.

The story finally settled down to this statement: The paying-teller of the bank, who lived opposite, was called upon by Mrs. Carnegie at about nine o'clock on the night of the robbery, and informed by her—the being in great distress at the time—that her husband was either dead or in a fit, the safe open, and the side-door of the bank likewise open.

GENERAL VACCINATION-DAY AT THE PARIS ACADEMY OF MEDICINE.

The teller repaired at once to the bank, and found things in precisely that condition, with the additional incident that the safe had evidently been despoiled of its entire contents, in so far as they included money.

Roderick Carnegie was found lying at the foot of the stairs, in the basement entry, near his own room—the Carnegie family occupied apartments in the basement of the bank. Beside him was a small empty bottle, and in his right hand he clutched a bag, containing a certain sum which had been deposited in the safe that afternoon by the teller.

Dr. Hyslop, being called in, made an examination of the prostrate porter, and announced that he was dead—drugged, and that a powerful one he had contained brandy. So Roderick Carnegie was lifted to the bed in his room, and there remained moaning and groaning, as it usual in such cases, until the next morning.

Then he awoke from his drugged, and looked about in a dazed sort of way, and finally, observing his wife, who sat near the head of his bed, some memory of the night's events, and of his muddled brains, and he buried his face in his pillow, and sobbed convulsively.

Mrs. Carnegie was a wise woman, and, refraining from any remarks on his condition or on the events of the night, she merely said, as if as she could, the unhappy man, and finally, when he became fitfully tranquil, helped him to get his clothe himself, that he might be prepared for the inquisition which she knew must shortly follow.

But even a woman's curiosity must be satisfied some time; and Mrs. Carnegie was only a woman, after all. So, when Roderick's toilet was over and shaved himself, and had swallowed his tea and taken a bite of something—though very little, for he evidently ate with the effort of without appetite, she said to him, "And now, Roderick, tell me all about it."

But to her utter astonishment Roderick replied, "Ask me no questions, wife, for I've nothing to tell—nothing for you or any one but myself—not if I swings for it!"

Here was a condition of things! Found drunk in the entry, with a bag of the bank's money in his hand, the safe broken open, and the rest of the money gone, nobody but he could have done, and he with "nothing to tell about it." She shouted her sense of injury.

But such was the fact, and the most stubborn of facts it proved to be: for when Roderick Carnegie was examined by the police officials he utterly refused to make any statement whatever, simply saying, "I know nothing about it—ye've known me here for fifteen year, an' I come to ye with a good recommend, an' if ye think I done it, why there's no help."

So, as nothing else could be wrung from him, either by coaxing or threatening, the bank officials had to yield to the natural clamor of the depositors, and Roderick Carnegie was duly arrested and imprisoned, charged with the crime.

He could not be tried for a month, as the county court would not sit until then, so there was ample time to canvass the matter in all its bearings. Ins and outs, as it was canvassed in every house in the county.

The most astonishing feature was that Roderick Carnegie, whose head was full of rum and stone, and who never took more than his drop of whisky-toddy before going to bed, should have been laid out by about a gill of brandy—which was all the little bottle would hold.

But that never been seen drunk during his residence in Dennistown; and as a hard-headed Scotchman, and canny withal, would have scouted the possibility.

That he must know the perpetrators of the crime was always yet what puzzled the reason could he have had for screening them at his own expense.

Finally, popular opinion reached the conclusion that the porter had committed the robbery, with the assistance of confederates; that he was somehow been overcome by the liquor he drank, and that they had left him to make good their own escape as well as he remained unconscious, in the belief that his previous good character and the want of proof would clear him, and he would still share the booty. So it was concluded that he was an unmitigated rascal after all, and every man's hand and every mouth was ever against him; and the women were the loudest and most violent of all, as is usually in such cases made and provided. All but Mrs. Carnegie; she, poor creature, stood by him, and trusted him to the last. She had troubles in and the little bag of gold clutched in his hand—and in the face too, of what was being said of him by the solute and unflinching determination of Roderick not to clear his confidence.

Roderick Carnegie's family comprised, besides his wife, two buxom daughters, respectively eighteen and twenty years of age, who had hitherto been made much of by the Dennistown people, as they were pretty, well-behaved, and intelligent girls, and decided accession to the parties, picnics, and other merry-makings of the neighborhood. But now they received the cold shoulder from all directions, and were completely cut by the "mere" gods and rigidly righteous" ones of Dennistown. This was a sad blow, and their father's moody reticence and the suspicion that clung about him like a winding-sheet still more bitter.

And so for this unhappy family the days were long and dreary that separated them from the trial, when, they fondly hoped, something might happen to change Roderick Carnegie's determination, or that Providence might interfere to restore them to their former position of acknowledged probity and worth. The day of the trial came, and every body in the county could possibly accomplish it was at the court-house.

The prisoner pleaded "not guilty," which made the spectators laugh; and his lawyer—the court provided him with one—pleaded his previous good character, which made the spectators hiss, and caused the crier to shout "Silence!" in a loud voice; and then every body laughed again, because the crier was a bossing scalawag whom every body knew, and who was public game.

And after all was said and done, and the interpretation of counsel, and all the other trivialities of such trials had been duly accomplished, the jury—as a matter of course—went into secret consultation in whispers the foreman rose, and, pronouncing their verdict, they require to go out, presented the verdict of "guilty."

It was silent enough then. The proverbial pin of a pin-dropped could have been heard in the raving rumuser.

Then, almost at that moment some more tender and compassionate impulse influenced that mass of beings, greed for the punishment of Roderick Carnegie, and they began to whisper, stolen their idol—their hard-earned money.

Perhaps women were the most merciful, for women are those who they saw the stricken wife and daughters as they bowed their heads, and some said as shame.

However this may be it was very still, until the solemn voice of the judge broke, and some that shouted out, "You fool! he's guilty, is he? Why, I lost the money, and knocked the old man down and robbed him myself, and he knows and he hung on to the other bag precious hard, I tell you, and I'm glad it was not taken from fools! What's the use of men being honest if that's all the confidence you have in 'em? Here, you crier, you go and tell the old man we've busted your old rusty money-box; and I wouldn't be likkers on your life, and I'm glad he's convicted would 'a got him off;" but you see he's my father an' I couldn't go back on the old man.

Then there was commotion and hubbub every where, and the judge and jury were surrounded by anxious and tender and sympering friends. They were glad, now, to be sympathetic.

They had heard of a brother, who had disgraced them, but was long since dead; but they had no sympathy.

Meanwhile the new prisoner had been handcuffed and locked in a cell under the court-house—every body looked for Roderick Carnegie; and they found him doubled up on the floor, just where he had dropped when he heard the son's voice, and where, in the intense excitement produced by the trial, he had left the new character in the drama, he had lain forgotten.

He was lifted up tenderly now, however, and kindly cared for by the jailer's wife.

Roderick Carnegie the younger was tried for the burglary of the safe to make up nearly all the money, and on account of his having surrendered himself, he was let off with the lightest punishment—imprisonment for a few months in the State prison.

In making his statement in open court he said that he had not seen his father or mother for twenty years, and that they believed him dead. He had been a sailor before the mast, a miner in Australia, a lumberman in Maine, and, finally, was traveling round the coast, and passing through Dennistown, when he encountered his father standing in the doorway of the bank, and had recognized him.

He had gone to the bank on the night of the robbery, and simply opened the door; and, being an expert burglar, had no trouble with the safe. That he had been surprised by his father, and had made himself known to him. That his father stowed away all the money except one bag of gold, which the old man grasped; but that under the pressure of the excitement, and the fear that he would be the cause of the discovery of his son, he had drained the liquor which poured the prepared liquor down his throat—this he always carried with him in case of accidents—and had then left him as he found him, safe, supposing he would find his way to his room when he had recovered from the effects of the drug, and that he would then disclose all. He had remained in the vicinity, however, and watched, and learning his father's condition, had eventually overcame him, and he attended the trial, determined that if the worst would not speak, he would; and so he did; and he concluded his statement by the remark, "And he's the gunnest old pop there ever was, and I want a-goin to send him up, nohow!"

And then it came after all of them—the son reformed and a respectable and hard-working man—were restored to favor; and to-day few families are more respected in the town of Dennistown than the Carnegies.

A CARD

FROM THE NATIONAL (ELGIN) WATCH CO.

OFFICE OF THE NATIONAL WATCH CO.,
CHICAGO, March, 1870.

AN advertisement, replete with false statements, which has recently appeared in various newspapers in the guise of a communication over the signature of "HOWARD & CO.," a concern in New York, nominally engaged in selling watches "C. O. D.," would be passed unnoticed but for the fact that they are generally understood to be in the interest of, and their advertising bills paid for by a rival American Watch Company of respectable pretensions, for the purpose of injuring the reputation of the genuine Elgin watches.

In the recent injunction suit, decided against those parties in favor of the National (Elgin) Watch Company, by the name of VAN BUREN, in the N. Y. Common Pleas, Special Term, March 14, 1870, it appeared in evidence that said "HOWARD & CO." (nominally the agents of the Waltham watches) never had in their possession but the exterior cases, watches, ALL TOLD, and yet they had expended large sums of money in advertising "Elgin Watches" to be sent upon the "C. O. D." plan. (Vide reports of the case published.)

In view of these pertinent facts, and the odium attached to the "C. O. D." watch business, the public may safely be left to determine the character of such firms as HOWARD & CO. are engaged in, or whether they are the "agents" said to do the work of the Waltham Company, to degrade the standing of the genuine ELGIN WATCHES to the medium level of their own, or to the low standard of those offered at approximate prices.

The National Watch Co., of Elgin, Illinois, for the common protection of distant watch buyers, as well as themselves, once more caution the public against buying of but now nor ever have furnished watches to any party outside the regular authorized agencies.

Perhaps some one who has "C. O. D." plan, which has been made the medium of so much swindling, and which would naturally be made the medium for traffic in the worthless imitations of Elgin watches known to be in the market. Use pamphlet form for those desirous of purchasing the genuine Elgin watches is to apply to any respectable jeweler in your own locality in preference.

The real Elgin watches—elegant, accurate, and reliable—are known by the name of Elgin, each accompanied by the special warranty certificate of this Company, and usually, also, guaranteed by the jeweler from whom purchased. We had of most jewelers in all towns throughout the United States. Call and ask to see them. As an additional protection, look for "National Watch Co.," on the dial, and one of the following trade-marks: "B. W. Raymond," "H. Z. Culver," "H. H. Taylor," "G. M. Wheeler," "A. T. Foreg," "Matt. Laflin," "J. C. Egerton," "John Elgin," or "Lucius Rubie," together with the words "ELGIN, ILL.," engraved upon the gilt plate inside. These are the trade-marks to denote the various grades and styles; but as even these have been pirated, purchasers will do well to demand warranty certificate, duly signed by T. M. AVERY, the President of the Company, and countersigned to correspond with the watch.

THE NATIONAL WATCH CO.

Factory at Elgin, Ills.
Business Office, 159 Lake St., Chicago.
[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-Worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions, Flesh-Worms, Blotches on the Face. Prof. Pe-ter's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. Depot 49 Second Street, N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.

For Moth Patches, Freckles, & Tan.

Use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion." The only reliable remedy ever known to science. Prepared by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N.Y. Sold by Druggists every where.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!

The reputation of the NOW ELITE JOB PRESS for STRENGTH, SIMPLICITY, and PERFECTION of all the requirements of a first-class press, with which it is "always printing," and as being the favorite press of the largest bona fide Printers. Many printers are using them as their second most suitable adapted for job work. Many Publishers are using them, and the Proprietors of the Press which employs them, thereby materially adding to their profits. TEACHERS AND MANUFACTURERS are finding them great aids to their business. Principals of Schools and Academies, merchants, mechanics, and boys are finding them a never-failing source of instruction, pleasure, and profit. Most lists of fourtens, with one of these presses and a few dollars' worth of material, will more than pay for itself in the profits of the first father's business, and will be thereby worth many times its cost. Price, complete, $175; $30, $32, $50. Send for full descriptions, with printed circular, with testimonials from all parts of the country, and with specimens of the various kinds of work done on the press, and specimen sheets of types, cuts, etc., by the NOW YORK TYPOGRAPHIC COMPANY, 12 Spruce St., Nassau, Mass., dealer in every description of printing material, or by the manufacturers, GEO. C. CHIERSTON, No. 16 College Place, New York; KELLY, HOWELL, & LUDWIG, 317 Market St., Philadelphia, Pa.; A. C. KELLOGG, 66 West Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

Fishing in American Waters.

Opening of the Season for Angling and Fish-Farming. To the end of obtaining information Scott's pamphlet on "Fishing in American Waters" will prove a readable success in every thing about angling and breeding fishes.

Sent throughout the United States, postpaid, for $1 20. HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, N. Y.

$60 A WEEK gold agents in a new business. Address SACO SOVELTY CO., Saco, Me.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 337 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Agents with Goods to Peddle and Open Stores.

Employment for Every Body,
UPON HIGHLY REMUNERATIVE TERMS.
What we Have Done, What we are Willing to Do.
READ THIS ATTENTIVELY.

During the past ten years we have been extensively engaged in the Publishing business in the City of New York, principally in the publication of books; in the course of that experience the idea of facilitating the means with which to make business by supplying it in short form at greatly-reduced prices, so that the poorest man could purchase for much of all. Our undertakings has cost us a large amount of money and incessant labor, but we have persevered, and our labors have been successful. We have received written encouragement from thousands, and orders for our books come from thousands, until copies can be seen upon nearly every table in the cities, towns, and villages throughout. We now desire to have a lady or gentleman in every town in the United States, who will devote a part of their business to see that HITCHCOCK'S HALF-DIME SERIES, and other publications of ours, are kept constantly on sale. Persons can be employed for our publications, and their remuneration be the wages, or they can receive the supply for sale on commission according to their wishes. To enable agents to do this successfully, we have arranged a plan of business which we think will satisfy the most enterprising. A few cents will bring to you for a specimen copy of our Half-Dime Music, or a ten-cent stamp a specimen of our Dime Music. From which you can learn something useful, and hundreds of copies.

Special Terms to Agents for our Sheet Music:

From 25 to 50 copies HALF-DIME SERIES, by mail, postpaid, at 3 cents each.

From 6 to 10 copies DIME SERIES, by mail, postpaid, at 10 cents each.

100 assorted copies HALF-DIME SERIES, by express, at $2 50.

100 assorted copies DIME MUSIC, by express, at $8 00; by mail, $10 00.

HALF-DIME AND TEN-CENT MUSICAL ALBUMS. Twenty pieces assorted each. Price 25 cents each. Specimens and remittances are also supplied at the above rates.

Catalogues sent on receipt of a three-cent postage stamp.

TO SABBATH-SCHOOL INSTRUCTORS.

We will publish any good original or non-copyright hymn or tune, and pay the author a fair price for the same, provided the music is adapted to children; an agent's price is sent with the order. In such cases we will print from 1,000 to 5,000 copies, and issue the same in title-page TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES and other MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS upon the same liberal terms. The Half-Dime size and style is generally selected. Send for specimens of our issues.

LET US DO SOMETHING WAY.

Many have the idea that cheap music must be of a very small amount of good to others. Cheap music is rapidly becoming the most popular, and is extensively used by many, and when first-class music is supplied to communities at low rates, the benefits must be very far-reaching.

WHOM WE WANT AS OUR AGENTS.

Those who have a desire to do good, and are honest in making our publications known, and the smallest amount of time and prompt attention, provided it is accompanied with the money at agent's rates. We are compelled to have the cash with the order, as our experience is limited as to what we could not sell at low rates if we engaged otherwise.

HOW TO SEND MONEY.

Write your letter plainly; inclose the exact money you enclose; sign your name in full, with Post-Office, County, and State. Make Drafts payable to your Post-Office. Bank notes received for purchase money order and exchange that is current in the city of New York. Postage stamps taken to either amount less than, if not, the payment can be stopped. We will be responsible for any loss in value incurred when the amount does not exceed $25. Amounts over $25 should be forwarded by express, or in checks or bank drafts. Address all orders as below.

OUR NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
Will Speak for Itself. It Stands Unrivaled.

No other publication has ever attained the rapidly gaining praise and commendation from the entire press of this country. Over 50,000 copies are already sold in United States printed upon so good paper, no better paper being used in any newer type used, no better plates and illustrations known in the production of any work, and when it is known that our Monthly Musical Magazine will be furnished at the low price of 15 cents per copy, the literary matter, illustrations, and the LARGE AMOUNT OF CHOICE PIANO MUSIC which accompany each number, it must be conceded to be unparalleled, for at all time. It is issued on the 20th of each month, dated for the following month. $1 50 per annum, or $2 in advance.

MAGNIFICENT PREMIUMS TO OUR AGENTS.

As we contrival all others in the production of a Musical Magazine, so are we determined to excel all others in our circulation. To secure a still larger list of subscribers, we propose to offer the following premiums of advertising and the delay of awaiting returns by that channel. We propose to the agent who will advertising would rest in remunerating our agents, and we propose to offer the following premiums to those who will engage in procuring subscriptions for the HITCHCOCK'S NEW MONTHLY MUSICAL MAGAZINE.

Read these Offers.

For One subscription and $1 50 by mail for one year, we will send by mail to the agent any 50 pieces of Dime Music, or any 50 pieces of Half-Dime Music or Catalogue.

For Three Subscriptions, with $4 50, we will send by mail 50 pieces of Dime Music, or 100 pieces of Half-Dime Music.

For Five subscriptions and $7 50 we will send by mail 100 pieces of Dime Music, or 200 pieces of Half-Dime Music.

For Ten subscriptions and $15 00 we will send 200 pieces of Half-Dime Music and 50 pieces of Dime Music.

For Twenty subscriptions and $30 00 we will send 100 pieces of Half-Dime Music and 50 pieces of Dime Music.

For Fifty subscriptions we will send by express, at $50 00; that is, he or she may remit us only $35 00 and retain $15.

For Hundred subscriptions the agent need only remit us $70 00 and retain $30.

For Two Hundred subscriptions the agent need only remit us $20 00 with the list.

Specimen Numbers and $120 we present the agent with a

NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE,

A Wheeler & Wilson No. 1, First-Class, Bran New, Just out of their Store.

This machine has been already used as a sample, and it gives satisfaction in every instance.

Any person who will send us $20 and will send the names of 100 subscribers for half or cent, worth at retail $35 00 dollars.

Each list must be accompanied with the names and addresses of the subscribers. It is not necessary that the agent should all be addressed to the same post-office: we do not care to know many different post-offices in a town. Each subscriber must pay the postage at his or her own post-office. Subscriptions may commence with No. 1 of volume 1, dated in October, 1869, or with the January number for the current year. Try to have them uniform for one or the other, and be particular to state which.

Agents will please remember that we deposit the $20 with the Express agent across them, to be paid over upon the receipt of the Sewing Machine.

The same can be done by those who have obtained the Fifty subscribers.

PROCURE A SPECIMEN COPY OF

Hitchcock's New Monthly Magazine,

at any bookstore, or by remitting 18 cents to us, and then canvass among your friends and neighbors.

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Music Publisher,
24 BEEKMAN STREET, New York.

REMOVAL.
S. W. GERRY & CO. will remove to southeast corner of 18th Street and Broadway, 1st of May. Importers and Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Teas, Sugars, etc.

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,
Formerly L. & W. Gerry, No. 79 Broadway,
Established in 1804. New York.
The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.
Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent free. Goods will be called for (in city only) every morning, if desired.
Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

7 PER CENT.
GOLD LOAN,
FREE OF U. S. TAX,
OF THE
Burlington, Cedar Rapids, and Minnesota R. R. Co.'s
FIRST MORTGAGE
50-YEAR BONDS,
At 95 Flat.
THE ACCRUED INTEREST IS FROM NOV. 1st, WHICH GOES TO THE PURCHASER.
TRUSTEES:
I. EDGAR THOMSON, Pres. Pennsylvania R. R. Co.
CHARLES L. FROST, New York.
These Bonds are payable, principal and interest, in coin, at New York or London; the interest being payable in May and November.
They are exempt from all taxes, and are protected by a liberal Sinking Fund.
They are issued upon the several sections of the road only as the same are completed and in successful operation.
They are guaranteed not only by a first lien upon the entire property and franchises of the Company, but also by now current earnings and an ample commerce on the route of the road, and have not to depend for their security upon a traffic which the road itself is expected to create.
Over Three Million Dollars have been already expended on the road.
Eighty-three miles of road are already completed and equipped, and show large earnings, and the remainder of the line is progressing rapidly toward completion.
The State of Iowa, through which this road runs, is one of the richest agricultural sections of America. Its large and extending population, and its immense yield of agricultural products, create a pressing demand for the construction of this road.
The road also runs through the fertile and growing State of Minnesota. It traverses the most enterprising and practical portion of the West, and forms the shortest of the great trunk lines to direct communication with New York, Chicago, and St. Louis.
Having thoroughly investigated all the conditions affecting the security of these Bonds, we feel justified in giving them an unqualified indorsement as a first-class and thoroughly safe investment, as secure as a Government Bond can possibly be, and paying nearly 9 per cent. more interest than Five-Twenties.
All marketable securities at their full price, free of commission and expense charges, received in payment. Pamphlets and maps furnished on application.
HENRY CLEWS & CO.,
Financial Agents of the Company,
No. 32 WALL ST.

STAR-SPANGLED BANNER.—A large 36-column paper, Ledger size, illustrated. Devoted to Sketches, Poetry, Wit, Humor, general Literature, Sense (of a sensible kind), and to the exposure of Swindling, Humbugs, etc. Only $2 a year, and a superb engraving, "Evangeline," 18 by 2 feet, gratis. 80,000 circulation. Money refunded at once if not as it is wide-awake, fearless, truthful. Try it now. 7½ cts. a copy. Specimen FREE. Address "BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

CHURCHMAN & ENGLAND,
FRENCH CHINA
Decorated Dinner & Tea Sets.
12 MURRAY STREET,
NEW YORK.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.
With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, any person can do his own printing, and in saving much time and expense. Our press contains full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 62 Murray Street, New York.

HOOKLEY KNITTING MACHINE
FOR FAMILY USE—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits Every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circulars and sample stocking FREE. Address HINSLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

The Celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Grade).—These superior Imitation Watches have been thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for accuracy and as imitators of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no further comment. Prices:—Full-jewelled Patent Levers, $18, equal in appearance and time to nine-dollar time to gold cases costing $150. Those of extra fine finish, $20, equal to $300 gold cases. We are also making a very fine luxury and extra fine watch, full-jewelled patent lever, equaling in appearance a $250 gold watch. In order to introduce them quickly, we offer only $25. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All our watches are in hunting cases, gents' and ladies' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $2 to $5. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.
The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.
The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.
One of the $20 Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.
Goods sent by express, to be seen & Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.
C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 325 Broadway, New York.

WATCHES manufactured by the UNITED STATES WATCH CO.,
Of MARION, N.J., retailed and sent to any part of the country, by C. A. STEVENS & CO., Jewellers, 49 East 14th Street, Union Square, New York. Call or send for Price-List.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
ARE OFFERING
EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS
IN PRICE, STYLE, AND QUALITY, TO HOUSEKEEPERS,
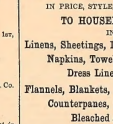
IN
Linens, Sheetings, Damasks,
Napkins, Towellings,
Dress Linens, Printed Linens,
Flannels, Blankets, Quilts,
Counterpanes, Sheetings,
Bleached and Brown Cottons,
Standard American Prints,
&c., &c.
BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH AND 10TH STS.

DOGSEY'S "50-CENT" MUSIC.—Dossey's Musical Cabinet, Vocal Nos. From 10 to 99 Songs in each book, with Piano accompaniment. Price 50 cents each. 13th Twelve Songs by Arthur S. Sullivan and Molloy. 102. Eight Comic Songs. 94. Twenty Comic Songs. 90. Twenty Scotch Songs. Fifty Songs of Ireland, in Three Books. 41. Twenty Welsh Songs. 38. Twenty French Romances. 89. Twenty Moore's Melodies. 84. Twenty Celebrated Songs. 83. Twenty-two Baritone Songs. 80. Twenty-two Tenor Songs. 79. Twenty-two Songs by Claribel, Balfe, &c. 58. Operatic Songs. 31. Ten Songs by Mozart. 26. Songs by Mozart. 36. Ten German Songs. 18. Sixteen Songs, Kücken. 15. Twelve Songs, Schubert. 10. Twelve Songs, Donizetti. 12. Fifteen Songs, Beethoven. 13. Twelve Songs, J. L. Hatton, &c. 3. Twelve Songs, Verdi. 2. Twelve Songs, M. W. Balfe. 1. Twenty Songs, Mendelssohn, &c. 88. Fifteen Operatic Duets. 34. Twelve Duets, Mendelssohn, &c. Each Book 50 cents. To be had of Music and Book sellers. Complete catalogue free. DOSSEY & CO., No. 644 Broadway, N. Y.

ROGERS' GROUPS OF STATUARY.
These groups, suitable for wedding presents or ornament, are now ready to sell, with all express charges prepaid, at the following prices: No. 1, $15; No. 2, $20; No. 3, $25; No. 4, $30; No. 5, $35. Send for illustrated Catalogue and Price-List, to JOHN ROGERS,
Taking the cash. 213 Fifth Ave., New York.

FOWLE'S PILE AND HUMOR CURE.
Warranted a perfect CURE for all kinds of PILES, LEPROSY, SCROFULA, SALT-RHEUM, DYSPEPSIA, CLERGYMAN'S SORE THROAT, and IMPURE BLOOD. Entirely vegetable. In case of failure, please send and get your money. No failures for 12 years. Over 14,000 Certificates on hand. H. D. FOWLE, Sole Proprietor, Boston. Sent by mail, $1 a Bottle. Send for Circulars.

"BETTER THAN GOLD" is the NEW "GOLDEN PEN." Absolutely non-corrosive—indestructible. Scours pens often used, is economical, six months. Equal to gold. Made from new metal—a wonderful discovery. Agents wanted. Address Pens, &c., clear 500 a week with them. Nearly put up. 12 in a box. Price only 50 cents; by mail 56 cts., postpaid. Address the sole proprietors,
GOLDEN PEN CO., Hinsdale, N. H.



(From Hale of our Watches and Oroide Jewelry.)
that no thief can steal your watch. Also, request every where to examine what they order before paying bill, on paying to Express charges only; or, on receipt of Postal Order, Draft, or Money, we will send, post-paid, a better, well-formed Key-Watch, $2 00 to $10 00 each. Also, sole agent for the celebrated Imitation Diamonds! Crystalized Carbonated Stones! Sparkle like diamonds, stand acid test, and warranted to cut glass. Send for Price-List. JOHN FOGGAN, Dealer and Importer, 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

Caution.—Audacious Counterfeit!
The reputation which, for many years, has attached to "HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS," as the Great Specific of the Age, and the large demand for the article not only in the United States but elsewhere, have provoked in the cupidity of the counterfeiting tribe, and it has been extensively manufactured and sold by unscrupulous dealers.
The most daring counterfeit of said article which has been produced has recently come to our knowledge. The engraved steel label on bottles containing the counterfeit bitters, with the beautiful vignette of Mt. Georgia and the dragon, is shrewd combining a warning against counterfeits, and a caution to the public to buy no bitters but those bearing said vignette. It has been copied so closely that the fraud can only be detected on a minute inspection. The dark label is also well counterfeited, and the wording on both the imitation and genuine labels are precisely the same, the difference being simply in the execution of the work: that of the imitation being somewhat coarser than the genuine. Other counterfeits are on the market which are in all respects the same as described above, with the exception of a slight difference in the spelling of the word "Bitters."
In addition to the above, various counterfeiters have gone so far in some instances as to place the Trade Mauger over the cork and fasten to the neck of the bottle, on which is a vignette, and otherwise printed to imitate the genuine article, a label with the following U. S. Revenue stamp, but upon inspection will disclose the fraudulent fact that the words "4" and the word "cents," also "United States Internal Revenue," all of which appear with additional wording, appear in our genuine stamp. The public are, therefore, especially warned against the same as counterfeits, and are advised to purchase only of houses whose integrity is above suspicion. The true specific is for bottle compounded and put up by HOSTETTER & SMITH, Pittsburgh, Pa.

HOSTETTER'S
STOMACH BITTERS

A GREAT OFFER.
HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y.,
Will dispose of FIFTY HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, AND ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices, for cash, or part cash, and part on installments. Call or send for circular. Prices reduced to suit the times. Agents wanted. Illustrated Catalogue mailed free. Second-hand Pianos for sale cheap. Rents $5 to $8 per month. Monthly installments received. Pianos to let. Pianos exchanged. Pianos tuned. Pianos repaired. Pianos packed and moved. Pianos stored. Pianos boxed and shipped. Pianos purchased. Chickering Pianos are included in the above offer.

40,000 SOLD. The Wonder of the World. The Most Reliable Regulator Time Indicator, or Pocket Watch." A perfect Key-Watch, $2 to $10 each. Sold by Agents everywhere. Also, the Celebrated Oroide Dial, Silver and Brass works, Glass crystal, size of key's watch. Will keep correct time a number of five years; superb and showy case, entirely of metal. This is the WORLD'S TRIUMPH. Sent free, postpaid, $2 00 each in three weeks. Only $1 each, three for $5, five for $8, ten for $15. Trade supplied. Trade with the sole manufacturers, MAGNETIC WATCH CO., Brandon, Vt.

$25 A DAY! 40 new articles for Agents. Samples sent free. H. B. BLAKE, Alfred, Me.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK OF FOREIGN TRAVEL.
HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST: Being a Guide through England, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Greece, Turkey, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Portugal. With Maps and Plans. In Two Volumes. Corrected up to 1869. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. Revised Edition. Eight Vols. Large 12mo. Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7.50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK.
HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversation in English, French, German, and Italian, on a new and Improved Method. Including Idiomatic Phrases, Colloquial Dialogues, Travellers' Table of Monetary Systems, etc. Edited by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and accurate Rules for the pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 4to, Flexible Cloth, $1.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Hunting-Case Watches, are manufactured with the most recent improvements as to style, finish, and durability; are sold at low prices, and are worn by the most fashionable and costly Gold watches. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Detached Lever Watches, Stem-Winders, $40 and $50. Foggan's Patent "Filled" Gold Watches, Stem Winders, $40 and $45. After a fair trial, if not satisfactory, exchanged or money refunded, less 10 per cent. Every customer presented with the Patent Pickpocket Detective attachment, so that no thief can steal your watch. Also, sole agent for the celebrated Imitation Diamonds! Crystalized Carbonated Stones! Sparkle like diamonds, stand acid test, and warranted to cut glass. Send for Price-List. JOHN FOGGAN, Dealer and Importer, 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

The New Books of the Season
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.
☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. History of the American Civil War. By JOHN W. DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of the City of New York. In Three Vols. Vol. III. just ready. 8vo. Cloth, $3 50 per vol.

A BRAVE LADY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. Together with a Statement of the Intimations of Science respecting the Primordial Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Planets. By ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

THE UNWIND WORD, and Other Stories. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c., &c. 18mo, Cloth, $1 00.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By JAMES ORTON, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Equatorial America and Numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

JOURNAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO THE EAST. Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Constantinople, the Crimea, Greece, &c., in the Suite of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By the Hon. Rev. GEORGE ANTROBUS. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

GARIBALDI'S NOVEL. The Rule of the Monk; or, Rome in the Nineteenth Century. By GENERAL GARIBALDI. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Additional Illustrations, and Three Portraits. New Edition. 32mo, Tinted Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY. A Novel. By MRS. A. D. SWEET, Author of "Gardenmont." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HAND-BOOK OF THE SULPHUR CURE, as applicable to the Diseases of the Skin, Rheumatism, &c. Also of Apple and other Fruit Treats. By W. M. J. FLAGG, Author of "The Season in European Vineyards." 18mo, Paper, 50 cents.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford. Related in a Selection of her Village Life." Told by Herself in Letters to Her Friends. With a Sketch of her Childhood and Girlhood. Two Vols. Uniformly Bound with the Additional Contemporaries. Edited by Rev. A. G. K. L'Estrange. 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By ALTON CLYDE, Author of "Maggie Lyons." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

OLD TESTAMENT SHADOWS OF NEW TESTAMENT TRUTHS. With Illustrations of the Harmony of "Jesus of Nazareth, his Life and Teachings," &c. Engraved by Dalziel. By the Author of "Jesus of Nazareth, Sunbeams, and Parables. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50; Gilt Edges, $3 00.

BIRRELL. A Novel. By the Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," "Dora Deane," "John Ward," "Martin Pole," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History. By CHARLES ST. JOHN. With Engravings on Wood, Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger," "Hints to Riflemen," "Short Rambles," "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 147 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE ONE YEAR..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, ONE YEAR..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, ONE YEAR..... 4 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.
Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly, or semi-quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied by 24 cents for MAGAZINE and 20 cents for WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.
The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume. Back Numbers will be sent accordingly.
The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the first Number of January. When no time is understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the first Number issued after receipt of his order.
When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new post-office must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.
In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferred to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the owner.
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Weekly.—Eight Cents a Line. $100 Half Page, $175 Quarter Page, $30—each insertion. Or, for a less space, $1 00 per Line, each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Pages, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.
ADDRESS HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

VINEGAR. WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address F. L. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

$200 per Month guaranteed. Agents wanted in every County in the U. S. to sell the Great Harpier Alarm. Price $8. Sells on sight. Liberal terms. Address HARPIER & CO., 165 Nassau St., New York. Fallen's, Pa.

$20 A DAY! Business new. For circulars and samples, address J. C. HAZLY & CO., Biddeford, Me.

THE OTHELLO OF TO-DAY.

IAGO (Democratic Politician). "The Moor is of a free and open nature, that thinks men honest that but seem to be so, and will as tenderly be led by the nose as asses are."

U.S. PIANO CO. N.Y.

Manufacture enlarged concentrated full-length scales, Agraffe Overstrung, Round Corners, Iron Plate, Carving—pipe, wreath, lyre, and powerful Sub-Bass and sent everywhere for trial—warranted 5 years—Price $290.—Circulars mailed free.—Address—UNITED STATES PIANO CO., No. 630 Broadway, New York.

SMITH'S

AMERICAN ORGANS,

FOR THE

Services of Chapels and Lodges, as well as for Home Recreation.

The constantly-increasing demand for instruments, taxing the capacity of the manufactory to the utmost, shows conclusively that the efforts of the Proprietors are justly valued.

Only the best and most carefully-selected materials are used; and the ingenuity of the most skillful mechanics is employed in improving the details of construction, in developing the best quality of tone, and in heightening the power of expression.

Never to rest satisfied with mediocre success has been the motto of this house. And with every year's experience they expect not only to maintain their present position, but to produce instruments of greater and more varied power, thus anticipating the increasing demands of the most cultivated tastes.

An Illustrated Circular, containing full descriptions and prices, will be sent, postpaid, on application.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH, Boston, Mass.

PAPER-BOATS.

For exercise, pleasure, racing, traveling, and boating. Specimen sails for young ladies, lads, tourists, & sportsmen. Descriptive circulars & price-list sent on application. WATERS, BALCH, & Co., 30 River St., Troy, N.Y.

20,589

Advertisements (Gen'e Index) tel. for Next of Kin, Chancery Heirs, Lapsed Legacies, cases of Unclaimed Money, since 1800. Price 6d sent.
JOHN HOOPER & Co., 41 Park Row, New York.

MICROSCOPES,

For Scientific and Popular Investigations. Illustrated Price-List forwarded to any address.
T. H. McALLISTER, Optician, 49 Nassau St., N. Y.

DREXEL & CO.,
34 South Third St., Philadelphia:
DREXEL, WINTHROP, & CO.,
15 Wall St., New York:
DREXEL, HARJES, & CO.,
3 Rue Scribe, Paris.

AMERICAN and FOREIGN BANKERS,

Issue Drafts and Circular Letters of Credit, available on presentation in any part of Europe. Travelers can make all their financial arrangements through us. We will collect their interest and dividends without charge.

All correspondence or papers directed to the care of DREXEL, HARJES, & Co., PARIS, will be promptly forwarded to any addresses that may be ordered by travelers. In this way, arrangements may be made for having supplies brought with them.

American Papers and the various Cities always on file at the Paris office.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO
CLEANS, POLISHES, AND IS CHEAPER & BETTER THAN SOAP.

Depot, 211 Washington Street, New York.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Whoever wants to Know whether TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT cures biliousness, relieves pain, sharpens appetite, tones the stomach, and regulates the alvine discharges, is requested to ask those who have tested it in such cases, and to act accordingly.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

*In the interchangeability (at the option of the holder) of National Paper Money with Government Bonds (both on a fixed gold valuation), there is a self-balancing power that will regulate the movements of Currency and Commerce as accurately, as the motion of the steam Engine is regulated by the Governor. Such Paper Money, Volume could be issued, without affecting the market value of Gold and Silver. Indeed, the only use of gold or other merchandize as Money, is a barbarism unworthy of the Age.—*William Jennings

BISHOP & RHIN,
JEWELERS,
Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,
OFFER FOR SALE
DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,
Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine
MOSAICS,
And other
FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.
WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.
We call particular attention to our fine assortment of
CORAL JEWELRY.

VALUABLE BOOKS for PRACTICAL MEN.—DICTIONARY OF MANUFACTURES, MINING, MACHINERY, AND THE INDUSTRIAL ARTS. By Gregory Dodd. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

NUGENT ON OPTICS; or, Light and Sight Theoretically and Practically Treated. 1 vol., 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

BAUERMAN ON THE METALLURGY OF IRON: containing the History of Iron Manufacture, Methods of Assay, and Analysis of Iron Ores, Processes of Manufacture of Iron and Steel, &c., with Hewitt's Report on the Martin Process for Making Steel. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $3 50.—D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, 23 Murray St., and 27 Warren St., N. Y.

 Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

☞ My Catalogue of American and Foreign Scientific Books, 64 pages, 8vo, sent on receipt of 10 cents.

45,000 Now in Use! Geo. A. Prince & Co.'s ORGANS and MELODEONS will be delivered in any part of the United States reached by Express (where they have no Agent), free of charge, on receipt of list price.
Send for Price-Lists and Circulars.
Address GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Buffalo, N.Y., or GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Chicago, Ill.

RHODODENDRONS.

There is no plant so beautiful. Its foliage is broad, evergreen, and hardy; its flowers are superb beyond description. For these and other varieties of TREES, SHRUBS, ROSES, &c.,
address PARSONS & CO., Flushing, N. Y.

Bird House No. 4. 10 inches high, 14½ by 10½ base. Finished in White Lead and Oil Color. Manufactured by the MILLER BIRD CO., Providence, R. I., Manufacturers of Ornamental Iron Work for Gardens, Lawns, Parks, Cemeteries, &c. Illustrated Catalogue sent free.

DEAFNESS,

Letter from Robt. McMurdy, D.D., LL.D., Grand Prelate of Grand Encampment of U. S., Freemasons. "New York, Sept. 11, 1869. Dr. STILWELL was in charge of the Church Hospital, Alexandria, Va., during the Peninsular Campaign, and I frequently visited him. He has had every opportunity of knowing his reputation for accuracy and skill. It was of the highest character. His success in the treatment of Impediment of patients was remarkable.—ROBT. MCMURDY.

THE PATENT ORGANIC VIBRATOR.

It fits into the Ear, is not perceptible, restores Hearing, Noises in the Head, and enables Deaf Persons to Converse Naturally. Thousands are using it. Circulars, containing testimonials, Statistics of Deafness and Catarrh, with Means of Cure, sent free.
Dr. T. HUNT STILWELL, 70 Broadway, N. Y.

CLOVERINE

Maintains its pre-eminence on the Ladies' Toilet Tables over all other Cleansers, for removing Tan and GREASE from Gloves, Silks, Satins, Velvets, &c. In bottles, at 18 and 50 cents.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

$20 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE Agents to introduce the Popular GROVER SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the ONLY REVERSIBLE SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $60. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Circular FREE.
Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

$732 in 31 DAYS

Made by one Agent, selling SILVER'S PATENT ELASTIC BRUSH. Over 50,000 now in use. Recommended by Hon. Horace Greeley and American Agriculturist. One county reserved for each Agent. C. A. CLOSE & CO., 58 Cortlandt St., N. Y., or 176 Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
☞ Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

Woodward's National Architect, 1000 Working Plans, Elevations, Sections, Detail Drawings, Specifications, Estimates. Postpaid, $12.

Harney's Barns, Outbuildings, and Fences, 200 Designs, including Stables, Gates, Gateways, and Stable Fittings. Postpaid, $10.

Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses. 150 Designs and Plans. Postpaid, $1 50.

Illustrated priced catalogue of all books on Architecture and Agriculture mailed free.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,
191 Broadway, New York.

THE TRAVELERS
INSURANCE COMPANY,

of Hartford, Conn., Cash Assets over $1,350,000, is a General Accident Insurance Company, granting policies of insurance against Death or Wholly Disabling Injury by ACCIDENT, to men of all trades, professions, and occupations, at rates within the reach of all. It insures against accidents by machinery, accidents from the use of tools and implements, accidents of all descriptions that occur in the usual and lawful avocations of life, as well as accidents by railway, steamboat, and travel generally. Accident Policies written by Agents.

The Travelers has paid over $1,200,000 in Benefits to Policy Holders.

The TRAVELERS also grants full LIFE and ENDOWMENT Insurance in the usual forms, its policies uniting Ample Security and Cheapness of Cost under a Definite Contract. All policies non-forfeitable. Premium system, the favorite Low-Rate Cash Plan.

Boston Office, 99 Washington Street; New York Office, 207 Broadway; Philadelphia Office, 117 South Fourth Street; Chicago Office, 80 La Salle Street; San Francisco Office, 64 California Street.

THE RICE DIVORCE SUIT,

For fraud in age, is causing great excitement in Boston. It should warn young men not to marry in haste. But if, like Mr. Rice, you have married, and the made him believe she was but his own age, by using Magnolia Balm upon her face, neck, and hands. Poor youth! He probably found her elbows weren't quite so soft and pretty. Ought Magno to be indicted? We know of many similar cases. This Balm gives a most wonderful pearly and natural complexion, to which we don't object. It is like pretty women. To finish the picture, they should use Lyon's Kathairon for the hair. With pearly chin, rose cheeks, and soft, luxuriant tresses, they become irresistible.

The Perfect Street and Boot Blacking—Now used by both Companies has been brought to a degree of Perfection by Messrs. BLACKING & Co., Proprietors of the Blacking. It is the Cheapest, Best Dressing, Most Durable, Most Difficult to Injure and Most Easy to Apply. Most Quickly Lighted, and Most Economical Street Lamp Burning Fluid ever manufactured. IN USE IN OVER 300 TOWNS AND CITIES. Send for Descriptive Pamphlet and Price-Lists.

THE HEATH & SMITH M'F'G CO., Portland, Conn.

SALESROOMS: 44 MURRAY STREET, New York City; 93 RANDOLPH STREET, Chicago, Ill.

AGENTS: KEEN & HAGERTY, Baltimore, Md.; CARR, ADAMS, & CO., 20 Milk Street, Boston, Mass.

FOUR NEW BOOKS

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS. By An Old Boy. New Edition. With numerous Illustrations by Arthur Hughes. 16mo, Cloth, Price $1.50; Paper, 50 cents.

SELF-HELP; with Illustrations of Character, Conduct, and Perseverance. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "The Life of the Stephensons," "History of the Huguenots," &c. A Revised and Enlarged Edition. 16mo, Cloth, $1.50.

BAZAR BOOK OF DECORUM. The Care of the Person, Manners, Etiquette, and Ceremonials. 16mo, Tinted Paper, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1.00.

DEBRETHAM'S VOW. A Novel. By ANELDA B. EDWARDS, Author of "Barbara's History," "Half a Million of Money," "Miss Carew," &c., &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

PULLAR & SON, MAKERS TO HER MAJESTY, 106 Merchetown Gords. Stores: 419 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, & 57 John St., middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter-Box 5845. Repairing and Bolting also done.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIV.—No. 696.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE ACTOR'S LESSON.

THE most admired and idolized of all French living actors is Frédérick Lemaitre, often spoken of affectionately as plain Frédérick. He touches nothing that he does not adorn, even the strangest absurdities and incongruities; witness his performance of Père Gachette at the Folies-Dramatiques, in 1867. Such a drama would never enter your head—such a promising glut of crimes and corpses. It was a posthumous piece which would never have been played had its author, Paulin Deslandes, still survived; but there was his family to be assisted, and certainly it would have been a pity to lose one of Frédérick's most striking creations. Paulin Deslandes was a man of talent who, in the popular drama, more than once touched the right note. This "Père Gachette" was found in his drawer, and they determined to act it. They polished it up, remodeled the frame-work, and, in short, tried to render it passable, presentable—no very easy task. Luckily, a great actor was at their disposal, Frédérick Lemaitre, who weathered the storm. A man of genius, like him, fixes all our attention upon himself, and causes his surroundings to be forgotten. Frédérick is the soul of this crazy drama. In his hands impossibilities become probable, absurdities superb, and the ridiculous story haunts and worries you like an actual occurrence.

The great power of Frédérick lies in his continual and conscientious truthfulness—truth in his passion, truth both in his comic and his grander scenes. There is not one of those striking gestures, which surprise you by their emphasis, which has not been studied and copied from nature. He is a dramatic genius born, not full armed, like Minerva, from Jupiter's brain, but who has armed himself, little by little, with all the feverish sorrows in his own experience, and the dramas of real life that have fallen in his way. His only professor has been, in fact, life. His conservatoire is the street or the saloon, any place where the collisions of love and hate cause passion to flash out like lightning. It is said that one day Lafontaine, who had been playing with great success, called on the old hero and begged his counsels.

"What counsels would you have me give you?" Frédérick asked. "The first person you happen to meet, if joyful or sad, and revealed he manifest his sorrow or his joy, will give you more valuable hints than mine."

"Nevertheless—

"We artists find only one true teacher, and this is our own proper heart. Come," continued Frédérick, "you wish me to give you a lesson. So be it; you shall have your lesson. Very well. You are returning home in good spirits, satisfied with every thing, after a pleasant evening, a dinner with friends—never mind what. You mount the staircase, smiling, before you see her, at your wife, who is awaiting you with open arms, and ready to give the usual kiss. You open the door and enter; your wife is not there. You look about you, and find, on a table, a letter, in which she tells you that she has left you, that she will never return, and that it is useless to search after her retreat. Here is a situation. How will you render it? Try it. I am all attention."

Frédérick Lemaitre, quietly seated on his chair, regarded M. Lafontaine, who hesitated a little, feeling nervous in the great artist's presence. Perhaps he was also taken by surprise. Abrupt modes of teaching, like this, are unknown in the schools of declamation, where the professor lays the principal stress on the accent and the diction, implanting in his pupils a uniform mode of speech, which, in the end, becomes fatiguing to the hearer, and buoying himself with the gesture rather than the soul—with the style of walking more than the intensity of feeling. Lions only, like Frédérick, take the bull by the horns, or rather pin him by the nostrils.

Frédérick Lemaitre rose from his seat. "Look," he said to Lafontaine, "how I should do it!"

And then, as if in the course of conversation, with his hands in his pockets, and without any of the resources of the theatre, he acted before wondering Lafontaine one of the most astounding scenes it is possible to witness. At first he was the happy, confiding husband, stepping upstairs, humming a song. With a commonplace open countenance, and a half silly smile, he opens the door, draws a deep breath, rubs his hands. He is at home. He looks about him. Where is his wife? She has not sat up for him. Very extraordinary. Is she ill? Note that Frédérick did not utter a single word; all this was expressed by his unaided pantomime. He goes to the bed. Nobody! Has she gone out? He sits down; he will wait for her. He takes up a newspaper to while away the time.

But what is that letter on the side-table in the corner? A letter; and a letter from her! Why should she write? What need can she have to write? The husband changes countenance. He guesses some misfortune.

GRANDMAMMA.—(SEE POEM, PAGE 274.)

Yes; there is misfortune in that letter. He takes it, turns it about, does not open it. He reads it, and falls in a fainting fit.

"There, my good friend, are the only counsels I can give you," said Frederick, raising "Lay your hand on your heart, and listen to its beatings."

GRANDMAMMA.

[See Illustration on First Page.]

AH! 'twas very long ago,
That my grandmamm sat so
By the oriel that dreary morning with her head half turned to see,
What was grown the oaken door
Of the smilit corridor
Came a visitor, unconscious, singing a blithe and bonny glee.

That was grandpapa who came
He had only lured his mate,
He had her face commended, but had seen it not till then:
She was glowing with her ride.
He was blushing, half in pride,
Angry with himself for feeling shyest of all bashful men.

It was very long ago,
Yet I like to hear it so—
How they met that bright May morning in a summer long passed by.
Were her eyes not sunny brown?
Prithee, when you come next to town,
I will show you grandpapa, they've not left them—such a brow, and such an eye!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1870.

THE REAL ENEMY.

THE late Convention in Albany to protest against any sectarian use of the State funds shows how deep the interest is, and how sensitive is the public mind upon the subject. The matter is, however, a great deal of cross-firing in the skirmish. The disposition to assault the Roman Catholics as such, for instance, is an illustration of the cross-firing. The question is not in the least theological; it is exclusively political. It is not whether Roman Catholics are more or less Christians than other sects; nor whether they have persecuted more or less than others; nor whether the theory of the Roman Catholic Church is not essentially hostile to the American political system; but simply and only whether Church and State shall be kept absolutely independent of each other. If the debate should degenerate into a squabble between sects, the Roman Catholics are not quite able to give blows, as well as to take them. American citizens may hold to what religious faith they will, and the American system will defend their equal rights with all others. But American citizens who, in the interest of a sect, attack one of the fundamental principles of the Government, must be met and exposed at the beginning of their enterprise.

It is this attack which is made by the demand for the sectarian division of the public money. And the plea upon which it was first urged is not valid. It was said by the Roman Catholic clergy that the schools as conducted were sectarian, and that it was plainly unfair to tax for sectarian schools. They therefore demanded a division of the public school money in proportion to the number of each sect. Now if what they alleged were true, the demand proposed was absurd. What was needed was not to destroy a vital principle of our polity, but to correct the abuse. If any public school was sectarian it violated the cardinal condition of the school system, and the necessary measure was obvious. It was simply to remove the cause of just complaint, not to abolish the system.

The plea by which the Roman clergy sought to sustain their wrong was that the Bible, as read in some of the schools, was, in their view, a sectarian book. Of course it is no answer to the plea for other sects, who may not be numerically in the majority, to reply that they don't think so. We must remember that to the American citizen who is a free Christianity itself is a mere sect, and the Jews have precisely the same rights as the rest of us. Ours is not a Protestant Christian government, nor a government it supports no religion, but equally protects the supporters of all religions. The Jew, the Mohammedan, the man who professes a general unbelief—so long as they all keep the peace and violate no law—stand in the regard of the government side by side with the Methodists, Romanists, Quakers, Presbyterians, Baptists, and the members of all other sects. The Jew, for example, does not believe that the New Testament is a divinely-inspired book. Can the majority rightfully compel him to support religion which, under pretense of secular instruction, this book is read to his children as of supernatural authority? Is this a point upon which the will of the mere majority ought to prevail?

If we establish secular schools, to be supported by a general tax, for the benefit of all, by what right do we obtrude into them the religious views of the majority? In every State in the country the cry is raised that the Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Let us suppose that they agree to pay for a school for the secular instruction of all their children. But the Baptists are two to one in numbers. May they therefore introduce the reading of Baptist books as part of the system of instruction? Will not the Methodists very properly say, "If Baptist books are to be read on Monday, we insist that Methodist books shall be read on Tuesday, or we will withdraw from the agreement?" And is not the only rightful solution of the difficulty to resolve that the school is not intended to teach Baptist or Methodist views, and therefore no such books shall be read?

But when the good sense of the country met the plea of the Roman clergy by this simple statement of the case, the clergy immediately showed that their outcry against the Bible was a pretense only, by declaring that the removal of the Bible would not satisfy them. Their real objection, in the precise kind, "A Catholic Priest" wrote to the Boston Advertiser in November: "Catholics would not be satisfied with the public schools even if the Protestant Bible and every vestige of religious teaching were banished from them;" and he proceeded to say that Protestants ought to have their schools and Catholics theirs. The Rev. Thomas Preston, in his discourse upon the question, says: "The question of religious education does not render the common schools satisfactory to us: for this alone would not make them non-sectarian.....No schools will satisfy us but those in which we can teach our religion." Thus the point of the Roman Catholic assault is not the Bible in the schools, but the fact that the schools do not teach religion. And the question, therefore, is, shall the public schools teach religion?

Manifestly that is impossible. And so the next question is, what religion? And to that there will be as many answers as there are sects. To demand it, therefore, as to demand as the Roman priesthood does demand, that the school money be divided among the sects, and the American system be abandoned, is to be absurd. Now the State supports schools as a part of its police, and for no other reason. It leaves religious instruction entirely private, to the Church, and to the Sunday-school. To allege that the public school is "irreligious" because it does not teach religion is to misunderstand the whole subject. The Roman Catholic, for instance —is as laughable as to say that a public gymnasium or a public drill-ground is "irreligious" because the object of the gymnasium is muscular exercise, and that of the bath cleanliness, just as that of the public schools is elementary secular instruction, and that of a Sunday-school religious instruction. To abandon our present school system in order to ally Church with State by a sectarian division of the public money is to invite the fury of religious rancor and the contest of sectarian power which would sweep very much of its prosperity and intelligence to the vigorous separation of the two. Let each sect, with its own funds and at its own option, do what it lawfully chooses; but let all sects sternly insist that the State shall be non-sectarian.

CONSTITUTIONAL CÆSARISM.

IF a man has made up his mind that LOUIS NAPOLEON is base, he will have a very simple key to Bonaparte's character. On the other hand, he really believes that the French people intelligently and spontaneously elected LOUIS NAPOLEON President of the Republic, he readily explain all political events in France. The facts in the mean while seem to show that Napoleon is a man who has unscrupulously to an imperial throne, and whose word is nothing, of itself and unsustained by circumstances, be utterly trusted.

But it is very clear that, after a trial of eighteen years, he is convinced that the Empire, as we conceive of it, is not easy in practice; and an old-fashioned empire—is wholly impracticable. It is a cuckle after daybreak, neither thinks for any one else, nor permits others to think therefore, to save as much of an empire and of the imperial chances of his heirs as possible. He does like Napoleon I. to introduce a constitutional form. But to expect him to establish a Republic, in which he might not even be nominated President, is to expect the impossible.

LOUIS NAPOLEON is undoubtedly just as selfish, just as unscrupulous, and just as unversacious as ever. But his position is not the same. He has recently proposed may be trusted, because obviously they are for his interest. Discussion in France is dead, and certainly not unnatural. The glamour of the Empire has vanished. But sensible Frenchmen know and Louis Napoleon knows that a revolution is a movement of very uncertain issue. Such Frenchmen are loth to appeal to it. But they are aware of the necessity of change. He has therefore, proposes a compromise to retain their support and his own throne. This is the significance of his recent proposition. It is a liberal change of the Constitution. It makes the fundamental law accord still more with the forms of free governments. Under the recent system the Senate was the ruling power in the Legislature, and the Emperor controlled the Senate. Under the new proposes that the Lower House, to be elected by universal suffrage, shall originate laws and taxes; and the power of the Senate over the Lower House and the Constitution is abolished. The ministry is responsible, although the same section which declares this vaguely states that they depend solely upon the Emperor.

So far this is like other constitutional monarchical governments. But now comes the extraordinary provision which leaves the Emperor an indefinable power. "The Constitution can only be modified by the people on the proposition of the Emperor." This right of appeal is unconditional. The Emperor may propose the abolition of the Legislature and a return to absolute personal government, and his Ministers and the Legislature must be silent. But if it is not likely that he would make, that he the people would sustain, such a proposition, amendment of the Constitution is impossible except by his will. The Empire is made permanent until the Emperor proposes its dissolution, or until a revolution overthrows it. The wisest heads in France may see the vital necessity of constitutional change. They may persuade the Emperor; but until they can persuade the Emperor, the change can not be lawfully made. This is a vague and immense peril. In this country, if we had a similar provision, we might assume that the President, elected by a party, would propose no fundamental amendment that the party thought desirable. But the Emperor is not elected. He is hereditary. He is for life, and he is amenable to no one.

Under the ordinary constitutional form a popular government is more practicable even in a monarchy. If, for instance, there were to general suffrage in England as there is in this country, the Queen would be felt more immediately that it is here. But a Constitution which is changeable only upon the proposition of the monarch is not a popular Constitution, and progress is possible under it only as fast and as far as he chooses. This was well enough when the system was that of personal government, as it has been since the coup d'état. But it can not be satisfactory to intelligent Frenchmen who are wish evolution, but who do wish that the lawful steps of political progress shall not depend upon the whim of an Emperor.

The election of representatives to initiate laws and to lay the taxes, a ministry responsible to the majority of the Legislature, and the abolition of the power of the Senate—the creature of the Emperor—over the Lower House and the Constitution, are all great gains. But here the divergence begins. The Emperor considers himself. The opposition consider the people. The Emperor says: "I will change the Constitution as my conception of my own necessities and interest dictates." The opposition says: "The Constitution should have the power to change the fundamental law whenever their welfare requires." If the Emperor should concede this, he might reserve to him to retire to-morrow. But until he concedes this he is not, in the ordinary sense, a Constitutional Emperor.

REPEAL OF THE TAX ON STATE BANK CIRCULATION.

THERE is a combined effort on foot to repeal the tax imposed by the General Government which has not hitherto operated to destroy the vicious circulation of the old State bank system, but to give as one in its place of improved if not of infinite evil. The change should be firmly resisted by Congress and the people.

The right to impose this tax assumes the supremacy of the General Government in protecting a circulating medium. Although the States exercised this power for many years, recent events have shown that it was a clear violation of fundamental principles.

At the outset of the recent war the alternative presented to the nation was this: whether to rely on the State banks in the multitudinous financial operations that grew out of the contest, or to devise a national system. After the suspension of the banks on the 31st December, 1861, they undoubtedly aspired to become the fiscal agents of the Government. The Subtreasury act prevented any arrangement of this character without the action of Congress, but a proposition to repeal the Sub-treasury act and devolve the duties of a fiscal agent upon the banks was made at the time under imposing auspices. The Government would have involved the use by the Government of the irredeemable currency of State banks, largely augmented in volume to meet a vast expenditure. The institutions which aimed at occupying this confidential position were in no degree responsible to the Government for their conduct, but were created by States not all of them harmonious with the principal object, and in many of them there were persons who were quite willing to improve obstructions. The banks were under no obligations to accept the duty; and if accepted and neglected they could be reached by no process whatever, as it was foreign to the objects for which they had been created. Even if this duty had been imposed upon them by State laws, their refusal to perform it could be punished only by the slow process of legal proceedings.

The motives presented to the Treasury for an alliance with these institutions were these: that the war was on foot; that all the gold and silver which they could raise had been loaned; that it was dangerous in the face of the enemy to establish a new system; and that, as they were in operation, the increase of their irredeemable issues would create less of a shock than either to create national banks, which were to start on the same unsound basis, or to rely on Treasury notes.

The emergency was appalling, but the Government and the people felt that in fact there were no features in the organization of State banks which permitted this connection. It would have been as reasonable to commit important national duties connected with commerce or the coinage to them, as to have devolved upon them the control of the circulating medium. The next step to follow such a measure would have been to make their bills a legal tender. In no event it would have amounted to a surrender of an important national power into the control of the States.

Perhaps a greater portion of the misery of creating State banks could be afforded than results from their inadequacy in time of war to meet the necessities of the condition. Although those of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston loaned freely at the beginning of hostilities, yet it became manifest that as the war advanced and their character was anomalous, and that if we were to have a paper system, another and a different one must be created. The obligation to rely on the State banks was very much like that imposed by the articles of Confederation, which compelled the General Government to call upon the States for quotas of men and money.

In the distribution of power between the States and the General Government complete control over commerce and the coinage was devolved upon the United States. As money is an important instrument of commerce, its regulation is of national concern; but there was a constant tendency to transfer this power over to the States, as a part of their reserved rights. So far did this extend that the right to create a national bank was denied, and the authority to create State banks was practically rendered to the States. This was, in truth, a surrender of one of the attributes of sovereignty.

The prohibition in the National Constitution upon the States, forbidding them to issue bills of credit, or to make any thing but gold and silver a tender for debts—prohibitions not extended to the General Government—show that the States were neither to issue nor to authorize the issue of a paper money. The power to issue the bills a tender in great emergencies must appertain to the paper system, and as the States were stripped of it, it is not to be supposed that any power of regulation was intended to be conferred on them.

These conclusions have been held to be constitutional on the ground that they were incorporated by the States to exercise private rights, and that their bills were not issued on the faith of State credit, but only of corporate credit. The mischief intended to be remedied was the universal evil system of paper-money, and the mischief was in full operation when the Government, in 1861, was brought face to face with the dilemma of a paper circulation over the whole Union, as to which it had surrendered its control.

In the light derived from recent events it can scarcely be supposed that the right to issue circulating notes free of tax, or under any circumstances, was conferred by the two subjects—restriction upon State circulation, and against the States making paper a tender—are linked together in the same section. The obvious disappearances—the legal-tender decision having been opened—there is likely to be the same harmony in the decision of the Court that exists in constitutional provisions.

A POLITICAL CALM.

WITH the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment there is a striking lull in the interest of general politics. The Georgia debate in the Senate has been interminable, and to most persons incomprehensible; and it yet remains to be explained upon what ground Senators justify long speeches addressed to the empty seats of their colleagues. They can not even plead that they are means for Buncombe, for Buncombe does not read them. They are not reported, and in the Globe, and editors are supposed to read that paper. But editors are human, and they discriminate. It is, therefore, fair to say that the speeches upon the Georgia question, which have occupied precious days of the Senate, have been heard by nobody and read by nobody. The languor of public interest in the Congressional debates which were remarkable during the House the tariff discussion, confined to the details of taxation, has been really very important, but prodigiously uninteresting. It is fair to be no contest of principle, but a sharp fight of special interests. Indeed, the chief political excitement has been in the New York Legislature, and in that "honest" body the victory of the Ring has been so complete as to be amazing that there is no longer any sign of war.

If parties were wholly arbitrary organizations, or if they were formed merely to accomplish certain results, they would disappear when those results were attained. If the Republican party had been only a union for the overthrow of the ascendency of slavery in the national policy, the creation of the Fifteenth Amendment would be the signal of its dissolution. But as the Democratic party, which for a generation was merely a conspiracy to perpetuate and extend slavery, survives the extinction of slavery, so does the Republican party. Total defeat does not end the one, nor absolute victory the other. They each continue as representatives and organs of a certain general tendency or political development. A hearty faith in the great principles of popular government, a generous hospitality toward new views and economic progress, a practical perception of the close relation between morals and politics, a deep conviction of the vital necessity of intelligence to a true popular will, generally lead a man to act with the Republican party, while the policy of that party upon any specific question that may arise will naturally be determined by the same characteristics.

Upon such immediate topics of public discussion as general financial policy and the tariff, neither of the great parties is harmonious within its own ranks. There are tariff Democrats and free-trade Republicans; neither party, as a party, is directly committed to protection or to free trade. Meanwhile, the financial measures of the Secretary of the Treasury are severely criticised by many Republicans, while the Democrats have no other policy than increasing circulation that the last measure caused the heavy taxation, and that taxes ought to be reduced. Upon the foreign policy there is the same disagreement among parties. The Administration, during the Cuban troubles, has faithfully enforced the laws of 1818, while Administration measures and appointments are ruthlessly condemned its position, and Democratic journals have sustained its action. Upon the Alabama question little has been openly said. The Republicans are, however, generally united upon the truth of the statement made in Parliament by Mr. Cobden in May, 1862, that England carried on war from her shores with the United States, violated international law, and flagrantly disregarded her neutral duties. The Democrats would take still higher ground upon the same side, if necessary to conclude the Civil War on the Presidential election.

But in the political lull of which we speak there is no doubt of a very general and profound confidence in the sagacity and integrity of the Administration. It has had as little respect for the celebrated constituency of Buncombe as any administration that ever existed. If the St. Domingo crotchet were out of the way, and a few appointments had been different, there would be nothing left but praise for the general conduct of affairs. It is a quiet, steady, working Administration, which is precisely what the exigency following the war demands. In view of what the Democratic party offered at the election, the general situation of the country is such as to occasion the sincerest satisfaction and congratulation. The Union is about being fully restored, and with its restoration political disinfection of class and section. If the great party to which this inestimable consummation is due is as wise as it is powerful, it power will indefinitely endure.

THE END OF LOPEZ.

THERE seems to be little doubt that LOPEZ is killed, and his death will of course end the war in Paraguay. Under his absolute despotism Paraguay has had a plantocracy and the master being dead, by common consent the struggle is over. This fact alone should be enough to show those who have depended upon describing Paraguay as a republic how entirely mistaken they are. LOPEZ was an absolute dictator. Everything was left to him by his father, who took possession of it upon the death of his uncle, DR. FRANCIA. The Paraguayans or Guaranis Indians are as capable of conducting and maintaining a republic as Hottentots or Egyptians, but no more so; and nothing can be more absurd than to represent either of them as which they have fought as an intelligent and devoted patriotism. It is impossible to read the interesting articles which CHAMBERLAIN MOSS, the late Minister to Paraguay, has contributed to Harper's Magazine, without seeing that MR. SARMIENTO told the simple truth when he said that the Indian inhabitants of Paraguay "consider themselves the property of the LOPEZ family, and fight for them because these chiefs fight against the white men whom they hate, and of whose characters and civilized practices they know only what this LOPEZ family has allowed to enter the precincts of the country."

The death of LOPEZ opens Paraguay to the trade of the world and the chances of civilization. There is a provisional government at Assumption, the capital, friendly to the successful alliance; and the alliance by the treaty of the 1st of May, 1865, has bound itself to respect "the independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity" of the country. To those who deplore what they call the overthrow of a republic by a slaveholding empire, let it be a consolation that the government of Paraguay was not a republic, but a more absolute despotism than that of BRAZIL, while slavery existed in Brazil and has ceased to exist in Brazil. If there had been more regard for things than for the name of things there would never have been any impression in the United States that the rule of LOPEZ was a republican form of government. It is hoped by many that the name of the dictator will only be honored among the great names of republicans or of patriots. He was a true despot upon an immense scale who tried to make his people wealthy, prosperous, and has lost his own with his life. And his loss is the gain of the people whom he ruled and of the world which he dicted.

THE LATEST WORD ABOUT THE "ALABAMA."

THE last contribution to the literature of the Alabama question is an edition of MR. SUMNER'S speech, with the map of Confederate cruises, and foreign publishing a corrected copy. This is prefaced with a very brief and forcible introduction by the author of the pamphlet. And is followed by a letter written in March, 1863, to that London correspondents, by a Boston house, sent by orders of the Alabama to address to an American merchant to some English members of the Society of Friends during the rebellion, urging them to do what they could to counteract the action of rebel cruisers in England, and the speeches of MR. COBDEN and of MR. THOMAS HARVEY favoring England of the neutrality obligations she was making. The pamphlet is handsomely printed, and is intended for English circulation, and to affect English opinion. In the editor's judgment it is of the utmost importance to England that the question be settled; and he believes that MR. SUMNER'S speech and the map are contribution toward a good understanding that has yet been made, and that he demands nothing which is not the true and the permanent fit of England and of the civilized world. He therefore hopes that the pamphlet will tend to renew the discussion.

A careful reader of the pamphlet, however, who does not believe that to grave a question can be properly settled without the use of reason, will find in it the utmost importance to England. It is the most conclusive argument to show that England was making her claims, and that she has no just ground for complaint. The introduction thinks that a more general and careful reading of MR. SUMNER'S whole speech in the Senate will make the impression made at Worcester, which is also included in the pamphlet, and designed to produce this result, and gives his reasons for so thinking; which reasons do not, however, appear to me conclusive.

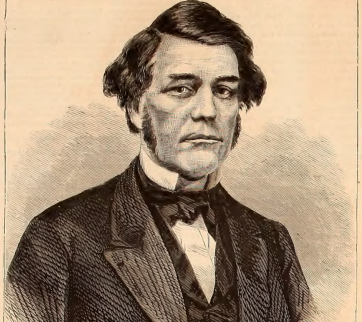
It will be with him and with MR. SUMNER in the opinions they express of the conduct of the English Government during the rebellion, and of the claims; and I think MR. SUMNER'S speech a very able one up to the point where he begins to discuss the "extent of our losses." He then gets upon dangerous ground, if the statement he was attempting to establish by him that 'a lawyer in drawing up his indictment, or a skilful general in making his claims, would not present his case in all its possible magnitude,' a valid one. He was speaking to a lawyer or court of lawyers, but as Senator, and his words were liable to be interpreted as those of the Senate of the United States, and, in fact, were so considered and replied to. If we had been present at the case before referees in record might have passed, but would have been even then impolitic, I think. So long as he described the conduct of the rebels he was admirable. But when one of those very Englishmen who took an active part in compelling the war to continue for a year than MR. SEWARD does. But it is worthy of notice that one of the English writers who replied to him make no reply to that part of his speech. They ignored the magnitude and the wonderful skill of the poorest claims to stir up the ire and obstinacy of John Bull, and would not consent to the question. Whether may be divided, with reference to this question, into four classes.

"1st. The Government—whose members understood the case, but were afraid to state upon England, but not see how they can wipe it out; and are too proud to acknowledge it. They would consequently be better

BISHOP CALVIN KINGSLEY.

THE Methodist Episcopal Church of this country has of late suffered in a remarkable manner from the death of leading members. It is but a short time since we gave obituary notices of Bishop THOMPSON and Dr. M'CLINTOCK; and a few days since intelligence came from the Old World that Bishop CALVIN KINGSLEY had died of heart-disease at Beirut, Syria. This accomplished scholar and faithful minister was a native of this State, having been born at Amesville, Oneida County, September 8, 1812. He was the eldest of twelve children. While a youth his opportunities for study were limited; but his thirst for knowledge made him superior to circumstances, and he laid the foundation of his education in study by night, and in the intervals of leisure in his working hours. By teaching in country schools he saved enough to defray partially the expenses of a collegiate education; and in 1836 entered Allegheny College, Pennsylvania, whence he graduated with honor in 1841. The same year he was elected Professor of Mathematics in his Alma Mater. In 1843 the Pennsylvania Legislature withdrew the appropriation for State colleges, and Professor KINGSLEY was selected, in connection with others, for the task of raising funds for the endowment of his college, which was successfully prosecuted. In 1843 Professor KINGSLEY debated with LUTHER LEE the question of slavery and its connection with the Church, proving himself in the discussion an able argumentative speaker. His speeches upon the anti-slavery side of the question had great weight in the councils of the Church, and added much to his reputation.

In the years 1844 and 1845, while stationed as preacher at Erie, he reviewed, in two lectures, Professor BEMAN'S work on the Resurrection, and in 1846, returning to Meadville, resigned his Professorship, but on urgent solicitation retained it at a considerable pecuniary sacrifice. At the session of the General Conference at Boston in the year 1852, he was at the head of his delegation, and made so favorable an impression, though a comparative stranger, that he received forty votes for Bishop. In 1853 he received the degree of D.D. from Genesee College. In 1856 he was a prominent member of the General Conference, and a member of the Committee on Slavery. At this Conference he was chosen editor of the Western Christian Advocate, succeeding Dr. ELLIOTT in that position. Dr. KINGSLEY displayed much editorial ability in his connection with this paper, and it became a powerful influence in the West. In 1860 he was chairman of the Slavery Committee in the General Conference, and managed the discussion on that subject with great ability and tact. He was at that time re-elected editor of the Advocate, and at the breaking out of the war brought its whole support to the aid of the Government. In 1864



THE LATE BISHOP KINGSLEY.—[PHOT. BY S. J. & C. W. HALLETT, NEW YORK.]

Dr. KINGSLEY was elected Bishop at the General Conference. In the summer of 1869 he started upon an Episcopal tour around the world. He went by the way of Oregon and California; and, having visited many points in Asia, had in his progress homeward reached Beirut, where he died. He was a man of liberal views, a thorough scholar, an able and successful instructor; and the intelligence of his death was received with general regret throughout the country.

THE HIPPOPOTAMUS.

THE name of this animal is derived from the Greek word which signifies river-horse; but it bears so small a resemblance to man's best servitor that African hunters, despising foreign roots, style them sea-bulls and sea-cows—names more apt, if not quite as euphonious.

It is generally believed that the behemoth of Scripture was a hippopotamus; at any rate, it is the only existing animal that would appear to answer the description of the sacred writer.

The name is significant of its amphibious nature, considerable diversity of opinion existing as to the length of time its structure admits of its remaining under water; probably ten minutes is the natural limit of endurance deprived of atmospheric air.

The hippopotamus, when on land, is at best no beauty; when full-grown, the male measures twelve feet in length, and as much in circumference, and its legs are so short that the belly nearly touches the ground; its body resembles in shape a hogshead placed lengthwise on four short sticks of timber. The nostrils and ears are placed nearly on the same plane; its eyes are large and prominent, its ears small, sharp, and stiff-looking, and surmounted by a few hairs; its hide rough but bare, an inch thick, and of a dark chocolate-color. The interior of the mouth is one of the most repulsive sights that can well be conceived, being like nothing in the world but a monstrous hole made with a jagged instrument in a mass of salmon's flesh. This unpleasant-looking mouth is garnished with four great tusks that protrude from between, and viciously curl up, the corners of his leathern lips. Ugly and dangerous as the tusks appear, that most vivacious and entertaining of modern travelers, DU CHAILLU, says, that after watching for a great many times the movements of the hippopotamus, he became assured that the huge crooked tusks are used and designed chiefly to hook up the long river grasses on which these animals feed. He has seen them descend to the bottom, remain a few minutes, and reappear with these tusks strung with grass, which was then leisurely chewed up. They make the whitest of all ivory, and on that account are in demand by dentists. It is not improbable, therefore, that some long since defunct sea-bull is yet aiding in the destruction of pate de foie gras and other dainties unknown to his own capacious stomach, the extent of which may be conceived when it is asserted that five to six bushels of half-masticated vegetables have been removed from the intestines of one of these animals.

One of the hippopotami in our engraving has had the honor of a biography by ALEXANDRE DUMAS the elder. He was secured in the waters of the Upper Nile, having been taken from his mother by the Cæsarean operation; he proved a troublesome infant, for his appetite was enormous; when only fifteen days old he required daily the milk of fifteen goats or of six cows to satisfy him, which nourishment he obtained by sucking a goat-skin made into a nursing-bottle—but then he weighed at birth nearly two hundred pounds. His appetite grew with his growth; when a month old the yield of thirty goats or twelve cows barely sufficed to keep him alive; however, he reached Cairo and eventually France, where he received a not over-generous welcome, as a female, not male, was required and expected at the Jardin des Plantes.

SPRING FARM WORK—GRAFTING.—[FROM A DRAWING BY WINSLOW HOMER.]

HIPPOPOTAMI IN THE JARDIN DES PLANTES AT PARIS.

The gentleman who had acted as his guardian for the first six months of his babyhood, having absented himself for some twelve weeks, paid his protégé a visit when he was nine months old, and attracted his attention by calling him by his Arabic name, when immediately he rose to the surface of the water-tank, exhibiting the most intense satisfaction at meeting his foster-father once more, giving vent to his joy in grunts resembling those of fifty porkers. So ALEXANDER DUMAS writes; but then DUMAS is a professed teller of stories.

The hippopotamus, as seen in captivity, although not beautiful, appears a quiet, inoffensive animal, and as such he was formerly described by naturalists; but modern travelers have many stories to relate of unprovoked attacks on men; and the natives of the country in which they are found certainly hold them in great dread.

Their jaws are extremely powerful, and, according to RAY, are long as are those of the crocodile, viz.: the upper jaw as well as the lower being movable.

They are very cunning and sagacious, and Providence has gifted them with eyes which can be protruded or withdrawn at the will of the animal, commanding a very wide area. PLINY tells us that "the cunning and dexterity of this beast is so great that he will walk backward in order to mislead his enemy." Of course this is not true; but they are wonderfully keen in scenting a trap, and will pause at the brink of the most naturally covered pit, grunt knowingly, and walk round it. The "spoor" of a man discovered in their regular paths is enough to rouse the suspicions of all the mother hippopotami of the neighborhood, and, taking their young ones, they emigrate, several miles sometimes, to safer quarters.

The researches of geologists have proved that in the earlier ages the hippopotamus was common to Europe and Asia; it is now found only in Africa, and there not universally, as it inhabits no river falling into the Mediterranean, with the exception of the Nile.

Hippotami are commonly seen in families of from ten to thirty, and in certain districts, particularly Nubia, are a terrible plague to the native farmer, by nightly inroads through the grain fields, eating enormous quantities, and spoiling more by the tread of their great feet. These animals rarely take to the dry land in the day time, so the natives usually hunt them in what appears to be their most dangerous element, and kill them with a specially shaped harpoon; using an ingeniously constructed raft or floating dâhâ made of reeds, under cover of which they approach to within striking distance of the sly brutes. This manner of hunting is comparatively safe, for, on account of the great size, buoyancy, and elasticity of the raft, the animal, however wickedly inclined, can neither "kneel" nor capsize it; but when one pursues him, as is sometimes done, in a canoe, the peril is very considerable, the wounded animal sometimes attacking the frail craft, which is instantly upset, and seizing one or other of the crew with a terrible grasp of his horrid jaws, either terribly mutilates the poor fellow, or, it may be, cuts his body fairly in two.

White settlers and sportsmen usually shoot them from the shore: but this compensates, or indeed quite, safe plan is accompanied by the drawback that the hippotamus when killed outright usually sinks, and then the sportsman has watched for the carcass to reappear on the surface, which is not to be expected.

Various devices are resorted to by the natives of Southern Africa to destroy these animals. At times they set strong nets, despite of their unwieldiness, in pitfalls: but the most ingenious plan is by means of the downfall, a heavily weighted log or spoon, suspended over a frequented hippopotamus path or trail, which is so contrived that the legs of the animal coming in contact with a string instantly destroy the support of the cunningly poised instrument, which, descending, is driven deep into the back of the beast, who, wounded and bloody, rushes with pain and fury to the nearest water, where he soon dies.

The flesh of the hippopotamus is highly esteemed, and with reason, for it is very delicate. The tongue is reckoned a delicacy; the fat is very excellent, and forms a capital substitute for butter.

As civilization advances the hippotami recede before it, and in a century or two will cease to be extinct, known only to students of natural history, classed with the mastodons and megatheriums of by-gone ages.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-EIGHTH.

(Continued.)

THE NEWS FROM GLASGOW.

BLANCHE was the first to break the silence.

"It seems like a fatality," she said. "Perpetual failure! Perpetual disappointment! Ann, Anne and I doomed never to meet again?"

She looked at her aunt. Sir Patrick showed none of his customary cheerfulness in the face of disaster.

She has promised to write to Mr. Crum," he said. "And Mr. Crum has promised to let us know what he hears from her. That is the only prospect before us. We must accept it as resignedly as we can."

Blanche wandered out listlessly among the flowers in the conservatory. Sir Patrick made no secret of the impression produced upon him by Mr. Crum's letter, when he and Arnold were left alone.

"There is, perhaps," he said, "that matters have taken a very serious turn. My plans and calculations are all thrown out. It is impossible to foresee what new mischief may not come of it, if those two women meet; or what desperate act Delamayn may not commit, if he finds himself driven to the wall. As things are, I own frankly I don't know what to do next. A great friend of the Presbyterian Church," he added, with a momentary outbreak of his whimsical humor, "once laid down, in my hearing, the true doctrine of priming was nothing more or less than a proof of the intellectual activity of the clergy. Upon my honor, I feel for the first time in my life inclined to agree with him."

He meditatively took up the Glasgow journal, which Arnold had laid aside, while he spoke.

"What's this?" he resumed. "I see the same caught his eye in the first line of the newspaper at which he happened to look. "Mrs. Glenarm again! Are they turning the iron-master's wife into a public character?"

There the name of the widow was, unquestionably; figuring for the second time in type, in a letter of the gossiping sort, supplied by an "Occasional Correspondent," and addressed to Paris by the title of "Sayings and Doings in the North." After tattling pleasantly of the prospects of the shooting season, of the fishings from Paris, of an accident to a tourist, and of a scandal in the Scottish Kirk, the writer proceeded to the narrative of a case of interest, relating to a marriage in the sphere known (in the language of footmen) as the sphere of "high life."

Considerable sensation (the correspondent announced) had been caused in Perth and its neighborhood, by the exposure of an anonymous attempt at extortion, of which a lady of distinction in the county had been the object. As her name had already been publicly mentioned in an application to the magistrates, it appeared to be no impropriety in stating that the lady in question was Mrs. Glenarm—whose approaching union with the honorable Geoffrey Delamayn was heralded to in another column of the journal.

Mrs. Glenarm, it appeared, had received an anonymous letter, on the first day of her arrival as guest at the house of a friend, residing in the neighborhood of Perth. The letter warned her that there was an obstacle, of which she was herself probably unaware, in the way of her projected marriage with Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn. That gentleman had seriously compromised himself with another lady: and the lady would expose his marriage to Mrs. Glenarm, with proof in writing to produce in support of her claim. The proof was contained in two letters exchanged between the parties, and signed by their names, and the correspondence was addressed to Mrs. Glenarm's disposal, on two conditions, as follows:

First, that she should offer a sufficient pecuniary price to induce the present possessor of the letters to part with them. Secondly, that she should consent to employ such a method of paying the money as should satisfy the person that he was in no danger of finding himself brought within reach of the law. The answer to these two proposals was directed to be made through the medium of an advertisement in the "Scotsman" newspaper, inscribed by this address, "To a Friend in the Dark."

Certain turns of expression, and one or two mistakes in spelling, pointed to this insolent letter as being, in all probability, the production of a Scotchman, in the lower ranks of life. Mrs. Glenarm had at once shown it to her second husband, Captain Newcombe. The captain had sought legal advice in Perth. It had been decided, after consultation, that no notice of the advertisement demanded, and to take measures to entrap the writer of the letter into revealing himself—without, in the mean time, informing the fellow really to profit by his attempted act of extortion.

The cunning of the "Friend in the Dark" (whoever he might be) had, on trying the proposed experiment, proved to be unexpectedly much for the lawyers. He had successfully eluded not only the snare first set for him, but those subsequently laid. A second, and a third, anonymous letter, one more impudent than the other, had been received by Mrs. Glenarm, assuming that lady and the friends who were acting for her, that they were only wasting time in withholding the price which would be asked for the correspondence, by the course they were taking. Captain Newcombe had, therefore, in addition to knowing what other course to pursue, appealed publicly to the city magistrates; and a reward had been offered, under the sanction of the municipal authorities, for the discovery of the man. This proceeding having proved entirely fruitless, it was understood that the captain had arranged, with the concurrence of his English solicitors, to place the matter in the hands of an experienced officer of the London police.

Here, so far as the newspaper correspondent was aware, the affair rested for the present.

It was only necessary to add, that Mrs. Glenarm had left the neighborhood of Perth, in order to escape further annoyance: and had placed herself under the protection of friends in another part of the county. Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn, whose fair fame had been assailed (it was needless, the correspondent added, to say anonymously, to say knowingly), was understood to have expressed, since the investigation commenced under the circumstances, but also his extreme regret at not finding himself in a position to aid Captain Newcombe's efforts to bring the anonymous slanderer to justice. The honorable gentleman was, on the sporting pitch were well aware, then in the course of strict training for his forthcoming appearance at the Fulham Foot-Race. So important was it considered that he should not be harassed by annoyances, in his present responsible position, that his trainer and his principal backers had thought it desirable to hasten his removal to the neighborhood of Fulham—where the exercises which were to prepare him for the race were now being continued on the spot.

"The mystery seems to thicken," said Arnold, coldly.

"Quite the contrary," returned Sir Patrick, briskly. "The mystery is clearing up—thanks to the Glasgow newspaper. Miss Silvester has gone to Perth, to recover her correspondence with Geoffrey Delamayn."

"Do you think she would recognize it," said Arnold, pointing to the newspaper, "in the account given of it here?"

"Certainly! And she could hardly fail, in my opinion, to recognize the writer. Unless I am entirely mistaken, the authorship of the anonymous letters has not puzzled her."

"How could she guess at that?"

"In this way, as I think. Whatever she may have previously thought, she must suspect, by this time, that the missing correspondence has been stolen, and not lost. Now, there are only two persons whom she can think of, or possibly guilty of the theft—Mrs. Inchbare or Bishopriggs. The disadvantages against the writer of the anonymous letters declares it to be the style of a Scotchman in the lower ranks of life—in other words, points plainly to Bishopriggs. You see that? Very well. Now suppose she recovers the stolen property. What is likely to happen then? She will be more or less than woman if she doesn't make her way next, provided with her proofs in writing, to Mrs. Glenarm. She may innocently help, or she may innocently frustrate, the end we have in view—either way, our course is clear before us again. Our interest in communicating with Miss Silvester remains precisely the same interest that it was before we received the Glasgow newspaper. I propose to write to Mrs. Crum on the chance that Mr. Crum may write again. If we don't hear from him, I shall visit the Crums on Monday morning, and take my chance of finding my way to Miss Silvester, through Mrs. Glenarm."

"Leaving me behind?"

"Leaving you behind. Somebody must stay with Blanche. Mr. Crum having only been a Tory eight married, must I remind you of that?"

"Don't you think Mr. Crum will write before Monday?"

"It will be such a fortunate circumstance for us, if he does write, that I don't venture to anticipate it."

"You are down on our luck, Sir."

"I doubt it, Arnold—I do. But stung, I own, expresses my state of mind, in this instance, with an accuracy which almost reconciles me to the use of the word once in a way."

"Every body's luck turns sooner or later," persisted Arnold. "I feel it. Only thinking our luck is on the turn at last. Would you mind taking a bet, Sir Patrick?"

"Apply to Blanche. I leave betting, as I leave cleaning the horses, to my groom."

With this playful answer he closed the conversation for the day.

The hours passed, and time brought the post again in due course. Was there a letter from Arnold's favor? Sir Patrick's want of confidence in the turning current of Fortune was practically rebuked by the arrival of a second letter from the Glasgow lawyer on the next day.

"I have the pleasure to inform you" (Mr. Crum wrote) "that I have heard from Miss Silvester. She has left Perth by railway train after I had dispatched my letter to Ham Farm. She writes, very briefly, to inform me that she has decided on making her next stopping-place in London. The reason assigned for taking this step—which she certainly did not contemplate when I saw her—is, that she finds herself approaching the end of her pecuniary resources. Her object in going to Glasgow, as a means of living, the calling of a concert singer, she has arranged to place her interests in the hands of a friend of her late mother (who appears to have belonged also to the music profession), a professional musical agent long established in the metropolis, and well known to her as a trust-worthy and respectable man. She gives me the name and address of this person—a copy of which you will find on the inclosed slip of writing paper—if my having occasion to write to her, before she is settled in London. This is the whole substance of her letter. I have only to add, that it does not contain the slightest allusion to the nature of the errand on which she left Glasgow."

Sir Patrick happened to be alone when he opened Mr. Crum's letter.

His first proceeding, after reading it, was to consult the railway time-table hanging in the hall. Having done this, he returned to the library—wrote a short note of inquiry addressed to the master of Ham Farm—and rang the bell.

"Miss Silvester is expected in London, Duncan. I want a discreet person to communicate with her. You are the discreet person."

Duncan bowed. Sir Patrick handed him the note.

"If you start at once you will be in time to catch the train. Go to that address, and inquire for Mr. Dawkins. If he has arranged to give her my compliments, and say I will have the honor of calling on her in Mr. Dawkins's behalf at the earliest date which she may find it convenient to appoint. Be quick about it—and you will have time to get back before the last train. Have Mr. and Mrs. Brinkworth returned from their drive?"

"No, Sir Patrick."

Pending the return of Arnold and Blanche, Sir Patrick sent Mr. Crum's letter to the press.

He was not quite satisfied that the pecuniary motive was really the motive at the bottom of Anne's journey south. Remembering that Geoffrey's friends had returned to the neighborhood of London, he was inclined to doubt whether some serious quarrel had not taken place between Anne and Mrs. Glenarm—whether some direct appeal to Geoffrey himself might not be in contemplation on the part of the writer. Sir Patrick's advice and assistance would be placed, without scruple, at Miss Silvester's disposal. By inserting her claim, in opposition to the claim of Mrs. Glenarm, she was also asserting herself to be an unmarried woman, and was thus serving Blanche's interests as well as her own.

"I owe it to Blanche to help her," thought Sir Patrick, "and I owe it to myself to help Geoffrey Delamayn to a day of reckoning if I can."

The barking of the dogs in the yard announced the return of the carriage. Sir Patrick went out to meet Arnold and Blanche at the gate, and told them the news.

Punctual to the time at which he was expected, the discreet Duncan reappeared with a note from the messenger.

Miss Silvester had not yet reached London; but she expected to arrive at that later than Tuesday in the ensuing week. The agent had already been favored with her instructions to pay the strictest attention to any commands received from Sir Patrick's bundle. He would take care that Sir Patrick's message should be given to Miss Silvester as soon as she arrived.

At last, then, there was news to be relied on! At last there was a prospect of seeing her! Blanche was radiant with happiness. Arnold was in high spirits for the first time since his return from Baden.

Sir Patrick tried hard to catch the infection of gayety from his young friends; but, to his own surprise, not less than to theirs, the effort proved useless. With the tide of interest turning decidedly in his favor—relieved of the necessity of taking a doubtful journey to Scotland; assured of obtaining his interview with Anne in a few days' time—he was out of spirits all through the evening.

"Still down on our luck!" exclaimed Arnold, as he and Blanche had finished their first game at billiards, and parted for the night. "Surely, we couldn't wish for a more promising prospect than our prospect next week!"

Sir Patrick laid his hand on Arnold's shoulder.

"Let us look indulgently together," he said, in his whimsically-grave way, "at the bumblepuppy of human life. And mark it well, I feel, at this moment, Arnold, as if I would give every thing that I possess in the world to have passed over next week, and to be landed safely in the time beyond it."

"But why?"

"There is the folly! I can't tell why. With every reason to be in better spirits than usual, I am unaccountably, irrationally, invincibly depressed. What are we to conclude from this? Am I the object of a superstitious warning of misfortune to come? Or am I the object of a temporary derangement of the functions of the liver? That is the question. Who is to decide it? How contemptible is humanity, Arnold, when it is frightened! Give me my candle, and let's hope it's the liver."

EIGHTH SCENE.—THE LAWYER.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-NINTH.

ANNE WITH A VICTORY.

On a certain evening in the month of September (at that period of the month when Arnold and Blanche were traveling back from Baden to Perth), Mr. Bishopriggs—tall and spare, and blind, and one eye moist and merry—sat alone in the library of the Ham Farm, Perth, pounding the sugar softly in a glass of whisky-punch. He has hitherto been personally unknown to these pages. He was the professional father of Anne Silvester and the humble servant of Geoffrey Delamayn, on certain occasions. He now dawns on the view in amicable relations with a third lady—and assumes the mystic character of Mrs. Glenarm's "Friend in the Dark."

Arriving in Perth the day after the festivities at Ham Haven, Bishopriggs proceeded to the Harp of Scotland—at which establishment for the reception of travelers he possessed the advantage of being known to the landlord. At the barber's right-hand man, and of standing high on the head-waiter's list of odd and intimate friends.

Inquiring at the latter first for the home of Thomas (otherwise Tommy) Pennyquick, Bishopriggs was informed that during his own private interests by performing the part of Thomas Pennyquick's generous and devoted friend.

The friendship offered in this place, without taking the emoluments, of the invalided headwaiter—or the undertaking, either, as a matter of course, that the landlord consented to board and lodge him free of expense at the inn. The landlord having gratefully accepted the services of Thomas as Pennyquick retired to the bosom of his family. And there was Bishopriggs, doubly secured behind a respectable position and a virtuous action, against all likelihood of suspicion falling on him, as to the singular part which he was playing in correspondence with Mrs. Glenarm being made the object of legal investigation on the part of her friends!

Having opened the campaign in this masterly manner, Bishopriggs now signalized his victory by punished the operations of Bishopriggs throughout.

His correspondence with Mrs. Glenarm was invariably written with the left hand—the writing being disguised defying detection. So much as bearing no resemblance of character whatever to writing produced by persons who habitually use the other hand. So also Bishopriggs's cunning distinguished his proceedings in answering the anonymous letters which the lady inserted in the newspaper. He appointed hours at which he was employed on business-errands for the inn, and places which led his way to those errands, for his meetings with Mrs. Glenarm's "Friend in the Dark" to take place. He proceeded on, as usual in such cases, by exchanging which the persons concerned could discover each other. However carefully the lawyers might set the snare—whether they had their necessary "witness" disguised as an artist sketching in the neighborhood, or as an old woman selling fruit, or what not—the wary eye of Bishopriggs detected the trap, and the passe-avoid accepted. He went his way on his errand; he was followed on suspicion; he was discovered to be only "a respectable person," charged with a message by the landlord of the Harp of Scotland Inn!

To a man introbched behind such precautions as these, the chance of being detected might well be reckoned among the last of all the chances that could possibly happen.

Company was, nevertheless, advancing on Bishopriggs from a quarter which had not been included in his calculations. Anne Sylvester was in Perth; forewarned by the newspaper (as Sir Patrick had guessed) that the letters offered to Mrs. Glennarn were the letters sworn to Crosby and herself, which she had lost at Craig Ernie, and bent on clearing up the suspicion which pointed to Richmond as the person who was trying to turn the correspondence to pecuniary account. The inquiries made for him, at Anne's request, as soon as she arrived in the town, openly described his name, and his former position as headmaster at Craig Ernie—and led, not easily to the discovery of him, in his publicly avowed character of Thomas Pennycuick, retired friend. Toward evening, on the day after she reached Perth, the news came to Anne that Bishopriggs was in service at the inn known as the Harp of Scotland. The landlord of the hotel at which she was staying inquired whether he should send a message for her. She answered, "No; I will take my message myself. All I want is a gentleman to show me the way to the inn."

Secluded in the solitude of the head-waiter's pantry, Bishopriggs was generally nedring the sugar in his whisky-ganch.

It was the hour of the evening at which a period of tranquillity generally occurred before what was called "the night-business" of the house began. Bishopriggs was accustomed to drink and meditate daily in this interval of repose. He tasted the spirit, and smiled confidentially to the set down his glass. The prospect before him looked fairly enough. He had outwitted the lawyers in the preliminary negotiations for the All that was needful now to wait till the terror of a public scandal (caused by the publication of letters from her "Friend in the Dark") had had its due effect on Mrs. Glennarn, and hurried her into paying the purchase-money for the correspondence with her own hand. "Let it breed in the brain," he thought, "and the siller will soon come out o' the purse."

His reflections were interrupted by the appearance of a severely respectable man, with a handkerchief tied round her head, and an unclean sauce-pan in her hand.

"Eh, Maister Bishopriggs," cried the girl, "here's a braw young leedy speerin' for ye by yer ain name at the door."

"A leddy?" repeated Bishopriggs, with a look of virtuous disgust. "Ye dunnot ne-te-do-weed, do you come to a decent, spondulic house like this wi' sic a Cyprian overture as that? What d'ye mean, ye limmer? Is it money that's brought a leddy for love (the mair fule he!)? or Don Jovanny that coamed his conceptions by hundreds, like the blessed Shakespeare himself? Go to the yer pots and pans; and bid the wandering Venus that sent ye go spin."

Before the girl could answer she was gently pulled aside from the doorway, and Bishopriggs, thunder-struck, saw Anne Sylvester standing in her place.

"You had better tell the servant I am no stranger to you," said Anne, looking toward the kitchen-maid, who stood in the passage staring at her in stolid amazement.

"My ain sister's child!" cried Bishopriggs, lying with his customary readiness. "Go yer ways, Maggie. The lassy and I must talk this out and kin. The tongue o' scandal, I trow, has nothing to say against that, when I see my own guide us!" he added in another tone, as the girl closed the door on them, "what brings ye here?"

"I have something to say to you. I am very well; I must wait a little first. Give me a chair."

Bishopriggs obeyed in silence. His one available eye rested on Anne, as he produced the chair, with an uneasy and suspicious attention. "I'm wanting to know one thing," he said. "By what meerciculous means, young madam, do ye happen to be fund yer way to this house?"

Anne told him how her inquiries had been made, and what the result had been, plainly and frankly. The cloaked face of Bishopriggs began to clear again.

"Hech! hech!" he exclaimed, recovering all his native impudence, "I has had occasion to remark aiready, to author Mrs. Glennarn, that it's seemply marvelous hon a man's ain gude deeds find him out in this lower world o' ours. I has done a gude deed by puir Maister Pennycuick, and here's a Fairth ringing wi' the report o' it; and Sawnie Sylvester's niece (I was known that ony stranger has only to ask, and find him. Understand, I beseech ye, that it's no hand o' mine that gets this bee-line to the cage. As a guide Calvinist, my saul's clear o' the smallest figment o' belief in Works. I only look at my ain celebrity I joost ask, as the Psawmist asked before me, 'Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?' It seems ye've something to say to me," he added, suddenly reverting to the object of Anne's visit. "Is it humanly possible that ye can ha' come a' the way to Fairth for nothing but that?"

The expression of suspicion began to show itself again in his face. Concealing as she best might the disgust that he inspired in her, Anne stated her errand in the most direct manner, and in the fewest possible words.

"I have come here to ask you for something," she said.

"Ay? ay? What may it be ye're wanting of me?"

"I want the letter I lost at Craig Ernie."

Even the sedately-dignified self-possession of Bishopriggs himself was shaken by the startling directness of that answer on it. His right tongue was paralyzed for the moment. "I dinna ken what ye're drivin' at," he said, after an interval, with a sullen consciousness that he had been all but tricked into betraying himself.

The change in his manner convinced Anne that she had found in Bishopriggs the person of whom she was in search.

"You have got my letter," she said, sternly insisting on the truth. "And you are trying to turn it to a disgraceful use. I won't allow you to make a market of my private affairs. You have stolen a piece of mine for the value of my forgeter. I insist on your restoring it to me before I leave this room!"

Bishopriggs hesitated again. His first suspicion that Anne had been privately instructed by Mrs. Glennarn was succeeded to his mind as a suspicion confirmed. He felt the vast importance of making a cautious reply.

"I'll no' waste precious time," he said, after a moment's consideration with himself, "in thrashing out the question o' theft or scandal, when it passes my way. It blaws to nae purpose, that young leddy, when it blaws on an honest man like me. For forbye that ye're saying what ye've joost said—to me that was a father to ye at Craig Ernie!—Wha set ye on to it? Will it be Mrs. Glennarn that's amicca'd me behind my back?"

Anne took the Glasgow newspaper from the pocket of her traveling cloak, and placed it before him, open at the paragraph which described the Bishopriggs exposure among the Perthites.

"I have found there," she said, "all that I want to know."

"May a' the tribe o' editors, preenters, papermakers, news-venders, and the like, bizzen to the place they ca' Hell for it!" With this devout aspiration—internally felt, not openly uttered—Bishopriggs put the newspaper from him. The passage pointed out to him. "I see naething here touching the name o' Sawmuel Bishopriggs, but the name o' ony ferse to see in her life to, as had at Craig Fernie," he said, when he had done: still defending his position, with a resolution of passive resistance.

Anne's pride recoiled at the prospect of producing the forged letter herself. She rose to her feet, and said her last words.

"I have learned enough by this time," she answered, "to know that the one argument that prevails with you is the argument of money. Name the amount you require, and instruct me in disputing with you—poor as I am, money you shall have. Be silent, if you please. You are not interested in what I have to say about that."

She opened her purse, and took a five-pound note from it.

"If you choose to own the truth, and produce the letter," she resumed, "I will give you this, on your account. For fifteen pounds more I will do something that I had lost. If you persist in your present prevarication, you may think it worth the while to cheat a mere paper you have stolen from me nothing but waste paper in your hands. You have not understood Mrs. Glennarn's proposal to you. Suppose I go to Mrs. Glennarn? Suppose I enclose the letter of Mr. Delamere's in my possession, and produce them to speak for me? What has Mrs. Glennarn to purchase of you then? Answer me that!"

The color rose on her cheeks as she spoke. Her dim and weary eyes shone with a sudden light, her head rose with a proud and resolute bearing, her voice rang clear and firm. Bishopriggs looked at her, and was startled, with a burst of her old energy which revealed the fire and passion of the woman's nature, not yet exhausted in her.

If Bishopriggs had a merit, it was a rare merit, a merit which is not often met with in men. If he had an accomplishment, it was the accomplishment of retiring defeated, with all the honors of war.

"Mercy presairve us!" he exclaimed, in the most overwhelming manner, "I'm no' sure to be sat that wi'n the letter to the man ca'ed Jaffray Delamayn, and gat the wax bit mower in pencil, on the black seal. Bless me, Miss, in Heaven's name, was I to know that was the letter ye were after when ye com in here? I'm very well, but ye see I'm no' a mane bloodhoun' at the knife? Never mind. Was the puir feckless husband-creature ye had set up at the Craig Ernie Academy to be fleeced and mak' twa o' him, as my ain eyes ha' seen. Gi' ye back yer letter? Ye shall have it, and welcome. Ye'll excuse me? I'll gi' it back wi' a bit pleesure in life!"

He opened his pocket-book, and took it out, with an alacrity worthy of the honestest man in Christendom—and (more wonderful still) he looked with a perfectly assumed appearance of indifference at the five-pound note in Anne's hand.

"Hoot! toots! I'll no' be hard on ye. Ye're a' my mind that I'm free to tak' yer money. Eh, weel! weel! I'll ken receive it, if ye like, as a free gift atween friends. Ye're a' the mair free ama' service to ye at the bottle. Yell no' mind," he continued, producing the letter from his pocket-book, "if I joost ha' a bit drink-penny on me? I'm no' joost a-line in the way o' receipt, ye ken —to clear me o' ony future suspicion in the matter o' the letter."

Anne threw down the bank-note on the table near which she was standing, and snatched the letter from him.

"You need no receipt," she answered. "There is the only letter for which I have to account you!"

She lifted her other hand to tear it in pieces. Bishopriggs stopped her with both wrists, at the same moment, and held her fast.

"Bide a wee!" he said. "Ye don't get the letter, young madam, without the receipt. It may be a' the same to you, now ye've married the other man, whether Jaffray Delamayn once was accused o' murder in the by-gone time, or no. But, my certie! it's a matter o' some moment to me, that the accusation should be cleared off the score, and making a market o't, and Lord knows what beside. Ye'll no' get the letter, I tell ye, without ye've it in black and white. Gi' me my bit receipt —and een do as ye will with yer letter after that!"

Anne's hold of the letter relaxed. She let Bishopriggs repossess himself of it as it dropped on the floor between them, without making an effort to prevent him.

"It may be a' the same to you, now ye've married the other man, whether Jaffray Delamayn once promised ye fair in the by-gone time, or no. Those words repeated Anne's position before her in a light in which she had not seen it yet. She had married the man she loathed. Sir Geoffrey now inspired in her, when she had declared, in her letter to Arnold, that, even if he offered himself at the last moment for the part, she would rather be what she was than be his wife. She had never meant to be, until this moment, that others would misinterpret the miserable pride which had prompted the abandonment of her self-sacrifice to one who had ruined her. It had never been brought home to her until now, that if she left him contemptuously to go his own way, and sell himself to the first woman who had money enough to buy him, her conduct would sanction the false conclusion that she was powerless to interfere, because she was married already to another man. The color that had risen in her face, mounted to her brow, left it deadly pale again. She began to see that the purpose of her journey to the north was not completed yet.

"I will give you your receipt," she said. "Tell me what to write, and it shall be written."

Bishopriggs uttered the receipt. She wrote and signed it. He put it in his pocket-book with the five-pound note, and handed her the letter in exchange.

"Tear it if ye will," he said. "It matters nae mair to me."

For a moment she hesitated. A sudden shudder passed through her frame, at the recollection of the thing, it might be, of the influence which that letter, saved from destruction by a hair's-breadth, was destined to exercise over her life to come. She recovered herself, and folded her cloak closer to her, as if to keep out the infection.

"No," she said; "I will keep the letter."

She folded it and put it in the pocket of her dress. She turned to go—and stopped at the door.

"One thing more," she added. "Do you know Mrs. Glenarn's present address?"

"Ye're no' reely going to Mistress Glennarn?"

"That is my affair, and yours. You have given me my question or not, as you please."

"Eh, my leddy! yer tempers no' what it used to be in the auld times at the lonely. Aweel! aweel! ye ha gien me yer money, and I'll ken tell ye. Mrs. Glennarn is still—for the time—at Mistress Glenarn's awa' in private—ing, as they say—to Jaffray Delamayn's brither at Swanhaven, Lincolnshire. It may rely on the information, as it is no' that easy to come at either. They're keeping it a secret, now they think from a' the warld. Hech! hech! Tummy Pennycuick's youngest but twa is page-boy at the house where the leddy's been wanting to be—on the outskirts o' Lunnon. Keep a secret if ye can frae the pawky ears o' his discreet parents, my dear! Heh—heh—heh!"

Anne left the room, and walked rapidly out of the house, without referring grimly on her previous overthrow of the promising speculation on which he had embarked. "My certie! there was nothing left for't, when madam's fingers had gripit me, but to slip through them as cannily as I could. What's Jaffray's marrying, or no marrying, to do wi' her?" he wondered, reverting to the question which Anne had put to him before leaving. "And what's the news to me, raisd, if she's reely bent on finding her way to Mistress Glennarn?"

When Anne sat down at her errand night he, Anne's next proceeding proved that she was really bent on it. After resting two days at the Perth by the first train in the morning, for Swanhaven Lodge.

ANTIPATHIES.

SOME curious instances are on record of the antipathy displayed by individuals toward certain articles of food. Erasmus, himself a native of Rotterdam, had such an aversion to fish that even the smell of it threw him into violent sickness. Scaliger and Peter Abano never could drink milk; and Cardan was particularly displeased at the sight of eggs. Philip II. of Spain gave a whimsical reason for his dislike of fish: "They are nothing but elements congealed, or a jelly of water."

Usually the colors of flowers are agreeable; but there are exceptions to this rule even in precise a totally different effect. The jonquil and the tuberose are inseparable to some; others again not bear the odor of a violet. Even roses, the last flowers to be suspected, have excited the greatest aversion. The Princess de Conti was brought on by the marsh-mallow; saffron has been known to produce swooning.

Fainting, there is an aversion to certain animals. Henry III. of France, though he had driven his enemies out of the kingdom, was overcome from head to foot at the sight of a cat. When a lure crossed the celebrated Duke d'Epernon's path his looser effects became the victim. Albert, a brave field-marshal of France, fell insensible to the ground on seeing a sucking-pig served up whole at his own table. Ambrose Paré mentions a gentleman who could never see an owl without fainting. There is an account of another person who would fall into convulsions at the sight of a carp. A French lady always fainted on seeing boiled lobsters. M. De Lamet gives an account of a man who was so terrified at seeing a hedgehog, that, when he pursued the imagined his bowels were gnawed by such an animal. The same author was familiar with a very brave officer who was so frightened at the sight of a mouse that he never dared to look at one unless he had a sword in his hand. The author of the "Turkish Spy" tells us that he would rather encounter a lion, provided he had but a weapon in his hand, than feel a spider crawling on him in the dark.

Two English sailors, who had been left in charge of Dr. Livingstone's steamer at Tette, had a curious method of dealing with the travelers there. Having ascertained the market-price of provisions, they paid that and no more. If the natives refused to leave the steamer till the price was increased, a chameleon, of which the natives are very fearful dread, was placed under the cabin; and the moment the natives saw the creature they at once sprung overboard. The chameleon settled every dispute in a twinkling.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

TO CURE DYSPEPSIA.—Close all the outer doors of a four-story house, open the library doors, and then take a long switch, and chase a cat up and down until she sees streaks.

Charlie, a bright four-year-old, of Norwich, was in an unusually mood the other day, and his mother was furnished him to look pleasant. But his face continued to wrinkle, till she remarked: "Why, Charlie, I am afraid you will get your face so that you can't be smart!" Charlie brightened up at once, and retorted: "Why, I calculated to laugh, but, mamma, my face slipped."

A husband two years after marriage met an old friend who congratulated him upon his impressive personal appearance, but said, "I remember you a downy growth smaller." "No wonder," was the reply; "I never shed I saw you I have been coming down handsomely."

A smart old Western lady, being called into court as witness, after inquiries touching her residence, character, and told the judge that she would quit the stand, as he was "only one of the most inquisitive old gentlemen she ever seen."

A young gentleman, who has just married a little undersized lady, says she makes a capital wife, but she is made of such precious materials that Napoleon could not afford it.

A CHICAGO EXPERIENCE.—That of the railway station master.

A young lady in Galesburg, having "set her cap" for a rather large specimen of the opposite sex, and having failed to win him, was heard to remark to a couple of her confidants, when one of them consoled her with the remark that "there were plenty more, there are no good fish in the sea as ever were caught." "Unlike known fish," replied her little brother; "but she wants a whale."

A young gentleman at Wapello, Iowa, sent seventeen cents to New York recently for a book on how to write without pen or ink. He received the following inscription, in large type, on a card: "Write with a pencil."

A blind mendicant who frequents the Rue St. Honoré, in Paris, has the unenviable notoriety of being accused, "Behold the father of four children, the result of a terrible accident!"

PLEADING AT THE BAR.—Begging for a drink.

A lady conversing a room, letter B, at a hotel in New York, was asked on the slate what B was. "Make letter B set seven, and if letter B says, 'Let her be,' let her be; if letter B says, 'Let her alone,' let her alone; if letter B be, letter B will be unable to let her house to you. You will have to call at the office." Then the person, a much better boot-black than orthographist, affectedly rubbed out the slate, and did not know whether to wake letter B or to "let her be."

"All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players," said the lecturer, by way of reverence to Shakspeare—very poor players, most of them.

A NATURAL COLOR.—The gray of the evening.

If a girl were to fall into the water, and were unable to stir, why would she partly change her sex?—Because she would be a boy (buoy) when afloat.

FRESH FROM SCHOOL.

EMILY (little sister). "What a large family the Spiderstern must be, Mary! I never heard before that some of them are going to be married."

MARY. "Emily, you are a little stupid! Don't you know what spinsters are?—Bachelor ladies, of course."

THE RUBBS OF DOMESTIC LIFE.—A hoop-skirt.

"The following anecdote is told of the painter Barrett. He one day went to a friend's house to buy a puppy. A friend, seeing two holes in the bottom of his door, asked him for what purpose he had made them. Barrett said it was for his cats to go in and out. 'Why,' replied his friend, 'you have only one cat.' 'Yes,' said Barrett, 'but you see I have only one hole.' 'Why can't the cat go through the same hole?' said his friend. 'Why, you fool,' said Barrett, 'could not the little one go through the big hole?' 'Why, to be sure,' said Barrett, he could; but I never thought of that."

THE TOPIC OF DAY.—A lady in the country, the clock having struck twelve, looked out of the window, and called the garden to see what time it was; when one of the boys replied that the clock had already struck three, but that he had not learned that the cook had left. Upon this the lady exclaimed, in an extreme rage, that the servants might tell the time themselves.

PLEASANT FUN TO SAY.—Those of your tailor.

Smith, the auctioneer, is a popular man, a wit, and a gentleman. No person is offended at what he says, for he is always good-natured, and has a ready way to express. He was recently engaged in the sale of several beautiful horses, and Jones, a friend of Smith's, said to "going, going, and a half, going," when he saw a gentleman in the audience, an eccentric individual, bid at him. A wink is as good as a nod to a blind horse, and Smith, seeing that Jones was not to be bidded, and the man wished to purchase, cried out, "Going, going, gone!" Jones, whose object was gone, gave a sigh, and really like he was knocked down.

"To whom?" said Smith, gazing at the smiling stranger. "To whom?" repeated Jones, "why, to—I don't know who." "Why, you, Sir," said Smith. "Who, me?" said the man on the bid, said Smith. "Yes!" Hang me if I did!" insisted the stranger. "Why, did you not wink, and keep winking?" said Smith. "Winking? Well, I did, and so did you at 'going, going, gone!'" "Yes," said Smith, "I saw you, and thought you was winking as much as to say, 'Good luck, and I'll stick somebody in the ear for it!'" and he added as much as to say, "I'll be hanged if you don't, mister?"

No matter how gold may get, it will never want friends.

The only bluestone from whom a brave man will take a blow is the sky.

AN AUCTION SALE.—DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.—[SEE PAGE 283.]

JACK IN THE BOX.—FROM A PAINTING BY H. H. COUDERT.—[SEE PAGE 282.]

A STOLEN VISIT.

When you are wrapt in happy sleep,
I walk about your house by night,
With many a wistful, stealthy peep
At what I've loved by morning light.

Your head is on the pillow laid,
My feet are where your footsteps were;
Your soul to other lands has strayed,
My heart can hear you breathe and stir.

I seat me in your wonted chair,
And ope your book a little space;
I touch the flowers that knew your care,
The mirror that reflects your face.

I kiss the pen that spoke your thought,
The spot whereon you knelt to pray,
The message with your wisdom fraught,
Writ down on paper yesterday,

The garment that you lately wore,
The threshold that your step has gone by,
The music that you fingered o'er,
The picture that contents your eye.

Yet when you wake from happy sleep,
And hear him, and my fancy, too,
You take your wonted morning peep
At what is good and wise in him,

"She has been here," you will not say,
My prying face you will not find;
You'll think, "She is a mile away"—
My love hath left no mark behind.

JACK IN THE BOX.

Our illustration on page 281 is engraved from a pleasant little picture by Mr. H. H. Courdery, a young English artist of great promise, which we shall compose and excellently drawn. Its chief merit, apart from the spirit and humor of handling exhibited in all the details of the picture, lies in the character the artist has thrown into the faces of those two attentive little Sicke'tenes. He has not only made himself acquainted with the droll mysteriously left open, and to which he refers us. Master "Jack" and his partner in mischief have rolled out and broken through a bandbox, and therefrom extracted a bonnet, the veil of which the latter is proceeding to tear: while Jack himself, feeling master of the situation, is content to plant his paws outside the box, and, with head slightly awry and twinkling eyes, to survey the wreck with a comical expression of triumph. As no less happily conceived touch is that of the peering kitten in the background, who, longing to share in the sport, is yet fearful of joining thirty rougher playmates.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book V.

CHAPTER IX.

A RESOURCE.

The evening of Lord George Segrave's dinner-party was the first occasion on which Cesare de Barletti had given his wife a glimpse of the brute fury that was latent under that quiet, dry demeanor. They had had quarrels before: lovers' quarrels: in which Cesare had protested against Veronica's cruelty, and Veronica had played off her despotic airs, and they had both been vehement, and demonstrative, and childish. And the end of such quarrels had invariably been to bring back Cesare humbly imploring pardon at the feet of the triumphant beauty.

But never had his looks and tones been such as to make her astonished eyes and ears on that miserable evening.

And there was no deep repentance afterward, no humble sing for pardon on his part. He approached her the next morning with a smile and a kiss: and when he saw that the cloud, the storm, were not, he merely shrugged his shoulders, lit his cigar, and sauntered off into the stable-yard.

In truth Cesare considered himself to be the injured person. His will, by her inconceivably absurd temper, had led him into a scrape, which error had thrown him into a rage. That was no trifle. Cesare was always particularly careful not to fly into a passion if he could avoid it. And his temper was so indolently mild in general that he had no great difficulty in avoiding frequent ebullitions of anger.

To an unaccustomed English eye, indeed, he might have seemed to be in a continual fury on many occasions when his feelings were scarcely stirred. He had the southern characteristic of instantly translating slight and superficial emotions into very violent outward expression by means of voice, face, and gesture: and he was working off excitement at a cheap cost, if the phrase may pass.

But whenever angry motion went beyond the slight and superficial stage with him, it was apt to become very terribly intense indeed, and to assume the form of personal hatred, and a deadly desire of vengeance against the object of it.

To talk to Cesare Barletti about hating a sin but pardoning a sinner, or to use any phrase involving a similar idea, would have appeared to him very much like uttering meaningless jargon.

He never conceived or thought of any thing in an abstract form. The unseen—the intangible—had no power over his imagination. Hate a sin, indeed! Why, should he hate a sin? Che, che! But he could hate a sinner, or a saint either, if need were—with a relentless animosity of which it would be difficult to exaggerate the bitterness.

On the occasion in question, however, his anger had been merely evanescent. It was all an absurdity and a mistake. What if a man did express his opinion that such and such people were too rigid in their notions to desire to associate with them? Well, so much the worse for such and such people, as he had said to his wife. He had all his life heard about English prudery. There were young persons who pretended to play cards and to go to the opera. Was he to distress himself about this? Certainly not, was Princess Cesare de Barletti. That was sufficient with persons who knew the world. He would permit no man to insult the Princess Cesare de Barletti with impunity.

Cesare's quickness of perception was rapidly bringing him to the conclusion that it was a far finer thing to be a "prince" in England than in Naples. Veronica, in bantering her mother, had herself open him, had not then made an entirely one-sided bargain. The consideration was not an unpleasant one.

He drove over to Hamnicle Lodge more than once after the first visit to Lord George, and met several guests there, mostly bachelors, and, with few exceptions, active patrons of that noble institution—the Turf. Cesare found these gentlemen pleasant and unaffected; entirely devoid of the insufferable airs which he had been accustomed only looking for since his arrival in Great Britain, and had found up to the height of his expectation in only one individual—the accomplished Mr. Dickinson.

The "turf" gentlemen, on their part, found Barletti a charming fellow, and were delighted to make his acquaintance. But the "turf" gentlemen have learned to be very wary indeed about one singular blemish in Barletti's moral nature; the unaccountable "nervousness" on any betting event whatever, on the extraordinarily naive plea that he did not understand betting.

"Why, you see, my dear sir," said this gentleman, with a long, sharp chin and dull, fishy eyes, "it's as simple as A B C."

"Ah, gih!" returned the prince, with much suavity. "But A, B-a, C-a is not simple unless you have learned it."

Nevertheless, despite this deplorable lack of emergence on Cesare's part, he was very popular at Hamnick Lodge. He played at nothing remotely good game at écarté, a very fair one at whist, and that he was entirely free from the "nervousness" did not certainly operate against him in Lord George's good graces.

He had an formal reconciliation with his wife, but the coolness between them—which in fact was all centered on her side—passed away in a day or two.

Cesare never knew how much it cost Veronica to condescend to that kind of reconciliation. Expression of the deepest penitence on his part. And his generosity in the sacrifice her despotic spirit was forced to make rendered that sacrifice, perhaps, a little less difficult than it would otherwise have been. At least he could not detect any perception of what she deemed a bitter humiliation.

In her loneliness—and she was very lonely: but, as Cesare said, it was she who had deserted to come to Shipley, and could not come to people would not call on her?—she had recourse to the only human resource on whose presence decision she could rely. She took to writing letters to Mr. Plew.

Her letters at first were short; mere notes written with the excuse of asking his advice upon a point of that trifling point of regimen. She would follow his advice—or not, as it happened—being over it, and she really believed that exercise would be good for her. Could he not come to see her? Why had he not been? The first note brought, not Mr. Plew, but a brief professional communication of the gentle, fatherly kind from her consideration. In the second note, she asked the man why he had not come to see her. Of course, as had been whispered to her, that the attractions of a certain meek dove had succeeded in engrossing him altogether. Mr. Plew's reply she dispatched this note than she wished to read. It was a business-like bill of it. It was too familiar—too condescending.

The answer to it, however, contained no allusion to her hint; perhaps it was not understood. It merely stated that Mr. Plew would willingly call over to Shipley, but that he was not in the service to her; but that, unless she had need of his presence, he must refrain from doing so. His advice was at her command if he can give it: to mention he could give her.

This reply in the surgeon reached Veronica on a rainy afternoon. She was dull and dispirited. Her husband was at Hamnick. The usual scenes of quarrel and "make-up" had subsided in with Veronica's mood at the moment of receiving it. She sat with her elbows on her knees her cheeks as she sat with her head leaning on her hand, looking down on the note. She must open some topic with Mr. Plew: must originate some what of the weight of sadness that oppressed her must be relieved by another human heart a few, at least, of her sorrows.

She sat down to write to Mr. Plew. As she wrote on, the half revelations she had intended became whole revelations. She found a relief in the depiction of her loneliness and some of her faults. She would rather speak evil of herself than not speak of herself at all. She poured forth her complaints and her self-accusations without reserve.

Here was one who would listen patiently, who would sympathize sincerely, who would feel her sorrows as his own. Here was a heart that might be trusted to beat faithfully, let it ache as it would. His judgment might condemn her, but his feelings would take her part. He might preach, warn, reprove her even, but the reproof would have no sting. She could accept such reproof, she could embrace it, for she would know that it came out of the depth of a great love. He would ask nothing, he would expect nothing, he would resent nothing. He could thrust himself aside with a sublime magnanimity, and think only of her.

So she sent the letter.

"What do you mean so often to that man for, Cara Vorcica?" asked Cesare, unexpectedly, on the day following that on which her third letter had been dispatched.

"So—so often?" she stammered. The question took her by surprise, and she was startled by it.

"Yes; it is often, I think. Two letters in one week. This lying on the table"—and Cesare took up a pink envelope sealed and directed to "the surgeon"—"is the third."

"It is kind of you not to recollect that I told you I had consulted Mr. Plew about my nervous headache. I wrote to him partly about them and, besides, he is one of my oldest and most intimate friends. I have known him from a child."

"Ah, Benissimo!" replied Cesare, coolly. And that was all that he seemed to have forgotten the whole affair.

But when, in the course of two more days, a reply arrived from Mr. Plew, Cesare, playing with the Spitz dog in one corner of the sofa, watched to see how the letter was delivered to her—watched her while she opened it and began to read it, and finally asked, "Is the letter from our good friend, il reverendissimo Signor Vicario?"

"No; it is from Mr. Plew."

The instant directness of the answer seemed a little unexpected by him. He looked up at her with a face which then began to strike her as in a more caressing way than he had used before.

"Where are you going, dearest?" he asked, presently.

"To my own room."

"To read your letter in peace? May I see it?"

"See it? See this letter?"

"Yes: is it indiscreet?" he asked, showing his white teeth in a smile that flashed for a second and was gone.

For a scarcely perceptible space of time Veronica hesitated. Then she replied: "No," and tore it deliberately.

"You are as curious as a baby!" she said.

He took the letter and pored over it gravely. Then he brought it back to her and kissed her hand.

"I can't read it," he said. "What a devil of a writing!"

Veronica had fully reckoned on this inability of Cesare's. Between his imperfect knowledge of English and the cramped characters of Mr. Plew's handwriting, that looked as though it were expressly contrived and adapted for the purpose of strawing the hieroglyphics familiar to our eyes in doctors' prescriptions, she had been reasonably sure that Cesare would fail to gain much information from the letter, let it contain what it might.

"Why should Cesare have wanted to see that letter?" she asked herself when she was alone in her own room, and it must be from the mere suspicious dislike that any thing, however trifling, should pass between me and any one else with which he was not fully acquainted. I have noticed this trait in him lately—only lately. He did not use to be so Italy."

Veronica forgot that in Italy Cesare had been himself her sole possible confidant.

When the letter arrived Mr. Plew's letter she felt glad that Cesare had been unable to decipher it. Every word of it was from the heart—was made him justly discontented with Mr. Plew; but there were many words with which she could not have brought herself to write.

"The account of your unhappiness cuts me to the heart, but I write in one hope. "I can not at all skilfull with my pen, nor able to express what I feel. But I am so sure you are wrong in giving way to such melancholy thoughts, and yet I pity you so much for having them. I still hoped that you were at least happy and contented. God knows that there is nothing I would not give to see you so."

And again: "I can solemnly certain that your first duty now is to try to gain your husband's whole confidence and affection. Remember you have him freely, and he loves you: what he was no one else, whom you knew of, to love you."

And once more: "I wish I was clever and could write like you. But I can not. I can only beg and pray you to cast off gloomy and despising thoughts. There is one thing we can all do—try to be kind to others. Think of their sorrows more than your own. Even in my humble way I find that this soothes my pain of mind as nothing else does. And you, who are so rich, and so young, and so clever, might be a deal of good. You don't know the misery there is in the world that a few copper coins would lighten. I feel your confidence in writing to me very sacred. I will ask for your sake that you would have no secrets from your husband. You ask me to come and see you. I can not just at present. My mother is very ill; and there is an epidemic fever in the parish. My life is not always in bed of roses."

Within a week after the receipt of that letter Mrs. Plew was dead. And the Prince and Princess de Barletti had gone away to London in great haste; for a malignant form of typhus fever was raging in Shipley Magna.

CHAPTER X.

A FRIENDLY TEA-DRINKING.

It was near the end of a very sultry summer day in London—a day in the quite late summer. The people who were able to leave town next week pronounced that the season was over. The people whose business, or interest, or impecuniosity obliged them to linger a while longer, declared that there was so much going on still they positively didn't know how to keep all their engagements.

It was, however, near enough to the period styled by London redeemer "the end of the season" to bring it to pass that Miss Betsy Boyce had no dinner invitation for that day, and no invitation to any later assembly, and that she was consequently drinking tea at about half past five o'clock in Mr. Lovegrove's house in Bedford Square.

Betsy Boyce was quite free from any vulgar prejudice in favor of the cochineal-blushing or asphalte-blushing hours. She would drink tea at seven o'clock, or nine at night, or breakfast at one hour from nine a.m. to two p.m., with perfectly accommodating good-humor.

"It matters very little what you call a meal," she would say. "If you eat between eight and nine o'clock at night, and like to eat a good dinner, I'm quite content. If you have your real solid dinner at two or three, and your old-fashioned tea at five or six, and like to call that lunch, or kettle-drum, or any thing else, I'm equally content. Some people lives in the world more than do us in the world does the matters. I have heard papa say that when he was at Vienna, at the court of Prince Metternich, he has seen him often at a grand banquet, playing with a plateful of brown bread-and-butter, and tasting nothing else. And he ate his whitebait food at a wholesome hour, of course. But he never thought of changing people's manners and customs. "

Something of this kind she had said in answer to Mrs. Lovegrove's ostentatious little apology for inviting her to tea at seven o'clock.

It is not, of course, to be supposed that a kind of virtuous, self-denying severity that would have exasperated any one less genuinely tolerant and good-natured than Betsy Boyce—"I say," and I do not understand the usages of the circles in which you habitually move. I should be strange, head up as I was at our place in the country, among the élite of our country society—you won't think my words offensive, country society is a general rule, more exclusive and more rigid on the score of birth than the mixed and ever-varying circles of the metropolis—should be strange if I did not understand those usages.

"Oh be sure," said Miss Boyce, pleasantly. "What good cake this is! Thanks; I will have a piece more of it."

But when Mr. married Mr. Lovegrove I put all that aside at once and forever. I looked my position in the face, and accepted all its conditions.

"And a very comfortable position it is, too, Mrs. Lovegrove," she added, and acknowledged a good many ladies of my acquaintance would be to jump into and be thankful for."

It will be perceived that the acquaintance between Mrs. Lovegrove and Miss Boyce, begun in Mrs. Frost's drawing-room, had advanced now to something like intimacy.

Betsy Boyce was, as she herself declared, emphatically a social being. She was just as cheerful and content in the solicitor's house in Bedford Square as at my lord duke's in Carlton Gardens. And while she regaled the lawyer's wife with stories of the Olympian feasts she shared with the gods and goddesses, whose mythic glory carefully edited with a view to its meeting the public eye in connection with Bernard Bodgers' red volumes, she never offended her hosts by appearing to despise their earthlier hospitality.

Mr. Lovegrove considered Miss Boyce to possess extraordinary spirits and an immense fund of anecdote. Mrs. Lovegrove thought her a genuine pleasure in her conversation, as it reminded her of the old times passed at her papa's place in the country, a sagacious asked Betsy once upon tea as to the spread of High-Church doctrine among the country, and was answered with a certain illustrious person was going over to Rome? Altogether, she was a general favorite with the whole family.

One frequent topic of her conversations with Mrs. Lovegrove was the lamentable state of affairs in the household of the vicarage, as she designated Mr. Frost's residence. Things were going on there, it would seem, from bad to between husband and wife, she meant. Georgina was an old friend of hers, but she must say Georgina was to blame. She was not sufficient to Mr. Frost's comfort, so neglectful of his home, so careless of his ease, and so indifferent about displeasing him. She on her side complained of her husband's meanness and parsimony. He neglected her health, and declined to hear that. Which, said Miss Boyce, was certainly odd in a man who had always been so lavishly indulged a husband.

"Perhaps he has at last been able to discover a fool that woman has been making of herself by her extravagance, and is beginning to turn over a new leaf. I am sure I hope he has, and will try to hope so!" said Mrs. Lovegrove, with all the fervor of charity.

"Georgina tells me," said Miss Boyce, "that there is at times something so strange about her husband, that he seems scarcely in his right mind. Something is preying on him, I fancy. It isn't business troubles, I suppose, eh?" It was forbidden to Miss Boyce to suppose that Mr. Boyce was good-natured, for she was rarely discreet, and not a little curious.

"What business troubles Mr. Frost may have on his private account I am unable to say," replied Mrs. Lovegrove. "But as to Frost and Lovegrove, there is no cause for anxiety about them; of that you may be quite assured."

"Ah, then I dare say it is mostly, if not entirely, Georgina's fault. He is desperately fond of her, and she is as hard and cold to him as a block of ice."

"I consider Mrs. Frost's infatuated weakness for his wife to be positively culpable! But what, alas! can one expect from a man totally devoid of religious principles?"

In order to avert the stream of Mrs. Lovegrove's indignation from Sidney Frost—by whom the kindly old man had a real liking—Miss Boyce changed the subject of discourse.

"Ah, dear me!" she exclaimed, fanning herself, "it is a queer world! Talk of books! I know much stronger stories than ever I read in book yet. Have you ever known the Bartletts, for instance. What a career hers has been!"

"Oh, do tell me. Was she ever so favored in the highest society? I trust not, for the credit of our aristocracy."

"H'm!" Well, I don't know that one more or less would much affect the credit of our aristocracy."

"Eh?"

"However, that's neither here nor there. I believe the fact is she is not much remembered. She might have been taken up at one time by a certain set. But she is devoured by ambition. She wanted to be as great a lady as the greatest, and to play princess: and that wouldn't do."

"Ambition indeed! pretty matter of fact!"

"Yes; pretty ambition. But yet—it seems a strange thing to say; but I am not sure there is not a grain of perverted good in it."

"Good! How do you mean?"

"Well, I—I think a woman who would have been downright, frankly bad and unscrupulous, might have had a better chance."

"My dear Miss Boyce!"

"Yes: I know it sounds very horrible. But what I mean is this: that young woman can't be contented with the society of flashy folks of doubtful reputation. She might have got that, having money and beauty, and a taste for society. But—you may call it pride, or ambition, or whatever you like—she can't content herself. She knows there is something higher and better than that sort of thing, and that she aspires to it. She can't be at peace without the good opinion of persons she can respect, and—she will never get it."

"I should think not."

"She will never get it, because she has not strength to make any real sacrifice of her vanity and selfishness. And yet I believe she is eating her heart with misery and unavailing regret in the midst of all that she paid such a terrible price to gain!"

Mrs. Lovegrove stared at the speaker in surprise. She had never seen such a grave expression on Betsy Boyce's round, ruddy-cheeked visage. The kind old lady had always been inclined to a serious tone as she spoke, and when she ceased there was something like a tear in her eye.

Sarah Lovegrove's heart, although it did not beat with remarkable warmth, was better than her creed. But she repressed a sentimental movement of pity by way of asserting the stern purity of her principles, and replied, with elongated under lip and incisive brevity, "That is the natural result to which such iniquity leads, Miss Boyce."

"Dear me," said Miss Boyce, "I've been making quite a preachment! But it is not altogether my own wisdom that I have been uttering. The fact is that I was yesterday with that sweet creature, Maud Desmond, and she talked to me a little about the vicar's family, and when she was out of the room, Mrs. Shearsdown talked for a good deal, and, between the two, I got a pretty clear notion of the state of the case."

"You don't mean to say that Miss Desmond visits her?"

"No, no: their lives are apart altogether. But I don't believe that if Veronica needed any thing—if she were sick, for instance—Maud would go to her directly."

"Would Mr. Lockwood allow that?" asked Mrs. Lovegrove, with something like a sneer.

"Yes, I think he would. But I am very glad we'll take him for, if he would oppose it."

Mrs. Lovegrove had not yet forgiven Maud for preferring Hugh to her son. As Maud had not turned out to be an heiress, the thing was the less to be regretted. But to think that Veronica justice, she had been almost as willing to encourage Augustus's pretensions to one as to any idea of Maud's being wealthy as after. And her maternal vanity had been ruffled by the young lady's cold disparagement of her idol's charms.

Mrs. Lovegrove's character was not malicious at bottom, however, and, after a moment's pause, she said, "I do think Miss Desmond is a really good girl."

"Good? She's an angel! And so clever!"

"Indeed? I did not perceive much—a—much solidity of intellect in Miss Desmond. She—she—seems but she is very young still. However, it was a very proper attention on her part to call on us directly she came to town. I'm sure Augustus grove knew her mother well. He is, indeed, in some sort, the young lady's guardian, and he was gratified by her coming."

"Maud Desmond always does the right thing," said Miss Boyce, with a severe remembrance of Augustus's ill-starred wooing. "It was a good thing that the Shearsdowns brought her to town with them on a visit. Very nice people the Shearsdowns. I knew them at Shipley. I hear often from that neighborhood, and I fancy the vicarage was no fitting or pleasant place for the girl."

"Really!" exclaimed Mrs. Lovegrove, with a strong gleam of curiosity in her gray eyes.

"Oh, I'm afraid not. Emma Hughes writes to me—there, I've let her name slip out. But you don't know her, and, probably, never will, so it don't much matter. Well, this young lady tells me that the vicar is going to the dogs—that isn't her phrase, but it is her meaning—as fast as he can. He has cut his old friends, and formed low connections. And he doesn't even attend to the duties of his church, but has got a wretched curate, at twopence a week, to do his duty for him, and, in fact, the whole thing is as bad as it can be. He's no fit guardian, and his house is no fit home, for a young girl."

"A—clergyman—of the—Church—of—England!" said Mrs. Lovegrove, with enormous slowness, nodding her head at each word.

"Oh dear, yes! There's no doubt in the world about that."

Then the tea-things were cleared away, and presently the Misses Bowles and Lucy and Dora Lovegrove made some music. And Augustus sang a Latin hymn, accompanying himself; and if the vocal qualities of the performer were the most insudible at the other end of the drawing-room, the piano-forte part was attacked with unsparing vigor. Then Miss Boyce, at her request, and she went home, having passed, as she protested, a very pleasant evening.

AUCTION SALES.

OUR illustration on page 280 will be recognized by every New Yorker as a truthful sketch of the scene presented by many of the auction-rooms of this metropolis at this season of the year, when families are breaking up for the customary summer residence in the country. The upsetting of "moving-day"—the grand annual nuisance to which our citizens are subjected. There is probably no city in the world where the rule of the landlord is more despotic, or more oppressively enforced than in New York. We have, comparatively, keep the same house two years in succession; and whatever the change, it generally entails changes of carpets, furniture, etc. If the family move into a more elegant or larger house than the one they have been occupying, a new set of furniture must be made to correspond; and, if, as is the case with hundreds this year, high rents compel them to take refuge in flats, where they have superfluous furniture to dispose of, at any rate, some of their superfluous goods fill the auction rooms, and give rise to many scenes like the one so faithfully depicted by our artist.

"THE RED PLANET MARS."

MASS stands prominent among the planets for the distinctness and variety of the markings on his disk exhibits. When a telescope of adequate power is turned upon this remarkable orb, what we see, struck, in the first place, by the singular brilliancy of the two white spots, which have long since been recognized as the snowy poles of moonless Mars." They stand out so conspicuously from the rest of the disk that often, when a mist passes over the surface of the planet, they may be distinctly recognized, like two faint stars, like all the rest of the fixed stars in the heavens, and forms a sort of frame, within which the true features of Mars's surface are seen to the best advantage. Their bonize is supposed to be due to light cumulus clouds in the Martial atmosphere. When closely observed in the case of our own orb, would only become perceptible to us where, through the effect of foreshortening near the edge of the disk, they were crowded together—in appearance—and thus concealed the true surface of the planet from view. Generally, however, they exhibit a greenish tint of exquisite delicacy.

But it is on the surface of Mars that the chief colors of Mars are to be seen. The body of the planet, or what may be assumed to be its true surface, is of a ruddy hue, which, in some parts, there somewhat yellowish. There are also to be seen occasionally spots of salmon-colored and brownish patches, and even black spots of small size. We may not unreasonably look upon all these portions of the planet as continents and oceanic substances, resembling those which constitute our own globe and continents. Next, covering a large extent of the disk very little less than that occupied by the ruddy regions, we have spaces which are commonly described as green, but which, to others they appear of an indigo-gray or neutral color. Like the red parts, the grayish or greenish spaces are variable in extent. In some places they are so faintly tinted as to appear almost white; in others they seem tinged with a purplish hue. We can not doubt that these portions are in reality seas, and not fresh-water seas, but seas like our own, which are the home of life as they contain. The varieties of color correspond, indeed, quite closely with the appearance of our own oceans, from the light green hues of the polar seas to that strange, deep hue which Homer has described as the wine-dark sea.

A French astronomer was led, by the singular appearance of two shadow on Mars, in 1862, to very strange theory respecting the physical conditions which prevail upon his surface. Noticing that the ruddy portions of the planet most clearly during the Martial summer, he came to the conclusion that vegetation upon the Continents of the Mars than on our own earth. In place of green leaves the trees on that distant world put forth red leaves, he argued, and the Martial landscape, in fields recover from the effects of the long Martial winter, but in place of what we term verdure they are clothed with ruberscence. If this theory be true, the Martial poets might say of spring, more truthfully than our own have do so, that "She cometh, blushing like a maid."

But we have no great reason for supposing that this theory is correct. Certainly, vegetation does not appear green if her continents could be viewed from afar off, as we see Mars. Nay, even our forests, supposing them large enough to be separately visible, would scarcely exhibit a discernible green tint. A very eminent landscape-painter used to deride the notion that trees are green: "leaves are green, if you will," he used to say; "but trees—they are any color but green; black, white, yellow, red, but never green." And, making allowance for the requirements of prejudice, the assertion is not far from the truth. No one ever saw out of a picture-book, and that a bad one, a really green forest. And, by parity of reasoning, we may assume that if vegetation on Mars ever be, as it is, seen in large masses, the red tints would be lost.

The fact seems to be that we have a reasonable explanation of the ruddy tint of the Martial continents in the fact that the principal part of the soil of that planet resembles those red and ochreish soils which appear in various parts of our own world. A few years ago, Professor Way, will, that the Martialists are passing through the cold and nendstone period; and pos ibly some thousands of years hence observers of Mars may see with wonder the signs of a soil wholly different from that now visible to us.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

AMONG the independent newspapers in France express their astonishment at the result of the trial of Prince Pierre Bonaparte. The Siècle advises that the Emperor from his exile set the storm of indignation blown away. Yet he is not one who is likely to hide himself for any such reason. On the day of the acquittal an immense crowd had gathered outside of the courtroom, eager to hear the verdict. When the prisoner was expected to go to the Hôtel de l'Univers, society of sympathizers, who had long awaited his coming. The crowd was quiet, yet scattered all through it were the great Garnier, and a host of the municipal guards. Wonderfully patient were the people—never uttering a murmur during the day, until at last, about four o'clock, there was a cry of joy. A few carriages, with all the windows up, slowly forced its way through the multitude, the crowd never closing in its rear but along the way from the prison to the hotel. Some of the Siècle among the crowd, and tendered warm congratulations to him on the happy result of the trial. A great many people in Paris that France would soon also be requested by the Emperor to quit France for an indefinite period, and many of the newspapers gave the report full credit.

The University of Vienna has taken a progressive step in deciding to open its medical courses to women, and confer medical diplomas on them.

A singular story is told of a man in Fall River, Massachusetts, who in December last, while eating a piece of bread and butter, felt something sharp, which subsequently proved to be a needle, in his mouth. The needle could not be seen, and he knew to be seen. After three or four days it worked into the right side a number of times, causing the most painful abscess. A little above the abscess the needle was so near the surface that it caused the flesh to protrude like a pimple, but the physicians could not find it, especially as they had some doubt as to the cause. Two weeks ago the abscess broke spontaneously, and the needle was drawn out. The needle in the mean time worked back into the side of the throat, and then up under the tongue, causing great swelling and pain. A week or two ago it was discovered protruding under the tongue, and was extracted. The needle measured one and a quarter inches, and at times during the four months it has been in the body it has moved.

A report has recently been made by the French committee for encouraging hippophagy, which contains some startling facts. The first horse-flesh feast was opened July 9, 1866, and during the remainder of the year 869 steeds were cut up and sold for Paris dining-tables. This would be at the rate of 2,600 a year. In 1867 the whole number of victims was 2187; and in the following year it reached to 2811. The record for the last year has not yet appeared; but it is evident Parisians are not afraid of eating horse-flesh.

It is a dreadful state of affairs when members of the same family, especially when husband and wife, get so "out out" that they can't speak peaceably to one another. We have been led to the reflection of the Simeon Twist, if, as report says, they have not spoken to each other for a month, owing to a difficulty about receipts!

The French navy has adopted a novel arrangement by which all apprentice seamen are to hereafter to be taught on the ships as regular exercise.

During the recent Carnival festivities an amusing incident occurred in a city on the Rhine. The mayor of the city has a son, who had no person qualified in domino dress on the streets. The police had strict orders to arrest every one who broke the regulations; by the mayor's wife and one of her friends had not heard of the ordinance: they put on dominos, were arrested by the police, and were known to be police. station before they were released. The policeman who arrested them showed great zeal in the performance of his duty.

A little fellow, not ten years old, performed a noble and touching act, which deserves public record. One morning as the Pacific Express train, Pennsylvania Railroad, was rounding a curve on the mountain-side near Altoona at rapid rate, a deep precipice yawning on one hand and high rocks on the other, a small lad threw his arms around his big but and timid brother, his arms aloft. The train was stopped within a few feet of a mass of rock that had fallen upon the track, and to have thrown engine and passenger-cars over the precipice. The boy, whose name is Willie Calder, has been the fall and hastened to signal the approaching train.

The moths are busy these warm April days, and unless furs and woolen garments are carefully attended to they will be ruined. Every lady has her own special method of preventing such ravages, as she deems to be injured by these destructive creatures. Camphor, pepper, tobacco, and various such articles are ready powders, are used as preservatives. Some use linen wrappings, some merely newspapers. In every case the articles should be thoroughly beaten before being put away, so that if moth-eggs have been already deposited they may be dislodged.

One of Raphael's finest paintings is now on exhibition at the Louvre, and possibly may be purchased by the French government. It is the Virgin and Child, executed for the monastery of St. Anthony of Padua, at Perugia, in 1506. The picture is in an excellent state of preservation, and art critics in France are eager for its purchase; but the price demanded is no less than one hundred thousand francs.

The free use of tomatoes is condemned by Dr. Dio Lewis, as he is of opinion that they cause blocking of the gums, loosening of the teeth, and irritation of the membrane of the intestinal canal. The tomato is said to have a rank and specific action upon the liver: and as, by temperaments and habits, Americans are predisposed to biliousness, Dr. Lewis thinks a moderate sparingly—perhaps a medicine, is sensitive by very beautiful: but that it is not well to make a daily article of food.

A sudden lady of ninety-three recently appeared in a Massachusetts court to defend herself against an action brought for her to turn a dower widow's worth of labor which had been performed for her. When placed upon the stand she made a clear statement, and, aside from being deaf, seemed to possess all her faculties in a healthy condition, and to be good for many more years.

A man being brought into court on charges of larceny was asked if guilty of the crime. Turning to the judge, he innocently replied, "No, Sir, no yes!" "Prisoner," said the ruffled magistrate, "don't put on your airs with me, or I'll commit you for contempt of court. I ask you again, are you guilty or not? and tell you, no!" But this man says he detected you in the very act of larceny." "Yes, Sir, yes!" was the feeling bitter. "Feeling him! How do you make that out?" "I felt making believe, as you do sometimes," "Sir, what do you mean?" "Why, the other night, when you were counting the spoons in the kitchen, I thought you were tight, but I knew you were only making believe!" Prisoner discharged.

In one of the most fashionable quarters of Paris a great dry-goods establishment has opened a grand spring opening. The novelty of the occasion was the presentation of a beautiful bouquet of flowers with every purchase of not less than its cheapest bonnet ribbon. "Nothing like the deepest," $5,000 bouquets had been sent from Nice for the purpose. Large bouquets of roses, camellias, and violets blossomed in the entrance; and over the whole establishment, outside beneath its gilded sign, on the pavement, down the street, poured and pushed a number of customers such as few shops have dreamed of in their most golden dreams.

The "Bazar Book of Decorum," which has just been issued in a tasteful form by the Messrs. Harper, says: "The functions of the natural eye and eye-glasses are much abused. It is quite clear that the whole world is not composed of a world of a wonderful or afflicted with short-sightedness as to render the use of artificial means for the relief universally necessary. Nineteenths of the people, male and female, who are constantly rubbing their eyes with eye-glasses through glass, require no other medium than the one provided by the Creator. Nothing can be more blind, and we assert it in the face of assenting Fashion, than ogling a stranger in the streets through an eyeglass—something him at the opera or the Jenny Brilliant, or surveying an opposite neighbor at the window with a double glass."

The other day a man applied to a New York physician to be vaccinated. On examining his arm the doctor found that the operation had been recently performed, and inquired of the man the reason why that he was vaccinated a few weeks ago in Chicago, but that he didn't suppose it was of any account in New York!

It is said that the Irish female domestics in New York city, having been annoyed to receive a mock cook toward building the Catholic Cathedral, they have, in turn, assessed the amount on their employers. Employers are very objective to paying, and hence there are a good many idle servants in interference offices, and a good many ladies in the kitchen.

About five miles from Yonkers, in a rude hut in a secluded nook, lives an old man, who for many years has supported himself by hoeing corn. About 1830 he was in his own account he was born in Strasbourg, in 1793. He was well educated, an artist by profession, and traveled extensively in Europe. Misfortunes, however, compelled him to join the army, and he served many years in the Napoleonic. But finally acquired he found his friends dead or scattered, and came to America, where for seven years preaching a church in Albany he accidentally lost his footing on the scaffold and fell to the floor, breaking his right leg and arm. He was laid up a long time, and when the wounds had healed had lost the use of his right arm and so engaged in his present humble occupation, became a beggar. Nine years ago he wandered to the present abode, where he lived ever since, earning a precarious livelihood by carving wooden canes and selling them to visitors.

The hermit occasionally makes excursions to Yonkers to dispose of his wares and replenish provisions. He is cheerful and talkative when treated with respect. He converses in French, German, and English with fluency.

Some gentle hints on manners are given by an exchange, from which we select a few:

Don't be disturbed if you find the best seats in a railroad-car taken. As no one knows you new coming, of course they did not intend to insult you.

When a car is crowded don't fill a seat with your bundles. True politeness is not mines, even amidst the inconveniences of a crowded conveyance.

If an open window proves uncomfortable to another, don't shut it.

Whispering in church is impolite. Besides showing disrespect to the speaker, it is extremely annoying to those who wish to hear. Coughing should be avoided as much as possible. Sleeping, with its frequent accompaniment, snoring, had better be done at home.

Violent perfumes, especially those containing musk, are offensive to many people, and to some positively distressing. Be careful how you "shed" such odors in any crowded assembly. Beecher says "there is no smell so universally pleasing as no smell."

INDIANS SWAPPING WIVES.

OUR BARBARIAN BRETHREN.

OUR Indian fellow-citizens, it is well known, entertain very lax notions respecting the sanctity of the marriage tie—which, in fact, they consider any thing but a tie. The noble red man not only regards his wives as inferiors, but in the light of goods and chattels, and when tired of them trades them off in barter, or swaps them for another's. Our illustration on this page is an accurate sketch of the kind of trade that frequently takes place among them—an old, homely wife swapped for a young and pretty one, and a horse thrown in to boot. The women submit, knowing very well that they can't help themselves.

Our second illustration on this page records a very curious incident that took place recently at Fort Shaw, Montana. The Pegan Indians, being about to sue for peace, as a preliminary step, killed "PETE," one of the principal murderers of white settlers in that region, and brought his head to General DE TROBRIAND as a pledge of their sincerity. The face of the dead "brave," deeply pitted with small-pox and scarred with wounds, presented a ghastly spectacle when uncovered in the General's presence; but as a token of their desire to cultivate more friendly relations with the whites it was more eloquent than words.

AN INDIAN PEACE-OFFERING.

and expediency of such institutions; and it may be that their work might be accomplished without an organization so closely resembling that of the "Sisters of Charity." However this may be, a great amount of real, hard, unobtrusive, self-denying, and beneficent work has been done by these Sisters, especially in the over-crowded population of England, in visiting and nursing the sick, reclaiming the unfortunate, tending and devote themselves especially to this work. Except in a few extreme cases, the orphans are not usually received gratuitously, but the payment required is very small. Many a poor little fatherless and motherless child is thus "brought home," and finds a refuge and shelter under the fostering care and gentle guidance of these devoted women. And besides this systematic tending of orphans, many a sickly and neglected lit-

Charity," and their regulations do not demand the same seclusion from worldly society. The best known institution of the kind in this country is the "House of Mercy," in this city, where hundreds of unfortunate women, who in all probability could not have been reached in any other way, have been reclaimed through the agency of the sisterhood, and the means of earning an honest livelihood placed within their reach.

BROUGHT HOME.

BROUGHT HOME.

It is only within a few years that the people of England and this country have become familiar with the idea of Protestant sisterhoods, organized to enable charitable women to carry on their philanthropic work among the poor in a systematic and thorough manner. Grave doubts still exist in the public mind as to the necessity educating orphan children. Our engraving on this page, from a picture by the English artist, Mr. A. ACKLAND HEYE, touchingly illustrates the latter department of their labors. To almost every sisterhood in England is attached an orphanage, in which orphan children (generally girls only) are fed, clothed, and taught under the superintendence of the Sisters, three being generally some one or more of their number who die one of either sex is from time to time discovered and "brought home" by the Sisters, and taken care of by them till it has in some degree regained health and strength, or till the parents desire its restoration. Both in this country and in England, the "Sisters" adopt a simple costume, in harmony with the unostentatious and self-denying character of their work. Their vows are less rigid than those of the "Sisters of

POLEWARD VIA THE GULF STREAM.

THE proposition to equip a new American Arctic expedition is just now exciting a deep interest. The discovery of the North Pole is an object of geographical ambition, unrivaled in its claims of importance and in its charm of romance. For centuries this great pivot of the globe has defied every effort to approach it; and it has seemed as if the energies of the Frost King had been all employed in building around it a wall of ice not less impassable and impregnable than a wall of fire.

Against this adamantine wall explorers have repeatedly knocked, knocked patiently, knocked violently, and often, to themselves, fatally. The forbidding parapets of this gigantic barrier have been scaled, but never dismantled or pierced by human means. Up to this day the wrecks of some proud old cruiser, against which the battle surged and raged till, nearly every vessel around this Polar cordon lie strewn the wrecks of the most sanguine expeditions; and the word "Arctic" instead of recalls a thousand cruel-winged horrors and casualties.

But, what the Russians could not carry by storm at Thermopylæ was won by art. Who that has read the thrilling stories of Arctic narrative but has wondered if this icicle-encrusted of the Pole is not at some point open? Is there, then, a gateway to the mysterious axis of this planet? is a question the solution of which engages to-day many minds; and it is in the interests of this problem that the scientific and cosmographical world hope to see the newly-proposed expedition to the Pole approved and equipped by the Government. Since the days of old Hendrick Hudson and his predecessors to within a few years, no geographer suggested any feasible or plausible method of finding such a gateway, if one existed. Explorers have gone with several years' provisions and stores, prepared and expecting to winter their way through the ice, and, after passing through the usual season of being "frozen in," having their ships dirted on "ice-islands," they were all driven with the "current," etc., they have returned home to enjoy their fame, and the applause of their friends. The cause of geographical science can not afford longer to submit to this heroic trifling. It has become manifest that, if no better route can be found than the one hitherto attempted by Franklin, Kane, and their successors, the time has arrived for all humane and scientific men to discountenance Arctic voyages, as the mariner would avoid a shoal or the soldier a masked battery.

Within a few years, and since the last Polar expedition from our shores returned to tell the old tale of failure and defeat, a new and more important theory for finding the Pole has been propounded by Captain Silas Hent, the experienced seaman and well-known Post-office Commodore Perry's Expedition in the waters of Japan. Captain Hent's theory is simple, but simplicity and force of reasoning, has shown that the Kuro Sivo, or Black Stream of Japan —the Gulf Stream of the Pacific Ocean—passing through Behring's Straits in majestic volume and with temperature sufficient to thaw the ice of the Polar ocean, and, in all probability, to open a navigable way into the very heart of the great geographical mystery. The Gulf Stream of the ocean, he has likewise shown, moves off the coast of Spitzbergen with a similar power to produce, in combination with the Kuro Sivo, that unfrozen sea observed by Dr. Kane in the second Grinnell Expedition. In Captain Hent's and theory of Captain Bent, based on the most authentic records of these two great currents, from the Coast Survey reports of Lieutenant Bache, Maury, and others, and from his own observations under Commodore Perry, has been subjected to the most rigid criticism and scrutiny, and to-day, at least, commends itself sensible and practical by the scientific men who have reviewed it. Captain Bent proposes the navigation of these Polar waters by the means of the isothermetrical indications—i. e., following where the water temperature shows the sea to be warmest, and hence where the great tropical currents are moving toward the Pole. There is nothing simpler than this, and he believed that a proper treatment of the "Thermometric Gateway" theory, as the new proposal has been termed, can be made for less than one-half the cost of the half the time required for the old-fashioned journeys to the Arctic. If the thermometric theory can be demonstrated, it would possess great advantages over every other one attempted, because open to the summer in his and, and requiring only the fast-trawler capable of Herculean labor and endurance, and the great-ships-and-stores of these Arctic foot-paths and sledge-tracts is, that they sometimes move under the explorer's feet faster in one direction than he is able to travel in the contrary direction, as Parry found off the shores of Spitzbergen—in 1827, he was compelled to reach the Pole by a journey over the ice.

The proposition has been made by some of our explorers to make the experiment of the Kane through Smith's Sound, and to watch the ice in the narrow gorge until it was seen to be lodged and drift to the south, and then to attempt to find a way into the open sea to the north. Whether this plan be practicable or not it is, perhaps, impossible to say, as no one can judge of the freaks and whims of Polar ice. It may be so accommodating as to move out of the Sound, although the experience of those who have tried it is against such an abandonment of drift. If, however, it should, in any given year, break up in time for a vessel to pass into the sea, the return of the vessel would be very uncertain and precarious, especially should she tarry long enough at the Pole to survey its waters and to take scientific observations. The route, if successfully demonstrated through Smith's Sound once or twice or several times, could never become a navigable or commercial highway, and, in all probability, would prove little more than a trap for seamen and enterprising explorers. Such a route could never conduct a vessel from that long-promised passage to the Indies, so ardently hoped for by all the maritime nations of Europe, from the day of the commencement of the successful rounding of Cape Horn by the gallant Magellan.

Not to go into the argument for the new theory, or the Gulf Stream or Kuro Sivo, with the aid of the water-thermometer, it may be proper to state that, after mature reflection, Dr. Kane, to whom Captain Bent explained the theory, thought very highly of it, and, in his narratives of the second Grinnell Expedition, so declares himself. The German Expedition of last year found piles of drift-wood twenty feet high on the southern and eastern shore of Spitzbergen; and it has long been a common occurrence for mariners to find weeds and wood from the West Indies on the western coast of Europe. In 1823, General Sabine, while on a visit to the Danish Greenland coasts which lay to the northwest from the docks of a vessel known to have foundered off Cape Lopez, on the western coast of Africa. The cabin-boy of the steamer on the equatorial current of the Atlantic, which is the chief feeder of the Gulf Stream of the latter, had been transported into the polar basin. But one of the most important confirmations of the views of Captain Bent is found in the facts of the Dutch whole-fisheries in the seventeenth century. The right-whale, the object of commercial pursuit from 1600, was found in immense schools between Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla and around Spitzbergen. The remains of them attracted and maintained, in the middle of the seventeenth century, more than 10,000 men, and employed more than 300 ships. Seventy Dutch fishermen, engaged in this northern business, perished in the terrible winter preserved in Holland, 17,461 voyages. The greed and rapacity of these sailors, early in the eighteenth century, began to destroy the whale-fishery on the whole into higher and less accessible latitudes, and at a greater distance from Holland, ness equaled its former figures, but has greatly decreased. In the Pacific Ocean, in our day, there has been a great falling off in the number of fishermen. The annual statistics prepared by Mark Collector of Customs, for the Treasury, show that the commerce of the islands has greatly suffered by this decrease. The number of whaling vessels engaged in the Pacific ocean for the year 1869 was only 46; while, in 1852, there were 329. The decrease in the whale-fishery has been brought about by the scarcity of the fish, captains sometimes being forced to go north of Behring's Straits before they can get a ton of their chief before they can obtain a cargo of oil.

The fact is well known that the whale can not live in the warm water of southern or tropical latitudes, and that it is the instinct of every species him to come to the surface every few minutes to breathe. Where, then, have the old tribes and families of the whale fled? Have they all been shoulder the Dutch once fattened and grew rich, and which, at one time, seemed to have fully satisfied the avarice of nearly three hundred whalers? That they have retreated into the circumpolar regions is probable. But it is also equally evident that, if this be so, those regions can not be reached and won.

But we did not undertake the task of arguing the theory; that has already been done.

The year 1870 opens with the splendid Norwegian steamer, the Solid, sail as far as the Sea of Kara, where, coasting along the Siberian shore, along the coast of Siberia as far as the neighborhood of the White Island, without perceiving the slightest trace of ice. Captain Wiggins, commanding her, was often in sight of land, which he describes as low immense acres of low-lying steppes of great extent, covered over with long wood and trees of stunted growth, the water near the shores of great depth, and free from shoals, rocks, and witnesses and seals every where abundant. The English ship Samson, Captain Pullen, also followed the coast-line on their way, giving a like testimony. After having entered the Sea of Kara, however, Captain Wiggins, in the latitude of seventy degrees around Nova Zembla, doubled it, and entered the Sea of Kara again by the Strait of Matotchkin, the very rolling mountains of Nova Zembla, summer Zemo, commanded and owned by M. Sawatier, Hydrographer of the Russian Navy, visited a few degrees to the northward and eastward of its most northern extremity, and reported open water in all directions. Captain Nordenskiold, who last year commanded the Swedish Expedition which penetrated to the farthest degree of north latitude, calculates that the sea will be open, at least for some months—from the end of January to the end of September—all along the whole Siberian coast and around the shores of Nova Zembla. In fact, there appears to be no reason for an immediate and vigorous prosecution of the great Polar enterprise, and especially along Behring's Straits, around Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla, unless an attempt is to be made to find a northern route of the Kuro Sivo. Not to repeat what has been said of the old Dutch fishermen in the seventeenth century, a company of whalers sailed from the port of Hull in 1773, with the express purpose of comparing notes of their experience, to the best way of reaching the Pole. The deliberations of this congress were conducted by Captain Way, an officer of the British service, and resulted in the statement, the oldest commanders agreed that they would never reach the Pole to the west of Spitzbergen, but run out to the Greenland sea, westward of Nova Zembla, the route advocated by Captain Bent.

It is said that this route can be tested in a few weeks by thermometrical navigation at less hazard of life than by the old routes, and at less than half the expense of any other yet suggested. It seems to be the first proposal for finding the Pole sustained by scientific deduction. If every scheme, having this end in view, is promising, it is the new plan urged by Captain Bent, and it is to be hoped that Congress, in making any appropriation for the Polar Expedition, will provide for a fair and speedy consideration of the "Thermometric Gateways."

THE MEMORY OF ANIMALS.

THAT the faculty of memory exists in animals, there are many proofs. Boss, according to Huber, who had been fed in the autumn with honey at a particular window, returned in expectant crowds to the same place in the spring, when the window, closed through the winter by an outer shutter, was reopened. The recognition of their own hives, out of a number of others, on returning from their excursions, would appear to be from a remembrance of the situation, rather than from any peculiarity about the individuality of Swallows, on returning from their winter-quarters in southern latitudes, resume possession of their former summer residence. A horse will almost always be found to preserve an acute recollection of any spot where he has received a fright, however many years may have since elapsed.

We can not just now call to mind where we met, long ago, with a very amusing example of memory in a horse-in-the charger of the commanding officer of an Indian regiment. He was in a mountainous region, and heavy, man, and horse, having a dislike to carrying such a burden, acquired the habit of lying down on the ground whenever the rider attempted to mount. This, as may be supposed, annoyed him, and, to avoid the ridicule of the soldiers, he punished with the animal, and procured another not so fastidious as to a few stones more or less. We believe is was a pair of stones—certainly some considerable time—after that colored, visiting another station, was there to receive the troops there, and a horse was placed at his service, which, on first attempting to mount, immediately lay down in full view of the assembled regiment. It turned out to be the identical dismissed charger, who had at once recognized his more objectionable rider.

A very interesting anecdote is related by Frederick Cuvier, recently dead, only great for his memory, but also strong attachment in an animal generally supposed to be destitute of all good qualities. While in Paris a gentleman had treated up one from infancy till he was as tractable as a dog, would follow him about wherever he went, and become quite low-spirited when he was absent. Being compelled to leave home, his master made him over to the Menagerie at Paris, where he at first drooped and refused to eat, but gradually became more reconciled to the situation. After the lapse of a year and a half his master returned home and paid him a visit. The wolf knew the voice the moment he spoke, and flew to him with every demonstration of delight and affection, planting his fore-feet on his shoulders and licking his face. The same scene occurred after a second separation of three years' duration. The wolf, as before, at once recognized his master's voice, and bounding toward him as soon as set at liberty by the keeper. A final meeting followed after the lapse of four years. The creature never appeared to regain his former spirits and vivacity, and died apparently of grief, betraying ominous signs of the ferocity inherent in his race.

Stories of elephantine intelligence are numerous, but most of them too well known to repeat. We have, however, heard by a traveller, in a paper contributed to a scientific journal, and which is vouched for from personal knowledge, is worth a brief notice. Captain Hall was on a journey and several elephants were engaged to carry his tent and baggage. One of them, euphoniously named Fatma Mungo, coming on the scent of a lion, was seized with a panic and ran off into the woods, the rest of the party, in the meantime, going to the branch of a tree and letting himself down. All attempts to recover the animal were fruitless, and the party proceeded on their way, giving up all idea of seeing him again. Among a herd of 300 elephants encountered eighteen months afterward was found the runaway, who at first was as apparitions and unmanageable as the rest; but on an old native owning him and calling out to him on a tone elephant, pulling him by the ear, and ordering him to kneel down, he immediately obeyed the familiar word of command and became perfectly tractable. This writer also mentions a female elephant which escaped from her owner and was at large for fourteen years. On being recognized she remembered her former driver, and instantly lay down at his order.

Locke adduces the learning of tunes at proof that it is not memory, but association. "Association," he says, "with any appearance of reason can be supposed—much less proved—that birds, without such a contrivance, can approximate notes nearer and nearer by degrees to a tune they never heard before, and that they get a part at in their memory, is nowhere, nor can be a pattern for them to imitate, or which any repeated hearers can help them to retain." Because there is no reason why the sound of a pipe should leave traces in the brain which look at first, but by their after-endeavors, should produce the like sounds; and why the sounds they make themselves should not make traces which they should follow as well as those of the pipe, is impossible to conceive."

There is no question that many animals understand the measurement of time. It is a well-known fact that the rabbit where the rivers are habitually shot at, the birds, instead of keeping to the water-courses, go on the days of the week, come close up to the farm-houses on Sundays, having somehow found out that the guns are then shelved.

Every one who has traveled much in Scotland, more especially in the Highland districts, must have remarked the large attendance of shepherds-dogs at church on Sundays. The peculiarity is very interesting to English tourists, one of whom states that he was told that many of the dogs were more constant than their masters. This gentleman mentions that, in one district, the animals, perhaps demoralized by a "black sheep" among their number, became so quarrelsome and unmannerly in their behavior that the minister requested all who had been in the habit of bringing their dogs to confine them to the house before leaving for church. This plan answered exceedingly well for the first Sunday, but, for the future, not a single shepherd or farmer could find his dog on a Sunday morning. They had no notion of being deprived of their accustomed liberty and, well knowing the hour of service, set off to church without their masters. An attempt was then made to compromise matters, by erecting a large kennel close to the church, where the dogs were imprisoned during public worship, but they kept up such a fearful howling that the congregation was seriously disturbed, and there was no help for it but to restore them to their former rights and privileges.

The Committee of the Board of Aldermen of the city of Boston upon Lamps and Gas have been on a visit to New York, at the Fifth Ave. Hotel, investigating the new process of lighting street lamps, as now adopted in this city by BARNET'S PATENT Instantaneous Gas Lighter, the Improved Key. We understand they were highly pleased with this new and simple method.—[Com.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-Worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions, and Blotched Disfigurations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. Depot, 49 Bond Street, N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.

For Hair, Whiskers, Arching, Etc.

Use "Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion." The only reliable and harmless remedy known to science. Prepared by DR. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by Druggists every where.

Fishing in American Waters.

Opening of the Season for Angling and Fish-Parsing. To the angler or the fish-culturist: Scott's book on "Fishing in American Waters" will prove a real value woven in every thing about fish and breeding fishes.

Sent throughout the United States, postpaid, for $3 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, N. Y.

Newspaper Statements.

HOW THE PEOPLE TEST THEIR TRUTH.

This is not the age when people are apt to trust whatever they see in the public journals. Fifty or sixty years ago, when the accuracy of a statement that had appeared in one of the gazettes of "News Letters" of the day was questioned, it was considered a sufficient answer to all cavil to say "it must be so, for I read it in the newspaper." It is not so now. Newspaper assertions must be verified before they are taken for granted, and this is especially the case as regards statements which relate to the remedial properties of proprietary medicines. For example: It was not until the tonic and alterative properties of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters had been thoroughly and thoroughly tested by thousands, and found to be in perfect accord with the principles of medical practice in behalf, that it was accepted by the public at large as

A STANDARD REMEDY.

But when a medicine who has attained to such a safeguard against malicious fevers, a cure for indigestion and biliousness, a boon and strengthening the frame, fastening the spirits, and imparting a healthful vigor, or, come forward and testified that its beneficial effects had extended to their most sanguine expectations, of course the world believed. To resist such proofs was impossible. Hostetter's cure has been taken by the beginning not to overstate the merits of the Bitters. Exaggeration and falsehood are the last breath of many preparations that might otherwise have survived. They were "weighed in the balance and found wanting."

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS,

on the contrary, have never been announced in grandiloquent language, but as a cure for malaria, in bad, simply as a pure, harmless vegetable specific, possessing remarkable strengthening, regulating, tonic, alterative, and antiseptic properties. This is exactly what the public desire the article to be, and its enormous sales is an argument in its favor.

A BAD BOY.—Why? Did he inherit it? Is it from the devil? Is he "born so?" Is it association with evil-disposed persons? Whatever the cause, it is well to know what are the remedies. Love of the person, on phrenological principles, that the best means may be employed. Then the child improves, and reform follows. It is also well for adults. Examination FREE. See Dr. WELLS'S PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, 20 cents. S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK OF FOREIGN TRAVEL.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map and Plans of Cities. By JAMES PARTON. Thirteenth, Revised Edition. Eighth Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-book Form, $7 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK: or, Hand-Book of Travel-Talk for Travellers and Students in Europe. Containing Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a new and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. PEDDLES FAYRFAX. Amitted Edition, containing a Vocabulary, Dictionary of Coinage and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postpaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

REMOVAL.

S. W. GERERY & CO. will remove to southeast corner of 8th Street and Broadway, 1st of May, Importers and Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,

Formerly I. & W. Geery, No. 218 Broadway,
Established in 1804. New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.

Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to Grocery Trade. Catalogue sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering

LARGE ADDITIONS

to their very popular stock of English Body Brussels, at $1.75, $2, and $2.25 per yard.

Best Quality Velvets, at $2.50 per yard.

Royal Wiltons, at $2.50 and $3 per yard.

Moquettes and Axminsters, $3.50 and $4 per yard.

They are also offering a CHOICE ASSORTMENT of

INGRAINS, THREE-PLYS,

COCOA AND CANTON MATTINGS,

English and Domestic Oilcloths,

&c., &c., &c.,

OF THE BEST QUALITY

AND NEWEST DESIGNS.

NOVELTIES IN

CARPETS BY THE PIECE.

WITH MEDALLIONS AND BORDERS, and also by the yard.

RECEIVED BY EACH AND EVERY STEAMER.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH AND 10TH STS.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!

The reputation of the NOVELTY JOB PRINTING PRESS is thoroughly established, as meeting all the requirements of a first-class press, with which to do "your own printing," and as being convenient to refer to for the general Job Printers. Many of the latter have purchased this press, and find them admirably adapted for job work. Many young men have bought them, and are doing all the printing for the house which employs them, thereby materially adding to their emolutions. Farmers and Mechanics are also finding them great aids to their business. Principals of Schools are finding them very useful appendages, and boys are finding them a never-failing source of instruction, pleasure, and profit. Send for a Pamphlet, with one of these presses and a few dollars' worth of material, are perfectly capable of doing all the printing for their father's business, and will be thereby saving many times the cost of the press, which is $160, $312, $625, and $1,250. Scripture texts accompanied circular, with testimonials from persons in every country and gentlemen of every calling, all printing done on the press, and specimen sheets of types, cuts, &c., to RENT, $5 MONTH. Manufactured by REGESTER, BOSTON, MASS., dealer in every description of printing materials; or the Sole Agency of which is C. C. TRUXTON, No. 16 College Place, New York; KELLOGG, LEWELL, & LYMAN, 917 Market St., Philadelphia, Pa.; A. C. KELLOGG, 63 West Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

THE JAPANESE CORN FILE

Removes Corns and Warts without pain. Price 25 cts. Can be used by a child with perfect safety. Sold at all Drug and Shoe Stores. Trade price list and samples mailed on receipt of price by E. B. BERTRAM, General Agent, 94 Pine St., N. Y.

$200 per Month guaranteed. Agents wanted in every County in the U. S., to sell Buck's Harpihr Alarm. Price $6. Sells on sight. Address G. H. BECKER & CO., 493 North 3d St., Philad'a, Pa.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

have recently published

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON: or, Across the Continent of South America. By James Orton, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N.Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Equatorial America and numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE UNKIND WORD, and Other Stories. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c. &c. 18mo, Cloth, $1 00.

JOURNAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO THE EAST. Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Constantinople, the Crimea, Greece, &c., in the Suite of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By the Rev. Mrs. WILLIAM GRAY. 18mo, Cloth, $1 00.

GARIBALDUS NOVEL. The Rule of the Monk; or, Rome in the Nineteenth Century. By Lieut.-Col. GRAHAM. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. New Edition. 16th Thousand. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY. A Novel. By Mrs. A. C. Swaine, Author of "Gerdenmuir." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HAND-BOOK OF THE SULPHUR-CURE, so applicable to the Vine Disease in America, and Diseases of Apple and other Fruit Trees. By Wm. J. Fraas, Author of "Three Seasons in European Vineyards." 18mo, Paper, 60 cents.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By Alton Cuyler, Author of "Maggie Lynne." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we will send a Seventh free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. C. COLLINS & Co., 335 Broadway, New York.

Reliance Wringer,

IMPROVED.

Keyed Rolls. White Rubber Spiral Cogs. Easy Working. Has Curved Clamp. Fits any Tub. The Best. The Cheapest. TRY IT.

PROVIDENCE TOOL CO.,

20 Beekman St., N.Y.; PROV., R. I.

WORMAN'S CONVERSATION MANUALS,

For SCHOOLS and PRIVATE STUDENTS.

1. "ECHO DE PARIS," or FRENCH ECHO. 25 cts.
2. "DEUTSCHES ECHO," or GERMAN ECHO. 15 cts.

OLDER MANUALS THE "ECHOS"

Of Spanish, Italian, and Russian are in course to lead the student to translate-speak and think in the same tongue. As thought is better than words, they also speak. The results are the less his own, and make wood and stone utterly selfish; self-reliant action and enhancement of from the first by removing the necessity of translating. The Manuals secure the exercise of the mind which any vocabulary. They almost forbid original ideas teach the memory and custom.

☞ Mailed, postpaid, on receipt of price. To teachers for examination, half price. A. S. BARNES & CO., 111 and 113 William St., New York.

Popular Music at Popular Prices.

BRAINARD'S MUSICAL ALBUMS.

Each number contains from eighteen to twenty-four pieces of choice new music.

No. 1 contains 18 Vocal and Instrumental Pieces.
No. 2 contains 18 Popular and Fashionable Dances.
No. 3 contains 24 Popular New Comic Songs.
No. 4 contains 24 Beautiful Songs and Ballads.
No. 5 contains 24 Instrumental Pieces for Piano.
No. 6 contains 20 Sacred Songs and Quartets.
No. 7 contains 20 Popular Songs and Choruses.
No. 8 contains 19 Comic and Sentimental Songs.

Each number contains 48 pages, large, elegant size, neatly bound. Price only 50 cents. Copies mailed to any address on receipt of price. Catalogues of contents sent free. Other numbers will rapidly follow. Address all orders to W. A. Brainard & Son, Cleveland, Ohio.

STAR-SPANGLED BANNER.—A large 5 50-column paper, Ledger size, illustrated. Devoted to Sketches, Poetry, Wit, Humor, genuine Fun, Novelty (of a sensible kind), and to the exposure of Humbug, Blundering, Quackery, and Folly of every kind. A superb engraving, "Evangeline," 15 by 2 feet, given to every subscriber. Money refunded if not satisfied. It is wide-awake, fearless, truthful. Try it now. 75 cts. for 3 months. Specimen, 3 cts. Address STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

PSYCHOMANCY, Fascination, or Secrets of the Soul, as applied to the purposes of life. 400 pp. Cloth. By Herbert Hamilton. A Manual of book for inquisitive people. It contains complete instructions to acquire the wonderful power over men or animals. Can be obtained by sending 15 cents for postage, and address as above. C. W. HAMILTON & CO., 41 South Eighth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Country Newspapers, Dollar Stores, or Gift Enterprises, wish a Premium Picture, we offer choice of several Steel-plate Engravings by Frank etches. Will furnish the pictures or sell the right cheap. HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman St., N. Y.

WANTED—Agents to sell a thoroughly good selling article. Permanent employment. Apply to Pendleton. Exclusive territory given. Business very pleasant. Average sales sold 3 dozen per week, and per day. One sold 120 in a small town, another 1000 in a large city. Sample sent by express for $1 50. Send for circular. Address J. PENDLETON & CO., 1 Chambers Street, New York.

"BETTER THAN GOLD" is the NEW "GOLDEN PEN." Absolutely non-corrosive and indestructible. Sent by mail, with Pen-holder, size, six months. Equal to Gold. Made from new metal. Warranted to give satisfaction. Agents, Pedlers, &c., clear $20 a week with them. Neatly put up, 12 in a box. Price, Fifty Cents. Sent by mail, postpaid. Address the sole proprietors,

GOLDEN PEN CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

EVERY BODY READ THIS!

We will Pay Agents $25 a Week and expenses to sell the Great Discovery of the Age. Address WHEATON, HENRY, & CO., Marshall, Mich.

AGENTS WANTED—SAMPLES FREE.—$30 TO $50 per week guaranteed to either sex. Goods sew, and no stamp or fluter. Send 6c. for return postage. D. S. LIMINGTON, 58 South Haskell St., Chicago.

B.W.S. That spicy book, "Tare," Free, with all other Books, Cards, &c., 25 cts. Agents wanted. Boston Watch Sale, 12 School St., Boston.

STEEL SHIRT COLLAR, superbly enameled white (Duplex Elliptic, patented October 26, 1869). Agents wanted. Boston Watch Sale, 12 School St., Boston.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved).—Three justly-celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendation. Prices:—Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, $15, equal in appearance and time to gold ones costing $100. Those of extra fine finish, $20, equal to $200 gold ones. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled patent lever, equaling in appearance a $200 gold watch, and with a magnificent watch-case of solid gold plate. All of these watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All or either sent by express, with bill to collect and indemnify. Collins Metal Chains, Lockets, All kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

One of the $20 Watches is worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Tuesday's Democrat.

Please to send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. C. COLLINS & Co., 335 Broadway, New York.

BOOSEY'S "20-CENT" MUSIC.—Boosey's Musical Cabinet, Vocal Nos. From 39 to 52 Songs in each Book, with Piano-forte accompaniment. Price 20 cents each. 198. Twelve Songs by Arthur S. Sullivan and Balfe. 199. Eight Comic Songs. 64. Twenty-four Songs. 96. Twenty Scotch Songs. Fifty Songs of England, in Three Books. 47. Twenty Welsh Songs. 48. Twenty French Romances. 92. Twenty Moore's Melodies. 93. Twenty Irish Songs. 94. Twenty-four Sacred Songs. 95. Thirteen Songs by Schubert. 97. Eighteen Songs by Charles Dibdin. 98. Twenty-four Songs. 112. Twelve Songs by Mendelssohn Bartholdy. 76. Ten German Songs. 18. Sixteen Songs, Kücken. 19. Sixteen Songs, Schumann. 20. Twelve Songs, Beethoven. 12. Fifteen Songs, Beethoven. 13. Twelve Songs, Mozart. 14. Twelve Songs, Haydn. 15. Twelve Songs, M. W. Balfe. 1. Twenty Songs, Mendelssohn. 34. Fifteen Christmas Carols. 35. Twelve Duets, Mendelssohn, &c. Each Book 50 cents. To be had of all Booksellers, and Boosey's complete catalogue free. BOOSEY & CO., No. 644 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S "20-CENT" MUSIC. — Boosey's Musical Cabinet, Instrumental Nos. Piano-forte Numbers in Books, containing from 8 to 10 pieces. 56 contain each Book. 1. Twenty-two Gems. 2. Twenty-four Gems. 3. Twenty-two Pieces. 11. Chopin's Waltz, with Beethoven's forty-one original Waltzes. 126. Thalberg's Fantasias. 121. Sydney Smith's Pieces. 95. Schubert's Impromptus and Moments Musicales. 82. Beyer's twenty National Anthems. 84. Kalkbrenner's Studies. 85. Heller's Promenades d'un Solitaire. 87. Leybach's six Fantasias. 75. Chopin's piece. 90. Heller's twelve short pieces. Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words, complete, in Three Books. Mozart's Don Juan. Rossini's Barber of Seville. Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable. Bellini's Norma. Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia. 9. Auber's nine original pieces. 8. Verdi's twenty-five Gems. 16. Piano-forte Duets, Mozart, &c. 11. Twelve Pieces, Beethoven. 17. Twelve Pieces, Schubert. &c. &c. Each contains each Book. To be had of all Book and Music sellers. Catalogue free. BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, N. Y.

MADAM FOY'S COMBINED

Corset, Skirt Support-er, and BUSTLE

Is just the article needed by every lady who consults

HEALTH, COMFORT, AND STYLE.

Testimonials in its favor are constantly being received from all parts of the country.

Ladies, J. Foy's Corsets are in every respect to the United States.

Price, Single Corset, $1 75.

Sole Manufacturers, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

WE want every one who has read Miss Alcott's "Little Women" and "The Old-Fashioned Girl" to read her first novel, MOODS.

One chapter from "The Lamson Wanosca" at a Farm-House, is worth the price of the book.

"Full of life and power."—Tribune.

75 cents Paper, $1 25 Cloth, at all the booksetores, and by mail on receipt of the price.

LORING, Publisher, Boston.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of these presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving time, money, and vexation. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., sent free on application. Specimen-books of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 33 Beekman St., New York.

ROGERS

GROUPS OF STATUARY.

These groups, suitable for wedding presents or ornament, will be delivered free of cost, packed and delivered at any point east of the Mississippi, on receipt of the price, viz. Group No. 1, $20. Send for Illustrated Catalogues and Circulars.

Taking the Oath.

212 Fifth Ave., New York.

40,000 SOLD. No Wonder of the Times. The Magic of Superior Quality. Wonderful Success. Agents Wanted Everywhere. Call and see Specimens of Gold, Superior Compass Attachment, Enameled Pen, Silver and Gold Pencils. Gives everybody a Trial. Any day's watch. Will denote correct time; warranted five years. Any one can sell it. Sells at sight. Profits large. No two WOOD Compass. Is entirely new, patented, and cannot be had of any other house. Only $3 each, when 3 or more are ordered. Single watch, $4. Sent by mail. Trade supplied. Address the sole manufacturers, C. W. RANDALL & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

SHEPHERD'S PILE AND HUMOR CURE. Warranted a perfect CURE for all kinds of PILES. LEPROSY, SCROFULA, SALT-RHEUM, ITCH, and all HUMORS of the Blood. Price, $1 50 per box. Sold by all Druggists. Sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of price. Please send and get your money. No failures for 12 years. 106 Fulton St., New York. H. H. FOWLE, Chemist, Boston. Sold every where. J. & E. Bellin, Agents for Chicago.

HUCKLEY'S KNITTING MACHINE

FOR FAMILY USE—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits heavy thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and sample stocking FREE. Address HUCKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without drugs. Price for circular, address F. I. EAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

TO CAPITALISTS.—A gentleman connected with a daughter was restored to health by simple means, after suffering many years. The particulars will be sent to any address. Rev. E. BOUDINOT, Stockton St., Brooklyn, L. I.

CLOSE OF THE 40th VOLUME.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR MAY, 1870.

CONTENTS:

OUR BARBARIAN BIRTHDAY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The North American Indian.—An Indian Station.—Methods of Capturing Buffalo.—Floridian Women asking for Help.—Antarctic.—The Method of using the Lasso and Pecker.—Wampum Belt and Strings.—Indian Pipe-Bowl of Clay.—A Travelling Magician.—Medicine Man.—Moccasins.—Head-Dress.—Totemic Signatures.—War-Clubs.—Tobacco-Pouch.—Arrow-Heads, full Size.—Quiver.—Earlap.—Necklace of Bears' Claws.—Indian Symbols.—A Scalp.—Shield.—Method of Kindling Fire.—Floridian Widows' Mourning Dress.—Fire-tube Bushmen.—Bushwhackers Indians.

A SONG.

ALBERT DURER.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Albert Durer.—Rauch's Statue of Durer.—Durer's House.—View from Durer's Home.—Durer's Tomb.

THE SPOTS IN THE SUN.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Sunaling the Glass.—Heliotscope.—General Appearance of the Spots.—The Planet Mercury.—Solar Spots.—Appearance indicating Cavities.—The Mottled Surface: The Willow Leaves: The Luminous Bridges.—Granulation.—Spot as seen October 18, 1858.—Spot as seen October 19, 1858.—Eclipse of 1860: Beginning of Totality.—Eclipse of 1860, End of Totality.—Eclipse of 1868 as observed in Siam Indies.

IN A COUNTRY STORE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Country Store.—Aunt Betsy.—Uncle Ephraim.—Cousin Boy.—Horace Harper.—The Darwinite.—The Wayfarer.—The Butter Buyer.—The Widow.—"Oh dear! what can I do?"

FREDERICK THE GREAT.—VI. Diplomatic Intrigues and Military Adventures.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Palace of the Emperor.—Map of Silesia.—The March into Silesia.—Battle-Scene.

AMONG THE HEMLOCKS.

HANDSOME JOHN GATSMER.

THE CHILDREN OF JUDAH.

A HOUSE TO LET.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS FOR WOMEN.

A BREACH OF PROMISE.

CUBA AND THE OTTOMAN MANIFESTO.

A WORD FOR SCANDAL-MONGERS.

"FAIS TON FAIET."

"ONLY A WOMAN'S HAIR."

SECULAR AND SECTARIAN SCHOOLS.

OLD ENGLISH LAWYERS.

WORKING. Omitted from this Number, the Author having failed to furnish Copy in time for publication.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITORS BOOK TABLE RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITORS DRAWER.

The May Number concludes the Fortieth Volume of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, which has increased from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter, and is more profusely illustrated, than any other monthly periodical in America or England. The unparalleled success of the work is due to the popular character and variety of its contents; to the enterprise of the Publishers in securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions of English and American writers; to the richly-illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration; to its carefully-prepared Historical Record, which presents a complete view of the progress of the World; to the Engravings of the Age; and to the variety and interest of its several Editorial Departments. For the Editor's Drawer alone, the co-operation of members of the Smithsonian Institute at Washington has been secured.

In the January Number was commenced the publication, from the Author's manuscript, of "Lamboy," a serial story, by the Author of "Guy Livingstone."

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE (a year), 24 cents; for the WEEKLY or BAZAR (a year), 20 cents, which must be paid by the person receiving the same. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, and 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for January and July of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number.

When not otherwise specified, it will be understood that the subscriber desires to begin with the Number current at the time of receipt of order.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of the order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

Back Numbers of the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or Draft payable to the order of the publishers, or remittance in postage stamps of the subscriber, will be promptly attended to. Single Numbers of the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR, may usually be obtained by booksellers or postmasters.

Specimen numbers will be sent gratis to any one who wishes to get up clubs.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

$25 A DAY! 40 new articles for Agents. Samples sent free. H. S. SHAW, Lowell, Mass.

$60 A WEEK, and agents in a new business. Address SHAW & CLARKE, Saco, Maine.

$20 A DAY! Business new. For circulars and samples, address J. C. KAST & CO., Biddeford, Me.

UNCLE SAM'S CHICKENS.—LAST OUT.

UNCLE SAM. "Well, rather late hatching, but looks lively."

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,
NEW YORK.

Seaver's Patent 'Excelsior' Swing.

The latest and best swing out. It received the highest premium awarded at the Fair of the Amer. Institute, Oct. 1869. Simple, Durable, Cheap, and Effective. Just the thing for the Nursery. Send for Circular.

LEWIS P. TIBBALS, 418 Broadway, N.Y.
For rights, address Sole Ag't for N. Y. City.
A. H. SEAVER, P. O. Box 4182, N. Y. City.

DREXEL & CO.,
34 South Third St., Philadelphia;
DREXEL, WINTHROP, & CO.,
18 Wall St., New York;
DREXEL, HARJES, & CO.,
3 Rue Scribe, Paris.

AMERICAN and FOREIGN
BANKERS,

Issue Drafts and Circular Letters of Credit, available on presentation in any part of Europe. Travelers can make all their financial arrangements through us. We will collect their interest and dividends without charge.

All correspondence or papers directed to the care of DREXEL, HARJES, & CO., Paris, will be promptly forwarded to any addresses that may be ordered by travelers; and, also, arrangements may be made for letters to be kept for them.

American Exchange, the various Cities always on file at the Paris office.

PRANG'S CHROMOS.

WEEKLY BULLETIN.—"Easter Morning;" "Primrose;" "Whittier's Birthplace." For sale in all Art Stores throughout the world.

CLOVERINE

Maintains its pre-eminence as the Ladies' Toilet Table cover of either Cleaning or removing DIRT and GREASE from Gloves, Silk, Satins, Velvets, &c. In bottles, at 15 and 25 cents.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Woodward's National Architect, 1000 Working Plans, Elevations, Sections, Detail Drawings, Specifications, Estimates. Postpaid, $12.

Harper's Barns, Outbuildings, and Fences, 140 Designs, including Stables, Gates, Entryways, and Stable Fittings. Postpaid, $3.

Woodward's Cottages and Farm-Houses, 75 Designs and Plans. Postpaid, $2.50.

Illustrated priced catalogue of all books on Architecture and Agriculture mailed free.

GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher,
191 Broadway, New York.

Waltham Watches,
IN 8-OZ. CASES,
For Merchants, Clerks, and Professional Men.

Waltham Watches,
IN 8-OZ. CASES,
For Farmers, Carpenters, and other Mechanics.

Waltham Watches,
IN 4-OZ. CASES,
For Mothers, Soldiers, and Expressmen.

Waltham Watches,
IN 8-OZ. CASES,
For Conductors, Engineers, and Baggagemen.

Waltham Watches,
IN 6-OZ. CASES,
For Miners, Lumbermen, and Stage Drivers.

Waltham Watches,
IN 8-OZ. CASES,
For all who wish something very substantial.

All the above are described in our Price-List. Write for it as follows:

Messrs. HOWARD & CO., No. 785 Broadway, N.Y.
Please send me your illustrated Price-List of WALTHAM WATCHES, as per advertisement in Harper's Weekly.

Sign Name and Address in Full.

And you will receive it, postpaid, by return mail. It gives all the information you desire, and explains our plan of sending Watches by Express without any risk to the purchaser.

HOWARD & CO.,
785 Broadway, New York,
(Formerly of No. 619 Broadway).

PATENTS INVENTORS who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to consult with MUNN & CO., Editors of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for Twenty-three Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. A pamphlet, containing full instructions to Inventors, 64 pages, sent free. Address MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, N.Y.

BLUNT & CO., 129 Water St., N. Y.
SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS.
First Quality only. At Very Low Prices.
Price-List Sent Free.

20,589
Advertisements (Gun's Index to), for Next of Kin, Chancery Heirs, Legatees, and cases of Unclaimed Money, since 1866. Price 50 cents.
JOHN HOOPER & CO., 41 Park Row, New York.

Stammering
Cured by Bates' Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, address SIMPSON & CO., Box 3076, New York.

Brewster & Broome St
Offer at their Warerooms
5th Avenue Cor. of 11th St
Elegant Carriages & Road Wagons
In the newest Designs
and of the most perfect construction exclusively the production of their Broome St. Factory
and in all respects equal to the vehicles
built to the order of their most valued
Customers. Sole manufactures of the
"Brewster Wagon."

FREEMAN & BURR, MERCHANT CLOTHIERS, TAILORS, and Outfitters in Men's and Boys' Clothing and Furnishing Goods, 120 & 140 Fulton Street, New York. Best Materials, Best Styles, Best Workmanship, and Lowest Prices.

CLOTHING OF EVERY description, ready-made or made to measure, for all ages, all occasions, and all climates.

All information concerning STYLES AND SUMMER CLOTHING, IN ALL THE NEWEST DESIGNS AND MATERIALS, at FREEMAN & BURR'S.

ORDERS BY MAIL attended to with care and punctuality. The easy and accurate system of self-measure introduced by FREEMAN & BURR enables them to send Clothing to any part of the country and guarantee Perfect Fitting in all cases.

RULES FOR SELF-MEASURE, Price-Lists, Samples of Goods, and Fashion Plate sent free, on application, to any part of the country.

45,000 Now in Use! Geo. A. Prince & Co.'s ORGANS and MELODEONS will be delivered in any part of the United States reached by Express (where they have no Agent), free of charge, on receipt of list price.

Send for Price-Lists and Circulars.
Address GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Buffalo, N.Y.,
or GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Chicago, Ill.

RHODODENDRONS,

There is no plant so beautiful. Its foliage is broad, evergreen, and hardy; its flowers are superb beyond description. For these and other varieties of

TREES, SHRUBS, ROSES, &c.,
address PARSONS & CO., Flushing, N.Y.

THE RICE DIVORCE SUIT

For fraud in age, is causing great excitement in Boston. It should warn young men not to marry in haste. Rice is but 21, his bride 37. He swears that she made him believe she was but his own age, by using Magnolia Balm upon her face, neck, and hands. Poor youth! He probably found her elbows weren't quite so soft and pretty. Ought Hagna to be indicted? We know of many similar cases. This Balm gives a most wonderful pearly and natural complexion, to which we don't object. We like pretty women. To finish the picture, they should use Lyon's Kathairon upon the hair. With pearly skin, rosy cheeks, and soft, luxuriant tresses, they become irresistible.

$20 A DAY to MALE and FEMALE

Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $30 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $60. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution. Address BUCKEYE M'F'G CO., Cleveland, O.

USE PATENT DOUBLE-POINTED TACKS. They have no heads to break off, never split leather, never cut carpets or other fabrics; can be used again and again, and have the floor in perfect condition. For sale by the trade and DOUBLE-POINTED TACK COMPANY,
55 Chambers St., N. Y.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
129 Send for Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

POLLAK & SON, Manuf'rs of Genuine Meerschaum Pipes, 10 Cortlandt Street, New York, and 10 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel, 1 Maiden Lane, St. nobble of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular to Letter-Box 3846. Repairing and Boiling also done.

$732 in 31 Days

Made by one Agent, selling Stevens's Patent Elastic Rosen. Over 60,000 now in use. Recommended by Horace Greeley and 100 Editors. Agents wanted. One county reserved for each Agent. C. A. Clegg & Co., 39 Cortlandt St., N. Y., or 126 Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'
SAPOLIO
CLEANS, POLISHES, AND IS
CHEAPER & BETTER THAN SOAP.
Depot, 211 Washington Street, New York.

JAMES & KIRTLAND,
38 READE ST., New York.
FOUNTAINS, VASES, SETTEES, &c.,
for Gardens and Lawns. Send for a Catalogue.

The New Books of the Spring,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for MAY, 1870
"The most popular Monthly in the world."—N. Y. Observer.

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS. By An Old Boy. New Edition. With numerous Illustrations by Arthur Hughes and Sidney Prior Hall. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SELF-HELP; with Illustrations of Character, Conduct, and Perseverance. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "The Life of the Stephensons," "History of the Huguenots," &c. &c. Revised and Enlarged Edition. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

BAZAR BOOK OF DECORUM. The Care of the Person, Manners, Etiquette, and Ceremonials. 16mo, Tinted Paper, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $1 00.

DEBENHAM'S VOW. A Novel. By Annie B. Edwards, Author of "Barbara's History," "Half a Million of Money," "Miss Carew," &c., &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. History of the American Civil War. By Prof. John Lord. Vols. III. and IV. Price per Vol., Cloth, $3 50; Sheep, $4 50; Half Morocco, $5 00.

A BRAVE LADY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE. By Rev. John M'Clintock, D.D., and James Strong, S.T.D. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. To be completed in about Six Volumes. Royal 8vo, of about One Thousand Pages each. Vols. I., II., and III., comprising A to Hymns, now ready. Each of the remaining Volumes will be in progress. Price, per Volume, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00; Half Morocco, $8 00.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the History of Matter and of Life. Together with a Statement of the Intimations of Scripture respecting the Primeval Condition and the Ultimate Destiny of the Earth and the Solar System. By Alexander Winchell, LL.D., Professor of Geology and Zoology and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 697.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

MRS. EMMA WILLARD.

MRS. EMMA WILLARD, whose portrait, taken in advanced years, we give on this page, was born in the town of Berlin, Connecticut, February 23, 1787. Her family, of Puritan stock, were among the earliest settlers in Connecticut. Her father was SAMUEL HART, a man of prominence in his day, both in Church and State, of extensive reading and information, and liberal views in politics and religion. From him his daughter inherited many of those intellectual qualities and traits that made her in after-life one of the most successful and popular of American female educators.

Her first experience in teaching was in 1804, when, at the age of seventeen, she took charge of a children's school in her native town. Her predecessor had been lax in discipline, and the children were accustomed to do just as they pleased. First she tried remonstrance and reasoning, telling them that she was there to do them good—to make them fine boys and girls—but all her pathetic appeals fell on listless ears. The rod was next tried, and before the day wore away the young teacher had nearly worn herself out in the punishment which she was compelled to bestow upon her scholars. But the lesson was well learned, and the whippings never had to be resorted to again. The school soon became a model one—its reputation extended, people came from a distance to inspect it, and by their commendation cheered the heart of the young teacher in what was to become the great work of her life.

The next two or three years of her life were spent in teaching and study. In 1807 she became assistant in the academy at Westfield, Massachusetts, and soon afterward took entire charge of a female seminary at Middlebury, Vermont. Here she was married to DR. JOHN WILLARD. The union proved a most fortunate and happy one. DR. WILLARD was a man of liberal education, and fully sympathized with his accomplished wife in her literary labors and scientific studies. His profession gave her facilities for the study of physiology; and at one time she announced a scientific theory in regard to the circulation of the blood, which has received countenance from eminent members of the medical profession. In consequence of financial losses, MRS. WILLARD, with her husband's consent, opened a boarding-school in Middlebury, and in 1816 she published an address to the Legislature, proposing a plan for improving female education. In the spring of 1819 she removed her school to Waterford, and two years afterward again removed it, for the last time, and settled permanently in Troy. The Common Council of that city appropriated $4000 toward the expense of maintaining the school.

MRS. EMMA WILLARD.—[PHOT. BY SOUDONMAKER, TROY, NEW YORK.]

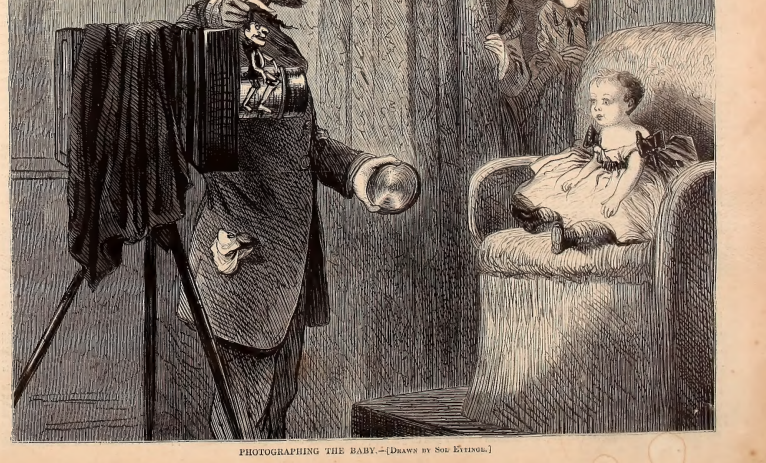
The career of this famous seminary need not be sketched here. It is well known throughout the length and breadth of the land. Nearly ten thousand young women have been educated within its walls. They came from every section of the country, North, South, East, and West; and, wherever they went, they always carried with them grateful remembrances of their friend and instructor. Her husband died only a short time after the establishment of the school at Troy, and from that time until 1846, when she relinquished the charge to her son and his accomplished wife, the entire responsibility of carrying on the business rested on herself. In the spring of the last-mentioned year she made the tour of the Western and Southern States, accompanied by a niece. Through her long journey of more than 8000 miles, embracing all the principal cities in the States west and south of New York except Florida and Texas, she was every where received by her former pupils with every mark of respect and affection. At seminaries for the education of girls she was welcomed as one of the pioneers in this department of literary training.

MRS. WILLARD was the author of many educational works, over a million copies of which have been circulated. She was fond of travel, and twice visited Europe—the second time in 1854, to attend the World Educational Convention in London. Her whole life was consecrated to the education and advancement of women, and her services will always be held in grate-fil remembrance. She lived to see the complete triumph of her views in regard to education, and passed away, at the ripe age of eighty-four, regretted by all who knew her.



PHOTOGRAPHING THE BABY.—[DRAWN BY SOL EYTINGE.]

[The following poem is not to be found in any edition of Leigh Hunt's works. I am indebted for the copy of it to Mr. Alexander Ireland, of Manchester, the author of a very valuable work entitled "List of the Works of Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt." M. D. CONWAY.
London, April 25, 1870.]

DIRGE FOR AN INFANT.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

He is dead and gone—a flower
Born and withered in an hour.
Coldly lies the death-frost now
On his little rounded brow;
And the cruel darkness lies
Ever on his shrouded eyes.
He will never feel again
Touch of softness joy or pain;
Never will his once-bright eyes
Open with a glad surprise;
Nor the death-frost leave his brow
All is over with him now.

Vacant now his cradle-bed,
As a nest from whence hath fled
Some dear little bird, whose wings
Rest from timid flutterings.
Thrown aside the childish rattle;
Hushed for aye the infant prattle—
Little broken words that could
By none else be understood
Save the childless one who wept
Over the grave where now he sleeps.
Closed his eyes, and cold his brow—
All is over with him now!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, May 7, 1870.

THE LIBERTINE PRESS.

THE conduct of the Prince of Wales has been very freely criticised by the press both in England and this country, and a suit for slander has now been brought in his name against a newspaper in Sheffield, which had stated that he would soon be implicated in another action for divorce. The fact called attention to the extreme freedom of personal comment by the press in both countries. It is a liberty which has become license. It has become so abused that nobody of experience or intelligence now believes any damaging personal comment in the newspapers without further proof. The rule of taking no notice of newspaper aspersions is a good one, and to very conspicuous persons it is an unavoidable one; but it is undeniable that the constant reiteration of a slander produces an effect. The pecuniary success of what may most fairly be called personal intelligence upon the best newspapers are another illustration of it. And the practice is now pushed to such an extreme that nobody can be sure that his most private letters and most unguarded words may not be served up for the public amusement.

The consequence of this practice is that the press becomes formidable not by reason, but by terror. It lives a universal blackmail upon society. A person appears as a reporter, and instantly a man who shrinks from notoriety, and with whom publicity has no necessary temptation to propitiate him by servility or to bribe him to silence. But as the most honorable of men will not serve as purveyor of scandal for the public, those who will serve have every body at their mercy. They may distort and invent at their pleasure; and he is a very foolish person who believes that people say what the interviewer ultimately reports them as having said. We have known a reporter to call upon a gentleman, who told him that he had nothing whatever to say upon the subject suggested, and wished not to be publicly mentioned in any manner. But the jackal, knowing that his lion, the public, was hungry, printed a story of the interview, with all the remarks that were not made. It is an illustration of what happens daily; and nothing is more truly edifying than to see such a newspaper pluming itself upon its defense of public morality. Indeed, the papers which endeavor to conduct as directed by terror, the ROBESPIERRES and MARATS of the press, imitate their prototypes. As MARAT called his sheet the Friend of the People, so these papers assume to be the especial guardians of public virtue.

The remedy for this primarily lies in the editorial profession, and not in the public. It is useless merely to denounce and decry the libertinism of the press as shameful. All sin is shameful; but many sins are profitable, and men love money. No editor or proprietor would publish a blackguard newspaper at a constant loss; any more than a man would keep a gambling-house or worse unless he made money by it. A quarter of a century ago there were periodical attacks in the other newspapers upon the New York Herald. It was decried as a disgrace to journalism, as a moral nuisance and pest. But the Herald kept on its course and flourished exceedingly, and has survived, apparently still prosperous, many of its warmest assailants. The bursts of moral indignation spent themselves without result. The truth is that the public wants entertainment in a newspaper. It is not news only that it seeks, nor didactic morality, and there is a large part of the public that delights in personal gossip. The same curiosity that carries old people to look at the dead body of a person whom they never knew, or that draws the crowds to crowd a church to see the marriage of those in whom they have no interest, wheels the spectator of thousands of readers for every day's gossip.

Now, if shrewd and honorable editors take an interesting paper without pandering to the blackguard taste of the public, they detach from the support of the blackguard papers those who buy them because they find them more entertaining than others; and thus the line will be drawn. The blackguard papers will not be ruined, indeed, for they can always count on a fellow-feeling in a certain part of the public. But honorable men who become journalists will prefer to make money honorably, and will decline the other kind of service. In this way the real glamour and evil of the press may be advanced, while just in the degree that the libertinism increases the character and civilizing power of the press will decline. The power of the libertine press soils every cause as it dishonors every person. Its advocacy is felt to be either venal or sensational. It is the friend not of the pirate and of the adventurer—to make money at any price, and to give its baseness the finest name. Among truly sagacious and self-respecting journals the libertine newspaper is what a sharper and a pander is among gentlemen. He affects to resemble them. He listens at keyholes. He cheats at cards. He lies and swears. He swaggers and cringes. He is a bully and a coward. Gentlemen avoid him, and do not name him.

It is in this way that the encroachments of the libertine press in this country are to be opposed. The active work must be done by the editors. If they denounce and then embrace, they must not be surprised if the public also embraces without denouncing. They must show that libertinism is not essential to the liveliest and the most attractive of newspapers, and then the blackguard journals will go to their own place and patrons.

CUBAN PROSPECTS.

THE chief Republican leader in Spain, CASTELLAR, has declared struggle for the continued union of Cuba with Spain, and the recent accounts from the island show that the struggle has begun there. GENERAL BANES evidently does not think the moment favorable for pressing the resolution in the House of Representatives, and he was wise enough not to appear at the late meeting in this city. It is not a subject upon which it is safe to speak with confidence; but the conditions of union proposed by Señor CASTELLAR, if adopted, would certainly remove all appearance of oppression upon the part of Spain. Señor CASTELLAR proposes that the slavery abolished; second, custom-houses abolished, to take from Cuba the chief cause of separation and from the United States the desire of annexation; third, the extension to the Cubans of all the rights of Spanish citizens; and fourth, local self-government. The present Spanish government involved the power of taxation and of general legislation, and to which Cuba should not be made tributary to Spain, it is not probable that serious resistance would continue upon the island.

Señor CASTELLAR and his friends naturally think that it was rather hard for the Cubans to select, at the moment of having swung against Spain, the very time at which they had risen against QUEEN ISABELLA and the régime that had made Spanish colonies in the Western Hemisphere, when fully established and organized, had refused justice to Cuba, an armed protest might have commanded the sympathy of the world. But that sympathy has never been given, because when the black roll of old Spanish oppression was recited, it was instantly answered that similar oppressions at home had also produced a revolution, the expulsion of that old Court, an appeal to the principles of republican influence in the Cortes. By what right, therefore, it was asked, do you plunge Cuba into all the inevitable horrors and wretchedness of war upon the plea of old oppressions, until you know that the new system will continue them? And to this question there was no answer.

The strenuous appeal for active sympathy with the insurgents in Cuba, by invoking all the revolution of the Spanish American colonies fifty years ago, has constantly failed for the same reason. If the Spain against which CASTELLAR rebelled still existed, the Cuban revolt might have been hailed by a very different feeling in this country. We may be very sure that JAMES OTIS and the fathers of our Revolution would have paused to await the issue if, just as they felt the armed struggle to be unavoidable, a victorious revolution against the tyranny of the British Government had taken place in England. They would have said, wisely, that revolution was not a good thing in itself, and that the appeal to arms can never be justified while there is yet a fair chance of peaceful remedy. And they would have insisted that the movement in the mother country offered the fairest possible chance for avoiding war. An oppressed people, indeed, is not likely to be prudent. But if its leaders are not prudent they betray their cause.

The truth was, that the Cuban revolution had been planned before that in Spain was known. It was to begin almost simultaneously. And when the news of the Spanish movement came it paralyzed, instead of wholly preventing, that in Cuba. From that paralysis it has never recovered. It may be the misfortune of brave and devoted men, but if the Cuban revolution has evidently never seemed to the American mind the heroic rising of an outraged people resolved to break the back of the old oppressor, and entitled to our national admiration and sympathy. It has seemed from the beginning a speculation. The real actors in it have been apparently a knot of persons in New York. There was talk of a government which has always been as shadowy as that of Barataria, and which, claiming to be that of an island, did not hold a single port. There were further talk of a war of emancipation—and the only visible head of the philanthropic crusade was General JORDAN, one of the late rebel generals in the country, urged to destroy our government because it would be made a mere conspiracy to extend slavery. General JORDAN was not a soldier who sells his sword and his service, and therefore not a person to be considered. But if that be so, doubts as to the honorable intentions of the Cuban war may at least be pardoned.

It is stoutly asserted, also, that if General WASHINGTON had left the President would long ago have virtually declared for Cuba. The influence of General RAWLINS upon the President may have been great, and he may have been especially well-informed upon Cuban affairs. Certainly he was a noble soldier and an honorable man, whose death the country sincerely deplored. But we see no reason in GENERAL GRANT'S character or career to suppose that he would have been eager in the case, or, willing to tarnish the fair renown of the United States by a policy of emotion rather than of principle. The end is not yet. Spain is far from tranquil; and the conscription seems, at this distance, to be ill-advised. But the great and well-established principles which have guided the public action of this country in Spanish affairs are not likely to be disregarded by this Administration. Cuba, surely, is not hostile to Spain, which has thrown off an intolerable government, and is trying to establish a better; nor is it hostile to the Cubans who are honestly striving for independence.

A FRIEND INSULTED.

THE contempt with which the Senate has treated DENMARK, a small but most friendly power, is a blot upon the national honor. Our own Foreign Secretary, with the concurrence of the President, urged a treaty upon Denmark for buying St. Thomas, and Brandenburg acted. The offer was persistently renewed, until Denmark was satisfied that it was made in good faith; and, after a long negotiation, earnestly pressed and urged by us, a convention agreeable to the wishes and proposals of the President and Secretary of State was signed by the accredited Minister of the United States, on the 24th of October, 1867. It was to have been ratified by the 24th of February, 1868. But the day passed without so much as a word from the Foreign Committee of the Senate. Eight months later, an additional convention was agreed upon by the Secretary of State and the Danish Minister, making a year from the date of the convention. That day passed without the slightest notice from the Senate. Under the new Administration the term was again extended until the 4th of April, 1870. That day passed also with the dissolutest silence of the Senate. The convention had, of course, at an end, and GENERAL RAASLOFF, the Danish Minister at War, one of the ablest of the Danish statesmen, and recently Minister of Denmark in this country, to whom the negotiation was chiefly supposed, who was necessarily trusted by his Government, and who was unwilling to believe that the United States would treat with contempt a friendly power which they had themselves solicited to negotiate, has offered his resignation to the King.

In the St. Thomas treaty there was no job, no plunder. It occurred to us as a most unfortunate and friendly popularism—perhaps the best in the Gulf—whose assent to the transfer was unanimous. If we have an ambition to rule in the Indies, there was none more desirable. It would have very slightly increased our population: it was involved in no debt and in no war. The proposal for its acquisition was the act of our Executive, and the contemptuous silence with which the Senate has treated the convention not only insults a power which has no remedy, and, therefore, puts us in the attitude of a bully, but it will necessarily incline every government in the world to listen with the utmost incredulity to every proposal of a negotiation with this country, and to deal to the constant mortification of our foreign ministers.

ARCADE RAILROAD.

THE annual gathering of the Legislature has come to be regarded with serious apprehension; and it is therefore an inexpressible relief to know that its hundred days have nearly expired. The presence of individual members among the people may be counteracted, as it is easier to deal with foul matter diffused than in accumulated masses. If the people are true to themselves, the position at home of those who as legislators have brought disgrace upon the system under which they assemble will be made to correspond with this formidable influence. The country's experience shows a decisive advance in corruption; but in the Arcade Railroad bill the policy of proceeding in that direction by unanimous steps has been abandoned, and at a single bound all prudence has been dismissed. The bill confers a right to take whole parcels of land from the rear of the gift to the incorporators, and subjects to their power hundreds of millions' worth of private property.

The corruption which is now so general in municipal and State legislation owes its origin and progress almost entirely to the Arcade bills. Prior to the grant to the Sixth and Eighth Avenue roads, made in the first instance by the Common Council, the city was generally governed; but the passage of these measures, and the action which followed, earned for the Common Council the title of the Board of the Forty Thieves. A grant of a Broadway Railroad was made at about the same time, and by the same authority, and when application will take the trouble to look over the names of grantees and officers of roads of that day will find among them all the leading and most conspicuous authors of the wide-spread corruption that prevails. It threatens to destroy every safeguard for public and private property. The power to establish these roads having been held not to be an incident of municipal authority, the scene of these measures was transferred to the State Legislature; and the result is that honest men, one after another, have been expelled from public life as the unavailing protest of this powerful interests. A majority has been established at Albany who legislate only for pecuniary rewards, and in the direction of selfish interests.

The constitutional restriction that private property shall not be taken for public use "without just compensation" is in fact neutralized by the provisions of this bill, which declares that in proceedings to ascertain the value of the property taken (usually for stations, depôts, etc.) "and the injury or damage sustained, the question of benefit shall be considered, and to the extent it shall appear by the construction of said road will enhance the value of the property of the person or party claiming damages to be sustained greater than the amount of the injury sustained, then and in that case the claimants shall not be entitled to recover more than nominal damages." If the road's benefits are less than the injury, the claimants shall only be entitled to recover the excess of such damage or injury.

This, which is a sample of the injustice of the whole bill, would entitle the company to take any property in Broadway, and pay for it by the supposed advantage which the construction of the road, in the view of friendly commissioners, would confer on the contiguous property of the owner in the upper part of the island. And of course, in taking land under this power the Company will be able to ascertain how much other property may belong to the owner over which they may distribute the value of what they take for stations, depôts, and other purposes.

The furthest extent hitherto reached in this line of plundering acquisition of property through a system of increased and increasing taxation. The tax enters, in carrying out this previous policy, to allow the assessment to the owner of a partial and somewhat prolonged enjoyment; but this bill is sudden and effective in its operation, and the benefit to unproductive property may be set off against the productive which the corporators move.

The owner is driven to the Supreme Court of the first judicial district of this State, and nor elsewhere," for his remedies to enjoin this iniquity; and the motion for that writ be made only at a special term, and after eight days' notice. Some of the press which affects to feel a great horror at the nomination of a new bench of the Supreme Court of the United States have been filled with judges of loyal antecedents, support the Arcade Railroad bill, and notwithstanding that it subjects the rights of individuals to the mercies of a tribunal selected in the interests of an adverse party. It is important that a fundamental principle incorporated in the Bill of Rights, established for public safety, is held in perfect contempt by the Legislature, as it is expected by them that it will be so held in the tribunal constructed for the purpose.

But on grounds of mere convenience the power over the business of the city which the bill confers will be considered one of its worst features. The travel and transportation conducted over Broadway are driven there because there is no other convenient avenue not occupied with railroads. The bill supposes that these interests will for a reasonable time, to be judged of by the Company, be interrupted, and provision is made, as the construction of the road proceeds, only for public travel. The omission in the bill to require temporary bridges for the transportation of merchandise as well as travel is doubtless due to the desire to save the expense of a heavy structure, but it is at the sacrifice of the business of the city. By an amendment the Commissioner of Public Works of the City of New York may compel the erection of temporary bridges for such travel, and compel the execution of the work below Fourteenth Street in such manner as no to interfere with the passage of Broadway except under such conditions as he may prescribe. But what can be expected from this source?

No compensation is provided for the incidental loss to owners on Broadway in rents and profits which must inevitably follow. Their property may be indeed by execution and deprived of any revenue. The work may be delayed for a year and a half, and then five years may be consumed, not counting any time lost in litigation. But it will take infinitely longer to complete the road. By what right can property owners on this line be subjected to irreparable loss?

An examination of the provisions of the bill will show that it disregards the principle on which the right to take private property for public use is founded; that it subjects the business of the city to the control of speculators in public grants; that it exposes property owners to spoliation and exaction; that it closes the door of the ordinary tribunals of the State against them; and places our parks in the power of those who will not scruple to convert them into railroad property.

GLIMPSES OF "THE DEMOCRACY."

The four months' session of Governor HOFFMAN'S "honest" New York Legislature is drawing very reluctantly to an end. The Democratic party, which has had a majority in both branches, came into power last autumn with two promises upon its lips. One was to restore —in its phrase—to the city of New York the right of self-government; and the other, to secure a stricter economy in the public expenditure. It kept its first promise by forcing the appointment of every chief officer in the city of New York, for four years and more, to a Mayor elected last year. As for the economy, let us hear the words of an ardent Democrat, the special Albany correspondent of the World:

"I should have some patience with the huge tax if it were for the necessary expenditure of the needy life of a great State, but so much of it is so recklessly ordered: and even in a party sense so much of it to their party when they allow it to drift into a severity of taxation beyond former years.

* * *

"And so unnecessary appropriations are wrung out of a people just busily recovering from the effects of the war, and all this because so few men are found capable of perceiving and resisting the combinations that are formed. The legislature acts like men sitting round a common object of plunder, and extorts out of the State all that is possible.

* * *

"This session ought to end Saturday at noon of this week. If the people of the State knew how much they would be spared of reputation and treasure by such vacation of the Capitol, they would almost, globally, re-enact the ordinance framed by WELLINGTON and NAPOLEON thrust out the legislature by their day."

Nothing could be added to such statements as illustrative of the character and methods of the dominant party in the State.

But they will be of use if they remind those who are inclined to think that any change is for the better, that the Democratic party is one that does not and can not learn. Thus, one of its committees or associations in Philadelphia has been lately gravely discussing the question if Democratic party will or will not resist the recent Constitutional Amendments, and it issues "a declaration," which is an extraordinary political document. The "declaration" sets forth, among other great truths, that "the Democratic party was created to protect and defend this system of government." Considering that the rebellion to overthrow it by arms was waged by the most conspicuous Democratic leaders, and had some but Democratic support and sympathy; that the Democratic Convention of 1864 was pro-surrender to the rebellion; and that of 1868 favored the repudiation of the debt incurred in suppressing it—this point of the "declaration" is historically amusing.

The "declaration" proceeds to state that "the meaning of the Constitution was fixed in power since 1860, and that they have continually made mince-meat of it ever since—especially, probably, before the people and in simple-tree. They have been perpetrating acts of "fraud, force, and violence," of which the Philadelphia Committee "proclaims its abhorrence." The same virtue abhorred the malefactor LINCOLN and the butcher GRANT, and its "declaration" smacks dismally of a Mr. JACKSON, who does the Philadelphia Democratic thunder, or of the patriotic Mr. WILLIAM B. REED, who in 1860 availed with ineffable complacency the arrival of the Christian hero, General LEE, in the city of brotherly love, and was grievously disappointed that he did not come.

This is the kind of political insolence to which the Democratic party devotes itself when it is out of power, and how full it is of promise to the peace and good feeling of the country is evident to him who reads as he runs. Where the party is in power, as in New York, it does not fulminate against the enemies of the Constitution, but it is thrifty like the Tammany Ring. It cultivates abstractions, but of another kind than the Philadelphia "declaration" of. It wrings taxes out of the people, according to the Democratic witness we have quoted, it sits "round a common object of plunder, and extorts out of the State all that is possible." This is congenial and familiar work. I salute the New York Democracy as the party which has not the honesty of his party at the polls secured its ascendency; we shall now behold long-needed reforms. What a perceptive Governor it is!

THE REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY.

AMONG the bills passed by the lower branch of the New York Legislature is one which deserves attention, partially reorganizing the system of education of primary schools over the State. It is in accordance with the suggestions of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, by which we learn that the present bill constitutes a Board of Education, of which the Superintendent is the head, and in which the Board of Regents is merged and abolished. There are to be thirty-two Regents instead of nineteen as now. They are to be elected as now by joint ballot of the Senate and Assembly; but while the present members are to remain, as they were elected, for life, or at the pleasure of the people, the new ones appointed are to retire every ten years. The Regents are hereafter to report to the Superintendent, instead of to the Legislature as they do now. All their present duties are to continue, and they are still to be unpaid.

The Superintendent who have already stated we can not see that this change is thorough enough to be of any essential services. It goes just far enough to remove the objection that approves the Board of Regents of its independent dignity, and does nothing else. The Board, in obedience to the Superintendent's recommendation, just made a brief report to that body, showing that it has already every desirable power of a Board of Education, except that of legislation, and declaring that no change in its present organization would make it more efficient for that purpose. It is not easy to see why the trouble to see how the efficiency of this Board would be increased by requiring it to report to the Superintendent instead of to the Legislature, or by limiting the term of membership to ten years. Nor do we understand why an unpaid post for gentlemen who have a business like education should be considered more honorable case of citizenship; but, she says, "how long is this to continue?" It will be more soldiers to coming the Indians in a way very agreeable to them, are starved and maltreated than to keep them in subjection. On the other hand, if they are true that they can secure a permanent peace, and that the white neighbors can be prevented from encroaching, then, with proper teaching, I warmed in the savage, as he is called by day, will be a law-abiding member of the community fifteen or twenty years hence."

If prophecies, Mr. SWEARD could tell SARAH WINNEMUCCA, are dangerous. But it is surely worth while to make the effort to try an honest policy with the Indians. If there are savages who will not be tamed, at least there are a great multitude of Indians of whom what this letter says is true. Surely it shall turn out false as to SARAH WINNEMUCCA, and that no such letter was ever written, its statements will still remain as the plea and protest of thousands of the Indians.

NOTICES.

IN the artists who paint the portraits of famous men do a great service for the world, how great a service only those who have felt the history of good men's lives! When we read of a neighbor of whom we had never heard, and discover that his genuine and pure and devoted life, that his influence was as lofty and his character as good endowed and strengthened. Such a story is told in a little book called the "Way, Truth, and Life," by the author of "Ragged Homes," Brooklyn, written with singular grace and charm by his friend and successor, JOHN DEATHERN. It is a life without romance, but short, active, unselfish. But the character of Mr. MACKAY was so lovely, his spirit was so pure, his views of duty and of the religious nature and relations of men so lofty, that the little memoir, and the few extracts from his writings which accompany it, are an addition as modest as they are valuable to the list of good books.

A DELIGHTFUL book of travel is Professor JAMES DEMMOND'S "The Andes and the Amazon," just published by the HARPERS. Mr. ONTON landed at Guayaquil, crossed the shoulder of Chimborazo to Quito, made the tour of the mountains under the equator, then descended the long eastern slope of the continent, and by the river Napo reached the Amazon, down which he sailed to Para upon the Atlantic coast, and thence came home. His description of the incidents of travel is simple and very charming, and his account of the people, scenery, and natural history of the mountain and river region will be very much appreciated where he knows how to gratify the most intelligent curiosity. The book is not only pleasant and lively, but it is of permanent value.

IT is stated that Mr. VALLANDIGHAM authorizes the announcement that "under no circumstances" will he be a candidate for the House of Representatives at the next election. But, it is added, his friends propose that "he shall attend the Democratic Convention until the next Senatorial election." If friends always gave politicians such sound advice they would be invaluable. It is a pity, however, in this case, that the friends had not advised him to attend to his business after the Senatorial election also, for then will not in the least interfere with such attention. Mr. VALLANDIGHAM will never consent to any political honors again as when he was defeated for Governor by a hundred thousand majority.

We are glad to remark that the United States flag-ship SARATOGA has gone to Santiago de Cuba to inquire into the outrage, lately, as recently mentioned, upon Mr. PHILLIPS, the United States Consul at that port.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

April 18.—In the Senate, a resolution of inquiry was adopted as to alleged charges of an attempt to influence legislation in the veto of the Georgia Bill.—In the House, a bill was introduced, and passed to a third reading by 95, for the appointment of the next Congress, fixing the number of members at 278, apportioned to the several States of the United States.

April 19.—In the Senate, Mr. Chandler endeavored unsuccessfully to introduce a resolution looking to the annexation of the Winnipeg country to the United States.—In the House, nearly the whole day was taken up with the Tariff bill.

April 20.—The Civil Rights Bill was accomplished in the Senate; and in the House, the discussion of the day was on a resolution to unseat the Hon. JOHN M. HARLAN, representative for the First Congressional District of Louisiana. The resolution failed. That district was finally declared invalid.

April 21.—In the Senate, the principal business of the day was the Georgia Bill.—In the House, the Pacific Railway bill.—Nothing of any importance was accomplished in the House.

April 22.—In the Senate, a long debate occurred on the Amendment to the Georgia Bill, and on the annexation of the Winnipeg country as a Territory. In the House, nearly the whole day in Committee on Appropriations. Among other bills passed was one to repeal the act of 1848, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to the Indian tribes. This is the last law on the statute-book of Congress.—April 23. In the Senate, the Tariff was the main topic of the day, the sections discussed being those relating to the duty on sugar.—In the House, the Senate bill to restore to New Pucblo the lands granted to the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad Company was passed.—April 25. In the House nothing was done. The Senate bill to restore to New Pueblo the lands granted to the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad Company was finally refused to concur, and also refused to ask for a committee of conference.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

The lower house of the New York Legislature has passed a bill regulating the Excise Department of the State, except in the city of New York, and also to amend the Excise law so as to prohibit, except on the same lights as white voters—in accordance with the provisions of the Constitutional Amendment.

The Massachusetts House of Representatives, after a long debate, April 19, passed a resolution in favor of submission to the State Constitution enabling women to vote and hold office.

The Prince Edward Island Legislature has rejected, by a large majority, a resolution in favor of Confederation with Canada.

The Governor of the late Minister Burlingame, which arrived from Europe at San Francisco, April 19, were received with appropriate ceremonies, on April 20, by the Governor of California, Senator Booth.

The Fenian scare still continues in Canada, and every precaution has been taken to give the raiders a warm reception, should they venture across the border. A Police Force has been created in New York April 19, and continued in session several days. The Governor is empowered to call upon the General for the proposed division of Canada.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided the motion of the Attorney General for a mandamus to the Secretary of War, which was forwarded—inviting him to the exercise of his official duties, and requiring him to issue the message of the Legal-Tender act—on the ground that some of the judges who concurred in the decision desired a rehearing.

FOREIGN NEWS.

It is reported that the papal police in Rome are active in searching out and imprisoning persons against the dogma of Infallibility.

In the Tyrol, a strictly Catholic province of Austria, there is a wide-spread movement in favor of secession from the Empire. Resistance to the dogma of Infallibility is promulgated.

The Irish Church Bill is becoming troublesome in England. They have threatened to mob the editor of the London Times and Pall Mall Gazette, and both establishments are guarded by the military.

Legal proceedings have been instituted against the Sheffield (Scotland) Daily Telegraph for libel, in consequence of the use of the word "Fenian" in the Divorce Court in the case of the Earl of St. Lawrence against his wife.

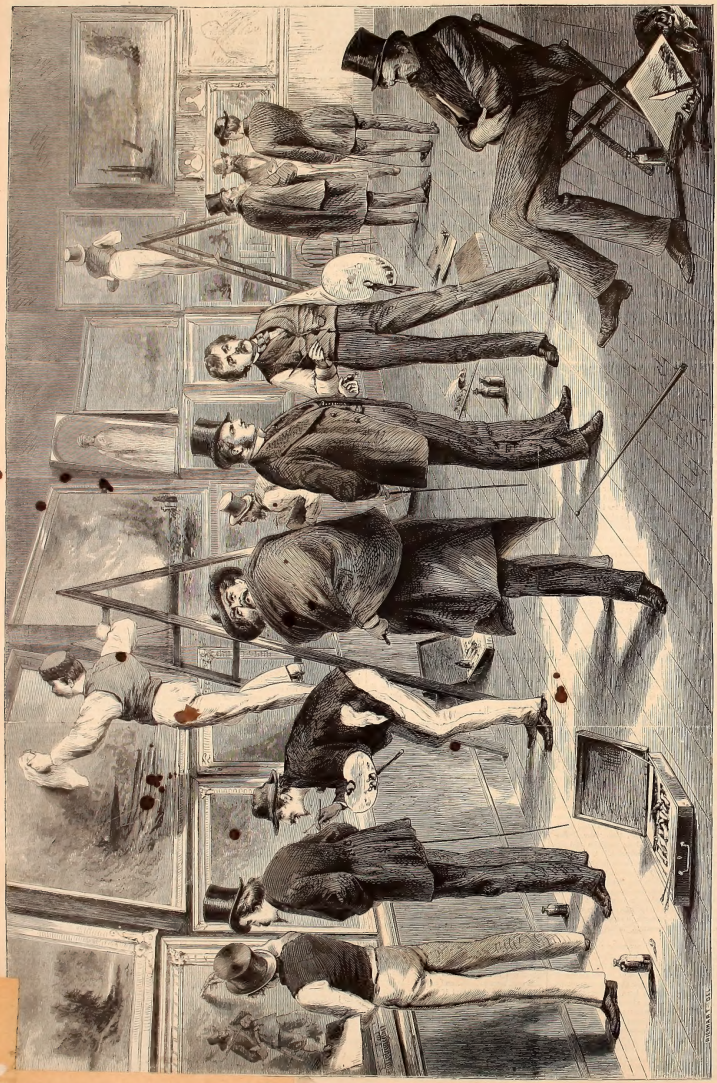
On the 5th of April the Emperor of France issued a proclamation in regard to the plebiscites, in which he swears to the maintenance of the laid down, and upon his supporters to ratify them, and by this means place order and peace on a firm basis, the effect of which will be stability of political institutions and the peaceful transmission of power to the heir to the throne.

The workmen in Paris are uneasy, and great numbers of them have struck for higher wages and industrial reforms.

Spanish Democracy is seriously ill at its country seat in Cadiz.

A party of travelers, including several persons of high rank, recently captured by Greek bandits near Athens, have been murdered by their captors.

The city of Lisbon, Portugal, suffered from a severe earthquake on the 16th inst. Several persons were killed, and a large number seriously injured, and great damage done to the buildings. Many vessels at sea or in the Tagus were wrecked.



VARNISHING DAY AT THE NEW YORK NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.—DRAWN BY C. S. REINHART.—[SEE PAGE 302.]

THE WAR IN CUBA—SURPRISE OF AN INSURGENT CAMP.—[SEE PAGE 302.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

NINTH SCENE.—THE MUSIC-ROOM.

CHAPTER THE FORTIETH.

JULIUS MAKES MISCHIEF.

JULIUS DARNAY was alone; idly smartening to and fro, with his violin in his hand, on the terrace at Swanhaven Lodge.

The first mellow light of evening was in the sky. It was the close of the day on which Anne Silvester had left Perth.

Some hours earlier, Julius had sacrificed himself to the duties of his political position—as made for him by his father. He had submitted to the dire necessity of delivering an oration to the electors, at a public meeting in the neighboring town of Kirkandrew. A detestable atmosphere to breathe; a disorderly audience to address; intervals of suspense to undergo; inquisitive inquiries to answer; brutish interruptions to endure; greedy politicians to pacify; and dirty hands to shake: these are the stages by which the aspiring English gentleman is compelled to travel on the journey which leads from the modest obscurity of private life to the glorious publicity of the House of Commons. Julius had the preliminary penalties of a political first appearance, as exacted by free institutions, with the necessary resources; and returned to the welcome shelter of home, more indifferent, if possible, to the attractions of Parliamentary distinction than he was before he set out. The discord of the roaring "people" (still echoing in his ears) had sharpened his customary sensibility to the poetry of sound, as composed by Mozart, and as interpreted by piano and violin. Possessing himself of his favorite instrument, he had gone out on the terrace to cool himself in the evening air, heeding the arrival of the servant with the mail summoned by the music-room bell. The mail appeared at the glass door which led into the room; and reported, in answer to his master's inquiry, that Mrs. Julius Delamayn was out paying visits, and was not expected to return for another hour at least.

Julius groaned in spirit. The finest music which Mozart has written for the violin associates that instrument with the piano. Without the wife by him, the husband was nothing. After an instant's consideration, Julius hit on an idea which promised, in some degree, to remedy the disaster of Mrs. Delamayn's absence from home.

"Has Mr. Glenarm gone out, too?" he asked.

"No, Sir."

"My compliments. If Mrs. Glenarm has nothing else to do, will she be so kind as to come to me in the music-room?"

The servant went away with his message. Julius seated himself on one of the terrace-benches, and begun to tune his violin.

Mrs. Glenarm, originally reported by Bishopriggs as having privately taken refuge from her obnoxious correspondent at Swanhaven Lodge —was, nevertheless, at home, and ready to efficient substitutes for Mrs. Delamayn. Julius possessed, in his wife, one of the few players on the piano-forte under whose subtle touch that shallow and soulless instrument becomes inspired with expression on its own, and produces music instead of noise. The fine organization which men work like miracle had not been bestowed on Mrs. Glenarm. She had been carefully taught; and she was to be trusted to play correctly—and was no more. Julius, hungry for music, and resigned to circumstances, asked for no more.

The servant returned with his message. Mrs. Glenarm would join Mr. Delamayn in the music-room in ten minutes' time.

Julius rose, relieved, and resumed his saunter ing walk: now playing little snatches of music, as they stopped or took air as the fiercer heat of the race, with an eye that enjoyed their beauty, and a hand that fondled them with caressing touch. If Imperial Parliament had seen him at that moment, Imperial Parliament must have given notice of a question to his illustrious father. Is it possible, my lord, that you can have begotten such a Member as this?

After stopping for a moment to tighten one of the strings of his violin, Julius, raising his head from the instrument, was surprised to see a man approaching him on the terrace. Advancing to meet her, and perceiving that she was a total stranger to him, he assumed that she was at the wrong door. Probability, a visitor to his wife.

"Have I the honor of speaking to a friend of Mrs. Delamayn's?" he asked. "My wife is not at home, I am sorry to say."

"I am a stranger to Mrs. Delamayn," the lady answered. "The servant informed me that she had gone out; and that I should find Mr. Delamayn here."

Julius bowed—and waited to hear more.

"I must beg you to forgive my intrusion," the stranger went on. "My object is to ask permission to see a lady who is, I have been informed, a guest in your house."

The extraordinary formality of the request further puzzled Julius.

"Do you mean Mrs. Glenarm?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Pray don't think any permission necessary. A friend of Mrs. Glenarm's may take her welcome for granted in this house."

"I am not a friend of Mrs. Glenarm. I am a total stranger to her."

This made the ceremonious request preferred by the lady a little more intelligible—but it left the lady's object in wishing to speak to Mrs. Glenarm still in the dark. Julius politely waited, until it pleased her to proceed further, and explain herself. No explanation did not appear to be an easy one to give. Her eyes dropped to the ground. She hesitated painfully.

"My name—if I mention it," she resumed, without looking up, "may possibly inform you." She paused. Her color rose slightly. She hesitated again: struggled with her agitation, and continued: "I am Anne Silvester." She said, suddenly raising her pale face, and suddenly steadying her trembling voice.

Julius listened, and looked at her in silent surprise.

The name was doubly known to him. Not long since, he had heard it from his father's lips, at his father's bedside. Lord Holchester had charged him, had earnestly charged him, to bear that name in mind, and to help the woman who bore it, if the occasion ever applied to him in time to come. Again, he had heard the name, more lately, associated scandalously with the name of his brother. On the receipt of a letter from the anonymous letters sent to her, Mrs. Glenarm had not only summoned Geoffrey Delamayn to receive the superior cast upon him, but had forwarded a private copy of the letter to his relatives at Swanhaven Lodge. Geoffrey's defense had been satisfied Julius that his brother was free from blame. But the name involved in the scandal, the doubt returned upon him strengthened—almost confirmed. Was this woman—so modest, so genuine, so singularly unconventional—the mysterious adventuress denounced by Geoffrey, as claiming him on the strength of a foolish flirtation during boyhood, at the time of his father's imprisoned to another man? Was this woman—with the voice of a lady—with the look and manner of a lady—in league (as Geoffrey had declared) with the illiterate vagabond who was attempting to extort money anonymously from Mrs. Glenarm? Impossible! Making every allowance for the proverbial deceitfulness of appearances, impossible!

"Your name has been mentioned to me," said Julius, speaking her first at last. Generosity pause. His instincts, as a gentleman, made him shrink from distressing the unprotected lady of her name with the name of his brother. "My father mentioned you," he added, considerately explaining his knowledge of her in that way, "when I last saw him in London."

"Your father!" She came a step nearer, with a look of distrust as well as a look of astonishment in her face. "Your father is Lord Holchester—is he not?"

"Yes."

"What made him speak of me?"

"He was ill at the time," Julius answered. "And he had been thinking of events in his past life with which you are evidently connected. He said he had known your father and mother. He desired me, if you were ever in want of any assistance, to place my services at your disposal. When he expressed that wish, he spoke very earnestly—as if he remembered that there was a feeling of regret associated with the recollections on which he had been dwelling."

Slowly, and in silence, Anne drew back to the low wall of the terrace close by. She rested one hand on it, and looked away from him. She had words of terrible import without a suspicion of what he had done. Never until now had Anne Silvester known that the man who had betrayed her was the son of that other man whose discovery of the fatal flaw in the iron cross was the betrayal of her mother before her. She felt the shock of the revelation with a chill of surprise, rather than with a pang. Was the mystery wound invisibly round her? Turn which way she might, was she still groping darkly on the track of her dead mother, to an appointed and hereditary doom? Present things passed from her view as in the awful distress that stunned her mind. She lived again for a moment in the time when she was a child. She saw the face of her mother once more, with the wan despair on it of the forgone days when the title of wife was denied her, and the sad secret was only whispered "Your invisibly round her? Turn which way she might, was she still groping darkly on the track of her dead mother, to an appointed and hereditary doom? Present things passed from her view as in the awful distress that stunned her mind. She lived again for a moment in the time when she was a child. She saw the face of her mother once more, with the wan despair on it of the forgone days when the title of wife was denied her, and the sad secret was only whispered "Your invisibly round her? Turn which way she might, was she still groping darkly on the track of her dead mother, to an appointed and hereditary doom? Present things passed from her view as in the awful distress that stunned her mind. She lived again for a moment in the time when she was a child. She saw the face of her mother once more, with the wan despair on it of the forgone days when the title of wife was denied her, and the sad secret was only whispered "Your invisibly round her? Turn which way she might, was she still groping darkly on the track of her dead mother, to an appointed and hereditary doom? Present things passed from her view as in the awful distress that stunned her mind. She lived again for a moment in the time when she was a child. She saw the face of her mother once more, with the wan despair on it of the forgone days when the title of wife was denied her, and the sad secret was only whispered "Your

"I am not a friend of Mrs. Glenarm. I am a total stranger to her."

This made the ceremonious request preferred by the lady a little more intelligible—but it left the lady's object in wishing to speak to Mrs. Glenarm still in the dark. Julius politely waited, until it pleased her to proceed further, and explain herself. No explanation did not appear to be an easy one to give. Her eyes dropped to the ground. She hesitated painfully.

"My name—if I mention it," she resumed, without looking up, "may possibly inform you." She paused. Her color rose slightly. She hesitated again: struggled with her agitation, and continued: "I am Anne Silvester." She said, suddenly raising her pale face, and suddenly steadying her trembling voice.

Julius listened, and looked at her in silent surprise.

The name was doubly known to him. Not long since, he had heard it from his father's lips, at his father's bedside. Lord Holchester had charged him, had earnestly charged him, to bear that name in mind, and to help the woman who bore it, if the occasion ever applied to him in time to come. Again, he had heard the name, more lately, associated scandalously with the name of his brother. On the receipt of a letter from the anonymous letters sent to her, Mrs. Glenarm had not only summoned Geoffrey Delamayn to receive the superior cast upon him, but had forwarded a private copy of the letter to his relatives at Swanhaven Lodge. Geoffrey's defense had been satisfied Julius that his brother was free from blame. But the name involved in the scandal, the doubt returned upon him strengthened—almost confirmed. Was this woman—so modest, so genuine, so singularly unconventional—the mysterious adventuress denounced by Geoffrey, as claiming him on the strength of a foolish flirtation during boyhood, at the time of his father's imprisoned to another man? Was this woman—with the voice of a lady—with the look and manner of a lady—in league (as Geoffrey had declared) with the illiterate vagabond who was attempting to extort money anonymously from Mrs. Glenarm? Impossible! Making every allowance for the proverbial deceitfulness of appearances, impossible!

"Your name has been mentioned to me," said Julius, speaking her first at last. Generosity pause. His instincts, as a gentleman, made him shrink from distressing the unprotected lady of her name with the name of his brother. "My father mentioned you," he added, considerately explaining his knowledge of her in that way, "when I last saw him in London."

"Your father!" She came a step nearer, with a look of distrust as well as a look of astonishment in her face. "Your father is Lord Holchester—is he not?"

"Yes."

"What made him speak of me?"

"He was ill at the time," Julius answered. "And he had been thinking of events in his past life with which you are evidently connected. He said he had known your father and mother. He desired me, if you were ever in want of any assistance, to place my services at your disposal. When he expressed that wish, he spoke very earnestly—as if he remembered that there was a feeling of regret associated with the recollections on which he had been dwelling."

Slowly, and in silence, Anne drew back to the low wall of the terrace close by. She rested one hand on it, and looked away from him. She had words of terrible import without a suspicion of what he had done. Never until now had Anne Silvester known that the man who had betrayed her was the son of that other man whose discovery of the fatal flaw in the iron cross was the betrayal of her mother before her. She felt the shock of the revelation with a chill of surprise, rather than with a pang. Was the mystery wound invisibly round her? Turn which way she might, was she still groping darkly on the track of her dead mother, to an appointed and hereditary doom? Present things passed from her view as in the awful distress that stunned her mind. She lived again for a moment in the time when she was a child. She saw the face of her mother once more, with the wan despair on it of the forgone days when the title of wife was denied her, and the sad secret was only whispered "Your Julius approached, and roused her.

"Can I do you any thing?" he asked. "You are looking very ill. I hope I have said nothing to distress you?"

The question failed to attract her attention. She put a question herself instead of answering it.

"Did you say you were quite ignorant of what your father was thinking of when he spoke to you about me?"

"Quite ignorant."

"Is your brother likely to know more about it than you do?"

"Certainly not."

She paused, absorbed once more in her own reflections. Julius, on his side, considered for a while whether they had first met, by Geoffrey's family name, she had put the question to him whether there had not been some acquaintance between their parents in the past time. Deceiving her in all else, he had not deceived in this. He had spoken in good faith, when he had declared that he had never heard her father or her mother mentioned at home.

The curiosity of Julius was aroused. He attempted to lead her to a second question.

"You appear to know what my father was thinking of when he spoke to me," he resumed. "May I ask—"

She interrupted him with a gesture of entreaty.

"Pray don't ask! It's past and over—it can have no interest for you—it has nothing to do with my errand here." She turned from him, even on, hurriedly, "to my object in trespassing on your kindness. Have you heard me mentioned,

Mr. Delamayn, by another member of your family besides your father?"

Julius had not anticipated that she would approach, of her own accord, the painful subject on which he had himself forborne to touch. He was a little disappointed. He had expected more delicacy of feeling from her than she had shown.

"It is necessary," he asked, coldly, "to enter on that?"

The blood rose again in Anne's cheeks.

"If it had not been necessary," she answered, "do you think I could have forced myself to mention it to you? Let me remind you that I am here on sufferance. If I don't speak plainly on matter at all, you have my own feelings, I make my situation more embarrassing than it is already. I have something to tell Mrs. Glenarm relating to the anonymous letters which she has lately received. And I have a word to say to you, first, about your contemplated marriage. Before you allow me to do this, you ought to know who I am. (I have owned it.) You ought to have heard the remarks that can be made of my conduct. (Your face tells me that you have heard the worst.) After the forbearance you have shown to me, as a perfect stranger, it will not commit the meanness of taking you by surprise. Geoffrey Delamayn, you understand, sees why I felt myself obliged to refer to your brother. Will you trust me with permission to speak to Mrs. Glenarm?"

It was simply and modestly said—with an unaffected sense of the extraordinary request of such a manner. Julius gave her back the respect and the sympathy which, for a moment, he had unjustly withheld from her.

"You have placed a confidence in me," he said, "which I shall respect as it deserves. You would have withheld. I feel bound, in return, to place confidence in you. I will take it for granted that your motive in this matter is one of which it is my duty to respect. It will be for Mrs. Glenarm to say whether she wishes to grant the interview to take place or not. All that I can do is to leave you free to propose it to her. You may rely on me."

As he spoke the sound of the piano reached them from the music-room. Julius pointed to the glass door which opened on to the terrace.

"You have only to go in by that door," he said, "and you will find Mrs. Glenarm alone."

Anne bowed, and left him. Arrived at the short flight of steps which led up to the door, she paused to collect her thoughts before she went in.

A sudden reluctance to go on and enter the room took possession of her, as she waited with her foot on the lower step. The prejudice of Mrs. Glenarm's contemplated marriage had produced no such effect on her as the fear which Julius supposed: it had found no love for Geoffrey left to wound, no latent jealousy only waiting to be inflamed. Her object in taking the journey to Perth was completed when her correspondence with Geoffrey was in her own hands. The sole change of purpose which had brought her to Swanhaven was due entirely to the new view which Bishopriggs had taken of Geoffrey's discourse common-sense of Bishopriggs had first suggested to her—the view of a conspiracy against Mrs. Glenarm's marriage, in the interests of the reparation which Geoffrey owed to her, her conviction of the innocence of Geoffrey's audacious assertion that she was a married woman already. Her error on each of these points might still have led to move in the matter. But Blanche's interests were concerned as well as her own; and, for Blanche's sake, she had resolved on making the journey to Swanhaven Lodge.

At the same time, feeling toward Geoffrey as she felt now—unconscious as she was of herself—desiring the reparation on which she was about to insist, as the only means of obtaining peace of her own self-respect that she should have some purpose in view which could justify her to her own conscience in undermining the influence of Mrs. Glenarm's rival.

She had come to this mind the critical situation of Blanche—and to see her purpose before her plainly. Assuming that she could open the coming interview by peaceably proving to Mrs. Glenarm the Geoffrey was beyond dispute, she might then, without any risk of misconception, take the tone of a friend instead of an enemy, and might, with the best grace, assure Mrs. Glenarm that she had no fear of herself, on the score of any confidence that she engaged to make Geoffrey repair the evil that he had done. "Marry him without a word against it to dread from me!" she might say, as he swings the words and unloses the deeds which have been a death on the marriage of Arnold and Blanche." If she could but bring the interview to this end—there was the way found of accomplishing, by her own exertions, from the false position in which she had placed herself toward Geoffrey.

Such was the object before her, as she now stood on the brink of her interview with Mrs. Glenarm.

Up to this moment, she had firmly believed in the sufficiency of her own visionary resources. It was only when she had her foot on the step that a doubt of the success of the coming experiment crossed her mind. For the first time, she saw the weak point in her own reasoning. For the first time, she felt how much she had blindly taken for granted, in assuming that Mrs. Glenarm would have sufficient sense of justice and sufficient command of temper to hear her patiently. All her hopes of success rested on her own favorable estimate of a woman who was a total stranger to her! What if the first words exchanged between them proved the estimate to be wrong?

It was too late to pause and reconsider the matter. Julius Delamayn had noticed her hesitation, and was advancing toward her from the end of the terrace. There was no help for it but to master her own irresolution, and to run the risk boldly. "Come what may, I have gone too far to stop now." With that desperate resolution to animate her, she opened the glass door at the top of the steps, and went into the room.

Mrs. Glenarm rose from the piano. The two women—one so richly, the other so plainly dressed; one with her beauty in its full bloom, the other worn and blighted; one with society at her feet, the other an outcast living under the bleak shadow of reproach—the two women stood face to face, and measured the cold encounter of salute between strangers, in silence.

The first to meet the rival necessities of the situation was Mrs. Glenarm. She good-humorously put an end to the embarrassment—which she saw nothing to share—by speaking first.

"I am afraid the servants have not told you?" she said. "Mrs. Delamayn has gone out."

"I beg your pardon—I have not called to see Mrs. Delamayn."

Mrs. Glenarm looked a little surprised. She went on, however, as amiably as before.

"Mr. Delamayn, perhaps?" she suggested. "I expect him here every moment."

Anne explained again. "I have just parted from Mr. Delamayn." Mrs. Glenarm opened her eyes in astonishment. Anne proceeded. "I have come here, if you will excuse the intrusion—"

She hesitated—at a loss how to end the sentence. Mrs. Glenarm, beginning by this time to feel a strong curiosity as to what might be the object of her visit, came to the rescue once more.

"Pray don't apologize," she said. "I think I understand that you are so good as to have come to see me. You look tired. Won't you take a chair?"

Anne seated stand no longer. She took the offered chair. Mrs. Glenarm resumed her place at the music-stool, and, as a matter of course, put the keys of the piano. "Where did you see Mr. Delamayn?" she went on. "The most irresponsible of men, except when he has got his fiddle in his hand! Is he coming in soon? Have we gone to have any music? Have you come to play with us?" Mr. Delamayn is a perfect fanatic in music, isn't he? Why isn't he here to introduce us? I suppose you like the classical style, too? Did you know that I was in the music-room? Might I ask your name?"

Previous to this, Mrs. Glenarm's questions were not without their use. They gave Anne time to master her embarrassment, and to feel the necessity of explaining herself.

"I am speaking, I believe, to Mrs. Glenarm?" she began.

The good-humored widow smiled and bowed graciously.

"I have come here, Mrs. Glenarm—by Mr. Delamayn's permission—to ask leave to speak to you on a matter in which you are deeply interested."

Mrs. Glenarm's many-ringed fingers passed over the keys of the piano. Mrs. Glenarm's plump face turned on the stranger with a dawning expression of surprise.

"Indeed? I am interested in so many matters. May I ask what this matter is?"

The flippant tone of the speaker jarred on Anne. The hesitation returned to her voice, as it appeared to be on the surface, there was little or no hope of any sympathy establishing itself between them.

"I wished to speak to you," she answered, "about something that happened while we were paying a visit in the neighborhood of Perth."

The slow attention in Mrs. Glenarm's face became intensified into an expression of distrust. Her hearty manner vanished under a veil of constrained civility, drawn over it suddenly. She looked at Anne. "Never at the best of times a beauty," she thought, "and terribly faded at health now. Dressed like a servant, and looking like a lady. What does it mean?"

The blank doubt was not to be borne in silence by a person of Mrs. Glenarm's temperament. She addressed herself to the solution of it with the most unblushing directness—instantly excused by the most winning frankness of manner.

"I don't understand it," she said. "My memory for faces is a bad one; and I don't think you heard me just now, when I asked for your name. May I ask you to repeat it?"

"Never."

"Not now, perhaps—but if I understand what you are referring to—you wish to speak to me about something which is only interesting to myself and my husband's family?"

"You understand me quite correctly," said Anne. "I wish to speak to you about some anonymous letters—"

"For the third time, will you permit me to ask for your name?"

"You shall hear it directly—if you will first allow me to explain what I wanted to say to you —if I can—to persuade you that I come here as a friend, before I mention my name. You will, I am sure, excuse me very much if I repeat you need dread no further annoyance—"

"Pardon me once more," said Mrs. Glenarm, interposing for the second time. "I am at a loss to know to what I can to attribute this kind interest in my welfare on the part of a total stranger."

This time, her tone was more than politely cold—it was politely impertinent. Mrs. Glenarm had lived all her life in good society, and was a perfect mistress of the subtleties of refined insolence in her intercourse with those who incurred her displeasure.

Anne's sensitive nature felt the wound—but Anne's patient courage submitted. She put away from her the insolence which had tried to sting, and went on, gently and firmly, as if nothing had happened.

"The person who wrote to you anonymously," she said, "alluded to a correspondence. I—is no longer in possession of it. The correspondence has passed into hands which may be trusted to respect it. It will be put to no base use in the future which it has served.

"You answer for that?" repeated Mrs. Glenarm. She suddenly leaned forward over the piano, and fixed her eyes in unconcealed scrutiny on Anne's face. The violent temper, so often found in combination with the weak nature, began to show itself in her rising color, and her lowering brow. "How do you know what this person wrote?" she asked. "How do you know that the correspondence has passed into other hands? What do you?" But before Anne could answer her, she sprang to her feet, electrified by a new idea. "I see, I see—you mean to speak of something else besides a correspondence. He spoke of a woman. I have found you out!" she exclaimed, with a burst of passion. "You are the woman!"

Anne rose on her side, still in firm possession of her self-control.

"Mrs. Glenarm," she said, calmly, "I warn you, I entreat you—not to take that idea into me. Compose yourself; and I promise to satisfy you that you are more interested than you are willing to believe in what I have still to say. Pray hear with me for a little longer. I admit that you have guessed right. I am that I am the miserable woman who has been ruined and deserted by Geoffrey Delamyn."

"It's false!" cried Mrs. Glenarm. "You wretch! Do you come to me with your trumpery story? And does Julius Pilsner's name mean by exposing me to this?" Her indignation at finding herself in the same room with Anne, after its way brought, not the restraints only, but the common decencies of politeness. "I'll ring for the servants!" she said. "I'll have you turned out of the house."

She tried to cross the fire-place to ring the bell. Anne, who was standing nearest to it, stepped forward at the same moment. Without saying a word, she motioned with her hand to the other woman to stand back. There was no pause. The two waited, with their eyes steadily fixed on one another—each with the resolution laid bare to the other's view. In a moment more, the finer nature prevailed. Mrs. Glenarm drew back a step in silence.

"Listen to me," said Anne.

"Listen to you?" repeated Mrs. Glenarm. "You have no right to be in this house. You have no right to force yourself in here. Leave the room!"

Anne's patience—so firmly and admirably preserved thus far—began to fail her at last.

"Take care, Mrs. Glenarm!" she said, still struggling with herself. "You are not naturally a patient woman. Trouble has done much to tame my temper—but endurance has its limits. You have reached the limits of mine. I have a claim to be heard—and after what you have said to me, I will be heard!"

"You have no claim! You shameless woman, you are married already. I know the man's name. Arnold Brinkworth."

"Did Geoffrey Delamyn tell you that?"

"I decline to answer a woman who speaks of Mr. Geoffrey Delamyn in that familiar way."

Anne advanced a step nearer.

"Did Geoffrey Delamyn tell you that?" she repeated.

There was a light in her eyes, there was a ring in her voice, which showed that she was roused at last. Mrs. Glenarm answered her, this time.

"He did tell me."

"He lied!"

"He did not!" He knew. I believe him. Don't believe you."

"If he told you that I was any thing but a single woman—if he told you that Arnold Brinkworth was married to my friend Miss Lundie of Windygates—I say again he lied!"

"I say again—I believe him, and not you."

"You believe I am Arnold Brinkworth's wife?"

"I am certain of it."

"You tell me that to my face?"

"I tell you to your face—for the way have been Geoffrey Delamyn's mistress; you are Arnold Brinkworth's wife."

At those words the long-restrained anger leaped up in Anne—all the more hotly for having been hitherto so steadily controlled. In one breathless moment the wirlwind of her indignation swept away, not only all remembrance of the purpose which had brought her to the house, but all sense even of the unpardonable wrong which she had suffered at Geoffrey's hands. If he had been there, at that moment, and had offered to redeem his pledge, she would have consented to marry him, while Mrs. Glenarm's eyes was on her—no matter whether she destroyed herself in her first cool moment afterward or not. The small sting had planted itself in the last in the great nature. The noblest woman is only a woman, after all!

"I forbid your marriage to Geoffrey Delamyn! I insist on his performing the promise he gave me, to make me his wife! I have got it here in his own words, in his own writing. On his seal, he swears it to me—as he will confirm the pledge. His mistress, did you say? His wife, Mrs. Glenarm, before the week is out!"

In those wild words she cast back the taunt —with the letter held in triumph in her hand.

Daunted for the moment by the violence of her self-betrayal, Anne might really have the claim on Geoffrey which she advanced, Mrs. Glenarm answered nevertheless with the obstinacy of a woman brought to bay—with a resolution not to be convinced by conviction itself.

"I won't give him up!" she cried. "Your letter is a forgery. You have no proof. I won't, I won't, I won't give him up!" she repeated, with the impotent iteration of an angry child.

Anne pointed disdainfully to the letter that she held. "Here is his pledged and written word," she said. "While I live, you will never be his wife."

"I shall be his wife the day after the race. I am going to him in London—to warn him against You!"

"You will find me in London, before you—with this in my hand. Do you know his writing?"

She held up the letter, open. Mrs. Glenarm's eyes darted with abnormally rapidity to the gentleman's seal, to seize and destroy it. Quick as she was, her rival was quicker still. For an instant they faced each other breathless—then with the letter held behind her; one with her hand still stretched out.

At the same moment—before a word more had passed between them—the glass door opened and Julius Delamyn appeared on the lawn.

He addressed himself to Anne.

"I've disturbed you, my dear," he said, quietly, "I fear you should speak to Mrs. Glenarm, if Mrs. Glenarm wished it. Do you think it desirable that the interview should be continued any longer?"

Anne's hand dropped on her breast. The fiery anger in her was quenched in an instant.

"I have been cruelly provoked, Mr. Delamyn," she answered. But I have no right to plead that. She looked up at him for a moment. Then, with a sense of shame in her eyes, and fell slowly over her cheeks. She bent her head again, and hid them from him. "The interview I came here to ask for, is at an end," she said, in a low voice. "I have no more to say to your pardon, and to leave the house."

Julius, who turned away from her in delicate silence, Julius Delamyn paid her the trifling courtesy of opening it for her. She went out.

Mrs. Glenarm remained where she found the moment—transfixed itself to Julius.

"If I have been entrapped into seeing that woman, with your approval," she said, haughtily, "I owe it to myself, Mr. Delamyn, to follow her example, and leave the house."

"I authorized her to ask you for an interview, Mrs. Glenarm. If she has presumed on the permission that I gave her, I sincerely regret it, and I beg you to accept my apologies. At the same time, I may venture to add, in defense of my conduct, that I thought her—and think her still —a woman to be pitied more than to be blamed."

"To be pitied—after what she has said, Mrs. Glenarm, doubtful whether her ears had not deceived her.

"To be pitied," repeated Julius.

"You may find it convenient, Mr. Delamyn, to forget what your brother has told me about that person. I happen to remember it.

"So do I, Mrs. Glenarm. But, with my experience of Geoffrey—" He hesitated, and ran his fingers nervously over the strings of his violin.

"You don't believe him?" said Mrs. Glenarm.

Julius declined to admit that he doubted his brother's word, to the lady who wished to become his brother's wife.

"I don't, at the last length," he said. "I find it difficult to reconcile what Geoffrey has told us, with Miss Silvester's manner and appearance—"

"Her appearance!" cried Mrs. Glenarm, in a transport of astonishment and disgust. "Her appearance! Oh, the men! I beg your pardon—I ought to have remembered that there is no accounting for tastes. Is that the way you put it?"

"Shall we compose ourselves with a little music?" suggested Julius.

"I particularly request you will go on," answered Mrs. Glenarm, emphatically. "You find it impossible to reconcile—"

"I said 'difficult.'"

"Oh, very well. Difficult to reconcile what Geoffrey tells you, with Miss Silvester's manner and appearance. What next? What something else, pray, which I was so rude as to interrupt you. What was it?"

"Only this," said Julius. "I can find it easy to understand Sir Patrick Lundie's object in permitting Mr. Brinkworth to commit bigamy with his niece."

"Wait a minute! The marriage of that horrible woman to Mr. Brinkworth was a private marriage. Yes, of course, Sir Patrick knew nothing about it!"

Julius owned that this might be possible, and made a second attempt to lead the angry lady back to the piano. Useless, once more! Though she shrank from confessing it to herself, Mrs. Glenarm's belief in the genuineness of her lover's defense had been shaken. It brought on him all Julius—moderate as it was—revived the fiery startling suspicion of the credibility of Geoffrey's statement which Anne's appearance had confused had forced on Mrs. Glenarm. Brought into the nearest clear, and put her hand to her head, her eyes. "You are a hated poor Geoffrey," she said, with a burst of tears. "And now you've defended me to my face!"

Julius managed her admirably. On the point of answering her seriously, he checked himself. "I always hated poor Geoffrey," he repeated, with a smile. "You ought to be the last person to say that, Mrs. Glenarm." He moved him all the way from London express to introduce him to you."

"Then I wish you had left him in London!" retorted Mrs. Glenarm, shifting suddenly from tears to anger, and from anger to sudden before I met your brother. I can't give him up!" she burst out, shifting back again from temper to tears. "I don't care if he has deceived me. I won't let another woman have him! I will be his wife!" She threw herself hysterically on her knee before Julius. "Oh, do help me to find out the truth!" she said. "Oh, Julius, pity me! I am so sick of him!"

There was genuine distress in her face, there was true feeling in her voice. Who would have believed that there were reserves of merciless insolence and heartless cruelty in this woman—and that they had been lavishly poured out on a fellow-sister not five minutes since?

"I will do all I can," said Julius, raising her. "Let us talk of it when you are more composed. Will you sing me a song?" he repeated, "just to quiet your nerves."

"Would you like me to play?" asked Mrs. Glenarm, forcing a model of feminine docility at a moment's notice.

She played the Sonatas of Mozart, and shouldered his violin.

"Let's try the Fifteenth," he said, placing Mrs Glenarm's music on the piano. "We will begin with the Adagio. If ever there was divine music written by mortal man, there is it!"

They began. At the third bar Mrs. Glenarm dropped a note—and the bow of Julius paused shuddering on the strings.

"I can't play!" she said. "I am so agitated; I am so nervous. How can I find out whether that wretch is really married or not? Who can I ask? I can't go to Geoffrey in London—the mischief would be if I saw him. I can't appeal to Mr. Brinkworth himself—I am not even acquainted with him. Who else is there? Do think, and tell me!"

There was but one chance of making her return to the subject of music—the chance of a suggestion which would satisfy and quiet her. Julius laid his violin on the piano, and considered the question before him carefully.

"There are the witnesses," he said. "If Geoffrey's letter to Miss Silvester depended on, the landlady and the waiter at the inn can speak to the facts."

"Yes, yes!" objected Mrs. Glenarm. "People don't know. People will be ready to take advantage of my situation, and be insolent to me."

Julius considered once more; and made another suggestion. With the fatal ingenuity of innocence, he hit on the idea of sending Mrs. Glenarm to no less a person than Lady Lundie herself!

"There is our good friend at Windygates," he said. "Some whisper of the matter may have reached Lady Lundie's ears. She has a little awkward to call on her (if she has heard any thing) at the time of a serious family disorder, as we the last place in the world to go to. All I can do is to throw out the notion. Windygates isn't very far off. Shall I say something more of it. What do you think?"

Something might come of it! Let it be remembered that Lady Lundie had been left entirely in the dark—that she had written to Sir Patrick in a letter which plainly betrayed how her self-esteem was wounded and her suspicion roused —and that her first intimation of the serious dilemma in which Arnold Brinkworth and his new idiocy, thanks to Julius Delamyn, to reach her from the lips of the person concerned. Let this be remembered; and then let the estimate be formed of what might come of it—not at Windygates only, but at the Hall of Dunross.

"What do you think?" asked Julius.

"I think you're an angel!" she said, in very person to go to!" she said. "If I am not let in I can easily write—and explain my object as an apology. Lady Lundie is the very woman to sympathetic. If she sees no one else—I live only to confide my anxieties to her, and I am sure she will see me. You will lend me your ringe, won't you? I'll go to Windygates to-morrow."

Julius took his violin off the piano.

"I don't think me very troublesome," he said, cunningly. "I between you and Lady Lundie to have nothing to do. And it is such music, if you once get into the swing of it! Would you mind trying again?"

Mrs. Glenarm was willing to do any thing to prove her gratitude, with the single exception of which she had just received. At the second trial all the fair player's hand seemed to find perfect harmony. The lovely melody which the Adagio of Mozart's Fifteenth Sonata has given to violin and piano seemed to flow from them as if Julius Delamyn soared to the seventh heaven of musical delight.

The next day Mrs. Glenarm and Mrs. Delamayn went together to Windygates House.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

HARVARD COLLEGE has received a valuable addition to its art collection in the bust of C. Ulisbie Macomber, graduate of Harvard in 1852, and exhibited in the Royal Museum at Portici. It was afterward purchased by an American at Rome, who presented it to Mr. B. Davis Washburn of Melrose, and by him it was donated to Harvard. The bust is a good study of preservation, and represents Macomber in the age of seventy, after he had retired from public affairs. Retreat was not unfavorable for the continuing and genius, and the personal friend of Virgil and Horace. He died in 8 B.C., in the seventh year of Augustus, and was buried in his own gardens, on the Esquiline Hill.

By the will of the late Lord Derby his personal property appears to have been about £200,000. The present Lord Derby will succeed to a considerable income, which he is not in the least likely to diminish. His habits are of the most economical kind, and I sedulous did not oblige otherwise, he would probably be known as the prodigy of modern times during a club. He does not inherit his father's fondness for horses, and is likely still to keep them.

"Association Hall" is a great improvement upon the old name, "Young Men's Christian Association Hall," which is too long for comfort. Can not the name of the building itself be abridged for common use?

If lovers quarrel, and with their love-letters returned, we warn them to deliver the important documents personally—it is not safe to trust expressed. At a recent auction sale of unclaimed express packages in Hartford a lot of love-letters were sold at. They were written by a young lady who, having got married, requested her old lover to return them. The purchaser, it is said, is heartlessly and dishonorably playing a scheme of creating readings from them at his boarding-houses.

It is rumored abroad that Father Hyacinthe has been converted to Protestantism by the pastor of the French Reformed Church, and that he is soon to be married.

Now that the ladies are having every thing their own ways, it is said that a great many of the blank forms are to be used by young ladies who have been married, or who propose. The ladies themselves fill out the blanks, and, of course, no sensible man can refuse signing them.

A second novel by Garibaldi has been published at Milan. It is called "Cantoni; or, The Volunteer." Mr. Swinburne's new volume of poems will be entitled "Songs Before Sunrise." Mr. Goldwin Smith is preparing a "History of England for American Readers."

How very thoughtful and considerate some editors are to make such suggestions as these, in connection with the death of a young lady reported from the effects of light-lacing: "These corsets should be done away with, and with all the girls can't live without being squeezed, we suppose men can be found who would rather marry a girl with a big waist, without a cent," or pay, as a brevet corset, than see these girls dying off in that manner. Office hours almost any time."

A remarkable marriage recently took place at Galesburg, Illinois. The bridegroom and bride were aged respectively eighty-three and eighty-one years. When they were children they had always been very fond of each other, but broke their troth; and since then each has followed two companions to the grave. Late in life the early love was rekindled.

Not so very far out of the way was an English editor at Brussels, who emptied his pockets, containing his purse, before the open apron of a woman with a dirty starving children. The seller remarked to the astounded natives who witnessed the act: "I am a Christian, and must never drink! I am simply going to drink wine." A good many young men might be found to "go and do likewise."

There are at the present time quite a number of "Apartment Houses" being erected in different parts of our city. These houses will contain suits, each containing a room and sitter, bed room, bath room, kitchen, bath-room, and bedrooms. It is inclusive of the peculiar popularity of this style of building, that in one which is nearly finished on Eighteenth street, near Second avenue, the following notice has been was laid. Some very handsome "Apartment Houses" are already completed. Every one is congratulating over the weary of paying enormous rents, and welcome the prospect of cheaper and yet comfortable quarters.

Miss Mulock says to parents that the time must come to every human being when he must learn still to listen to think and act for themselves, and the parents' duty is to help to do it by every thing but by prejudicially to slacken authority, to sink "I command" into "I wish," and to grant large freedom of opinion, and to be appreciative of it.

During the recent spring freshets some of the rivers in New England rose higher than they have been known since the year 1817. Salt water was reported higher than ever before, and the Merrimac higher than known since 1818. Many of the rivers in the New Middle States immense damage was done. In many places the inhabitants were rescued in the night by boats of every description from their dwellings, and were obliged to flee for their lives. Bridges, dams, barns, and entire mills were destroyed; and in many places there has been a dismal repetition of the ruinous scenes of the memorable year 1817. Such a heavy rain is surprising enough to those who suffered so much damage from that last date.

Our Dumb Animals—a monthly journal published by the Massachusetts Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—as a brief method of stating the purpose of the Society, says "Publishing the Gospel of Faith." Some of these are to prevent—the beating, overloading, overdriving, and torturing of animals; driving galled and disabled horses; tying calves' legs together; crowding or overloading cattle and overloading horse-cars; neglect of shelter for animals; plucking live fowls; dog-fights; to introduce—shelter for animals; water troughs; to secure the slaughtering and of horse-shoeing; improved cattle-cars; drinking-fountains for animals—children to be humane; teachers to teach kindness to animals; clergymen to preach it; cowards to write it; and brave men to be before the people; and generally to make men, women, and children better, because more merciful.

Reports come from Delaware that the peach-trees have been seriously injured in consequence of the warm weather in January and February, and that the crop is likely to be small. Berries, however, promise well, and it is expected that strawberries will be ready for market in about a month.

Professor Blot gives the following directions for frying potatoes: Cut them in whatever form you wish above a bowl of cold water, so that they will drop into it. Then wipe them dry and wipe them. This must be done quickly, so as not to allow the potatoes to turn reddish. Have a coarse towel at hand. Put them into potatoes into a colander, and immediately turn them into the towel, shake them in a little, and quickly drop them in hot fat. When done, turn them into a colander, sprinkle salt on them, and serve hot. If you wish them light or swelled, leave the potatoes in the colander only about half a minute, then put them back in cold water for a few minutes, and then drain, and put them again in the colander. If the fat is very hot, when dropped in, the potatoes will swell, and they will certainly swell. Bear in mind that fried potatoes must be eaten as soon as they are done, and are not at a time, as it takes three times as long to fry them when cut in pieces as when sliced.

Three or four years ago a colored woman from New Bedford graduated from the New England Medical College of Boston, and is now successfully practicing her profession. The New England Female Medical College was opened in 1856, and since then has graduated a number of females, many of whom are exceedingly useful in practice among women and children, and some have attained prominent positions in hospitals and educational institutions.

SAWING INTO LOGS.

BREAKING A JAM.

IN THE P

WINTER SCENES IN MINNESOTA.

We give on this double page a series of engravings, from some exceedingly fine photographs sent us by WHITNEY AND ZIMMERMANN, of St. Paul, Minnesota, illustrating winter life and scenery in that State. The sketches tell their own story as graphically, that but few words are necessary in the way of explanation. The uppermost line of pictures illustrates the manner of getting out lumber in the great pine forests of Minnesota—from the cutting down of the great trees, sawing them into lengths, hauling them out with ox-teams, and, finally, "landing" the logs on the surface of the frozen river or stream, in readiness for the spring freshet to sweep them down to a market. Though many of these streams are too shallow in summer to float an Indian in the lightest bark canoe, yet when swollen by spring freshets, each one becomes a wide and deep river. In some instances the pines grow near the streams, and the trouble of hauling the logs is very slight: but often they grow four or five miles away, and the distance becomes greater every year, as the forests are gradually cut down, and with it the expense of logging. The camp-follo Indians, who frequently stop at the camps to Underneath these forest scenes we give se winter. "St. Anthony's Falls" and "Silver most beautiful appearance in their winter ga morning look more like a picture from Fairy photograph was taken from which our engra

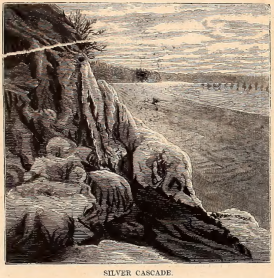
LANDING LOGS.



SILVER CASCADE.

FALLS OF MINNEHAHA

ICE FLOWS.

HAULING OUT THE ICE BLOCKS.

WINTER SCENES IN MINNESOTA.—[FROM PHOTOGR

FORESTS.

shown in one of our sketches are Chippewa provisions and whisky.
views of the river scenery of Minnesota in ands," within sight of each other, present a ilds the falls of "Minnehaha" on a frosty than an actual scene in nature. Since the s made, a heavy freshet has destroyed several mills at St. Anthony's Falls, and washed away a large portion of Hennepin Island, under which a tunnel had been excavated. Fears are entertained that this magnificent water-power may be permanently injured by this catastrophe.

UNLOADING LOGS.

The third series of sketches will give our readers an idea of the mode of gathering the ice-crop in Minnesota—a subject in which we are all interested this summer. The thickness of the ice is well indicated in the engraving, which shows the great, almost transparent blocks hauled out upon the bank, where they are chipped into shape for storage and transportation. As the thermometer sometimes indicates a temperature of 40 degrees below zero, the thickness of these blocks is not surprising. When the ice is of moderate thickness, it is cut by means of ice plows; but when very thick, saws are employed for this purpose. The people of this city, where ice is no longer a luxury but a common necessity, will be glad to have the ocular demonstration afforded by these sketches—which are as nearly fac-similes of the original photographs as could be made in wood-engraving—that in Minnesota, at any rate, the crop has been so abundant that ice-dealers will have no excuse for an exorbitant rise in the price of this commodity.

LOGGERS' CAMP.

FROSTY MORNING.

[DRAWN BY WHITNEY AND ZIMMERMANN, ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA.]

SAINT ANTHONY'S FALLS IN WINTER.

CAMP FOLLOWERS.

BLOCKS OF ICE.

HAULING ICE.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In five Books.—Book V.

CHAPTER XI.

TEMPEST.

THERE life in town, however it may have proved to be dust and ashes in Veronica's mouth, was mightily to the taste of her husband. One great drawback to his pleasure at first was Veronica's perverse determination to be discontented, as he deemed it. What could she desire that she had not? They were rich, young, fond of one another—he, at least, still loved her, although she seemed resolved to try to earn him of his fondness—and surrounded by companions who asked nothing better than to be merry and make merry selves. What though this dowager had declined to be introduced to her; or that dowdy countess refused her invitations; or that a third hitherto been impossible to find a lady to present her at court? There were the ladies whom she did know incomparably more lively and amusing than these dull persons? And was it not an incredible perversity in Veronica to long for those dull folk—it been offered to her—so to Cesare thought—she would have loathed it? The husband and wife had never a sharp discussion on this score.

When Veronica now told Cesare that he did not understand this or that he would have to appoint with vivacity. Indeed, but he did understand: quite as well as she did; perhaps somewhat better! She was but a woman. And if he were a foreigner in England, he yet knew the world—it might be that he even knew the English world—better than she or her cousin Dorothy than she thought. For His friend the marquis Gerard de Vere, Douglas De Raffville was one of the most fashionable women in London. Lord George, who had introduced her to him, said as much. She was at any rate, very handsome, very brilliant, and very good-natured: that they could see for themselves. For Bacon? These simpletons in her part were too amusing! Did she know the history of the celebrated little Duchess with the pearls, to whom she had been so civil at Naples? Then for a day, perhaps, Veronica would break out into wild gaiety. She would be excited, and with excitement, until even the rather noisy mirth of the society that surrounded her was drowned, dumb, and its members would stare at her uneasily, or indulge in expressive shrugs and grimaces to each other. Those fits of excitement were invariably followed by prolonged depression and gloom; sometimes even by sullenness that what obliged her to keep her bed for a day or so. But she would see no physician. Her husband, more and more separated from his wife's companionship, and absorbed in his own pursuits, gradually ceased to observe himself closely these daily fluctuations of health and spirits. There was no one at hand who cared for her. Her father wrote rarely and briefly. Maud was apparently happier as though the thickness of the globe were between them.

One afternoon Veronica was lying half asleep on a couch in her boudoir. Her Swiss maid Louise entered in the darkened room quietly, and stood listening.

"Is Madame la Princesse asleep?"

"Eh? What is it? My head aches," answered Veronica, in a drowsy voice.

"I should not have ventured to disturb Madame la Princesse, but the gentleman was so importunate that the footman begged me to come and speak with madame."

"A gentleman? I can't see the card by this light. Tell me the name."

"Mistare—Mistare Frost."

"Mr. Frost! Well—yes; let Mr. Frost come up stairs. Give me the sau de cologne. Draw that curtain a little more. Stay, Louise, how my head throbs! Ah, Dio buono, how my head throbs!"

In another minute Mr. Frost was ushered into the boudoir.

"Here I the honor of speaking to the Princess de' Barletti?" asked Mr. Frost, to whom the gloom of the chamber seemed at first almost pitch darkness.

Veronica groaned in answer to him where to find a seat. She half rose from her sofa, and sank back again with a murmur of pain.

"You are suffering? I grieve to intrude. But my business is of such importance—"

"Of such importance?"

"To me at the very deepest."

Veronica poured some eau de cologne on her hands, and passed them over her forehead. Then she looked steadily at Mr. Frost, and her eyes, more accustomed to the dimness than his, could perceive that he was changed; how pale, thin, and haggard. And that his restless hands wandered constantly to his mouth, and to his hair, and nails feverishly. He, for his part, could but just discern the outline of her face and figure.

"Madam," said Mr. Frost, "I will not waste your time or my own—minutes are very precious to me—in useless preamble. In preferring the request I am about to make, I know that I am doing an unusual—some might say unwarrantable thing. But I am bound myself temporarily, and temporarily. And I was to-day inspired suddenly with the hope that you might help me."

"In what way can it be in my power to help you?" said Veronica, in a strange, dreamy voice.

"Will you lend me some money?"

"Lend you some money? I thought you were very rich?"

"I shall be. I am, virtually. But there is a temporary pressure—a severe pressure." Mr. Frost put his hand to his head, as though the pressure he spoke of were there. "I will be frank with you. Women can be compassionate and generous sometimes. If you will lend me the sum I want you will save me from ruin."

"From ruin!" Veronica made an effort, and seemed to rouse herself from a lethargy that had apparently benumbed her faculties. Her voice was more like her own as she said, "But can I do this?"

"I think you can. The sum I need is a large one. But I know your means are large. I want two thousand pounds."

"It is indeed a large sum!"

"If I can have that sum by the end of this month the rest may go. I shall not care. That is—I mean I shall be safe."

"I should like to do good to somebody," murmured Veronica, half aloud.

"You can do good to more than one person. You know young Lockwood, who is engaged to marry Maud Desmond?"

"Yes; is he for her?"

"You love Maud Desmond, do you not? I have heard that you loved her so much as to offer her a part of your fortune."

"I do love her. But what—"

"I can not explain particulars. But I will swear to you by any solemn oath you choose, that in lending me this money you will be serving them. But I can not induce you to believe that—believe at least that, as I said, you will be saving me from ruin. God is my witness that that is true!"

The manner of the man—so different from the self-possessed, easy, dignified air she remembered in him—impressed her greatly.

"I should like," she said again, "to do good to somebody."

Mr. Frost gathered all his energies to plead his cause. His words were eloquent. He was eloquent to Veronica were his trembling lips, his panting breast, his eager and restless hands.

"If I can do this thing I will," she said, at length.

He sprang up and took her hand. "I can not thank you in words," he said. "It was a good inspiration that made me think of applying to you!"

"But—I shall need my husband's consent."

"Your husband's only?"

"Certainly. Whose else?"

"You have no marriage settlement? No trustees?"

This was the first time that the idea of having her money settled on herself had occurred to her. Her marriage had been hurried and private. There had been no one to watch her interests or advise her. And Mr. Frost's question implied that Cesare had purposely taken a dishonorable advantage of her confidence and obedience. It must be explained that marriage settlements are unknown in his country; and that he was too ignorant of English customs to be aware of their existence here.

"No," she answered, after a moment's pause. "I have no settlement; no trustees. I have no one but Cesare."

Indeed! said Mr. Frost, looking at her for an instant with his old searching keenness. "Fortunately for me," he added, "your influence over Cesare de Barletti is unbounded. I remember noting that."

"Do you?"

"Yes. If I have your promise, I am secure about the prince. But he may require more explanations than you have asked for. I have been generous in refraining from questioning me.

"And I shall not forget it," said Veronica, perhaps, 'Why did not this man apply elsewhere? to his partner, for example? to those connected with him by trade? It was clear that in certain circumstances to be seen to need help was a disgrace. The very sight of the man excites mistrust and apprehension. And the small sum which divides ruin from security can not be obtained, because it is essential to obtain it. But I will see the prince. I will speak with him. I will give him any guarantee my power. Only let me have your promise. That is sufficient. Can word more! I rely on your generosity. Your honor to your friend and to me!"

"If I can do this thing, I will," said Veronica once more.

Then Mr. Frost took his leave, scarcely daring to believe in his success; and yet feeling as though a mantle of lead, heavy as Atlas's, and certain wretched souls in purgatory, had been lifted from his head and shoulders since entering that room.

Cesare returned late in the afternoon from his ride. Contrary to his custom, he came into his driving, was yet not altogether satisfactory to calculate years. There was a wooden registry about his legs, and a general air of being out of sorts, to the possibility of his horse having the best of it in case of any difference of opinion arising between them inimical to grace. Veronica knew he had good horses, and was willing to lend one of them now and then to her friends; but sometimes panions content to join him in equestrian excursions to places in the neighborhood of London; or even—though of this his friends were unwitty—in a canter in the Row. On the present occasion he had been favored by the society of two ladies, in addition to that of his friend Count Polypodis, a Greek gentleman of very varied accomplishments, which were supposed, but only appreciated in his own country, but for the exception of which he would have been dull indeed. Seadon, after having exhausted Paris and Vienna. They had all been very merry, and Cesare entered in high good-humor.

"You were wrong not to come, ma belle princesse," said he, gayly. "It was very pleasant. We alighted at a village inn, and had beef, Figurati! And there was a garden to the inn, where there was a target. We shot at the target with bows and arrows. Nobody could hit the mark. It was immensely amusing."

Veronica's headache had apparently passed off. She was dressed with care and elegance. Her voice was gentle, and her manner conciliating, as she said to him,

"Come here and sit down by me, Cesare mio! I have a word to say to you."

"Must I not dress for dinner?"

"There is time enough. Come here for a moment."

He obeyed. Seating himself beside her, he pressed her hand to his lips. It was very thin, and burned with a feverish heat.

"Cara!" he said, touched with a vague pity as he looked at the transparent little fingers on which the sparkling rings sat so loosely. "If you would always be kind to me, I would rather stay here with you than leave myself with those others!"

"Ah, you would get tired of staying here with me, Cesare! and I do not wish you to do one. But I like to hear you say so. Do you really love me, Cesare?"

"Mia fe!"

"I had a visitor while you were out this afternoon; an unexpected visitor."

"Il Vicario? No? It was not that accursed doctor?"

"Oh, Cesare! Why should you speak so of poor Mr. Flew? What reason on earth have you to dislike him?"

"How can I tell? It is an antipathy, I suppose. With his insipid face, and his eyes like cover English sky, neither blue nor gray! He attacks my nerves. Well it was not he?"

Veronica made an effort to suppress an angry reply.

"It was Mr. Frost," she answered, shortly, not trusting her self-control to say more at that instant.

"Mr. Frost! Davvero!—Mr. Frost! Ah il povero Frost! He was trés bon enfant at Naples; and what was better, a very good lawyer?!"

"He is in great need at present."

"Si, eh?" said Cesare, whose interest in this announcement did not appear to be keen.

"And I have promised to help him."

"Oh! that was very kind of you," observed Cesare, with a tone of surprise, that was not lively enough to rouse him to any great demonstration of caring about what Veronica was saying.

"Yes; I have promised to lend him some money."

"What?" He was not indifferent now. "You are jesting! Lend Mr. Frost money!"

"I, too, was surprised at his request.

"What was it? How was it? Oh!" exclaimed Cesare, struck by a sudden idea, "perhaps he had forgotten his pocket-book, and sent to a few pounds. Were you able to give them to him?"

"Then you would not have objected to my doing so?"

"To that case, no."

"I am glad of that," said Veronica, ignoring the words in his face. At them he promised to assist him. It is a large sum he wants. But we can afford it, I suppose. I never enter into the details of business, but I make no doubt that it will not be difficult for us. In serving him, I shall be indirectly serving others in whom I am interested. I do not exactly understand how; but it you were to ask him he might tell you more easily. I was greatly struck by the change in Mr. Frost's appearance. He seems to have been harassed nearly to death. But if you had seen him you first came into his face when I said 'Yes!' It gave me quite a new sensation. I promised to lend him two thousand pounds!"

Cesare had sat silent, listening to his wife with growing amazement in his face. At these last words he jumped up and uttered a loud ejaculation. But in the next instant he burst into a mocking laugh:

"What a fool I am! You made me believe you were in earnest!"

But even as he said the words his angry face belied them.

"I am in earnest, Cesare."

For all reply he laughed again, and began to walk up and down the room, switching his riding-whip right and left with a sharp, vicious motion.

Veronica proceeded to recapitulate Mr. Frost's words as well as she could remember them. She spoke unsteadily and eagerly. At length, finding that she made no impression on her husband, she began to lose patience. "It would be something less grossly ill-bred and discourteous," she said, "if you were to favor me with your objections. If you do object, instead of sneering and strutting in that intolerable manner."

"My objections are that the whole idea is contrary to common-sense. Tu sei pazza—you are mad, mia cara."

"How contrary to common-sense? It is not think it at all contrary to common-sense.

"You do not see, for example, that this man must be in the last extremity before he would attempt such a desperate forlorn hope as this? That he must be as good as ruined already? Tu sei pazza!"

"But if we could save him—and others?"

"Pazza, pazza, pazza!"

"Cesare, I gave him my promise."

"You must have been bewitched, or—drunk—my when you did so."

"After all, the money is mine, and I choose to claim the disposal of it," she cried, her long-repressed resentment blazing out on her cheeks and in her eyes.

Cesare wheeled sharp round in his walk, and looked at her.

"Do you know," he said, slowly, "I begin to be afraid that you really are not in possession of your senses."

"I am in full possession of my senses. I desire your assent. I desire you; yes, I despise you! I will not forfeit my word to please your grudging, petty mennesses! The money is mine, I claim, I insist. And I will have some share in the disposal of it."

Then he let the demon of rage take full possession of him. From between his clenched teeth he hissed out such words as speedily made her quail and shudder and sink down, burying her head among the cushions of the couch. He had learned much during the past three months, both of her position and his own in the eyes of the world; and he spared her no detail of his knowledge. He knew his privileges; he knew that there was nothing in all the world which she could call her own; and he also knew that his nurse and title were looked on as more than equivalent for the surrender of herself and all she possessed. He had lately had increasing reason to be dissatisfied with her. But he had hitherto did not love her. They resented her pride, and ridiculed her pretensions. A hundred taunts which, but for the accidents arising of the long train of discussions, and spites, and sessions, might have remained forever unspoken, leaped from his tongue. His passion grew with speech, as a smouldering fire rushes into flame at the contact of the outer air. He turned and twisted the elastic riding-whip ferociously in his hands as though it were a living thing that he took pleasure in torturing. And at length, approaching nearer and nearer to Veronica as she cowered on the sofa, bending closer and closer over her, and hissing his fierce invectives into her ear, he suddenly let his hand upright, whirled that twisted whip with a crash into the midst of some porcelain toys that stood on a distant table, and dashed hershong from the room.

CHAPTER XII.

IN TIME.

MR. LOVEGROVE was very uneasy in his mind. His uneasiness was not the less irksome in that he confided it to no one. A small circumstance had given rise to a host of doubts and suspicions which had long been accumulating. It may be remembered that Mr. Lovegrove had expressed to his partner his desire to have a little confidential talk with him, and that his partner had expressed himself perfectly willing that the confidential talk should take place. It had not yet taken place, however. Mr. Frost always found some excuse for postponing it.

On the day on which Mr. Lovegrove had first spoken of this desire on his part it may also be remembered that a sum of money was received by the firm had been taken away by Mr. Frost, in bank, as he said. Mr. Lovegrove had asked him about it later, and Mr. Frost had answered, Oh yes; it was all right. And there the matter had dropped. But ever since then Mr. Frost's visit to the Princess de' Barletti Mr. Lovegrove made the very disagreeable discovery that the money in question had never been paid into the bank at all! The sum was an insignificant one, after all; and as he have looked upon the circumstance as a mere instance of carelessness and forgetfulness on the part of Mr. Frost had it been even irritated and annoyed by it, certainly, but he would have felt no more serious distress than those mistakes might create. But Mr. Frost, when questioned, had not clapped his hand to his forehead and exclaimed that the matter had slipped his memory: he had not even acknowledged that he had not yet paid the money, and remained dumb and confused and embarrassed. He had answered with composure that the matter was all right. Mr. Frost, then, had told his partner a lie. Mr. Lovegrove was terrified at this discovery than he would willingly have acknowledged. He had been a very strong attachment to his new Frost. He had the habit of looking up to his talents and character with much the same admiring deference with which an ingenuous little boy contemplates the cock of his school. Though at the same time Mr. Lovegrove understood very well what were the solid plodding qualities in which he himself excelled his partner, and which were especially valuable to secure to their joint affairs.

Mr. Lovegrove knew himself to be a plain man—plain in looks, plain in mind, and plain in manners.

But he had great pride and delight in Mr. Frost's brilliant superiority on all these points.

If one might dare to hint at the existence of a thing that is commonplace in the report of one middle-aged lawyer for another, it might almost be said that Mr. Lovegrove was proud of his friend was romantic. And be it understood that there was no human being on the face of the earth who would have more decisively scouted such an idea, could it have been broached to him, than Mr. Lovegrove himself. Mr. Lovegrove was to no one made the discovery above mentioned than he resolved with an inflexible resolution to lose no more time in speaking to an explicit with his partner. The discovery was made after office hours. But on the following day—it left Bedford Square. The junior partner debated with himself what measures he should take in order to avoid the pointing of the formal. Mr. Lovegrove having once formed a purpose, never permitted himself to discuss whether or no he should carry it out: he merely considered how he should fulfill it, which was one of the results of the timidness of his faculty of imagination—and also one of the secrets of his success in life.

"Sarah, my dear," said he to his wife, after tea, "I am going over to Bayswater this evening."

"To a party?" demanded Mrs. Lovegrove, with a rapid jealous notion that her long-nourished suspicions of Mrs. Frost's intention to insult her unmistakably had at length been confirmed.

"To a party! My dear Sarah, what are you dreaming of? Do I ever go to a party without you? I shall be back early. Shall you not invite me alone?"

Mrs. Lovegrove, a little ashamed of her too hasty conclusion, murmured something about effect that there was no knowing what "that woman" might do next.

"But I am not going to see 'that woman;' I am going to see 'that man.' My visit is solely on business."

"It's a strange hour to have a business appointment, I think, Angelotas, that you might consecrate your evenings to domestic peace. I'm sure you work hard enough in the day, poor old Gus!" said Mrs. Lovegrove.

The lady's sudden descent from the regions of lofty severity to the unlightful and familiar position was due to the pressure of her husband's arm encircling her waist and the touch of her husband's lips on her forehead.

"You know I never want to leave you and the girls, Sally; but I want to speak to Frost particularly. I must speak with him. Give me a kiss, Sally. I don't go because I like going, and I shall n't spend a pleasant time, you may depend on it."

Mrs. Lovegrove was very sincerely fond of her husband; and she marked his fatigue and gauged the tone of his voice—every vibration of which had become known to her so thoroughly at those things are known which love teaches, behind the accuracy of whose instructions all other powers and passions merge at a long distance—we perceived that there was, as she phrased it, "something on his mind." And the refrained from saying another provoking word to add to the burden. Mr. Lovegrove walked part of the way toward Bayswater in returning to spend his journey from a certain point in the omnibus. But the night was fine, and the walk was agreeable to the lawyer after his day spent busily in a hot, close office; and he therefore strolled on and on, until he found that he might as well proceed to his destination on foot. Thus, as it turned out, it was close on two o'clock by the time he arrived at Mr. Frost's house in Bayswater. He had no need to knock or ring for admittance. The street door was open, and a couple of servants—a man and woman—were lounging on the steps enjoying the evening air.

"Is Mr. Frost in?" asked Lovegrove, almost fearing to be answered in the negative.

"Mr.—yes, Mrs.?" asked the man, who did not at first recognize Mr. Lovegrove. The visits of the latter to Bayswater were not frequent enough to render his face very familiar to the servants there.

"Mr. Frost. I wish to see your master if he is at home."

"Oh, Mr. Lovegrove! I beg pardon, Sir; I did n't recognize your features in the dark. I suppose you know."

"Gone! Good Heavens! not dead?"

"Oh no, Sir; but she has left master, Sir. I shouldn't say any thing only you're of course so intimate, and such a friend.

"I had heard nothing! I had no idea! Perhaps you are mistaken. Mrs. Frost has merely gone on a visit for a time. Is she not?"

"Well, Sir, I'm afraid you'll find it is true. As for our knowing, sir, why, we couldn't help ourselves. The next-door neighbors might have known it—very likely they do." (The speaker had already detailed the affair in its minutest details with half the servants in the neighborhood.) "And I'm glad you've chanced to come up to-night, Sir, for master's in a awful state—indeed, I thought that was what you come for."

Mr. Lovegrove was in much confusion.

"Do you think I had better try to see him? he said, doubtfully.

The very fact of his asking the servant's opinion would have sufficed to prove to any one who knew Mr. Lovegrove the extraordinariness of action of his spirit.

"I think you had, Sir. Some one ought to see him. He's shut himself up in his study since six o'clock, and wouldn't take food nor do nothing. Half an hour ago he opened his door and called to us that we might go to bed, and shut up the house as soon as we liked. We haven't to go near him again. He wanted nothing."

"I will go in," said Mr. Lovegrove, with decision. "I don't mean you. I know my way."

The door of the little room behind the dining room, which Mr. Frost occupied as his study, was ajar. Mr. Lovegrove approached it and passed, hesitating whether or not he should knock for admittance. But after a moment he turned the handle and went in.

Frost was sitting at a table with writing materials upon it. A tumbler with some water in it stood by his right hand. On the other side was placed a small wooden box of peculiar shape. Before him lay two or three sheets of letter-paper closely covered with writing. At the opening of the door he looked up quietly, and tossed some papers over the box that stood on the table. He had expected no one, and was not startled. When he recognized Lovegrove his face changed, and he looked at him fixedly without speaking. Lovegrove had no need to ask a question. The haggard countenance that met his eye, with the light of the lamp falling full on it, was sufficiently strong proof to him that the servant had not exaggerated the state of matters.

"Frost!" he said, and held out his hand.

The other did not take it. "So you have heard!" he said, hoarsely.

"Only this instant. I was more overwhelmed—more amazed than I can say. I—I had some hope that the—my—your—misfortune was misstated in some way. But I fear— My dear Frost, I feel for you if ever one man felt for another. I do, upon my soul!"

"Why did you come here, then?" asked Mr. Frost, in the same monotonous hoarse voice.

"I came—no matter now for the business that brought me here. I can not harass you with it now. But, Frost, you must not break down in this way! For all sakes you must take courage."

"Break down!" echoed Frost, in precisely the same tone and manner as before; "no; I have not broken down."

"This," said Lovegrove, pointing to the bunch. "It is a bad comforter and a worse adviser. You should take food; and perhaps a glass of sherry when you have eaten. God bless my soul! I—feel like a man in a dreadful dream! When did it happen? I mean, when did—did she—"

"She went away this afternoon. She was gone when I came home from the office. She took her maid, and her jewels, and her clothes. She was very fond of her clothes. They were the only object she ever seemed to care for much. Sidney Frost laughed a short laugh as he said the last words: a laugh that made the man opposite to him start.

"For Heaven's sake, man, don't—don't laugh!—if that hideous sound can be termed a laugh. Then she—Mrs. Frost—did she go alone?"

"I tell you she was accompanied by all that she loved in the world! But you must also disclose? Did she leave me for a lover? Did she disgrace herself? Oh no! Oh no! I would have you to understand that Mrs. Frost is a woman of spotless virtue—spotless, spotless virtue! She only breaks her husband's heart. It is no more tarnishes his honor."

And again the horrible laugh sounded through the room.

"Here is her letter. She left a letter. That was very considerate, was it not? Did you like to read it?"

Frost tossed a letter across the table to his partner, and then, leaning his elbows on the table, buried his face in his hands. Mr. Lovegrove read the letter with astonishment. A few days he had finished it he threw it down with an expression of disgust, and something like an oath rose to his lips.

"By G—! such heartlessness is incredible! Georgina Frost must be a fiend! She has her husband had said, taking with her her jewels and the greater part of her costly wardrobe. She wrote that she had long been miserable in her heart; that her husband was either a ruined man, or was growing rapidly to a ruinous maximum, which threatened to become a monomania.

In the first case he would be relieved by her absence; in the second she was a great deal to make herself a victim to his avarice and his temper. She was going to her mother and her mother's lover, who appreciated her. They would willingly receive her. Her mother's property would eventually be theirs, and she was going in accepting a home with her parent. If brighter days should come, they might meet again. But Sidney must be aware that the present need treasure during the past three months had been such as to threaten utterly to ruin her private estate. Indeed, there were moments when she had feared personal violence. He would scarcely be surprised—if Sidney were of ordinary mould—at the step she had taken. And she remained his affectionate and unhappy wife.

"Frost," said Mr. Lovegrove, laying his hand on the forsaken husband's arm, "you said something about business. You are going to be enough to break your heart for a woman who could write such a letter as that!"

Mr. Frost looked up at him with a ghastly face. His features writhed and worked convulsively, but he did not speak.

"What is the use of your talking?" he gasped out. "You did not love her. She was not your wife, your heart, your life. All these years that she lay in my bosom I loved her more and more day by day. I—I—I—" He could not finish for want of a wish that did not tend to her pleasure and comfort and happiness. I knew she did not love me as I loved her. But—but—I—I—I was the happiest woman have the strength to love as I loved her. But I thought she had no reason to be unkindness for me—some human pity. Not break my heart! It is broken, and crushed, and dead! My life has gone out with hers."

"Sidney Frost," exclaimed Lovegrove, suddenly springing up and laying his hand on the wooden box, the significance of which had at that moment flashed on his mind for the first time, "I thank God that I came! I am glad to have sight to save you from an awful crime. Give me the pistol-case. I will have it. Give it me, Sidney. Sir. Sit down. Sit down, and sit still. And listen to me!"

After a short and unavailing struggle—for his strength was worn out, and he was, although a powerfully built man, no match for the vigor of Lovegrove—Frost obeyed. He sank back into his chair, and a great burst of tears came to relieve his overcharged brain. Then Lovegrove talked to him gently and friendly. Mr. Lovegrove was not a man of commanding intellect; and he used the arguments at which Sidney had been accustomed to scoff, less from conviction than a sympathetic appreciation of mind, to which cynicism appeared a short and easy method of cutting sundry Gordian knots that could not be unravelled. But Lovegrove possessed the enormous advantages of thoroughly understanding his self, and of knowing with a heart-felt interest in the man he addressed. Gradually Frost grew calmer. He said nothing, but he listened and he thought. Lovegrove could not put out his hand, with his face turned away, and present the other man's face.

"You—you do not know all," he faltered at length, when Lovegrove paused.

"I know all that I need to know! Yet we have known each other many years. We have always been friends, have we not? Let us be one fully. You will not repent doing so."

"I had written to you—a farewell letter—a letter of explanation. I had thought it would meet no human eye until I should be out of reach of— Well, I had made a clean breast of it. You may see it if you will. It matters little. I am past caring for any thing, I think. But I have had a keen sense of honor, Lovegrove. Less grove. I think you are a good fellow."

Poor Mr. Lovegrove had little conception of the revelations that awaited him. His first act was to lock the pistol-case and a worse one. In the door of the room to prevent the man from entering it. When the servant appeared he bade him bring a tray with food: cold meat, or whatever could be had, he said, and a little wine and bread. This tray, when it was brought, he received at the door, and set before his partner with his own hands. Then he shut the door, and, standing over Frost, commanded him peremptorily to eat. Having seen the latter reluctantly swallow one or two mouthfuls, Mr. Lovegrove sat down, with the pistol-case under his elbow, to pursue the closest scrutiny into his partner's confessions. More than once, during the perusal, Mr. Lovegrove wiped the perspiration from his forehead, and twisted about, like a man undergoing severe bodily exertion. But he read on, with a steady, silent perseverance, little less than heroic. Frost watched him, but said, made a clean breast of it.

The reader is already acquainted with the main points of the confession. He acknowledged his fraud in depriving Hugh Lockwood of his rightful inheritance during so many years—merely suppressing, with a lingering trait of the generous boyhood, but not the generous spirit which he had forfeited for the wife who had deserted him, Zillah's part in the deception of her husband and Lovegrove. Then came a record of disastrous speculations, recklessly entered into, in the spirit of a man who gambles rather, who throws one stake to bring back another, and with the object of supplying the extravagant expenditure of his household. Debts pressed on every side. Latterly they had been the threat of disgrace and exposure should he fail to refund Hugh Lockwood's money. There had been a temporary gleam of hope when his attempt to borrow from Georgina Lovegrove had proved with success. The affairs of the wretched Parthenope Company had, for a time, put on a more hopeful and sunny brightness. But a few hours had wrested this last hope from him. He received from Cosens's note, couched in the most courteous and almost affectionate terms, regretting much that the Principess and been led by an impulse of sympathy to have expressed to her (Cosens's thoroughly shared) into promising that which it was out of their power to perform. Their expectations had been very heavy. And Mr. Frost was aware that the fortune inherited by Sir Lucius Gale's widow consisted only a comparatively small portion of the late baronet's wealth. All these years of deception had deeply affected: he could not lend Mr. Frost a guinea; and he trusted with all his heart that the latter would speedily take view more encouraging.

After getting this note Frost confessed that he had absented himself. There was but one motive left to induce him to struggle on—Georgina. He reached his home, and found that she had fled from him, and from shame. Her letter, written beyond all possibility of self-delusion that her husband was a ruined man, informed him that she broken down the last remnant of his courage, and he had resolved, as Lovegrove had divined, to put an end to his life. Lovegrove thought long and anxiously as to the course it behoved him to follow; and at length, after a conversation on which lasted far into the night, he made the following propositions to Mr. Frost. First, that he should give up whatever claim he possessed, owing up his share of the business to Augustus, who was now qualified to take it. For himself, Lovegrove would undertake as once to settle Hugh Lockwood's claim, and to make such arrangements as would be satisfactory hereafter. Secondly, Frost was to give his word that he would, as soon as his retirement from the firm was known, Lovegrove should be announced, call a meeting of his creditors, and lay his affairs candidly before them. If a composition was found to be impracticable, he was to announce a bankrupt: but in an open and upright manner, and to give up whatever property he had, without reserve.

Thus the disgrace of having the name of one of its members in the gazette would be averted from the firm, which point weighed a good deal with Mr. Lovegrove. Finally, Mr. Lovegrove would undertake to assist his former partner in any way that might seem, on due consideration, to be desirable, and within the limits of what he (Lovegrove) considered compatible with justice to his own family. All this Mr. Lovegrove put forth at length, and with a clearness of statement which, even in that depth of misery and despair in which he found himself, impressed Frost with the conviction that he had hitherto a much underestimated power of his partner's mind.

"I am not in the least a sentimental man, you know, Frost," said Mr. Lovegrove. "And I do not pretend that these arrangements I propose are I am not, as far as is fair and practicable, consulting my own interests."

Nevertheless the fact was that the junior partner was willing to make more than one sacrifice for the benefit of the man who was his friend. But Mr. Lovegrove would have been much angered had he been told so, and any such remark was a tender desire to spare Sidney Frost's feelings at the expense of solid advantage to himself. Frost was broken down in mind and body. He had no will to oppose to that of his friend. And he knew in his heart that the other was the only person in the position with forbearing kindness. He agreed to all.

Mr. Lovegrove deemed it his duty to admonish Mr. Frost once more with some sternness on the fatal intention he had entertained.

"Suicide," said he, "is not only criminal, but cowardly. A man of your sort has better things to do than die like a dog because he finds life hard."

He extorted from Frost a solemn promise that he would not make further attempt on his own life. And he did not leave him until he had seen him prepared for his night's rest.

"I think he will sleep," thought Mr. Lovegrove, "Nature is wonderful. And I believe there is no further fear of—that?"

Nevertheless, before quitting the house, Mr. Lovegrove took the precaution of plunging the loaded pistols into a basin of water, and then locking them up in the camp and dripping as they were.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A RIVER story is told of General S——, Secretary of the State of ——. The General has a country person, and knows it. Being at the depôt in Sandusky a short time ago, waiting the pleasure of the train's lieuu duster, he was rather lonely accosted by a friend, an old settler, shaking the dust of agriculture and the salutation, and remarked to a companion that he didn't believe there was the Secretary of Time, notes: "Hello, you," pelted the old codger to the General. "Say you're still a-runnin' things down to Washington? You still a-relegatin' individual affairs?" "Well, Sir," retorted the General, "I am in Washington." "Ye-es?" asked the Secretary of State. "Why, yere see, this 'ere fellow said yeon was the Secretary of Wind, and I told him I didn't believe it. I stuck to it that you was a hog driver." The conversation was abruptly broken at this point.

Old John Berry that used to live up Lake Champlain liked to tell a big story. One evening sitting in the village store he said he once drove a large seventy-two miles in one day on the ice, when the ice was so thin that the water spirted up through the holes cut through it by the horse's corks. One of the party remarked that must have been a very fast or a pretty good drive for one day. "Yes," said Uncle John, "it was a good drive for a horse."

There is a scene reported from the Paris Correctionnel Court, February, what were you doing on the Boulevard? "I was walking there." "How! at two o'clock in the morning?" "Yes, because it is the only 'code' which says I may not walk on the Boulevard at two o'clock in the morning." "Where do you live?" "I prefer not to answer that on account of my landlord." "Why?" "Because he is a Republican!" "That I have done nothing; if I have robbed or murdered any one, let it be proved, and let me be guillotined. Last night there were heaps of men in the streets, and I was obliged to walk about for a moment. I having no money, am a criminal. If I had money I should be in a cafe." "Where do you get your money?" he said to me. What could I say to such a question? Do they believe that I am wearing out the Boulevard for my amusement? That is my only offence." "One question more: what do you do for a living?" "I call second-hand clothes."

A few Jonathan who had been gazing at a garden in the vicinity of a city, in which were several nurlie trees, exclaimed, "Just see what a crop of pears. I have no less than six scarecrows in this little ten-foot patch, and only on ten would keep the crows from a one-acre lot."

WHERE TO FIND MILKMEN.—At the watering-places.

At a restaurant the other day the autics of a greenhorning customer, who was twisting up in his chair, and tearing round in all sorts of contortions, attracted the attention of a waiter, who, after the gentleman had once asked, he deep perplexity, "Is it a revolver?" "No, Sir," he replied, "that is the inventor of the patent tilting chair." "Curious!" exclaimed the growled the victim, with well-feigned anger; "I'm sure no one would think it." "Oh, Sir," said the waiter, look at your bill of fare." We throw our eyes over the bill, discovered some dozen good things to eat there, and at the bottom were printed in fair large type the words, "For dessert, see over."

HOW TO MANAGE BACHELORS.—To mine-manage them.

A burly Teuton, whose taste for lager could not be disguised, entered a city car one day, with a huge meerschaum in his mouth, and, taking the only vacant seat, commenced puffing away in the most approved style. A gentleman sitting near him remonstrated with him and said: "No smoking allowed." The Teuton, taking the pipe from his mouth, and with a air of astonishment, true replied to the polite cautioner: "Vell, I don't see no sign on de outside."

A young lady, wishing to entangle a young man in the meshes of Cupid, sent him the following lavitation:

"Oh, will you come to tea with I,
And be my own sweet as curtain I?"

To which the young man, with corresponding ecstatic answer returned, replied:

"Another one's asked me to tea,
And I cannot go and see she."

LOOK FOR IT.—"Barber," said a former to his tonsorial artist, "how corn's cheap, you ought to shave for half price." "Why, Sir," replied the barber, "I am a poor man. I ought really to charge more, for when corn's dear farmers have a very long face that I have twice the ground to go over."

A young lady pupil in a Western female college thus describes a gentleman friend: "Really, I wonder that he here comes a-nigh, who parts his hair in the middle, and wears a moustache that prickles like fun."

New Orleans relates a case of absent-mindedness. A gentleman, writing a letter at his breakfast-table, found that he had put coffee and sugar on the paper. Noticing his mistake, he put a large lump of sugar in the cup, and then, with a look of disappointment, ate the contents of the letterhead into the coffee-cup to sweeten it.

A juryman was asked whether he had been charged by the judge. "Well," said he, "I don't know that he rely up in the pulpit and stares over the crowd gin us a charge, but I don't know whether he charges any thing or not."

HOW TO ACT IN EVENT OF BURGLARY.

1. Be very still, and draw the bed-clothes over your head.

2. Sit up and listen.

3. Pinch your wife, and tell her she ought to be awakened at once.

4. Tell her to go down stairs and see what's the matter.

5. Call your female servants to order the robbers off the premises.

6. The burglars still persist in their nefarious occupation, go on the landing, and ask them if they have any thing to say about.

7. If they don't desist now, make your wife tell them that if they don't explain they are worse than fiends.

8. If you have a great mind to be very angry.

9. Ask them to call again when you are more composed.

10. Beg them to leave quietly, and so obviate the necessity of a disturbance in the house.

11. Ask them if they would like some cold meat and pickles, and a glass of beer and a pipe.

12. Tell them to have what they like, do what they like, and give them a dollar each besides. When they've gone, bring out your pistols and send for a policeman.

13. Go to bed again, and say that the only reason you didn't do so before was because you thought they were friends.

14. Ask them to call again when convenient, and tell them that you'll want to discuss the arrangements.

IRISH SKETCHES—INTERIOR OF A MUD CABIN AT KILDARE.—[SEE PAGE 301.]

IRISH SKETCHES—COTTAGERS AT KILDARE.—[SEE PAGE 301.]

IN THE TOMBS.

ONE of the saddest sights that meet the eye of the visitor to the gloomy prison in Centre street, known as "The Tombs," is that so accurately and feelingly depicted in the first engraving on this page—a sight that may be witnessed every day. The artist has represented one of the long, narrow passages which lead between the rows of cells, against whose grated doors are kneeling grief-stricken women. Through the heavy bars may be caught a glimpse of some poor wretch who, perhaps, has just been arrested, and whose hand clasps that of his wife who has come to comfort him. By her side is her basket, which she has brought laden with better provisions than the jail rations, to which he would otherwise be subjected, while near by stands another woman, dressed in deep mourning—a sister, or perhaps the mother—and who seems overcome with her sorrow. Under certain restrictions, necessary to good order and discipline, these humane visitations are constantly permitted by the prison authorities, and are a grateful alleviation of the discomforts of close confinement behind the bars of a cell.

THE RAG-PICKER.

THE business of rag-picking, in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, gives employment and a living to a very large number of men and women, sometimes estimated as high as fifteen hundred. It is not confined to the collection and sale of rags. The poor scavengers despise nothing that can be sold—bits of old iron, pieces of wire, old boots, shoes, scraps of leather, half-burned coal from the ash-barrel, broken glass, and every other sort of rubbish thrown out into the streets and alleys. Many of these poor creatures carry a separate bag, in which they put whatever they can pick up in the way of refuse eatables. A large proportion of the rag-pickers are foreigners, and mostly Germans, who sometimes make the trade very profitable in the end. With the patience characteristic of the race, they live for months and even years in the most wretched manner, lodging in the vilest cellars and garrets, and subsisting on refuse food. All this time they keep adding to their little hoard in the savings bank, until they have accumulated enough to move out West and buy a farm.

The rag-pickers sometimes present a decidedly picturesque appearance, with a barrel or bag strapped upon the back; others, a grade higher in the business, provide themselves with a dog-cart, like the one shown in the engraving. In this case the owner—an old German woman—has just started out in the early morning. Before noon it will be heaped to the very bells; and then she will make her way to the cellar where her load will be assorted for sale. The earnings of these rag-pickers vary from five to ten dollars per week, according to good luck and diligence.

IRISH COTTAGES.

WE give on the opposite page two engravings—one showing the interior of an Irish cottage, the other a too common street scene in an Irish village—from which our readers can form a very fair notion of the condition of the Irish peasantry at home. The sketches were made in the principal street of Kildare, and are accurate representations of the actual state of things in that town. A correspondent, writing from that place, says that in one cottage, which consists of a single room, eight feet by ten in size, lives a widow, with a grown-up son twenty years of age, another son of sixteen, and a daughter of ten years. They have no bedstead or bedding, but sleep in their clothes on the bare ground, with a few dirty rags over them. The only furniture is a rick-

VISITING PRISONERS IN THE TOMBS

THE RAG-PICKER.

ety table and a broken bench, with an iron pot and kettle and two or three jugs, except that it actually has a chimney and a comparatively leaky roof, blackened, however, by a century of smoke, and that it accommodates at night simply a donkey instead of the customary pig, this is about as bad a specimen of an Irish cabin as could be found in any village in the county. There are puddles of water in different places on the mud floor, and the planks of the door very nearly tumble apart every time it opens or shuts. The widow who occupies the cabin, although in rags, and with bare legs and feet, is a person of some intelligence, or has a good choice of language, and has taught her children to read, if not to write: her idea being "there's nothing like education to get on in the world."

To judge of the character of the poor people who live in these cabins, the reader must take a look at the group of peasants about the cottage door, every one being drawn from life. The old man seated on the bench, and resting both hands heavily on his staff, is upward of eighty years old. He was born on the property, and inquired bred the trade as they now are when a boy. His condition is, no doubt, a sufficiently forlorn one, as he describes himself as "only a lodger." The young man standing near him is in the eldest son of the widow already spoken of, and the other old man at the extreme right of the engraving is a poor debilitated looking creature, with hacking cough and watery eyes, and having death at no remote period plainly written in his countenance. The calico occupied by him contains two rooms: and, save this meagre accommodation, which is alike rude and unclean, is fully amply furnished of its kind.

These miserable cabins are the property of the Earl of Kildare, the largest landed proprietor, and reputed to be the best landlord in Ireland. For such a wretched shelter the tenant pays from ten to fifteen dollars per year at the rate of about forty dollars a year per acre for the patch of land on which he rears his little crop of potatoes.

PRINTERS AND POPES.

As the war between the Roman Catholic Church and the Bible has been transferred from Europe to America, it may be well to recall some of the earlier incidents of the struggle. For three centuries the popes have been endeavoring to crush the press, to prevent the publication of Bibles. Almost at the very invention the art of the printing-press had to their ears an ominous sound. Said an English vicar, in an early period of the contest: "I must destroy the printing-press or it will destroy us."

At Paris, where printing flourished with rare excellence in the dawn of the sixteenth century (1534), the popes and the Sorbonne were perfectly successful. Every printer detected in publishing a translation of the Bible was burned alive. A severer condemnation could not be delivered than the following from the pen of Luther's monk; a bookseller, for having sold them. Henry Stephens, the accomplished printer and bookseller of from Paris to avoid a similar fate. Amidst the general persecution none suffered more severely than the printers. At last, in 1535, the Sorbonne obtained an edict from the king suppressing printing altogether.

The printers, meantime, unterrified, had fled to Switzerland or Germany. At Geneva, Basle, and other cities, unmolested, had poured forth a full tide of Bibles and Protestant works. They were distributed over all France. Even the fanatical colporteurs, who, in the midst of danger, toil, and death, wandered through the by-ways of their native land selling their forbidden wares. The printers boldly defied the popes: the press overthrew the political power of Rome. In Germany, Antwerp, Amsterdam, and Amsterdam the heretical engine still kept up its incessant clamor. Of all Luther's catechisms one hundred thousand were sold, and his smallest tracts were eagerly seized upon by the booksellers as soon as they were yet wet from the press. From Antwerp, long the seat of a band of gifted printers, numerous editions of the Bible and the New Testament were issued, in defiance of the commands of the pope. But a dreadful punishment was in store upon the powerful city. It fell before the arms of Philip II., and its printing-presses and its printers perished with its industry and its commerce.

The popes now made reading or printing the Bible a political offense. Philip II. made war upon Holland chiefly to destroy its press. In 1559 Paul IV. issued an Index Expurgatorius, containing a list of books prohibited by the Roman Church. It embraced all Bibles printed in the modern languages, and sixty-one printers were expressly put under the ban. All works issued from their presses were condemned. Pius V., however, the printers began to win a series of victories over the popes. The whole north of Europe insisted upon reading the Bible freely. For three centuries the press has continued to assail its ancient adversary, until, in Protestant Italy and Spain have yielded to its assaults, and the printers and labors in Florence and Madrid. In Rome alone the Bible is excluded from the school and the family: and there, with the aid of French arms, the Holy Father is at last enabled to keep up a feeble warfare upon the active printers. Yet so rapid has been the increase that it is not many years since the prisons of Bologna, Faenza, and Naples were filled with political offenders, whose chief crime was that they were the advocates of a free press.

The attempt of the Roman Catholic Church, therefore, to exclude the Bible from the public schools of New York or Cincinnati is only a continuation of the policy that led the popes and their adherents to burn printers alive at Paris in the sixteenth century, or to throw them into the dungeons of Rome or Bologna in the nineteenth. The Roman Catholics can not complain of history. When they present themselves to the American public as a political party, asking for the overthrow of a system of education that has become a part of our institutions—the chief security of our government—they must expect to be judged by their reputation in the past. They invite criticism, they demand scrutiny. But the historical character of the Italian hierarchy of the Romish Church is so bad that their yoke has been thrown off in every Catholic country of Europe. And it is the Italian hierarchy, and nothing else, are now assisting the public school system of America. That system is opposed by Catholic Italy, Austria; they hope for success in the elections of New York.

In the Italian section in the Romish Church may be traced all those cruel acts that have covered with shame. Here are the orders of the vergo of reform the popes and the Italian bishops interfered and filled it with everything the Bible was made ready to condemn. Paul III. founded the Inquisition, and exterminated the Waldensian heretics. Here Alexander VI. and the Italian bishops forced upon reluctant Germany and France the policy of death to the reformers. Of their diabolism and their vices history records endless examples. Yet it is such a faction, covered with indelible infamy in the estimation of all, of which it still covertly boasts, that asks a free government to aid it in excluding the Bible from the schools, and which, in every way, is implacable.

It is quite likely that many liberal Catholics do not share in that dread of the Bible or of Protestant writers professed by their Italian rulers. Germany, and even France and England, have thinkers who are not afraid of a free press. But the Roman Catholic Church is now governed at present mainly in its assault upon the public schools. It has organized its whole power to carry it; prizes are offered for the best articles of the Bible. We may trust that all liberal Roman Catholics will shrink from the dangerous folly of their ultimate success, and from the fatal contest which must otherwise follow with the public sentiment of the country in which they have found a home.

VARNISHING DAY.

"VARNISHING DAY" at the National Academy of Design, on which we give a sketch on page 292—when those pictures whose pictures have been accepted by the Hanging Committee are permitted to touch up their work for the last time before the Exhibition opens—is the most trying period of the year to those who are thus honored. The artist has been informed of the acceptance of his picture, but not of its position on the walls—for the Hanging Committee keep their secrets well; and, if a young man, or one who has been unfortunate before, he enters the building on Varnishing Day in a perfect agony of disappointment in his heart, hoping against hope to find that his picture has been accepted and awarded a position appropriate to its merits. But the best places are few, and even very deserving ones in respect to which the Hanging are not as numerous as they ought to be; and out of these a fair number of exhibitors must be many disappointed ones. They generally take their revenge in hearty abuse of the luckless Hanging Committee, and in many cases this done the best they could under the circumstances, and who always endeavor to conceal the moral certainty of offending nine-tenths of the exhibitors. It is after all a charity to an artist to hang a picture in a bad position: it gives him a chance to complain that they have spoiled it in the hanging. Some of our wouldbe Pre-Raphaelites have hanged on their walls so long and so loudly that one year the Hanging Committee gave them all the benefit of the side galleries. The publics were no better satisfied than before, and the discomfited Pre-Raphaelites had nothing to say.

FIGHTING IN CUBA.

THE war in Cuba still continues, with varying success on either side. The conflict is not yet the true state of affairs in the island. One day we have the Spaniards claiming that the revolution is nearly if not actually crushed, that the armies disbanded, and their leaders escaping out of the country, and not a few of them taken. The sun sources, that the revolution is stronger than ever, that the Spaniards have been defeated and driven back at every point, that the insurgent has always a great advantage over the regular soldier. Such a battle as the one represented on page 293, though desperate and bloody, has no effect on the ultimate fortunes of the war. The insurgents may be driven from their camps, only to gather somewhere else; the Spaniards may be repulsed, only to fall back upon their own lines, where the poorly-armed and ill-disciplined insurgents can not follow them, and prepare for a renewal of the attack. This sort of warfare may go on for years.

NICHOLAS OF RUSSIA.

NICHOLAS I., as is well known, being but the third son of Paul I., seemed in early years to have no chance of the imperial succession. As Grand Duke, in the reign of his brother Alexander, he gave himself up entirely to the administration of the army and the study of military affairs. The mauvaise sujet, however, of the many Duke Constantine, the testament of Alexander I., and the formal renunciation of Constantine himself of the throne, combined to raise him to the imperial dignity. His character, nevertheless, was well known before he came to the throne. His admiration of Ivan the Terrible was not a secret, and those who remember Paul I. found in him, without the madness, something of the imperious tyrannical nature of the father. As Grand Duke, in the command of the crown, he convinced himself in an amphetic of terror. After he has dead his very portrait terrified those who well known him. Of his side-de-camp, two years after his death, at an evening party, during a discussion in which he wanted to take part, turned the face of his portrait to the wall, saying, "I had such fear of the original in my life, that the copy must leave, with its terrible eyes, embarrasses me."

His reputation fixity of the dull, cold, searching eyes of Nicholas was both terrible and strange; he counted upon it as a means of intimidation; and when he dealt with his subjects, they were so fascinated that they could withhold no secret, and were almost paralyzed with terror. Recollodings of the real nature of his character created conspiracies in the first days of his reign. In suppressing the first he showed that he had a most imperious to pity. Among the conspirators condemned to the gallows was Count Reileff: he was taken the first to the gibbet, the halter was placed round his neck, he was launched into eternity, the rope broke, and he fell upon the ground. "Nobody knows how to do any thing in Russia," he said, on getting up; "they can even make a rope!" In such a case it was thought pardon would have been granted to the poet; but such a mandate was dispatched to the place to ask for the Emperor's will. He heard the story. "Ah! the rope broke! Well, what effect did that content? Did it severely produce on the spirit of the rebel?" "He has a brave spirit, Sire." "What did he say?" "He said, with a frown, 'Curse!' He was told. "Let them prove to him, then, that we can make ropes in Russia." A great Polish nobleman was condemned, for the same conspiracy, to serve for life as a private in the army, and sent at once to the Caucasus. Nicholas wrote with his own hand on the sentence, "On foot."

One morning, as the Neva was breaking up, the Emperor perceived from one of the windows of the Winter Palace a crowd watching a man leaping across the masses of floating ice on the river toward the opposite bank. He called his side-de-camp. "Run after that man, and bring him to me." "Sire, I can only bring him to you in his dead body." "What did he say?" "He said, 'I will not be taken alive.'" "Let him prove to him, then, that we can make ropes in Russia." A great Polish nobleman was condemned, for the same conspiracy, to serve for life as a private in the army, and sent at once to the Caucasus. Nicholas wrote with his own hand on the sentence, "On foot."

One morning, as the Neva was breaking up, the Emperor perceived from one of the windows of the Winter Palace a crowd watching a man leaping across the masses of floating ice on the river toward the opposite bank. He called his side-de-camp. "Run after that man, and bring him to me." "Sire, I can only bring him to you in his dead body." "What did he say?" "He said, 'I will not be taken alive.'" "Let him prove to him, then, that we can make ropes in Russia." A great Polish nobleman was condemned, for the same conspiracy, to serve for life as a private in the army, and sent at once to the Caucasus. Nicholas wrote with his own hand on the sentence, "On foot."

The willfulness of his despotic nature could not endure that even the theodolite and spirit-level should point to any conclusion but such as he chose to adopt. When the engineers had marked the plan for the railway from St. Petersburg to Moscow, they were laid before the Emperor, and he was asked which town he gave preference for the passage of the line. For reply he dipped one of his fingers in the inkstand, and drew a straight line from Moscow to St. Petersburg on the map of Russia. Engineers and mainists all exclaimed that the thing was impossible; that the railway would be taken through a desert. Nicholas smiled disdainfully, and answering in a courtier phrase, declared that his obsequiousness to the imperial will—asked he would undertake the task of carrying out his plans. A road was made accordingly in the trace of this ink-smudge of the Emperor. Engineers, officers, and other most intelligent places were left entirely out the line of route; the road was laid through forests and morasses and immense marshes: it cost Russia sixteen millions of English pounds sterling, or about £32,000 a mile.

Some weeks after the opening of the line, a new Turkish embassador came to St. Petersburg. Nicholas said to Prince Mentschikoff—who was noted for his wit and sarcasm, and who was accepted as a sort of licensed jester by the Emperor—"What can we show him to astonish him?" after the Turk had looked at every thing with frightful gravity of countenance, and without a sign of surprise. "The accounts of Kleinmichel," said Mentschikoff, "for the Moscow Railway."

The very balls of the palace were directed in military style and with military precision. At the one end of the great hall, on a throne, sat the Emperor, on foot and in a general's uniform, stood erect beneath the baldaquin, decorated with medals of the imperial orders, towering above the dignitaries of the court and the diplomatic corps arrayed in full dress. At a stroke of the baton by the chief of the orchestra, the dances were executed one after the other with military precision. Nicholas, though he did not dance balls, assisted at those of his court, which he wished to be as brilliant as possible, but it was with visible bad humor. His majesty sulked generally, and spoke no word; and as all the aristocracy, as a rule, fashioned its countenance after that of its sovereign, the gayety of these festivals was completely unimaginable. But nevertheless one must have the air of being amused at the same time; and such was the rule of the master. So, what with affected gayety and real ennui, these imperial balls were of an indescribable character.

A fault of etiquette was a crime, and if such was committed by one of his chamberlains, still deeper, of course, was its hue. The story of the punishment of one unfortunate chamberlain is still remembered at St. Petersburg.

The Emperor was talking with a foreign embassador, when a chamberlain approached, and invited the latter to "do her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess of Leuchtenberg the honor of dancing with her in the next quadrille. The embassador regarded the Emperor with astonishment, who said, "Go and invite another gentleman; we will continue our conversation after the quadrille." At soon as the minister had turned his back, Nicholas entered the chamberlain by the arm, and said, "Animal! stay here." The unfortunate courtier was obliged then to stop as the Emperor went on: "Triple blockhead! In the first place, you might have chosen another moment for performing the mission of my daughter. In the second place, you gave her a wrong title. She is not her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess of Leuchtenberg, but her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess Marie Nicolowna. In the third place, it is the gentleman, forsooth, who does her partners the honor to dance with them." "Pardon, pardon, Sire!" cried the chamberlain, with a piteous mien. "No; I will be without pity for so gross a fault. Quick! Marche, chamberlain!" whirled by the arm. "These are my orders: after the lighter one, that you shall receive at nine o'clock to-morrow morning, and keep on walking up and down the room, crying out, Ich donnerk! Ich donnerk! I am going to have a horse! I am a horse!" The unfortunate chamberlain carried out his punishment with the most religious scrupulousness; such was his terror of the slightest trouble of disobedience.

More fortunate was a guest of the palace, who, though a good dancer, had the misfortune to fall down as he danced with the Empress, and to draw her with him in his fall. As the unfortunate dancer took his place behind the chair of the Empress, Nicholas turned round with a nod to him with a severe face, and took him by the collar. The unhappy man wished the earth would open before him; but the Emperor, holding him off, he took him only, however, to a farther corner of the room, where stood a grenadier, one with powdered chalk at the bottom of it, in which Nicholas invited his terrified captive to rub his feet.

BEWARE OF LEAD POISONS

In the form of liquid washes for the complexion are mineral cosmetics that ruin the human life. There is but one way of removing impurity from the complexion, and that is by removing it from the blood. Such assistance is rendered by taking STAFFORD'S IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS, an effervescent of which infuses new life into the torpid circulation, while the other separates from the blood the infectious principle which causes eruptions and pimples on the complexion, and sends them to the surface with the perspiration, whence they are carried off through the sieve-like structure of the epidermis.

Sold by all druggists. 1 Package, 12 Powders, $1; 3 Packages, $2 50. Sold by Druggists, or Depot, 16 Astor House, New York.

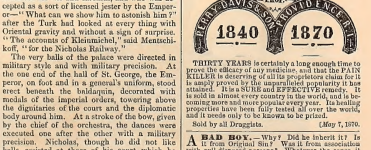
ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-Worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions, Flesh Worms, Blotched Disfigurations on the Face, use PERRY'S Comedone and Pimple Remedy. Depot, 49 Bond Street, N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.

For Moth Patches, Freckles, & Tan,

Use "PERRY'S Moth and Freckle Lotion. The only reliable and harmless remedy known to science. Prepared by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N.Y. Sold by Druggists every where.



THIRTY YEARS is certainly a long enough time to prove the efficacy of any medicine, and that the PAIN KILLER is the best remedy of all the quack nostrums that is amply proved by the unparalleled popularity it has attained. It is SAFE and EFFECTUAL in results. It is sold in almost every country in the world, and is be coming more and more popular every year. Its healing properties have been fully tested all over the world, and it needs only to be known to be prized.

Sold by all Druggists. (May 7, 1870.

A BAD BOY.—Why? Did he inherit it? Is it from the mother's side? Was it from schoolmates with evil-disposed persons? Whatever the cause, it is well to know what are the developments of the person, on physiological principles, that the best means may be adopted by which to correct, improve, and reform the boy. For this and every other purpose, read the Phrenological Journal, 389 Broadway, N.Y. Terms, $3 a year.

S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

$100 to $250 per Month guaranteed. $5 per day. $100 Wages paid weekly to Agents everywhere. Address Parker Manufacturing Co., Model Wire Clothes Lines. Business permanent. For full particulars, address GRAND WIRE MILLS, Philadelphia, Pa.

INQUIRE WITHIN.—The mouth is like a house to let. However pretty it may be externally, it is impossible to judge of the merits until you have seen the inside. If labeled the only place there are pearls of beauty, white fairness, and roses of health, it is safe to infer that DR. SCHENCK'S MANDRAKE PILLS are the means. Whether the utmost possible brilliancy, there is nothing like fragrant SOZODONT.—[Com.

REMOVAL.

S. W. GERRY & CO. will remove to southeast corner of 6th Ave. and Broadway, 1st door, as Importers and Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES.

Formerly I. & W. Gerry, 719 Broadway.

Established in 1804, New York.

The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.

Constantly on hand, a full assortment of everything appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.

Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

PROSTRATION PLAYED OUT

Violent purgatives, emetics, salivants, blistering, and bleeding have had their day.

The sick can no longer be persuaded that the best way to cure disease is to destroy the very strength that disease has left them.

Dyspeptics, tainted of fooling themselves with spoonfuls, alone, colocynth, jalap, and other powerful cathartics, know that digestive organs and stomach their bowels with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters.

Persons of bilious habit, instead of throwing the whole glandular system into a state of morbid irritation with mercurial poison, seek relief, and find it, in the operation of that wholesome vegetable alterative and tonic, Hostetter's Bitters.

Nervousness, debility, headache, and despondency, recruit their shattered energies with the use of the great invigorant, and liken the day when these administered injuries of commerce were superseded by a scientific stimulant perfectly adapted to nervous and sensitive forces.

Travelers by land and sea rejoice in the possession of an agreeable corrective, which protects them from the evil effects of malaria, from moist places, and from the disturbing influences of changes of temperature and change of water.

The weak and debilitated feel their strength return and their spirits revive under its bracing, purifying, gentle exhilarating action.

The aged, whose infirmities which cautious physicians can conscientiously recommend to bolster up delicate health, or to the aged and decrepid.

There is not a city, town, or settlement on the American continent where it is not recognized as a household remedy and a safeguard against pestilence and, in short, whenever there is intelligence, prudence, and common-sense, is pronounced a standard specific, for which, in the whole range of pharmacy, there is no substitute or equivalent.

HOSTETTER'S

STOMACH BITTERS

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING!

The reputation of the NOVELTY JOB PRINTING-PRESS is thoroughly established, as meeting all the requirements of a first-class press, with which a child can soon print, and as being second to none for the purpose of Secret Job Printers. Many printers have purchased, and then most admirably adapted for job work. Many young men have made fortunes with them, and are doing all the printing for the house which employs them, thereby materially adding to their salaries. TEACHERS and MASSACHUSETTES are finding them a valuable aid to their business, and many of scholars are finding them very useful assistants; and, indeed, for all who have printing to do, either for instruction, pleasure, and profit, and of kinds of business, with one of these presses, a child can do as much as a printer. They are especially capable of doing the printing for their father's business, and will be thereby gaining practical knowledge. Prices of Presses, $3, $30, $32, $50. Send for full descriptive illustrated circular. Testimonials from every part of the country, and specimens of plain and colored printing done on the press, and specimen books of type, cuts, &c., to BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer, 181 Fremont St., Boston, Mass., (entire factory devoted to the art of printing materials; or to the following Agents: NEW YORK CITY, Novelty Printing Press Co., 98 Nassau; KELLY, HOVEY & TUDOR, 13 Murray St.; PHILADELPHIA, Pa., A. G. KELLOGG, 60 West Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

Miss LOUISA M. ALCOTT'S BOOKS.

LITTLE WOMEN, 2 vols.; AN OLD-FASHIONED GIRL, and HOSPITAL SKETCHES, 1 volume each. Price $1 50 per volume. These books are having an enormous sale, nearly one hundred thousand every volume having been called for. What is the reason of this great success? It is because they are natural, truthful, vivacious, and appeal to the best feelings and home affections of the heart. The Boys and Girls love them, the author introduces us are the actual boys and girls of every-day life. Sending for a list of Miss Alcott's books. "If Dickens died, his books would live." "If Scott died, his books would live." "If Miss Alcott died, her books would live."

These books may be had of all booksellers, or will be mailed, postpaid, by the publishers,

ROBERTS BROTHERS,

BOSTON.

BOOSEY'S FIFTY-CENT OPERAS for the piano-forte, solo, complete, with overture, &c., at 50 cents, fifty cents each.—Le Nozze di Figaro; Mozart. William Tell, Grand Duchess, Norma, Crown Diamonds, Huguenots, Somnambula, Don Pasquale, Lucrezia Borgia, Martha, Zampa, Robert le Diable, Don Pasquale, Barber of Seville, Crispino e la Comare, Puritans, Trovatore, Traviata, &c. To be had of all Music and Book Sellers, or of the Agents,

BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., N. Y.

Removed from 64 Broadway.

REMEDY FOR PIMPLES.

To all who desire it the undersigned will mail (free), on receipt of stamp, the recipe and full directions for preparing and using a Genuine Vegetable Balm that will immediately remove Pimples, Freckles, Blotches, Tan, Black-Worms, and all eruptions and impurities of the skin, leaving the same clear, white, and beautiful.

He will also send (free) instructions for producing a heavy set of hair on a bald head or smooth face.

The above can be obtained by return mail, by addressing, in confidence,

HENRY GAY, 113 Broadway, New York.

THE JAPANESE CORN FILE removes corns without pain. Price 25c. Sold at all druggists' and shoe stores. Trade supplied and samples mailed free on receipt of price by the JAPANESE CORN FILE CO., 84 Fulton St.

5000 AGENTS WANTED.—Samples sent free, with terms to clear from $5 to $10 per day. Two entirely new articles, salable as flour. Address N. B. WHITE, Box 5066, N. Y.

CEBEL SHIRT COLLAR, superbly enameled white (English), 60c.; American, Snow White, $1. Mailed on receipt of price. HENRY GAY, 113 Broadway, N.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering,

IN ALL THE VARIOUS DEPARTMENTS of their

RETAIL ESTABLISHMENT,

UNUSUAL ATTRACTIONS

IN PRICE, QUALITY,

AND STYLES OF GOODS

JUST RECEIVED PER LATE STEAMERS,

as well as from the recent large auction sales,

To which they respectfully request the attention of their customers and the public.

BROADWAY, 4TH AVE., 9TH AND 10TH STREETS.

NOW OPEN, Novelties for the SPRING SEASON, in FRENCH TRIMMINGS, ECUMENICAL SATIN TRIMMINGS, CREPE CHENEYE FRINGE, FEATHER and QUILL FRINGES, MOURNING GOODS IN ALL COLORS, CROCHET GIMP, FRINGES, AND LOOPS, FRENCH FLOWERS AND RIBBONS, STRAW GOODS, LACES, ILLUSIONS, CREPES, SATINS, AND VELVETS. Fresh Arrivals by the last Steamer. POPULAR PRICES.

FREDERICK LOESER, 379 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, E. D.

N. B.—Any of the above goods will be sent by express, C.O.D., to parties residing at a distance, and the best assortment in selection as if they were present at our counter.

A GREAT OFFER

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N. Y.,

Will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for cash during this month, or will take from $5 to $25 monthly until paid; the same to let, and rent allowed if purchased. Cautioning Pianos are included in the above offer.

STAR-SPANGLED BANNER.—A large 32-columns paper, Ledger size, illustrated, devoted to Sketches, Poetry, Wit, Humor, genuine Fun, Romance of a sensible kind, and to the exposure of Swindling, Humbugs, &c. Only 25 cents a year, and eagerly sought by Everybody. Sample, 10 cts. 3 prats. 30,000 circulation. Money refunded to all who do not like it after subscribing. Address, Only 75 cts. a year. Specimens FREE. Address STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

All Retailers promptly supplied by Dr. J. G. BAIN, Sr., 125 West 41st St., New York. Send for Circular.

WANTED.—Agents to sell a thoroughly good domestic article, wanted in every family. No competition. Exclusive territory given. Business very profitable. Agents have sold 3 to 5 dozen per day per day. One sold 250 in a small town, another 100 in one evening. Sells at sight. Sample by mail, 25 cents. Cost of outfit, 50 cents. Larger outfits on liberal terms free. Send for circular. Address, LITTLEFIELD & DAME, Biddeford, Me.

Country Newspapers, Dollar Stores, or Gift Enterprises, who wish a novelty to sell, may find one choice of several Steel-plate Engravings by French Artists. Will furnish the printers' cuts to sell by the dozen, a bargain. HASKINS & CO., 34 Beekman St., N. Y.

DIABETIC FLOUR.

Prepared Flour of Bran, for making Bread of a delicious flavor, without Yeast. JOHN W. SHEDDEN, Pharmacist, 362 Sixth Avenue, New York.

VINEGAR.—HOW MADE FROM CIDER, WINE, MOLASSES, OR WATER, in ten hours, without using drugs. For circulars, address F. B. SAGE, Yeager Baker, Co., Cortland, Conn.

$200 per Month guaranteed. Agents wanted in every County in the U. S., to sell Buck's Harpoon Alarm. Price $5. Sells on sight. Address G. H. BECKER & CO., 460 North 3d St., Philad'a, Pa.

AGENTS WANTED.—SAMPLES FREE.—$20 TO $60 per week guaranteed to either sex. Goods staple and needed in every family. Address, with stamp, D. S. LININGTON, 38 South Halsted St., Chicago.

$20 A DAY! Business new. For circulars and samples, address J. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, called the Metal (Improved Swiss). These new and celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested as to time, and worn by gentlemen of this city for years, and as imitations of Gold Watches, so well established as to require no recommendation. Price:—Full-bevelled Patent Levers, $18, equal in appearance and for time to gold once costing $150. Those of extra fine finish, $20, equal to $200 gold. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled, patent levers, equaling in appearance a $300 gold watch. For these magnificent watches we charge only $25. All our watches fully guaranteed by special certificate. All our watches are in hunting cases, gentlemen's, ladies', Chatelaine, Collins' Patent, Key, Alexandra and Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.

The Collins Metal is the best but imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.

The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.

One of the best watches we have seen in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

PAYNE'S IMPROVED, or THE COMMON-SENSE FRUIT PRESERVER!

The above cut represents an improved apparatus for Preserving by Steam, Fruits, Vegetables, &c. an arrangement regarded by scientific judges as the most complete for their purpose ever offered to the public. Its construction is perfectly simple and easy to operate, and it is so arranged that a steady pressure is preserved, with no danger of bursting. Just the article required by every housekeeper. The Fruit retains all their Natural Flavor & Beauty, requiring no sugar, unless desired. An excellent pickle-preserver, and for canning meats, fish, &c. Also, for cooking, without steam or boiling. Directions for use with Mason's Patent and Standard, are regarded. Also, for use with Cornell's Patent Self-Sealing Jars. Also, for use with Lucas' Improved Jars. Also, for use with Payne's Improved Fruit Preservers—Single Size, $3; Double Size, $5. Sent by express.

Liberal discount to the trade, with the trade and good canvassers. For further information, address

WITHAM & CO., SOLE AGENTS, 51 Park Place, N. Y. City.

FOR EUROPEAN TRAVELERS.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Spain, Portugal, Southern Russia, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1869. In one large 12mo. volume, Revised Edition, 1869. Price, $3 50. Large 12mo. leather, Pocket-Book Form, $7 50.

HARPER'S FRENCH AND GERMAN PHRASE AND Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversation in French, German, Spanish, and Italian, on a new and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers," By W. Fraser Rae. Fcap. 12mo. Price 75 cents. Bound in boards, 75 cents. Bound in leather and cap, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ROGERS'

GROUPS OF STATUARY.

These groups, suitable for wedding presents or ornament, will be delivered free, with all express charges prepaid, at any point east of the Mississippi, on receipt of Catalogue price, $20 to $28. Send for illustrated Catalogue and Price-List. Address JOHN ROGERS,

Taking the Cash. 212 Fifth Ave., New York.

BUTCHER THE BEST.—Sold by the NEW "GOLDEN PEN." Absolutely no scratching—smoothest running pen ever offered—will last 12 months' use, six months. Equal to Gold. Made from new metal. Warranted to give satisfaction. Sent by mail, postpaid, &c., clear 590 a week with them. Neatly put up, 10 in a box. Price 40 cents; 12 boxes, $3 60, postpaid. Address the sole proprietors,

GOLDEN PEN CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying them, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information, with prices of Presses, prizes, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of type, cuts, &c., 25 cents. Address

ADAMS PRESS CO., 61 Murray Street, New York.

BOWLES'S SALE AND HUMOR CURE. Warranted specific for Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Piles, CHRONICAL, SALT-RHEUM, DYSPEPSIA, CATARRH, and Rheumatism. Sold by druggists, or sent by mail, postpaid. In case of failure please send and get your money. No failures for over 20 years. Price, $1 per box. Address H. D. FOWLE, Chemist, Boston. Sold every where. Inquire for Circulars.

HOWLEY'S KNITTING MACHINE

FOR FAMILY USE—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits Every thing. Agents wanted. Liberal terms. Send for circular stocking FREE. Address HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., 182 Broadway, N. Y., or 19 Broadway, Bath, Me.

BIG PROFITS to Agents on a new Illustrated Book. Send stamp for circulars. T. B. PEARSON & CO., Boston, Mass.

NEW BOOK.—Agents sell 100 per week. Price $2.25. Address L. STEBBINS, Hartford, Ct.

$25 A DAY! ☞ new articles for Agents. Samples sent free. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

WATCH free and $30 a day sure, and no humbug. Address LAFTA & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

$60 A WEEK sold agents in a new business. Address NACO NOVELTY CO., Boston, Mass.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Its great attraction is also given to the topics of social and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly employed in the interpretation of illustration, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographers in all the large cities and towns in the land and the East for prompt and valuable contributions. Thus it becomes, in the fullest sense of the word, a record of the day—a truthful illustrated newspaper which has no rival in this or any other country, and which is universally acknowledged to be

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY consists of able articles upon the important topics of the day; in leading weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and the Social Questions of the day.

In No. 471, for November 20, was commenced the new story "CLARA'S WIFE," by Mrs. Edward Kellogg, the Author of "The Woman to Wake," "No Name," "Acadia," and "The Mountain." Subscribers commuting $4 00 for each single subscription will be furnished with the Weekly from the commencement of this story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S WEEKLY has made a subscriber for life.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and unprecedented ever known in a journal of fashion, and is recognized as the best and most interesting family paper in the land. An authoritative Journal of Fashion it is without a rival in this country. By a special arrangement with the Publishers, we supply to the publishers of the Berlin Bazar—the leading journal of fashion in Europe—its illustrations, which are published in New York simultaneously with their appearance in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the BAZAR is every week devoted to Stories, Sketches, and entertaining miscellany. Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip. The Editorial Record of the Times, and Humor of every type of social life, which the Artist can express will be spared to permanently enrich the pages of the BAZAR. Its success is in no way doubtful, and which it so well deserves.

In the Number for April 16 was commenced "Mrs. Cregsbury," a serial story of thrilling interest, by Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, "Card and Cresset," by Dora Goldthwaite, profusely illustrated.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The best Monthly Periodical, not in this country alone, but in the English language.—London Review.

Harper's Magazine.

The MAY Number completes the Fortieth Vol. of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, the success of which is unprecedented by that of any other monthly periodical in Europe or America. Its steadily increasing circulation is the best criterion of its contents; to the enterprise of its Publishers in securing for it the best talent in the world; to the literary contributions of English and American writers to the pages of HARPER'S MAGAZINE; to the liberality with which it expends its prompters, authenticity, and popular treatment of its illustrations; to the skill and taste of the mechanical execution of the work; to the low and concurrent topics; and to the variety of its literature, several Editorial Departments have been added, and a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record. The elements of success in the past conduct of the Magazine has dependent will will continue to be its leading characteristics; and its Publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of the reading public, they will be able to increase even its present popularity.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred per cent more matter than any similar periodical in the country, and is published at a less price in proportion to the cheapest of them. Its Publishers propose to treat fully of all the topics embraced in their plan, and to furnish illustrations of unsurpassed excellence; and anticipating for the future a continuance of the favor which has been bestowed upon it in the past, the Publishers

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, which must be prepaid by the quarter at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with twenty cents additional on each subscription to pay for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Number for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is mentioned, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new address must be given. It is necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting, Bank Bills, Postal Notes or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferred. When Drafts are not procurable, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $130; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Whole Page, $1 50 per Line; Half Page, $80 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—Whole Page, $1 per Line; Half Page, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

ROMAN CATHOLICS DISGRACING THEMSELVES.

"Miss EDITH O'GORMAN, the well-known lecturer, suffered severe violence at the hands of a furious mob in Madison, N. J., on Friday evening, April 15. Madison is the seat of the Roman Catholic Convent in which Miss O'GORMAN first connected herself with the sisterhood as a nun. Miss O'GORMAN has renounced the faith, and now lectures on her experience while a nun. On Friday evening she delivered a lecture entitled 'The Romish Priesthood.' A great crowd gathered outside the hall, and though no disturbance was made during the lecture, at its conclusion, when Miss O'GORMAN was passing from the hall to the carriage in waiting, an assault was made upon her. The crowd yelled madly, and were about to tear the lecturer from her carriage and escort. Curses, disgraceful language, and all kinds of abuse found authors in the mob and an objective point in Miss O'GORMAN. A pistol was discharged as the carriage rolled off, but the shot passed over her head, leaving her unharmed. As the lecturer was borne to the Methodist parsonage the mob surrounded the house, and again would have assaulted her if a body-guard of Drew Seminary students had not prevented. The leaders of the mob are known."—The N. Y. Sun.

Brewster & Broome St
Offer at their Warerooms
5th Avenue Cor of 15th St
Elegant Carriages & Road Wagons
In the newest Designs
and of the most perfect construction
exclusively the production of their
Broome St Factory
and in all respects equal to the vehicles
built to the order of their most valued
Customers. Sole manufacturers of the
"Brewster Wagon."

One Million Acres of Choice Iowa Lands

FOR SALE, at $3 per acre and upward for cash, or on credit by the Iowa Railroad Land Co. Railroads already built through the Lands, and on all sides of them. Great inducements to settlers. Send for our free Pamphlet. It gives prices, terms, location: tells who should come West, what they should bring, what it will cost; gives plans and elevations of 15 different styles of ready-made houses, which the Company furnish at from $250 to $4000, ready to set up. Maps sent if desired. Address

W. W. WALKER, Vice-President,
Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

The Perfect Street and Depot Lamp.—The Lamp offered by this Company has been brought to a degree of perfection not equaled by any other Lamp now in use. It is the Most Brilliant, Most Economical, Most Durable, Most Reliable in Use and Most Easy to Regulate, Most Easily Lighted, and Most Economical Street Lamp out in the world in every respect. IN USE IN OVER 300 TOWNS AND CITIES. Send for Descriptive Pamphlet and Price-Lists.

THE HEATH & SMITH M'F'G CO.,
Portland, Conn.

SALESROOMS: 44 MURRAY STREET, New York City; 52 RANDOLPH STREET, Chicago, Ill.

AGENTS: KERR & HAGERTY, Baltimore, Md.; CHAS. E. ADAMS, 70 Milk Street, Boston, Mass.

Ladies Desire what Men Admire,

And this little thing is beauty. What do we say is beautiful? A tasteful complexion and a luxurious head of hair. What will produce these? Hagan's Magnolia Balm will make any lady of thirty appear but twenty; and Lyon's Kathairon will keep every hair in its place, and make it grow like the April grass. It prevents the hair from turning gray, eradicates Dandruff, and is the finest Hair Dressing in the world, and at only half ordinary cost. If you want to get rid of Sallowness, Pimples, Ring-marks, Moth Patches, &c., don't forget the Magnolia Balm, ladies.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'

SAPOLIO
CLEANS, POLISHES, AND TO CHEAPER & BETTER THAN SOAP.

Depot, 211 Washington Street, New York.

THE BLEES PATENT
NOISELESS LOCK-STITCH
SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion.

Call and examine; and, for agencies and circulars apply at 623 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

GUITARISTS send for a catalogue of the latest Guitar Music. Illustrated Catalogue sent free to any address. W. L. HAYNES, 120 Tremont St., Boston.

PRANG'S CHROMOS.

"Messrs. Bufletin." — "Re-Peec." "Queen of the Woods." — "First Lesson in Music." For sale in all Art Stores throughout the world.

WEBB ADDING MACHINE.

In the first year of its introduction has made itself an established success. In accuracy—mechanical—its labor-saving qualities are secured by a glance. A child can operate it. Lumber yards find it indispensable in tallying. Guaranteed to do more work for it. Price and $10. Sent on receipt of price, or by express, C. O. D. Circulars, containing full description and testimonials, sent on application. Agents wanted in every city and county. Address

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 713 Broadway, N. Y.

THE PARLOR
AIR TARGET PISTOL
Shoots No Lead, Does No Harm

No dirt, dust, nor smoke. No wad for ammunition. Shoots a BB shot, which is harmless to the eye, but deadly to fly, bee, or rat at any point. A great favorite with ladies and gentlemen for practice and amusement. Price $3 50. Sent by mail on receipt of price and $1 20 for postage, or by express, C. O. D., and charges. AGENTS WANTED. P. C. GODFREY, 119 NASSAU ST., ROOM 6, NEW YORK.

MICROSCOPES for Scientific and Popular Investigations. Illustrated Price-List forwarded to any address.

MAGIC LANTERNS, Stereopticons, Dissolving View Apparatus, for Public Exhibitions, &c. Illustrated Catalogue forwarded to any address.
T. H. McALLISTER, Optician, 49 Nassau St., N. Y.

CLIVERINE

Maintains its pre-eminence on the Ladies' Toilet Table, and all other Cleaners, for removing DIRT and GREASE from Gloves, Silks, Satins, Velvets, &c. In bottles, 15 and 25 cents.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

$20 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE Agents to introduce the NEW AND SUPERIOR SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides. Are fully licensed and protected. NEEDLE MACHINES sold in the United States for less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Office Free. Address W. A. REDDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

OFFICE OF THE ST. LOUIS AND ST. JOSEPH RAILROAD COMPANY.

St. Joseph, Mo., April 16, 1870.

The coupons on the First Mortgage Bonds of the St. Louis and St. Joseph Railroad Company, due May 1, 1870, will be paid in gold on presentation on and after May 1, 1870, at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in the city of New York, free of Government tax.

By order of the Board,
H. P. LAWSON, President.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES and NETTING,
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,
127 Second St. Fish Line]. Baltimore, Md.

BISHOP & REIN,
JEWELERS,
Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York,
HAVE FOR SALE
DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS,
Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS,
and other
FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE.
WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents C. M. P. Dent & Co.'s Watchmakers to the Queen), 33 Cockspur Street, London.
We call particular attention to our fine assortment of CORAL JEWELRY.

ROMAN
SASHES, SCARFS, AND TIES,
GENUINE GOODS,
OPEN TO-DAY,
AT UNION ADAMS & CO.,
637 BROADWAY.

45,000 Now in Use! Geo. A. Prince & Co.'s ORGANS and MELODEONS will be delivered in any part of the United States reached by Express (where they have no Agent), free of charge, on receipt of list price.
Send for Price-Lists and Circulars.
Address GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Buffalo, N. Y., or GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Chicago, Ill.

All persons in Delicate Health who need a healthful, corrective, anti-bilious, or salt-bilious medicine are advised to use TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT, and for these reasons: It removes all acrid matter from the bowels and regulates the secretions and excretions, without impairing the strength.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS EVERY WHERE.

PHELPS & SON, Manuf'rs of Genuine Wash-Boiler Goods. Store: 115 Broadway, under St. Nicholas Hotel. P. O. Box 96, middle of block. Send for new wholesale or retail circular in Letter-Box form. Repairing and Boiling also done.

20,589
Advertisements (Gun's Index to), for Rent of Kin, Chancery Heirs, Legatees, and cases of Unclaimed Money, since 1696. Price 60 cents.
JOHN HOOPER & CO., 41 Park Row, New York.

BLUNT & CO., 179 Water St., N. Y.
SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS.
First Quality only. At Very Low Prices.
PRICE-LIST SENT FREE.

Woodward's National Architect.

1000 Working Drawings, TWELVE DOLLARS, Postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher, 191 Broadway, New York.
Illustrated Priced Catalogue of all books on Architecture mailed free.

The New Books of the Spring,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for MAY, 1870.
"The most popular Monthly in the world."—N. Y. Observer.

MEMOIR OF THE Rev. JOHN SCUDDER, M.D., Thirty-six Years Missionary to India. By Rev. J. B. WARNSHUIS, D.D. With Portraits of Dr. Scudder and Wife. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

BAFFLED; or, Michael Brand's Wrong. A Novel. By FELIX GRISBAM, Author of "Joyce Dorman's Story," "The Search for the Grail," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS. By An Old Boy. New Edition. With numerous Illustrations by Arthur Hughes and Sidney Prior Hall. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SELF-HELP; with Illustrations of Character, Conduct, and Perseverance. By SAMUEL SMILES, Author of "The Life of the Stephensons," "History of the Huguenots," &c. A Revised and Enlarged Edition. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

BAZAR BOOK OF DECORUM. The Care of the Person, Manners, Etiquette, and Ceremonials. 16mo, Tinted Paper, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 00.

DEBENHAM'S VOW. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "Barbara's History," "Half a Million of Money," &c., &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. History of the American Civil War. By JOHN W. DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York. In Three Vols. Vol. III. just ready. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50 per Vol.

A BRAVE LADY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE. By JOHN M'CLINTOCK, D.D., and JAMES STRONG, S.T.D. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. To be completed in about Six Volumes, Royal 8vo, of about One Thousand Pages each. Vols. I., II., and III., comprising the Letters A to G, are now ready. The remaining Volumes are in progress. Price, per Volume, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00; Half Morocco, $8 00.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in reference to the Origin and History of Life. Together with a Statement of the Connections of Scientific Principles with Religious Truth and the Ultimate Destiny of Man and the Solar System. By ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Michigan, and Director of the State Geological Survey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE UNKIND WORD, and Other Stories. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c., &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By JAMES ORTON, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Equatorial America and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

JOURNAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO THE EAST. Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Constantinople, the Crimea, Greece, &c., in the Suite of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By the Hon. Mrs. WILLIAM GREY. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

GARIBALDI'S NOVEL. The Rule of the Monk; or, Rome in the Nineteenth Century. By GIUSEPPE GARIBALDI. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIV.—No. 698.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

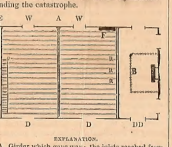
THE RICHMOND CALAMITY.

THE country was shocked last week by the news of a dreadful disaster, in which more than fifty people were instantly killed, and more than a hundred wounded, many of them so seriously that, even if their life should be spared, they will bear the effects of their injuries to the grave. The circumstances of this calamity remove it from the catalogue of ordinary disasters. We are so accustomed to railway accidents, by collision, by the breaking of rails, by the misplacement of switches—to boiler accidents in factories and on steamboats—to fires in hotels and tenement-houses, that we have come to regard these almost as visitations of Providence, or as the result of chances against which no foresight could provide. But the calamity at Richmond occurred in a public building, the Capitol of the State, where the Legislature met and several courts held their sessions. It was often densely crowded, and on these occasions the life and safety of hundreds of people depended on its strength.

On Wednesday, April 27, the court-room in the second story of the Capitol was packed with an immense audience to hear the decision of the Court of Appeals in the Mayoralty case. This room was constructed in a most extraordinary manner. A few years ago, when it became necessary to have additional offices in the Capitol, a floor was thrown across the very high hall in which the lower house of the Legislature met, thus making two stories instead of one. In doing this the architect, instead of inserting the floor-beams in the walls, rested them upon a slight ledge, or offset, projecting about four inches from the wall. This frail ledge was made to support timbers measuring two feet by ten inches, assisted by a row of pillars in the hall below. This arrangement was probably sufficient to resist ordinary pressure; but a few years ago, in order to improve the appearance of the Hall of Delegates, these pillars were removed, under the direction of an incompetent architect, leaving the beams without any central support whatever, and further weakened by the mortices in which the pillars had been fastened. The flooring immediately commenced sagging, and for several years, says a Richmond paper, it "had been conceive to an extent that was alarming: but familiarity had, as usual, removed the doubts of its safety."

In this frightful man-trap hundreds of people were packed on the occasion alluded to above. The bells had just struck the hour of eleven. The clerk of the court had just entered, and placed his books on the table. One judge was in his seat, his associates being still in the conference-room. The counsel, the reporters, were in their places, and the spectators were engaged in pleasant conversation. All at once, without a moment's warning, the large girder under the partition between the clerk's office and the court-room snapped in twain, and the floor, yielding to the pressure, began to bend downward, loosening the supports of the crowded gallery, which was wrenched away from the wall and precipitated into the centre of the court-room. The floor was crushed through as if it had been glass, and, with its mass of human beings, fell into the Hall of Delegates, a cloud of dust rising like smoke from the ruin. The scene was terrible. Through the cloud of dust and plaster that obscured the atmosphere, the horror-stricken survivors could discern nothing but a confused mass of dead and wounded flung together on the floor, while cries and groans arose that none who heard will ever forget.

The annexed diagram shows the interior of the court-room, and will aid materially in understanding the catastrophe.



EXPLANATION.

A. Girder which gave way; the joists reached from this to the girders E, E, which stood. The joists were removed into the large girder A; and, of course, when that fell, the joists all pulled out right and left from the girders E, E, and the crowd was all thrown to the centre. The reporters and lawyers, who were seated close to the railing, just far enough to be clear of the safe point—say about B, B, B—and facing the railing, fell backward.

B. Railing around the judges' seat.

C. Steps leading to the gallery, the marks of which on the wall are shown in the large sketch on page 313. The gallery toppled over, and fell on the crowd below.

D. Doors.

DD. Door to conference-room.

F. Mantle-piece, to which a man clung for a long time before he could be rescued.

W, W. Windows. People also clung to these over the chasm.

Immediately after the catastrophe the survivors set about the work of rescuing those who were buried beneath the ruins, and whose groans and cries for help were painful to hear. The firemen were called out by the fire-alarm, and rendered most valuable assistance in this work. Ladders were raised to the windows of the Hall of Delegates, and, as fast as they were recovered, the bodies of the dead and wounded were passed out through the windows and brought down by the firemen, in the manner shown in our illustration on page 313.

Most of them were placed under the trees in the square for recognition or surgical attendance. The whole city wore an aspect of mourning, and business was every where suspended.

It was several hours before the number of dead and wounded could be ascertained; but at length the ruins were cleared away, and it was found that sixty persons were killed and nearly a hundred and twenty wounded. Providentially the Hall of Delegates was nearly empty, or the loss of life would have been much greater than it was. The greater number of those who were down with the floor were uninjured, most of the casualties having been among those who were caught by the falling gallery, and those who were in the hall below. It is sad to know that many who escaped death and even wounds by the falling timbers, were suffocated by the clouds of dust that rose from the crumbling plastering. When the dead bodies were brought out and exposed on the square, scarcely one of them could be recognized, so fearfully disfigured were they; and the broken-hearted wives, sisters, and mothers of several even failed, in some instances, to recognize the victims. The faces of all the dead were fearfully swollen and blackened, it is supposed from suffocation; and about the mouth and nose was a sort of congulated froth, tinctured with blood, which was hardened and stiffened with dust. In the case of Dr. J. H. Brock, reporter of the Enquirer, it is said his wife failed to recognize him; and a brother reporter only discovered his identity by searching his pockets.

VIEW OF RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANDERSON AND CO., RICHMOND.]

Among the prominent persons killed were Maj. P. H. Aylett, an eminent member of the Richmond bar, and Assistant Attorney-General for the Confederate States until Lee's surrender; Maj. J. M. Schofield, a brother of Major-General Schofield, and an officer in the Union army during the war; Mr. J. W. D. Bland (colored), a member of the Virginia State Senate; General Thomas H. Wilcox, a Major-General in the Confederate army; and Dr. J. B. Brock, a reporter of the Richmond Enquirer. Among the seriously wounded was ex-Governor Wells.

Some very remarkable escapes are related of some of the survivors. Mr. D. B. White, a member of the Legislature, fell through the floor with the rest, and did not receive a scratch. He did not leave the spot, but, despite the suffocating dust, remained and worked vigorously to get out the wounded and dead. Mayor Kelly, of Fredericksburg, was conversing with Mr. Aylett when the crash began, and says Mr. Aylett was killed by a beam from the gallery. The larger number of deaths, as already stated, occurred among those persons who were standing under the gallery. Dr. Brock was just in front of it, sitting at his table writing, when the same beam that killed Mr. Aylett struck him. A member of the Legislature described the scene as follows:

"I heard a low rumbling sound, and felt myself sinking rapidly. I was facing the gallery, and saw it falling bodily in front. Fortunately I was not hurt. I saw the men scrambling over each other in the gallery, and heard what seemed to me unearthly shrieks of agony. Then came the crash, and I sank into darkness. I found myself under a mass of timbers with a dead body over me, a wounded man under me, and another at my side. The poor fellow under me said: 'Oh me! but if I could only fear God always as I do now! I have been wicked I have been wicked to my God, forgive me! Spare me, and I will be a true fellow-servant of my God.' The man at my side moaned: 'O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!' Then I heard the groans of the dying mingled with the agonizing shouts about their wives and children, while others were begging for air. I believe many of them died from suffocation; for, although little hurt myself, I should have died from suffocation if I had not been removed when I was."

On the day following the catastrophe many of the dead were buried, and the day was devoted by the whole city to mourning, humiliation, and prayer.

In the general view of the city of Richmond, the prominent object, the most conspicuous, is the capitol as seen. It is the large building a little to the left of the centre, with columns on the front.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1870.

OUR BARBARISM.

THE sad tragedy at Richmond should impress upon us the fact of the wanton disregard of human life in most of our public halls. It is a singular streak of barbarism in our civilization, that we submit so patiently not only to the wholly unnecessary but the very serious insecurity and discomfort of our public rooms. We speak from personal knowledge of many of the halls in the older part of the country, in saying that there is scarcely one which would not prove to be a trap in an emergency. They are generally upon the second, some of the finest upon the third floor of the building. The access to them is by totally inadequate staircases and halls, and the buildings are in no proper sense fire-proof. The great Music Hall in Boston has two ranges of galleries, and the only passage from the hall is through a narrow corridor upon each end ending in narrow and winding stairways. The building is, however, used for so many purposes than those of the hall, and the exposure is necessarily less than when the lower stories are occupied by shops of various kinds.

Twedale Hall in Albany is upon the third floor of a building occupied by all kinds of offices and shops; and, should a panic occur, escape would be impossible. And it must not be forgotten that panic is due to the consciousness of the difficulty of egress. The handsome Corinthian Hall in Rochester is obnoxious to the same censure. Two narrow stairways bring the audience together in a small passage below, with yet another staircase before the street is reached. In New Haven the Music Hall, a brilliant and spacious room, is ingeniously perilous in the same way. It can hold, perhaps, two thousand or twenty-five hundred people upon the floor and in the galleries. They must all descend together to the end of a long narrow passage, at the other end of which are the stairs to the street. Irving Hall in Troy is perhaps the worst of all. There is a narrow stairway on each side of the hall, which would be hopelessly choked in case of alarm. We mention these halls as illustrations. What is true of them is true of most of the great halls in the country.

In Providence there was a spacious hall upon the third floor, in which lectures and concerts were given. It was reached in the usual way by two winding narrow stairways with a common landing. Upon the second floor, and directly under the hall, there was a furniture store-room! One night, after a lecture had been given to a crowded audience, the building took fire, and was consumed like pasteboard. It was rebuilt in the same way—and was again destroyed by fire. It was very natural for the good sense of Providence to ask what would happen if the fire broke out an hour or two earlier in the evening, when the hall was thronged? The consequence was, the erection of a building disconnected with others and open upon all sides, with a hall upon the ground-floor, in which the most unpractised escape would be practicable from doors and windows, while the chances of fire or other alarm, and of consequent panic, were virtually removed. It is neither a very handsome nor a very costly hall, but there is a sense of security in it which is not felt in a crowded hall in New England.

Public halls are not generally thought to be good investments of property, and they are therefore subordinated to other rooms in a building. But it would greatly increase the public comfort and security if they were erected with chief reference to the easy escape of an audience. They would not be expensive. There is many a town meditating a hall in which will not think of building until it can put up "an ornament to the place," and which will cost a cost which will compel the building of shops under it to insure a fair return for the outlay. If the town would but be content with a single spacious room upon the ground-floor, and be willing to allow the neat and fair proportions of the building to foreign the ornamental, there would be a great many better, handsomer, and safer halls in the country. It should be a principle upon which all public architecture should strenuously insist that no place of great public assembly, like a hall, a theatre, or a church, should be at any height above the easy and gentle emergency as most of our great halls now are. The power which the State justly exercises of supervising the erection of buildings for the safety of steamboats, might wisely embrace a severe censure of this subject.

The vast and costly accumulation in public rooms is another constant evidence of our barbaric skill. There is no perpetual occasion of any sensible skill. There is no perpetual occasion which is not a black hole. Within a few days the Recorder of New York, presiding at an important trial, was obliged to adjourn the court for want of room. In Trenton, New Jersey, Mr. Justice Field was prostrated in the same way. In both cases the public convenience was a serious tension. But what do we expect of judges but the intensest application? and for that very reason there should be every kind of attention provision made for them. What, also, is more preposterous than the necessity of issuing grave certificates by builders that there is every reason to believe that the houses just erected by them will not tumble down? And yet, what questions the necessity of such certificates but the sinking and falling of other houses? If there is no officer of authority sufficient for this purpose of the public safety, it is time to create by the terrible tragedy at Richmond of the necessity of placing somewhere the responsibility of the security of public buildings.

THE BENCH AND POLITICS.

In the Democratic Convention to nominate Judges for the New York Court of Appeals, Mr. Horace O'Gorman, leading the active Tammany leaders, said, in response to a suggestion that politics should not be made prominent in a Judiciary Convention, "I am not on the contrary, especially necessary to consider politics in the nominations. The World quotes Mr. O'Gorman as saying further: "The Democratic party is known as the party of the Constitution, and we want men on our bench who will fight the fight of the Democracy for the Constitution." The Times reports him as adding that "we had gone through, and might still have to go through, terrible struggles." The Convention applauded Mr. O'Gorman, and agreed with him that a politician ought to be considered, and consulted, as much as any gentleman whose reputation in the State is wholly political, and who, it is very well understood, if he had not been nominated for Judge himself, would have been the candidate of the "Cheese-boxes" Democracy for Governor against Mr. Hoffman, the unrivalled candidate of Tammany. The Ring have nominated Mr. Church, not because they like him, but because they feared him as the most personally and politically conspicuous and popular of the rural Democrats.

Mr. O'Gorman's amusing assertion that the Democratic party is known as the party of the Constitution, shows that he has forgotten a late unpleasantness in which the distinctive "fight of the Democracy for the Constitution" was led on by Mr. Jefferson Davis and Mr. Judah P. Benjamin. The Democratic doctrine of the Constitution was State sovereignty; and that doctrine is demolished. If Mr. O'Gorman thinks that a Democratic Court of Appeals in New York, even with Mr. Sanford E. Church at its head, would seriously bring this State into conflict with the National Government upon the question of equal suffrage, he is profoundly mistaken. The days are gone when Mr. Charles O'Conor, in the old Court of Appeals—Mr. O'Conor then the head of the New York bar—gravely demanded that New York should hunt slaves for Virginia. No more shameful claim was ever made, and it was one of those acts which aroused the perception and revolted the conscience of the people of New York, and swept them on to the magnificent Republican victories of 1860 and the war. And when those days ended, the possibility passed away of persuading the State to fight the United States for the purpose of oppressing negroes. That was the outrage undertaken by the Southern States, under the same pretense of vindicating the Constitution, and the success of the attempt will hardly induce a repetition of it elsewhere.

But the speech of Mr. O'Gorman will show the people of this State the spirit of the Tammany Ring which controls the Democratic party. If it were practicable, it would gladly undo all the great work of the last ten years; for the fundamental party know that its hopes of success fade with the increase of intelligence and with acquiescence in a policy of justice. Mr. O'Gorman was one of the most resolute of Copperheads during the war—and we use the word merely as a political definition—and he opposed with the whole pro-Fluidship declaration of which we spoke last week. can not forgive the triumph of liberty and union. And the new government of the United States, as administered by the party of the war, is a remorseless despotism. In their view it tramples upon all the most precious securities of freedom. To them there are no people in the South States but the ex-rebels, who are heroes, graced with the dignity of misfortune, the unstained soldiers of a lost but lovely cause. In their judgment the great and happy days of the republic were those when four millions of slaves were held in hopeless bondage; when the slave power absolutely controlled, in its own interests, the policy of the government, and filled every office, large and small, with its lackeys; when the slave hunter coursed freely for his prey all over the land, cheered by "full fellowship;" and when every honorable and proud American bowed down before the taunting subject of every European king who asked to him what he could not deny: "In all monarchies, Europe has taught us, there is no tyranny so base and inhuman as that which your republic cherishes!"

This is the ideal American epoch of those who think with Mr. O'Gorman. And when he says that it is necessary to put politicians upon the bench of our highest court, or not to forget politics in the nomination of Judges who must fight a party fight, it is with the vague hope that somehow the settlement of the war may be in fact completed, and the country of New York. For the war, never to be forgiven by weak pretenders as certainly ended without the settlement of the political rights of the people and the great Democratic policy of perpetuating human slavery. Meanwhile the collateral advantages of placing politicians upon the bench may be seen in the case of the Chief Justice of the United States. It is a painful illustration, and one which we have lately considered in these columns. That the practice is wholly repugnant to democratic needs not to be stated. It is a growth of the miserable system of elective judges; a system which gives us the spectacle we examine upon the New York city bench. And if the reputation of the Judiciary in that country at large should ever be like that of our own State judiciary, it might justly be expected to "fight the fight" of those who elected it.

FOR JUDGES OF APPEALS.

The Republicans in New York have never nominated better candidates for any office than the eight candidates whom they have selected for Judges of Appeals. They were not nominated, as we have elsewhere shown that the Democratic candidates were, to fight the fight of a party. They are nominated to administer justice under the laws. That they will do this, their whole history, their characters and careers are sufficient pledges.

Henry E. Selden is known to the whole State as one of the first of men—as a learned and sagacious lawyer, and a magistrate of experience. In politics he has never been a hot partisan; but his political principles are sound, and his character so upright, that his name always suggested when a great and responsible office is to be filled. Judge Charles Mason is not less favorably known to his profession, he has been conspicuous in politics. Judge Robert H. Hand, of Essex, has been with distinction in Congress; and his judicial learning, long experience, his ability and angelic honesty, qualify him for the highest bench.

Charles J. Folger is one of the ablest public men in the State. First, independent, and honorable, his career has most closely commended him to the respect of those who would especially the best men in the political and judicial service. In the Constitutional Convention Mr. Folger was Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and its work had both his inspiration and his sanction. Upon the same Committee was Charles Andrews, who was one of the two candidates at once nominated by the Convention. Among the younger men in the State, Mr. Andrews is eminent for admirable professional accomplishments. For the highest intellectual ability, and for a certain weight of personal character, which have plainly marked him for high honors. Among his neighbors he has been always one of the strongest candidates for any position; and the unfailing courtesy with which he treats any difference of opinion secures for him the hearty respect and regard even of his political opponents.

We repeat that there was never a better ticket, for any purpose, presented to the voters of New York than the Republican nominations for Judges of Appeals.

THE ARCADE RAILROAD BILL.

As we supposed, this bill passed the Assembly as it had passed the Senate when we last went to press. It appears that the Governor, soon after the adjournment of the Legislature, assigned a day for hearing objections. It may be interesting to know in this manner the bill may be signed or vetoed; but its remarkable features ought to be clearly understood by the public.

1. It names fifty-seven persons, end constitutes them, in violation of all precedent, a complete incorporation, without any preliminary subscription of stock; and authorizes them to appoint thirteen directors out of their own number to manage its affairs. In creating corporations it is an invariable rule to authorize certain individuals to open books of subscription, and to distribute the stock pro rata, without favoritism; but in the present case the Company, after organizing, and during the process of executing its corporate powers, receives propositions on the condition that the subscribers shall pay to the treasurer of the Company ten per cent. of the amount subscribed, which permits favoritism, as a check would doubtless be accepted from those whose subscriptions were desired, and money would be refused from others. But the worst feature in its organization is the provision that the fifty-seven persons and their associates and successors receive, after the stock subscription, constitute the incorporation. These provisions make the Company a close corporation, and not such a corporation as the Constitution contemplates.

2. In advance of the stock subscription, and without capital or responsibility, the Company is authorized to commence operations below Wall Street; to take lands, by assessment, for depots and approaches; to open the Broadway under restrictions which may easily be avoided, from building to building, except under the sidewalks of Broadway (Court), and, to take up and remove to parallel streets the water and gas pipes and sewers, public and private, under restrictions that are nominal; without being required to make compensation for the damage inflicted by the loss of rents and business, and with a like rule of compensation for the lands and parks the Company may take for depôts and stations; that in valuing private lands the commissioners shall disregard the fact the award the benefit conferred on any other property of the owner by the construction of the road; and that for parks no compensation shall be demanded or awarded.

3. Under the bill, the fifty-seven persons named in it may, in advance of any stock subscription, take for depôts, stations, etc., without compensation, such portion of the Battery as not exceeding 200 feet in length by 100 feet in depth as any two of a board of commissioners, appointed, one by the Governor, one by the Mayor of the city, and one by the Commissioner of Public Works, may designate by metes and bounds. No record is required of the description; but, in advance of any stock subscription, the Company may excavate the Battery for its underground ways.

4. After the stock subscription of ten millions, and the payment thereon of two millions, the Company may proceed above Wall Street; but, without further compensation, the whole of any small parks they touch, and 500 feet by 100 on the City Hall Park, of Union Square, of Madison Square, of the Central Park, and, under the authority to extend their lines, the whole or the like quantity of other parks. They may also take, without land, the private lands deemed necessary for depôts and stations, in defiance of the owner, under the rule of compensation already mentioned, which will enable the Company to pay for the most valuable store or hotels by the advantage to other property of the owner, which, in the view of commissioners appointed by a selected court, the constructions of the road will confer. No affidavit or proof is required in the assessment of the two millions, which makes the provision worthless.

5. The 9th and 10th sections of the bill authorize the Company to stop, for a reasonable time, the supply of water and gas, and the operation of the sewerage in the streets; this is to be done by the Company, under the direction and superintendence of the board of commissioners described, no pecuniary means are provided to the commissioners to pay the expense of enforcing their directions, and, consequently, the most serious discomfort and danger may ensue.

6. The bill requires that all injunctions relating to the railway shall be applied for to the Supreme Court of the First Judicial District, and not elsewhere, at a special term to be held at the court-house, on a notice of not less than eight days. The commissioners and individuals aggrieved would be obliged to submit to this tribunal. As it takes a summer recess, and may sojourn at its pleasure, this amounts to a practical denial of justice, the more flagrant considering the abuses which have lately prevailed.

7. The bill restricts the Company from excavating under the sidewalks and removing the vaults except with the consent of a majority of owners on the line. Inasmuch as the Erie Railway, after proceeding from the Battery up Broadway, divides at Union Square, one going up Fourth Avenue to the Harlem River, and the other up Broadway to the Central Park, and thence to the Hudson River Road with no defined route, the owners of valuable vaults on Broadway are subjected to the consent of property owners not interested in vaults such as appertain to all the stores on that street. The last proposition to assume roll is to govern in ascertaining the owners. For the purpose of giving a majority to the Company a single lot up town may be conveyed to its stockholders by name or to their friends, and thus enable the Company to overpower the substantial owners on Broadway.

8. The only safeguard provided in the bill against the interruption of business, travel, and transportation on Broadway, during the many years which the construction of the road will require, is the one that the Commissioner of Public Works of the city of New York shall compel the erection of temporary bridges for travel only, and supervise the construction of the new Fourteenth Street; but, as in the case of the commissioners mentioned, no fund is provided for the purposes, and no power or duties are placed at the disposal of this officer, who, as one of the board, is to receive from the Company a compensation of ten dollars per day. It is not to be supposed that any officer will be appointed to this post hereafter who will interpose any difficulties in the way of the Company, so that the enormous business of the city is placed largely under the control of the Company, if the bill now shall receive the bill.

9. The clause with respect to fares is so drawn that for the shortest ride ten cents may be charged, as the law that appears to be a restriction in the bill of fifteen cents for the whole length of road, applies only to through and express trains, and not to the local.

Stripped of its thin disguise, the bill amounts to an absolute grant of city property to the fifty-seven persons named in it, and is a precedent for reaching all property that remains undisposed of. The names of those who are expected to have each a thousand over our most vital interests are as follows:

Melville C. Smith, Origen Vanderbeck, N. B. Ira Bee, Edward M. Cyzner, John A. Griswold, Sidney W. Hopkins, W. C. Church, R. R. Hazard, Jas. Boorman, F. Dunning, Samuel G. Bigelow, Daniel D. Badger, George H. Simmons, Philip Carter, Jr., Jas. Richard D. M'Graw, Samuel Barton, James H. Ingersoll, Jacob R. Wetmore, Stephen Schell, John B. Ford, Francis Bates, Henry W. Perkins, James Crawford, Henry Raven, Nathaniel Currier, Jr., Henry Grinnell, Austin Myers, John P. Moore, Homer A. Nelson, Samuel F. Barger, John P. Nazro, John C. Green, William H. Ritz, Edward G. Eaton, Jeremiah Pighmie, Gilbert Coutant, Joseph G. Swengers, Jr., Jacob Sharp, George W. Carpenter, D. P. Dey, John H. Sanborn, William Tunstall, Luke D. Pittoni, Jacob D. Vermilye, George D. Lord, A. Ferris Smith, D. Ashley Dickinson, Hector M. Wilmot, Thos. F. Smith, Orrin K. Miller, C. Sibley Brown, Rodney M. Whipple, Charles H. Ferrier, Michael Nolan, Cornelius S. Lester, Edward L. Cumming, Theodore M. Pomeroy, Philo Remington, Norman B. Kingsley, Henry G. Coggeshall.

The authority to them and their assigns to take whatever private property along Broadway may be deemed necessary under proceedings undirected before the tribunal previously, on a rule of compensation which enables them to pay for it with the supposed benefits which the construction of the road confers on other property of the owner, is a clear violation of the fundamental provision contained in the Constitution, that no private property shall be taken for public use without just compensation."

A bill so sweeping in its powers, so reckless in withdrawal protection from the public, so monstrous in its provisions, could not have passed a Legislature which paid respect to the will of office, or was not steeped deeply in corruption.

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

BY JOHN JONES, A.M.

ALTHOUGH I have sent nothing to the Exhibition this year, it is probably the best that we have ever had, and I am therefore very glad to find that by some kindly coincidence Shull is among the pictures a work by Mr. MOSSE, who was, I believe, our first President. It is a portrait of the Rev. Dr. STANFORD, now of the Church triumphant, and formerly chaplain of the New York Almshouse. The picture recalls the traditions of STUART and SIR JOSHUA, and has a force and character and breadth which may be profitably studied by my fellow-artists. My own style, indeed, is formed, but I can still admire what is excellent in the other old masters, and give good advice to the young ones.

In looking at this portrait by Mr. MOSSE, I remember with pleasure that he is still living: that this is only the forty-fifth annual exhibition, so that any boy can remember when the Academy was founded; and that within that time the interest in art in this country, such as it is, has developed itself. And there is certainly a good deal of interest. Here, for instance, is our building, which cost nearly two hundred thousand dollars, and there are several very admirable private collections in the city. I do not say that the owners are sufficiently versed in art, but that they have galleries shows that public opinion expects rich men to appear, at least, to cultivate a taste for the fine arts. Had TRUMBULL foreseen this day he would hardly have advised our late admirable President HUNTINGTON to relinquish the Academy, nor would Mr. MOSSE, after one sore disappointment, have been ready to abandon his easel and try his fortune elsewhere in this place.

Above all, perhaps, the vital interest in the subject is shown by nothing more than our discussions in the Academy. Here we are divided into two parties, and we call ourselves, Heaven alone knows why, Radicals and Conservatives. Sometimes the discussion of the men, favoritism, narrowness, and indifference in the direction and management of art itself. The Conservatives reply that it is not worth while to have collected the Fellowship fund during the war, nor worth while to have placed the Academy in such a noble home. To this the Radicals again answer that the building is a folly that I am glad to have a concern upon the Academy, which is so poor in its splendid talents as the Italian nobleman who was obliged to pawn his last diamond to get his shirts washed. And the press has joined the cry. There has been a great deal of gibing latterly at the Academy, when criticism would have been more serviceable.

Perhaps the building, beautiful as it is, is a mistake. The Academy is not numerous nor rich sufficient for a palace. With a flowing treasury, which a judicious sale of the building and some compensation for water supply, there might be courses of lectures, and the most remarkably appointed schools in every art of design. And there would be room for a museum in it—I don't see any sufficient reason for the distinction between Associate and Academician, which, by the constitution of the Academy, those portraits in this exhibition are his credentials, and Mr. F. B. CARPENTER, he only Associate, has painted the most important and will find in the catalogue—National Academicians? I am sure that I don't know the reason. But I am not sure that it is not well executed, and blood will evidently be shed. I think it will flow freely at the annual election, in the 11th of May.

Meanwhile the public ought to be grateful to any association that will offer them so attractive an exhibition as that which is now open in building. There is no pleasanter resort in the city than the Academy rooms at the corner of Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, which, and I remind readers beyond the city of that fact. Unluckily, in this space, I can not be a catalogue, but only a critic, and can not minutely name all the pictures that they will enjoy. But if they go straight up the grand staircase and enter the room before them they will find one of all see two pictures by Mr. WINSLOW HOMER, one of which represents girls bathing upon the beach at Marshfield, Massachusetts, and the other a girl upon a white horse, just reaching the top of Mount Washington. The pictures are not without merit, but they are not the best scene—like another which he has in the east room—is not quite refined. But the pictures have a fresh air, and are free from conventional conventions with spirit and vigor. So in Mr. HENNESSY'S pictures, among which that of Mr. BRYANT as the Poet of the Sea will have been even contemptuously criticised, there is a faithful study and careful rendering of the details of the landscape, which make the more essential elements in any good picture. If the critic must gibe, it should not be at such work, however faulty, but at the pictures of mere trick, and hurried commonplace of many of the pictures, which suggest nothing but that the painter was in a mere rule to make a picture. The engravings. In the works of Mr. HOMER and Mr. HENNESSY you are very sure that the painter has seen nature, and in the best sense, that tries to represent it. When he fails, it is therefore a hopeful failure.

In this room, also, is Mr. GIFFORD'S "San Giorgio at Venice," which seems to me one of the most pleasing of his pictures. A sagacious and cultivated observer told me that the bright sail ought not to be the central point, because it dulls the brilliancy of the buildings. As an artist I reserve my opinion; but I insist that the buildings are still brilliant, and the bright sail is very luminous, although its precise hue is perhaps not quite true to the fact. But the scene is that trance of noon—still, but, luminous—which is almost peculiar to the lagoons. From this exquisite repose let the rural friend, whom, with his kind permission, I am accompanying, now turn suddenly to Mr. THOMAS NAST'S "Department of the Seventh Regiment for the War," on the 19th of April, 1861. It is a large picture, almost without color, and often out of drawing, but its spirit, its vigor, its electric life, are delightful. It is Broadway, the regiment has reached Bell & Black's, and we look up the street. What a scene! It is crowded with figures—windows, balconies, roofs, pinnacles, are overflowing with the shouting, weeping, frantic throng. Every where the flag is flying and handkerchiefs are waving, and the interest is all in motion with the advancing soldiers, whose bayonets go glistening and bristling up the vista. The boldness, the freedom, the fervor of this picture, the evident fact that the artist deeply felt his subject, and that it is, therefore, a wholly sincere work, makes me wish all the more that I could praise the drawing and the color. But with all its defects it is the best war picture that I have seen. It shows a very great talent.

Mr. LOUIS TIFFANY'S "Fruit-Vender under the Sea-Wall at Nassau" is a bright, picturesque work, a bit of Naples astray near the Gulf. There is a great deal of poetic feeling in the picture; but the subject is not important enough for the size of the picture. In the next room Mr. PERRY'S "Holly," an illustration of LOWELL'S Cuttin' poesie, is charming. She sits by the fire piercing her ear for the first time, a sensibly lovely that 'Ziekel is entirely justified in flattening his nose, enamored, against the window-pane. It is a very great point gained in a picture of lovers if the affection is made, upon the face of it, to appear to be the most natural thing in the world. Mr. PERRY'S delight is admirably rendered, and the picture is so good that my rural friend and I agreed that we should expect pictures exhibited next year from the same hand. And what is this modest little canvas before which there is always a group of ladies intently gazing? Why, it is Mr. HUNTINGTON'S latest and lovely thing! Of course they do, for they re-cognize every "The Little Stranger." Mrs. Smith has painted the Colonel with Number Two, and there is a Number One sitting upon mamma's bed, who watches her fondly, while Mrs. Monthly Nurse declares that she is a little lady to hold baby so well; and Number One's dumpy little legs and feet stick straight out, and she holds the baby somewhat as if she were made of glass, while poor dolly lies prostrate and neglected, with her nose against the floor: and there is another doll upon the wall in a corner of Christ, saying, Suffer little children to come unto me. It is full of feeling and poetry, this little picture, and it is most carefully executed. The drawing is admirable. Every object is firm, clear, and natural. I heartily congratulate Mr. HUNTINGTON upon his performance. My only bouncer, considering that mamma does not nurse the baby, or only for a very short time, during the day; and as for dolly— It was fortunate that my fellow-artist did not hear the discussion that I heard upon it in a group of admiring spectators, whether dolly were not a living baby, with her wretched nose grinding the dust! The picture is worthy of the most earnest and enjoyment of the picture: but what idea must they have had of it! How entirely the sentiment was lost upon them, the devotion of dolly to baby, and the dimly suggested blessing! But the discussion strongly enforced the great truth that he who paints for the public must look to tongue, or pencil, or pen, must, first of all, speak with perfect distinctness. It seems to me that I have given my views in this picture; but, I suppose, the discussion shows that he has not.

It is very pleasant to observe the growth and activity which the Exhibition reveals; and I could wander up and down all these columns talking of the pictures. But I can not go further to-day. The chief defect which any careful spectator—who listens to me—will remark is the deficiency of the element of thoroughness; a rush to grasp the prize of success without the preparation. But, dear brethren, there are no short cuts in art. Genius may impress by a sudden sally; but genius holds its own only by patience and knowledge. As the Nation truly says, there are too many sketches in the exhibition. A painter's memoranda and notebooks are essential to his pictures; but they are not pictures. In order to become a master, it is interesting to know his methods. Mine, for instance, are very interesting. But in your own gentlemen, who are very true, the results, and not the processes, of your work alone interest us. If you object to this demand of thoroughness and concern that you are poor men, who must make a living, the court rules that you ought not to be able to make a living by painting pictures. And a sensational picture is a poor one. A sensational style palls in painting as well as in literature. The great names in both departments are not those of cold and grotesque men, but of those who were simple and healthful and intelligent.

NOTES.

THERE is a report in the papers that the Pacha of Egypt has offered a commission to General BEAUREGARD. We have heard also of the departure of other military gentlemen for the East, with the understanding that there is to be an Egyptian revolution and republic. To those who have been in that country, and who are familiar with its inhabitants, the prospects of a republic will not seem to be very promising. A revolution of the Pacha against the Sultan would not be very interesting, nor would its success offer any prospect of improvement; while a revolution of the Egyptians themselves is inconceivable.

WE are very sorry to see that Governor ALCORN has sent a message to the Mississippi Legislature recommending separate schools for white and colored children. The colored citizens do not wish their children to be taught in company with white children, or vice versa, it is a matter of taste which they should gratify at their own expense. But the State ought not to recognize either more than sect or race. It is a perilous discrimination which can have no other conceivable result than mischief; and we trust that the Legislature will have sagacity and humanity enough to refuse to follow the advice of the Governor.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

April 25.—In the Senate, a bill was reported relative to the salaries of the enforcement of the Fifteenth Amendment and Congressional contested cases postponed on the 26th and 27th inst. Several bills—In the House, bills were introduced to increase the duties on tea and coffee, and to repeal the duties on certain articles; chartering the American and Holland Ocean Cable Company; regulating the time and commerce between the States; and changing the standard weights of coin. A resolution was adopted asking for a bill providing pensions for all surviving soldiers of the war of 1812.

April 26.—In the Senate, Mr. Wilson reported his substitute for the Civil Rights Army bill, which, although similar to Mr. Logan's bill passed by the House, is here divided into three separate bills. It reduces the number of enlisted men in the army to 25,000 by July 1, 1871. A resolution was adopted for the final adjournment of the session of the present Congress on the 20th inst., for the purpose of establishing a general system of courts-martial. A Secretary's joint resolution in relation to the conduct of Spain in her treatment of the Cuban insurgents was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. In the House session was occupied with debate on the Tariff.

April 27.—In the Senate, a bill was reported to extradite the Territory of Oklahoma, and to consolidate the Indian tribes under a territorial form of government.—In the House, besides the debate on the Tariff bill, there was a long discussion in reference to the report of the Committee on Elections in the contested case of a sitting Texan member. It was called up by a bill, which was passed, ordering certain persons to Texas to testify in this case.

April 28.—In the Senate, a bill was introduced relative to the issuing, under the Secretary of War, to each mount, all persons, with certain exceptions, from pensioned disabilities. One of the exceptions being persons who left Congress and the army and navy to aid the Rebellion, and the bill was defeated.—In the House, the conventions which adopted ordinances of secession. The Home passed a bill to establish a Department of Justice.

April 29.—In the Senate, Mr. Wilson introduced a bill to provide for a new method of selecting military and naval cadets. The Committee Reports—A committee to investigate the Credit Mobilier. In the House, the Senate bill to repeal the commutation tax was considered. Mr. Garfield of Ohio opposed the measure, and the bill permitting retired officers to hold civil offices.

April 30.—In the Senate, a bill was introduced in the House most of the day was occupied with the discussion of private bills.

GENERAL NEWS ITEMS.

The New York State Legislature adjourned sine die, April 27, after passing the bills passed over the veto, and the session was the Arcade Railroad bill. The Pacific Railroad Company's bill was defeated.

The Attorney-General of this State has given an opinion that the new Civil Service act, in which he says that the only important change is in vesting the power in the Governor to appoint and to remove, instead of county authorities. There is, he then says, no conflict between the act of 1857 and 1870, and the date of Supreme on Sunday, or on election days, within a certain distance of the polls, is not to be prohibited by the law to-day.

A poor old crazy man, under the delusion that his life was threatened, left Seven New York to Long Island, and wandered into the village of Hempstead. Passing through the village on the road, he was set upon by a crowd of men and boys, who mistook him for a mad dog, and so severely used that he is not expected to survive.

Rumors have been in circulation for some time, and it is reported that several thousand warrants are circulating at different points on the frontier, for a campaign against the whites, of greater magnitude than that of 1868-69. Among the chiefs are Tall Bull, Medicine Calf, Little Robe, and Yellow Horse.

Fort Fetterman is a few days since, with three hundred Sioux warriors, for Powder River, to collect his bands.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE news from France is dispiriting. The discovery of a new plot against the life of the Emperor is reported. A man named Beauvy, recently arrived from England, was arrested in Paris on the 16th ult., charged with complicity in the plot. He was searched, and found to have in his pocket a letter from Rochefort, and papers in the "conspiracy." A part of the plot, it is said, was to blow up the Tuileries with the Palace Head-quarters, but this was subsequently denied. The existence of the plot was said to be known to the International Association of Workmen. Beauvy is an Italian refugee, and of science, and, it is stated, has confessed his intention to assassinate the Emperor. There is no doubt as to the existence of a very formidable conspiracy, and many arrests have been made by the police are incessantly in "turbulence." One has been arrested in Paris, and the Government has issued warrants for the arrest of others. The Emperor, despite left quietly, but expressed their disapprobation by hissing and hooting. Rochefort and others fled "Satisfaction." The prospect of impeachment was arrested by the adjournment.

Fresh outbreaks have occurred in various parts of Spain, but they were at once suppressed. At Santiago one hundred arrests were made. Three hundred refugees from Spain have arrived in France.

Captain Eyre, of the Bombay, is making an effort to secure the restoration of his certificate.

Six hundred failures in the Circumcenal Council took up the Bill for the Abolition of Conscription.

There is very little news from Cuba. Spanish reports are given of a recent raise found April 12 the Macio mountains, in which the insurgents under Modesto Diaz were defeated. Three batalions of Spanish troops were engaged.

AN IRISH LANDLORD WALKING OUT, GUARDED BY POLICEMEN.

SCENE IN IRELAND.

THE severity of the act recently passed by the English Parliament for the suppression of disorders in Ireland, as might have been foreseen, has had just the contrary effect to that intended. Not only has it given a fresh impulse to emigration, but rendered life and property more insecure than ever. The illustration we give this week on this page is a sketch taken at Balrath, in the county of Meath, the residence of Mr. NICHOLSON, a large owner of land, who was fired at, near his own house, and his coachman killed by the assassin's bullet, intended for Mr. NICHOLSON, four or five months ago. Since that attempt upon his life Mr. NICHOLSON has had a force of armed police constantly stationed at his house. He seldom ventures beyond the limits of his own park; and whenever he takes a walk he carries a loaded rifle, and is protected by a constable on each side of him, with two more constables behind, all with their carbines at full cock. If he goes along the high-road he is followed by a party of armed policemen in a car, with a short ladder, by which to scale any wall over which the assassins might escape pursuit. He never for a moment feels any security, and knows that any neglect of these precautions would probably cost him his life.

THE PASCHAL LAMBS.—[SEE PAGE 309.]

HEAD OF OUR SAVIOUR.—[By LEONARDO DA VINCI.]

THE PASCHAL LAMBS.

THE two paschal lambs to be killed at Easter every year, for the Pope's table, are blessed on St. Agnes's Day, January 21, in the church of St. Agnes, outside the city walls of Rome, on the Tivoli Road. The engraving on page 308 shows the performance of this ceremony, by Cardinal BARELLI, in the present year. The animals, having been bandaged with red ribbons and placed on cushions, were brought into the church, and laid upon the altar. After the celebration of high-mass they were sprinkled with holy-water, and a formal sentence of benediction was pronounced over them. It is usual for the Pope at Easter to present one of them to some royal personage; a part of the other is served on his own table on Easter-Sunday, and part is given to the poor. The wool of these lambs is carefully preserved, spun into yarn by the nuns of St. Agnes, and woven into cloth for the sacred pallium. This vestment, having been blessed by the Pope, is laid upon the tomb of the Apostle, under the great dome of St. Peter's.

HEAD OF OUR SAVIOUR.

THE engraving on this page is taken from the greatest of LEONARDO DA VINCI'S greatest painting, "The Last Supper." This extraordinary work was painted near the close of the fifteenth century, for the end wall of the refectory of the Dominican Convent of Santa Maria della Grazie at Milan. From the beginning all went wrong with this picture, which seemed projected under evil stars. The convent was damp and ill built, the wall dangerously placed between the kitchen and the refectory. In 1500 an inundation laid the chamber under water for some time; and one who saw the picture in 1642 spoke of it as a thing of the past. In 1652 a door was broken through under the figure of our Saviour, which destroyed the feet. In 1726 a miserable bungler, as conceited as he was imbecile, painted it all over. In 1770 a fool named Mazza retouched all but three heads. Before this the unhappy picture had been whitewashed. In 1796 NAPOLEON gave express orders to respect the sacred room; but later generals turned it into a stable and hay depôt. Luckily the great man's sketches for these pictures are still extant; the head of the Saviour, from which our engraving is taken, is in the Gallery at Milan, on a soiled and creased bit of paper.

Of this great picture of "The Last Supper" there are several anecdotes extant. The Prior, it is said, complained to the Pope of LEONARDO'S delay in completing the work—especially the hands of our Saviour and of JUDAS. The painter, summoned to account for his tardiness, replied that he despaired of attaining his ideal of the tender beauty and dignity of our Saviour's face; but that the malice and greed of JUDAS he could take from the Prior; which indeed he is said to have done. DA VINCI in this picture has invested the Saviour's face with the blended attributes of divinity and humanity. The serene majesty of Deity is softened by a compassionate forgiveness, in which love and sorrow are touchingly united.

THE CHILDREN OF THE POOR.

FROM THE FRENCH OF VICTOR HUGO, BY

ALGERNON C. SWINBURNE.

Take heed of this small child of earth:
He is great: he hath in him God most high.
Children before their fleshly birth
Are lights alive in the blue sky.

In our light, bitter world of wrong
They come: God gives us them a while.
His speech is in their stammering tongues,
And His forgiveness in their smile.

Their sweet light rests upon our eyes.
Alas! their right to joy is plain.
If they are hungry, Paradise
Weeps, and, if cold, Heaven thrills with pain.

The want that saps their sinless flower
Speaks judgment on sin's ministers.
Man holds an angel in his power.
Ah! deep in Heaven what thunder stirs

When God seeks out these tender things
Whom in the shadow where we sleep
He sends or clothed about with wings,
And finds them ragged lashes that weep!

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.]

MAN AND WIFE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

TENTH SCENE.—THE BEDROOM.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-FIRST.

LADY LUNDIE DOES HER DUTY.

THE scene opens on a bedroom—and discloses, in broad daylight, a lady in bed.

Farewell, with an irritable sense of propriety, whose self-appointed duty it is to be always crying out, and always to pause between the cry and the cause on this occasion. The lady now presented to view being no less a person than Lady Lundie herself, it follows, as a matter of course, that the utmost demands of propriety are, by the mere assertion of that fact, abundantly and indisputably satisfied. To say that any thing short of direct moral advantage could, by any possibility, accrue to any living creature by the presentation of her ladyship in a horizontal, instead of a perpendicular position, is to assert that which is the question of posture, and that Respectability ceases to assert itself when it ceases to appear in morning or evening dress. Will Propriety be bold enough to say that? Let nobody cry out, then, on the present occasion.

Lady Lundie was in bed.

Her ladyship had received Blanche's written announcement of the sudden stoppage of the bridal tour; and had penned the answer to Mr. Patrick—the receipt of which at Hom Farm has been already described. This done, Lady Lundie felt it due to herself to take a decisive position in her own house, pending the possible arrival of Sir Patrick's reply. With a well-dried-up, right-minded woman do, when she has reason to believe that she is cruelly distrusted by the members of her own family? A right-minded woman feels it to acutely that she falls ill. Lady Lundie fell ill accordingly.

The case being a serious one, a medical practitioner of the highest grade in the profession was required to treat it. A physician from the neighboring town of Kirkandrew was called in.

The physician came in a carriage and pair, with the necessary bald head, and the indispensable white cravat. He felt her ladyship's pulse, and put a few gentle questions. He turned his back solemnly, as only a great doctor can, on his own positive interest connected with his patient had nothing whatever the matter with her. He said, with every appearance of believing in himself, "Nervous, Lady Lundie. Nervous, and essentially necessary. I will write a prescription." He prescribed, with perfect gravity: Aromatic Spirits of Ammonia—15 drops. Spirits of Red Lavender—10 drops. Syrup of Orange Peel—2 drops. Camphor Julep—1 ounce. When he had written, Mince fat Haustus (instead of Mix a Draught)—when he had ordered, Let Somendas (instead of To be taken Three times a day)—and when he had certified to his own Latin, by putting his initials at the end, he began only to make his bow; to slip two guineas into his pocket; and to go his way, with an unvarying professional conscience, in the character of a physician who had done his duty.

Lady Lundie was in bed. The visible part of her ladyship was perfectly attired, with a view to the occasion. A fillet of purple velvet encircled her head. She wore an adorable invalid jacket of white cambric, trimmed with lace and pink ribbons. The rest was—behind the bed, on a table at her side stood the Red Lavender Draught —in order soothing to the eye: in flavor not unpleasant to the taste. A book of devotional character was near it. The domestic ledgers, and the kitchen report for the day, were ranged modestly behind the devout book. (Not even her ladyship's nerves, observe, were permitted to interfere with her ladyship's duty.) A fan, a smelling-bottle, and a handkerchief lay within reach on the counterpane. The spacious room was partially darkened. One of the lower windows was open, affording the invalid the benefit of watery cubic supply of air. The late Sir Thomas looked at his widow, in effigy, from the wall opposite the end of the bed. Not a clear was out of its place; not a vestige of wearing apparel dared to show itself outside the sacred limits of the wardrobe and the drawers. The scarifying treasures of the toilet-table glittered in the dim distance. The jugs and basins were of a large and creamy white; spotless and beautiful to see. Look where you might, you saw a perfect room. Then look at the bed—and you saw a perfect woman, and completed the picture.

It was the day after Anne's appearance at Swanhaven—toward the end of the afternoon.

Lady Lundie's own maid opened the door noiselessly, and stole on tip-toe to the bedside. Her ladyship's eyes were closed. Her ladyship suddenly opened them.

"Not asleep, Hopkins. Suffering. What is it?"

Hopkins laid two cards on the counterpane.

"Mrs. Delamayn, my lady—and Mr. Glenarm."

"They can't both call, I suppose?"

"Yes, my lady. Mrs. Glenarm sent for me. She went down the library, and spoke there alone." Hopkins produced the note, neatly folded in three-cornered form.

"Have they gone?"

"No, my lady. Mrs. Glenarm told me Yes or No would do for answer, if you could only have the goodness to read this."

"Thoughtless of Mrs. Glenarm—at a time when the doctor insists on perfect repose," said Lady Lundie. "It doesn't matter. One necessary more or less is of very little consequence."

She fortified herself by an application of the smelling-bottle, and opened the note. It ran thus:

"So grieved, dear Lady Lundie, to hear that you are a prisoner in your room! I shall take the opportunity of calling with Mrs. Delamayn, in the hope that I might be able to ask you a question. Will your inexhaustible kindness forgive me if I ask it in writ ing? Have you had any unpreized news of Mr. Arnold Brinkworth of lately ? I mean, have you heard any thing about him, which has taken you very much by surprise? I have a serious reason for asking. I will tell you what it is, the moment you are able to see me. Until then, one word of answer is all I expect. Send word down—Yes, or No. A thousand apologies—and pray get better soon!"

The strange expression in which Mrs. Glenarm suggested one of two inferences to Lady Lundie's mind. Either Mrs. Glenarm had made a report of the unexpected return of the married couple to England—or she was in the far more interesting position of having no news to communicate. A clew to the secret of what was going on under the surface at Hom Farm—if it existed—lay in the latter. Had Mrs. Glenarm received a letter from Blanche?

Lady Lundie's face, in the first minute's reflection, betrayed a serious anxiety to know the truth. Above criticism in every respect? Yes—even when the critic was a woman.

"Show Mrs. Glenarm up here."

"In a minute, my lady," said the iron-master's vis à fluttered into the room—a little overdressed as usual; and a little profuse in expressions of gratitude for the kindness, the politeness, and the anxiety about her ladyship's health. Lady Lundie gave her time to get it over—and then stopped it with a gesture of polite remonstrance, and came to the point.

"Now, my dear creature, what is the question in your note? It is impossible you have heard already that Arnold Brinkworth and his wife appeared in the town from Baden?" Mrs. Glenarm opened her eyes in astonishment. Lady Lundie put it more plainly. "They were in a white inn-yard in Scotland, you know, for their wedding tour, and they suddenly altered their minds, and came back to England on Sunday last."

"Dear Lady Lundie, it's not that! Have you heard nothing about Mr. Brinkworth except what you have just told me?"

"Nothing."

There was a pause. Mrs. Glenarm toyed hesitatingly with her parasol. Lady Lundie leaned forward in the bed, and looked at her visitor keenly.

"What have you heard about him?" she asked.

Mrs. Glenarm was embarrassed. It's so difficult to say! she began.

"I can bear any thing but suspense," said Lady Lundie. "Pray use the word."

Mrs. Glenarm decided to risk it. "Have you never heard," she asked, "that Mr. Brinkworth might possibly have contracted a marriage with some other lady before he married Miss Lundie?"

Her ladyship first closed her eyes in horror, and then searched blindly on the counterpane for the smelling-bottle. Mrs. Glenarm gave it to her, and waited to see how the invalid bore it before she said any more.

"There are things one must hear," remarked Lady Lundie. "I see an act of duty involved in this. No words can describe how you astonish me. Who told you?"

"Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn told me."

Lady Lundie applied for the second time to the smelling-bottle. "Arnold Brinkworth's most intimate friend!" she exclaimed. "He ought to know if any body does. This is dreadful. Why should Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn tell you?"

"I am going to marry him," answered Mrs. Glenarm. "That is my excuse, dear Lady Lundie, for troubling you in this matter."

Lady Lundie mentally opened her eyes in a state of faint bewilderment. "I don't understand," she said. "For Heaven's sake explain yourself!"

"Haven't you heard about the anonymous letters?" asked Mrs. Glenarm, gently.

Yes, Lady Lundie had heard about the letters. But only what the public in general had heard. The name of the lady in the background not mentioned; and Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn assumed to be as innocent as the babe unborn. Any mistake in that assumption? "Give me your hand, my poor dear, and confide it all to me!"

"He is not quite innocent," said Mrs. Glenarm. "He was to a foolish flirtation—all but losing, no doubt. Of course, I insisted on a distinct explanation. Had she really'any claim on him? Had he the shadow of a claim. I felt that I only had his word for that—and I told him so. He said he could pledge—he said he knew her to be privately married already. Her husband had disowned and deserted her; she was at the end of her resources; she was desperate enough to attempt any thing. I thought all very suspicious—until Geoffrey mentioned the man's name. That certainly proved that he had cast off his wife; for I myself knew that his wife had refused to ring for him.

Lady Lundie suddenly started up from her pillow—loosely agitated; genuinely alarmed by this time.

"Mr. Delamayn told you the man's name?" she said, breathlessly.

"Yes."

"Do I know it?"

"Don't ask me!"

Lady Lundie fell back on the pillow.

Mrs. Glenarm rose to go. Before she could touch the bell, her ladyship had rallied again.

"Stop!" she cried. "I can confirm it! It's true, Mrs. Glenarm! it's true! Open the silver box on the toilet-table—you will find the key in it. Bring me the top letter. Here! Look at it. I got this from Blanche. Why have they returned to their bridal tour? Why has Blanche gone back to Sir Patrick at Hom Farm? Why have they come to me with an intimation of refuge to account for it? I felt sure something dreadful had happened. Now I know what it is! She said it again, with closed eyes, and repeated the words, in a fierce whisper, to herself—"That man!"

Mrs. Glenarm read the letter. The reason given for the suspiciously-sudden return of the bride and bridegroom was palpably a make-shift—and, more remarkable still, the name of Anne Silcworth was connected with it. Mrs. Glenarm became strongly agitated on her side.

"This is a confirmation," she said. "Mr. Brinkworth has been found out—the woman he married to him—Geoffrey is free. Oh, my dear friend, what a load of anxiety you have taken off my mind! That vile wretch—"

Lady Lundie suddenly opened her eyes.

"Do you mean to tell me," she interrupted, "that Anne Silcworth is the mischief?"

"Yes. I saw her yesterday. She forced herself in at Swanhaven. She called him Geoffrey Delamayn. She declared herself a single woman. She declared him before my face to be the most audacious manner. She shook my faith, Lady Lundie—she shook my faith in Geoffrey!"

"Who?" echoed Mrs. Glenarm. "Don't you even know that?" Why her name is repeated half a dozen times in this letter!"

Lady Lundie uttered a scream cut short through the fingers of her. Mrs. Glenarm stood to her feet. The maid appeared at the door in attend. Her lady motioned to the nurse not to withdraw again instantly, and then pointed to Mrs. Glenarm's chair.

"Sit down," she said. "Let me have a minute or two of quiet. I want nothing more."

The silence which followed was unbroken until Lady Lundie spoke again. She asked for Blanche's letter. After reading it carefully, she said it again, with a look for a white inn-yard—

"I have done Blanche an injustice!" she exclaimed. "My poor Blanche!"

"You think she knows nothing about it?"

"I am certain of it! You forget, Mrs. Glenarm, that this wicked woman exists a double on my step-daughter's marriage. Do you think, if she knew the truth, she would have married a man who has mortally injured her as she writes here? They have put her off with the excuse that she innocently made love to him. I see it plainly in the eye! Mr. Brinkworth and Sir Patrick are in league to keep us both in the dark. Poor child! I owe her an atonement. If nobody else opens her eyes, I will do it. Sir Patrick shall find that Blanche has a friend in Me!"

A smile—the dangerous smile of an inventive lady in search of a motive—thoroughly illustrated, showed itself with a furtive suddenness on her face. Mrs. Glenarm was a little startled. Lady Lundie had overlooked—as distinguished from Lady Lundie on the surface—was not a pleasant object to contemplate.

"Pray try to compose yourself," said Mrs. Glenarm. "Dear Lady Lundie, you frighten me!"

The bland surface of her ladyship appeared smoothly once more; drawn back, as it were, over the hidden inner self, which it hid left for the moment exposed to view.

"Forgive me for feeling it" she said, with the patient sweetness which so eminently distinguished her in hours of trial. "It falls a little heavily on a poor sick woman—innocent of all suspicion, and insulted by the most heartless neglect. Don't let me distress you. I shall rally, my dear; I shall rally! In this dreadful calamity—this abyss of crime and misfortune!—I have no one to depend on but myself. For Blanche's sake, the whole thing must be cleared up—probed, my dear, probed to the depths. Blanche must take a position that is worthy of her. Blanche must insist on her rights, under My protection. Never mind what I suffer, or what I sacrifice. There is a work of justice for poor weak Me to do. It shall be done!" said her ladyship, fanning herself with an aspect of illimitable resolution. "It shall be done!"

"But, Lady Lundie, what can you do? They are all away in the south. And as for that abominable woman—"

Lady Lundie touched Mrs. Glenarm on the shoulder with her fan.

"I have a surprise in store, dear friend, as well as you. That abominable woman was employed as Blanche's governess in this house. Wait! that is not all. She left us suddenly—ran away—on the pretense of being privately married. I know where she went. I know the exact place. I can find out who was with her. I can follow Mr. Brinkworth and his belongings, behind Mr. Brinkworth's back. I can search out the truth, without depending on people compromised in this black business, whether it is to deceive me. And I will do it to-day!" She closed the bell with a sharp jerk of triumph, and settled herself on the pillow in placid enjoyment of her dear friend's surprise.

Mrs. Glenarm drew confidentially closer to the bedside. "How can you manage it?" she asked, eagerly. "I don't think me curious. I have my interest, too, in getting at the truth. Don't leave me out of it, pray!"

"Can you come back to-morrow, at this time?"

"Yes! yes!"

"Come, then—and you shall know."

"Can I be of any use?"

"Not at present."

"Can my maid be of any use?"

"Do you know where to communicate with Captain Newendon?"

"Yes—he is staying with some friends in Sussex."

"We may possibly want his assistance. I can't tell yet. Don't keep Mrs. Delamayn waiting any longer, my dear. I shall expect you to-morrow."

They exchanged an affectionate embrace. Lady Lundie was left alone.

Her ladyship resigned herself to meditation, with frowning brow and close-shut lips. She nodded her head, now and then, and once, as she lay thinking, with her head on her hand, and her elbow on the pillow. After committing herself to the physician (and to the red lavender draught), the commonest regard for consistency made it necessary that she should keep to her bed for that day. And yet it was essential that the supposed invalid should be actively astir on foot. On the one hand, the problem was not an easy one to solve; on the other, her ladyship was not an easy one to beat. She turned for the landlady at Craig Fernie, without exciting any special suspicion or sensation—on the occasion before her. In less than five minutes she had looked back into her memory of current events at Windygates—and found it there.

Her first proceeding was to ring the bell for her maid.

"I am afraid I frightened you, Hopkins. The state of my nerves. Mrs. Glenarm was a little anxious with some news that surprised me. I am better now—and able to attend to the household matters. There is a mistake in the butcher's account. Send the cook here."

She took up the domestic ledger and the kitchen report, corrected the butcher's overcharged the cook; and disposed of all arrears of domestic business before Hopkins was summoned again. Having, in this way, dismissed, distracted the woman from connecting any thing that her mistress said or did with Mrs. Glenarm's departure, with any thing that might have passed during Mrs. Glenarm's visit, Lady Lundie felt herself at liberty to open the way for the investigation on which she was determined to enter before she left that night's pillow.

"So much for the indoor arrangements," she said. "You must be my prime minister, Hopkins, while I be helpless here. Have any thing wanted by the people out of doors? The coachman? The gardener?"

"I have just seen the gardener, my lady. He came with last week's accounts. I told him he couldn't see your ladyship to-day."

"Quite right. Had he any report to make?"

"No, my lady."

"Surely, there was something I wanted to say to him—or to somebody else? My memorandum-book, Hopkins. In the pocket, on this chair. Why wasn't the basket placed by my bedside?"

Hopkins brought the memorandum-book. Lady Lundie consulted it (without the slightest necessity), with the same masterly inactivity exhibited by the doctor when he wrote her prescription (without the slightest necessity also).

"Here it is," she said, recovering the lost remembrance. "Not the gardener, but the gardener's wife. A memorandum to speak to her about Mrs. Inchbare. Observe, Hopkins, the association of ideas. Mrs. Inchbare is associated with the poultry; the poultry are associated with the gardener's wife; the gardener's wife is associated with the gardener—and so the gardener gets into my head. Do you see it? I am always trying to improve your mind. You do see it? Very well. Now about Mrs. Inchbare? Has she been here again?"

"No, my lady."

"I am not at all sure, Hopkins, that I was right in allowing her to consider the message Mrs. Inchbare sent about the poultry. Why shouldn't she offer to take any fowls that I can spare off my hands? She is a respectable woman; and it is important to me to live on good terms with all my neighbors, great and small. Has she got a poultry-yard of her own at Craig Fernie?"

"Yes, my lady. And beautifully kept, I am told."

"I really don't see—on reflection, Hopkins—why I should hesitate to deal with Mrs. Inchbare. (I don't think it beneath me to sell the game killed on my estate to the poulterer). What was it she wanted to buy of you? Some black Spanish fowls?"

"Yes, my lady. Your ladyship's black Spaniards are famous all round the neighborhood. Nobody has got the breed. And Mrs. Inchbare—"

"Wants to share the distinction of having the breed with me," said Lady Lundie, coldly. "I don't appear ungracious. I will see her myself, as soon as I am a little better, and tell her that I have changed my mind. Send one of the men to Craig Fernie with a message. I can't keep a trifling matter of this sort in my memory—attend him at once, or I may forget it. He is to say I am willing to see Mrs. Inchbare, about the fowls, the first time she finds it convenient to come this way."

"I am afraid, my lady—Mrs. Inchbare's heart is so set on the black Spaniards—she will find it convenient to come this way at once as fast as her feet can carry her."

"In that case, you must take her to the gardener's wife. Say she is to have some eggs—on condition, of course, of paying me money for them. If she does come, mind I hear of it."

Hopkins withdrew. Hopkins's manners reclined on their comfortable pillows, and fanned herself gently. The vindictive smile reappeared on her face. "I fancy I shall be well revenged to see Mrs. Inchbare," she thought to herself. "And it is just possible that my poultry-yard may get beyond the relative merits of her poultry-yard and mine."

A lapse of little more than two hours proved Hopkins's wisdom of the latent enthusiasm in Mrs. Inchbare's character to have been correctly formed. The eager landlady appeared at Windgates with the heels of the gardener's wife at her. Among the long list of human weaknesses, a passion for poultry seems to be one of those local advantages (in the shape of eggs) as compared with the more occult frenzies for collecting stuff-boots and cigar-holders, and amassing autographs and old postage-stamps. When the mistress of Craig Fernie was duly announced by the mistress of Windygates, Lady Lundie developed a sense of humor for the first time in her life. Her ladyship was thinking of the remark she had made on the exhilarating properties of the red Lavender draught in the subject of Mrs. Inchbare and the Spanish fowls.

"Most ridiculous, Hopkins! This poor woman must be suffering from a distressed passion for poultry to the brain. Ill as I am, I should have thought that nothing could amuse me. But, really, this good creature has stirred up my feeling here, as you say, as fast as her feet can carry her—it's impossible to resist it! I positively think I must see Mrs. Inchbare. With my active habits, this imprisonment to my room is dreadful. I can neither sleep nor read. Anything, Hopkins, to divert my mind from myself. It's easy to get rid of her if she is too much for me. Send her up."

Mrs. Inchbare made her appearance, courtesying deferentially, amazed at the magnificence which admitted her within the hallowed precincts of Lady Lundie's room.

"Take a chair," said her ladyship, graciously.

"I am suffering from illness, as you perceive."

"My cousin's sick or well, my lady, I'm brave sight to see!" renamed Mrs. Inchbare, profoundly impressed by the contrast presented, which illness assumes when illness appears in the regions of high life.

"I am far from being in a fit state to receive any body," proceeded Lady Lundie. "But I had a mother's wishing to speak to you about you next came to my house. I failed to treat a proposal you made to me, a short time since, in a friendly and neighborly way. I am given to understand that I regret having forgotten the consideration due from a person in my position to a person in yours. I am obliged to say this under very unusual circumstances," added her ladyship, with a glance round her magnificent bedroom, "through your unexpected promptitude in favoring me with a call. You have lost no time, Mrs. Inchbare, in profiting by the news which I had the pleasure of sending to you."

"Eh, my lady! I wasna' that clever (yer ladyship having once changed yer mind) but that ye might e'en change again if I failed to strike, as they say, while the iron's hot. I'm no' clever, I'm done, I'm sure, if I 'ha been ower hasty. The pride o' my hairt's in my poultry—and the black Spaniards' (as they ca' them) are a sair temptation. I couldna' to break the tenth commandment, sae long as they're in a' yer ladyship's possession, and nane o' them in mine."

"I am obliged to hear that I have been the innocent cause of your falling into temptation, Mrs. Inchbare. Make your proposal—and I shall be happy to meet it, if I can."

"I mean e'en be content wi' what yer ladyship will condescend on. A batch o' eggs if I can come by anything else."

"There is something else you would prefer to a batch of eggs?"

"I wad prefer," said Mrs. Inchbare, modestly, "a cock and two pullets."

"Open the case on the table behind you," said Lady Lundie, "and you will find some writing-paper inside. You are a shrewd woman. Help yourself out of the tray."

Eagerly watched by Mrs. Inchbare, she wrote an order to the poultry-woman, and held it out with a gracious smile.

"Take that to the gardener's wife. If you agree with her about the price, you can have the eggs; and the two pullets."

Mrs. Inchbare opened her lips—no doubt to express the utmost extremity of human gratitude. Before she had said three words, Lady Lundie's impatience to reach the end which she had kept in view from the time when Mrs. Gilmarn had left the house burst the bounds which had successfully restrained it thus far. Stopping the landlady without ceremony, she fairly forced the conversation to the subject of Anne Silvester's proceedings at the Craig Fernie inn.

"How are you getting on, my dear, Mrs. Inchbare? Plenty of tourists, I suppose, at this time of year?"

"Full, my leddy (praise Providence), frae the basement to the ceiling."

"You had a visitor, I think, some time since of whom I know something? A person—" She paused, and gave a strong emphasis to the word. "There was no alternative but to yield to the hard necessity of making her inquiry intelligible. "A lady," she added, "who came to you about the middle of last month."

"Could yer leddyship condescend on her name?"

Lady Lundie put a still stronger constraint on herself. "Silvester," she said, shortly.

"Preserve us a'!" cried Mrs. Inchbare. "I'll believe the same in time to come! I beg leave to herself—wi' a bit bug in her hand, and a bunbond left dwalling an hour or mair on the road behind her!"

"I have no doubt it is the same."

"Eh! I do know! and yer leddyship's 2? asked Mrs. Inchbare, feeling her ground cautiously.

"Certainly not!" said Lady Lundie. "I felt a passing curiosity about her—nothing more."

Mrs. Inchbare's face fell. "Then, to tell the truth, my leddy, there was nae love lost between us. She had a masterfu' tempe o' her ain—and I was weel pleased when I got the back of her.

"I can quite understand that, Mrs. Inchbare—I know something of her temper myself. Did I understand you to say that she came to your hotel alone, and that her husband followed shortly afterward?"

"Yes'am, yer leddyship. I was no' free to gi' her house-room in the bottle till her husband dadded in at her heels and answered for her?"

"I fancy I must have misunderstood you, Lady Lundie. "What sort of a man was he?"

Mrs. Inchbare replied in much the same words which she had used in answering the same question put by Sir Patrick.

"Eh! he was a clever young for the like o' her. A pratty man, my leddy—betwixt tall and short; wi' bonny brown eyes and cheeks, and fine coal-black hair. A nice doon-spoken body. I ha' nae mashing to say against him—except that he wan him into the wrong hoose. I was awa' to the next morning, and left mashan behind, a lead on my hands."

The answer produced precisely the same effect on Lady Lundie which it had produced on Sir Patrick. She, also, felt as if she had received a like too many young men of no uncommon humor and complexion to be relied on. But her ladyship possessed a resolution which was denied her brother-in-law in attempting to arrive at the truth. She resolved to get at it as quickly as possible, in her case, to assist Mrs. Inchbare's memory by hints contributed from her own superior resources of experience and observation.

"Had he any thing about him of the look and shape of a locket, she asked, "And did you notice, when you spoke to him, that he was in the habit of playing with a locket on his watch-chain?"

"There he is, my leddy!" cried Mrs. Inchbare. "Yer leddyship's weel acquented wi' him—there's nae doon o' that!"

I thought I had seen him," said Lady Lundie.

A modest, well-behaved young man, Mrs. Inchbare. As you say, he left me a day sooner than I longer from the poultry-yard. I am transgressing the doctor's orders in seeing any body. We are quite undressed each other's hands. I will be very glad to have sein you. Good-evening."

No sin distressed Mrs. Inchbare, when Mrs. Inchbare had served her purpose.

Most women, in her position, would have been content with the information which they had now obtained. But Lady Lundie—having a man like Sir Patrick to deal with—resolved to make doubly sure of her facts before she ventured on interfering at Ham Farm. She had learned from Mrs. Inchbare that the letter addressed to Anne Silvester had joined her at Craig Fernie on the day when she herself had left it, and had left her again the next morning. Anne had made her escape from Windygates on the occasion of the four-and-twenty hours' leave on the fourteenth of August. On the same day Arnold Brinkworth had taken his departure for the purpose of visiting the Scotch property left to him by his aunt. If Mrs. Inchbare was to be depended on, the men had met at the Craig Fernie instead of going to his appointed destination—and Mrs. Inchbare was to be depended on. Anne house and lands one day later than the day which he had originally set apart for that purpose. If the letter could be proved to be in the handwriting of a disinterested witness, the case against Arnold would be complete. Lady Lundie might act on her discovery with something like a certainty that her information was to be relied on.

After a little consideration she decided on sending a messenger with a note of inquiry addressed to Arnold's steward. The apology she invented to excuse and account for the strangeness of the proposed question, referred it to a little family discussion as to the exact date of Arnold's arrival at his estate, and to a friendly wager in which the difference of opinion had ended. If the steward could state whether his employer had arrived on the fourteenth or on the fifteenth of August, that was all that would be wanted to decide the question in dispute.

Having written in these terms, Lady Lundie gave the necessary directions for having the note delivered at the earliest possible hour on the next morning; the messenger being ordered to make his way back to Windygates by the first return train on the same day.

This arranged, her ladyship was free to refresh herself with another dose of the red lavender draught, and to step the sleep of the just, who close their eyes with the composing conviction that they have done their duty.

The events of the next day at Windygates succeeded each other in due course, as follows:

The post arrived, and brought no reply from Sir Patrick. Lady Lundie ensured that incident on her mental register of debts owed by her brother-in-law—to be paid, with interest, when the day of reckoning came.

Next in order occurred the return of the messenger, with Arnold's steward.

He had referred to his Diary; and he had discovered that Mr. Brinkworth had written beforehand to announce his arrival at his estate for the fourteenth of August—but that he had not actually appeared until the fifteenth. The one discovery needed to substantiate Mrs. Inchbare's evidence being made, Lady Lundie's possession, she decided to allow another day to pass—on the chance that Sir Patrick might alter his mind, and write to her. He was her nearest friend, and if nothing more was received from Blanche, she resolved to have Windygates by the next morning's train, and to try the bold experiment of personal interference at Ham Farm.

The third day's succession of events was the appearance of the doctor to pay his professional visit.

A severe shock awaited him. He found his patient cured by the draught! It was contrary to all rule and precedent; it savored of quackery—the red lavender had no business to do what the red lavender had done—but there she was, nevertheless, up and dressed, and contemplating a journey to London on the next day but one. "Business of duty, doctor, is involved in this—whatever the scirrhus, I must go!" No other explanation could be obtained. The patient was plainly determined—nothing remained for the physician but to retreat with uninspired dignity, and to feel his fee. He did it.

Left to herself, Lady Lundie in confidence, "I—nothing, after all, but a choice between alternatives. Either I must go—or not cured, as you think—but sustained by abnormal excitement. I have yet to ask which is the least of two evils—to risk letting you travel, or to irritate you by keeping you at home. With your constitution, a nice dose would settle the question. But how am I to get you to take it?"

Her ladyship's resolution was not to be shaken by the discovery—roused Mrs. Gilmarn's excitement to the highest pitch.

"I'll go to town on Saturday?' she said. "I will go with you. Ever since that woman declared she should be in London before me, I have been dying to see human my journey—and it is such an opportunity to go with you! I can easily manage it. My father and I are used to have met in London, early next week, for the footrace. I have only to write and tell him of my change of plan. Why-be-by, talking of my uncle, I have heard, since I saw you, from the lawyers at Perth."

"More anonymous letters?"

"One more—received by the lawyers this time. Mr. Inchbare's correspondent has written to them to withdraw his proposal, and to announce that he has left Perth. The lawyers recommended me to stop my uncle from spending money uselessly in employing the London police. I have received a clear letter to the Captain; and he will probably be in town to see his solicitors as soon as I get there with you. So much for what I have done in this matter. Dear Lady Lundie—when we are at our journey's end, what is to become of me?"

"My course is plain," answered her ladyship, calmly. "Sir Patrick will have room for me, on Sunday morning next, at Ham Farm."

"Telling him what you have found out?"

"Certainly not. I shall bring him that I find myself called to London by business, and that I propose paying him a short visit on Monday next."

"Of course, he must receive you?"

"I think there is no doubt of that. Even Sir Patrick's self-indulgence will scarcely allow him to do length—after leaving my letter unanswered—of closing the door against me next."

"How will you manage it when you get there?"

"When I get there, my dear, I shall be breathing an atmosphere of treachery and deceit; and, in my poor child's sake (abhorrence all dissimulation is to me), I must be careful what I do. Not a word will escape my lips until I have first seen Blanche in private. However painful it may be, I shall not shrink (from my duty, if my duty compels me to open her eyes to the truth.

Sir Patrick and Mr. Brinkworth will have somebody else besides an inexperienced young creature to deal with on Monday next. I shall be there."

With that formidable announcement, Lady Lundie closed the conversation; and Mrs. Gilmarn rose to take her leave.

"We meet at the Junction, dear Lady Lundie?"

"At the Junction, on Saturday."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

As the members of the Massachusetts Legislature moved slowly down the aisle through New Bedford's streets, an old lady, attracted by their solemn and dignified appearance, stopped to get a nearer look at them. "Whose funeral is it?" inquired the shop-keeper replied, "Why, that's the Legislature." "Da it," said the old lady, and went back to her knitting.

A stranger in a printing-office asked the youngest apprentice what his rule of punctuation was. "I set up no law on that subject," was the reply. "I put in a comma; when I spot I insert a semicolon; and when I want a clear of tobacco I make a paragraph."

To Cure Deafness.—Tell a man you've come to pay him money. It tests acoustic oil all believe.

Thin Side Dish.—We saw Jake sailing up a hot, dusty day, containing some article which is understood to soak up oysters. From the nature of the contents it was presuming that the box should not be covered on the passage, so we ventured the suggestion that it was the thin mock-shad—the skin, tail, etc., conspicuously upon the cover. A few days after we met Jake, and he said, "Say, you know your guess, Jake? Well, they got there safe!" "Every one broke?" replied we. "Not a bone broke," said Jake, "but the Fire-Commissioners broke, as he was carrying it, and he told you so!" "Yes, I did; and for fear you should not know it, the River, I put it on the bottom too—you found 'em?"

The first Step of Spring—"To Let."

A story is told of two men who traveled together three days in a stage-coach without a word or a syllable between them. On the fourth day one of them remarked that he was going to Buffalo to see a preaching. "And who said it weren't?" was the reply.

The last case of indolence is that of a man named John Hole, who was so lazy that, in writing his name, he simply used the letter "J," and then pushed a hole through the paper.

Two rival sausage dealers in Paris have their shops adjoining. One of them has painted on his glass window, over a quantity of sausages, "Here is sense; a pound; to pay more is to be robbed;" while the other, not to be outdone, has written in letters above it, "At twelve cents a pound; to pay less is to be poisoned."

Switch-fiddles—Hair-pins.

Two twin brothers in New York are so much alike that they frequently borrow money of each other without knowing it.

"Oh that mice cowny had written a book?" said Jones, "Why," said Brown, "do you suppose she was going to write a book for?" a pugil was said to have acted "on the square," when he "hedged" his bet. Brown—"Why, my dear, Job wanted to review it, of course, and call it Job's."

When is a boot like a pile of snow?—When it is subtle.

The lady whose blood curdled in her veins, has gone to the nearest drug store for a bottle of ammonia.

A boy's idea of having a tooth drawn may be summed up as follows: "The doctor hitched feet on me, pulled the tent, and just before it killed me the tooth came out."

"I am afraid, dear wife, that while I am gone absence will make you forget me." "Never fear, dear husband; the longer you stay away the better I shall like you."

Mindful of the traditional relationship of dog to sausage, a waggish rhymer pens the following "ode" to his favorite puppy:

"Oh, the pup, the bounding pup!
Coming when you whistle up,
Gamboling playfully around,
Jumping on a bone, then biting a fen:
Jumping,
Running,
After the pony;
Beautiful pup, you will soon be Bologna."

An Unpopular "Inn" with Every Body—The Hospital.

A good story is told of a young man who applied to one of our hotels for a situation. The landlord informed him that there was but one vacancy, and that of limp-cleaner. The questioner accepted the position, and entered upon his duties forthwith. He was conscientious, however, as he soon found, in applying four different languages discretly, etc. "Oh! that's the reason you have so many customers," remarked he; "this business won't require you to speak but one language, and a mighty little of that."

You ask me, love, how many times
I think of you a day;
I frankly answer only once,
And mean just what I say.
You seem perhaps at first somewhat hurt;
But wait and hear the rhyme:
From you to one the pen has once
What one does all the time?

An exchange received the following advertisement in Pennsylvania: "Strayed away from the subscriber, Polly Jane has left my bed. Whoever will bring her back to my bed will be rewarded. Any one found harboring her in my Count's wont Pay Jones."

Arab Billings says he will never patronize a lottery so long as he can hire any body else to rob him at reasonable rates.

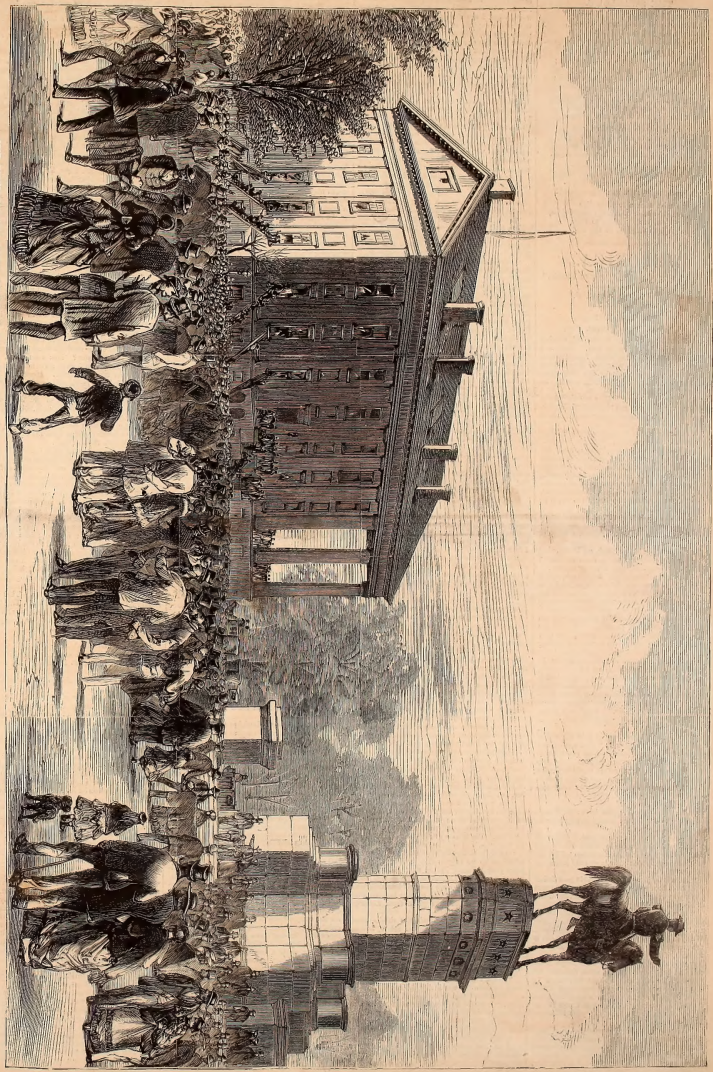
A Clock is like a Man.—It has two hands, a face, an inside, and an outside. Sometimes the hands point to the truth; and it is not unfrequently the case that when they don't. It is a useful bit of machinery—as long as it goes, it goes out of order—goes down. It is often wound up—is a man. It strikes—as does man. It is not always to be relied on—no more is man. It is hung up in the Tombs—so is man.

People who are behind the times should be fed on ketchup.

Soup for a Dear Friend.—"Come back to Erin."

A prodigal son writes from Omaha: "I have to write you this letter secretly for the dozen, for I is on many prices, and the smallest hole in it is the size I put my head through."

THE RICHMOND CALAMITY—INTERIOR OF HALL OF DELEGATES—GETTING OUT THE DEAD AND WOUNDED.
FROM A SKETCH BY W. L. SHEPPARD.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]



THE RICHMOND CALAMITY—REMOVING THE DEAD AND WOUNDED FROM THE CAPITOL.—FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BY E. AND H. T. ANTHONY, 501 BROADWAY, N. Y.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE SWALLOWS.

WITH rapid shoot of purple wings,
Like crescent arrow-heads, they fly,
And cut the soft blue deeps as if
To them belonged the endless sky.

Now high and soaring near the dome
That spreads in azure down to earth;
Now low along the river wide
That mirrors all the Summer's mirth;

Now skimming over meadows rich
With waving crowds of golden flowers;
Now stooping close, a moment's rest,
On lichened rail in orchard bowers.

Then up and swift again they hunt
Through fragrance of the air and light,
Where blest space and yielding breath
Stretch wide around their utmost flight.

O who can e'er such gladness know
As that which fills the swallow's breast,
When all the land in morning lies,
And skies are new the hasty dressed!

Or who with such a reckless dive
The sea immense of Heaven would dare,
And such rich fleeting wine to taste
The glorious freedom of the air!

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book I.

CHAPTER XIII.

ZILLAH'S RESOLUTION.

"MORTIER!" cried Hugh Lockwood, coming hastily into the little parlor in Cowper Street, and taking his mother in his arms, "good news, mother! Let me see your dear face a little brighter than it has been for this long time. There is good news for you, little mother, do you hear?"

"Good news for me? That can only mean good news for you, my son!" replied Zillah, unconsciously overlooking all her widowed life in the sentence.

"Good? good for me, good for you, good for Maud. Darling Maud! Kiss me, mother."

Then he told her that Mr. Frost had that day informed him by letter that the sum of money borrowed from his late father—to the note was worded—with interest on the capital for nearly the last twenty-five years, was lying at his disposal at Mr. Lovegrove's office in Bedford Square, and that on the personal application it would be handed over to him.

"Why, mother, it is more than I hoped to get out of the five. Five per cent. for twenty-five years! It will more than double the original sum!"

"Oh, thank God! My Hugh, my Hugh, what a weight of oppression is taken from off my heart!" exclaimed his mother. "Very far from will he has done, neither. Five per cent. on the sum every year is the very least that could pretend to approach fair dealing—and, in fact, nothing can make the conduct out to be less. But he has done better than I expected; and I am very glad and thankful, and mean to think of nothing but the bright side of things, I assure you."

When Hugh went to receive his money he perceived that the brass plate on the outer door, which usually stood open during office hours, had been removed, and a man was painting out the black letters on a drab ground on the doorpost, which formed the words, "Messrs. Frost and Lovegrove, Solicitors." Hugh was shown into Mr. Lovegrove's office, and received by that gentleman in person.

"The last time we met in this office, Mr. Lockwood," said the lawyer, "your errand here was to receive from me a fortune. You come now to receive—well, not a fortune, perhaps, but a sum of money that is not to be sneezed at;" and he looked upon as affording a very pretty start in life. I am glad of it, and wish you every success."

"Thank you heartily."

"You know, I dare say,—you have Mr. Frost's acknowledgment for the money lent by your father, Mr. Lockwood?"

Hugh took from his pocket-book a yellow bit of paper writ some words in Sidney Frost's bold clear writing and said, "At one corner of my paper there was a green stain, and near it the impression of a thumb in red paint.

"Here it is, Mr. Lovegrove. My poor father must have been at work in his studio when that paper was written. It is marked with the mark of his calling."

"H'm!" said Mr. Lovegrove, examining the paper gravely. "A sadly informal document. His! well, here is the money, Mr. Lockwood. Will you be kind enough to count the notes in the presence of my clerk? Just step here for a moment, Mr. Burgess, Mr. Burgess."

"It is all quite right, Sir," said Hugh, when this had been done. "Then, when the clerk left the room, he said, with a slight hesitation, "I don't know how intimate your knowledge of Mr. Frost's private affairs may have been, but I can not help entertaining an idea that I owe the recovery of this money mainly to your influence, Mr. Lovegrove."

"As to my knowledge of the state of Mr. Frost's private fortune, it is now, I may say, extremely intimate. But I have only quite recently learned the existence of this debt to you. And—Mr. Lockwood, I make no excuses for my partner. But I—I will confess to you that it hurts me to hear any one hard upon him. And there were certain palliations—certain palliations. His domestic circumstances were unfortunate. Upon my word, when I see the quantity of mischief that women are capable of causing, I feel thankful, positively most truly thankful, that they don't exercise their power more ruthlessly than they do!"

Hugh smiled. "You have had a happy experience of the sex yourself, Sir," said he.

"Why, yes. My mother was an excellent woman, and my wife is an excellent woman, and my girls are excellent, sound-hearted girls as ever his any where, thank God! And I most firmly believe, Mr. Lockwood, that the young lady whom you are about to marry is an ornament to her sex. You love her and respect her very much now, I have not the least doubt. That was my word for it, that you will love her and respect her more when she has been your wife some dozen years. Of course, that is utterly impossible! Yes, yes, I know. I suppose you will be married very soon now?"

"At as soon as possible!" said Hugh, with much energy. "Oh, by-the-by, Mr. Lovegrove, I see they are painting out the name of Frost on the door-post. Are you going to make any change in the style and title of it?"

"Yes; a considerable change." Mr. Frost retires from the business altogether—he deeds were signed this morning—and I shall be henceforth be known as Lovegrove and Lovegrove."

"All success to it under its new name, say I. But I had not heard that this was in contemplation."

Mr. Lovegrove proceeded to narrate as briefly as might be the misfortunes that had, as he said, determined Mr. Frost to give up business—so much, that is, of his misfortunes as must inevitably become matter of public notoriety—he spared his old partner as much as possible in the narrative. But he did not for many months past had partner to whom indeed he was inclined to attribute every thing that had gone to even to the very worst—to whom he left the Parthenope Embellishment Company, which had become matter of public notoriety within the last week.

Hugh was much shocked. And his good opinion of Mr. Lovegrove was greatly enhanced by the feeling he evinced for his old friend.

"He is really a most superior man, Mr. Lockwood. I don't know a more superior man than Sidney Frost is—or was—was, alas! He is a weak sort, poor, but wonderfully clever. He is want to send him off to Cannes or Nice, or some of those places for the winter. He has given up his house in Bayswater, and has taken apartments—they have not behaved badly. They understood in a man whose door to do business—and I say any thing like that woman—— However, it is unavailing to dilate upon that. But when all is said, there will be a small—a very small—a remaining, which will suffice to maintain Frost in comfort as one of those unfortunate beings, the bless my soul, white a superior man he was when I first knew him!"

Mr. Lovegrove did not say that the "small remnant" was to come entirely out of his own pocket, and Hugh was much amused at the mysterious winges of conscience when he looked at his wife and children.

"I will, Mr. Lovegrove, I hope that one of the first transactions of the new firm will be to draw up my marriage settlement. And I shall ask you to continue to look after Maud's interests. Perhaps Captain Sheardown will be the other trustee."

"I shall be delighted. You intend to have Miss Dunwoodie a little bit of money settled entirely on herself?"

"To be sure I do! I won't detain you any longer. Your time is precious, I am aware; you can guess in which direction my steps are to be bent! I want to see Maud's face flush and brighten when I tell her my news. Good-by."

Maud's face did flush and brighten in a manner which may be supposed to have been satisfactory to her lover. But it also expressed much more for Mr. Frost when she heard his story.

Hugh merely informed her that Mr. Frost had at length paid an old debt that had been due to Hugh's father; and Maud, who had never known but slender hopes of ever receiving the money, was already much too sorry for poor Frost about it to let her, lest she might suffer disappointment.

"Oh, poor, poor man! How dreadful to be deserted by his own wife! How she must repent in all the world he might have looked up to for comfort and sympathy in his troubles. I have been there. She is very beautiful woman. But oh how cruel and heartless she must be!"

"Let it be enough for her that I suffer your affections to be engrossed by millinery, and to keep your business on the first place in your heart, Mrs. Hugh Lockwood."

The Sheardowns were scarcely less delighted than Hugh himself. They were pressed to think the wedding should take place from Lowther Arcade.

"But ought I not—don't you think—what will Uncle Charles say?" Maud asked, hesitating.

"Do you think, my dearest, that your guardian would be if you are not married from his roof?"

"I—I'm afraid so," said Maud.

"Well, I will write and ask him permission to let it be from Lowther," said the captain.

"Perhaps," said Mrs. Sheardown, thoughtfully, "it would be best, after all, for Maud to be married in London, if she will, and go down to Shipley after the ceremony. Would you consent to that, Maudie?"

Maud thought she would consent to that.

If all had gone differently, she would have liked to be married in the ancient village church that also had worshiped in from childhood. But now there would be too many painful associations connected with St. Gildas! She would miss Veronica's face beaming out from its accustomed corner; she would miss Veronica's voice in the bridal hymn of the choir. It would call up in the vicar's mind all that was sad and terrible in his daughter's fate. No: it would be better to be married in town. And, after all, it mattered very little to herself. Hugh would be there. Hugh would take care of her. Hugh would love her. Could any thing matter very much as long as she had Hugh? Mrs. Sheardown took an opportunity of drawing Hugh aside and explaining to him her reasons for thinking that the vicar of Shipley-on-the-Wold would be rather relieved than offended by getting rid of the spectacle of his ward's wedding. Meanwhile Maud was much in the dark. A letter had to be written to the architect whose business Hugh intended to purchase. A friend in the neighborhood of Bedford Square was to be commissioned to look out for a house for the young couple. The house must have a garden, at any rate, and, if possible, a little stable for a pony and pony-carriage, which Hugh intended to purchase for the use of his wife. Though this latter desideratum, he observed smilingly, he could build for himself, should need arise, if there must be a cottage found in the neighborhood for Mrs. Lockwood.

But when he spoke of this to his mother, she met him with a protest that he would leave that part of his arrangements which concerned her in entire peace for a time.

"But, mother darling, why? Surely you mean to live near us, don't you?"

"Perhaps I may, Hugh. I don't ask me any more at present. I may have something to tell you by-and-by. I may need not look uneasy. It is nothing terrible. I will not deceive you—again."

At the end of a fortnight, and when the day fixed for the wedding was near at hand, Zillah received another letter—confidence she had announced to her son.

"Hugh," said she, "I have become a Roman Catholic."

"A Roman Catholic! Mother!"

"I am ready now to find peace and forgiveness in the bosom of the Church. I shall be at least be able to make some expiation, and to pray for those I have wronged. Rome does not reject the humble pious efforts after goodness of the faithful, as the more Calvinistic creed does. I always, when I was a girl in Paris, had a great admiration for the good religieuses, and was attracted by them. The seed of their blessed example has borne fruit in my soul. The price of my conversion which you refuse to accept for me, will suffice to gain me admission into a poor order whose members devote themselves to the sick poor. On the score of your marriage I shall assume a member—an unworthy and humble member—of a pious sisterhood in Belgium. The Church has been enlightening my dark mind with the comfortable truths of religion, will not be a bar to the arrangements for me. I shall pray fervently for you, my son, and for your sweet young wife. And all I ask of you, Hugh, is to make no one promise. I will prove that your heart drawn toward the ancient and holy Mother Church will not resist the impulse. It may be that it comes from Heaven, in answer to the petitions of the earthly mother who bore you."

Her could not be impudence or entreaties shake Zillah's determination. Hugh was greatly distressed by it. But wise, kind Lady Nell Shenstone consoled and comforted him.

"My dear Hugh," she said, "your mother will be happier in following this life than in any other which you could give her. I do not know Mrs. Lockwood's history; but she gives me the idea of a woman who has suffered much, and who is continually tormented by the recollection of some sin, or supposed sin the whole contents of one at a draught. Mr. Plew laid down his knife and fork, aghast.

"Take care, Veronica! That is a dangerous experiment! You have eaten no food, I'll be sworn, since dinner. Are you sure the pie but little at dinner? Am I not right?"

"Quite right. I never eat now. I hate eating."

"Good God!"

"Well—not quite never! Don't look so. You make me laugh, in spite of every thing, to see your horror-stricken face!"

But Mr. Plew showed no symptom of joining in the laugh. Timid and self-distrustful in most things—on his own ground, in matters pertaining to his profession, he could be strong and decided and resolute enough. What had contributed to make him so had been that his practice lay hitherto among educated persons who could in some measure be trusted to understand his scientific maladies, nor among idle, fanciful, imaginary invalids, who took to being "delicate" as a way of amusement, and found life uninteresting until they could succeed in persuading themselves that they ran some risk of losing it: but among the lowest ranks of the ignorant poor, who had to be cured in spite of themselves.

"You don't know what you are doing," said Mr. Plew, gravely; and, without the least ceremony, he took the flask away from the neighborhood of Veronica's hand, and placed it near his own.

"Ha, mio povero Plew," she said, nodding her head at him, "you little know! This will have no effect upon me. I am past it."

"What do you mean, Veronica?" he said, sharply and angrily. "If you are thinking, the joke is a very bad one. I think you are talking without rightly weighing the meaning of what you say."

"Ah, per Bacco, it is likely enough. I often do! But, Plew, you don't care—you will not drink! Won't you try this wine? It isn't bad."

"What is it? I am not used to these costly vintages. I think I never tasted that kind of wine in my life before."

"That which I poured out is sparkling Moselle. The other is Hock. Which are you for?"

"Well—a little of this, I think," said Mr. Plew, filling a small wine-glass full of Hock.

"Oh, mamma, don't pour that thick into that thimble! The bigger glass—the green glass—is meant for the Hock!"

"Thank you, this will do," said Mr. Plew, sipping the wine gravely. "That effervescent stuff I should take to be very heating and unwholesome."

Veronica leaned back on her sofa cushions and looked at him. He was still, commonly looking, ill dressed, unpolished. His boots were thick and clumsy, his hands coarse and ungloved. She saw all this as keenly as he had ever seen it. But she saw also that he was good and generous and devoted. Without knowing it being, she told herself, who was true to her; the only one!

"I am so thankful you are come!" she exclaimed. The words broke from her almost involuntarily. Mr. Plew pushed his wine-glass aside. In spite of what he had said, he had scarcely touched the food they had set before him. Then he drew his chair so as to front her face to face, and with his knees a little apart, his body leaning forward, his elbows resting on his knees, and his hands loosely clasped together. It was a familiar attitude of his. Veronica had seen him sitting thus a hundred times in the room to see, in listening to her father, and looking at herself.

"Now," said he, "let us talk seriously."

"You must not oppose my wish! You must not! I tell you I can not go on living this life. I must get back to Cesare. Io mi ne vo' da Cesare! Why should he? He has the money!"

As he now saw her, looking at her intently and marking her face, her voice, her attitude, he perceived that she was greatly and deplorably changed. It cut him to the heart to see it.

Before we speak of that, Veronica, I had best tell you something which I have it in charge to tell you."

"Io charge to tell me? It is not about yourself, then? An unreasonable suspicion flashed through her mind that he was going to tell her he was married—or betrothed. She might have unlikely his very presence there rendered such a suspicion: she forgot his mother's recent death. She only thought, "I shall lose him! He will slip through my fingers!"

Poor, wearied, fevered, clinging fingers, grasping with desperate selfishness at the kind true hand which offered the only touch of sympathy, the only chance of safety that remained to her!

"No: it is not about myself. It is news that you will, I am afraid, be vexed to hear. Your father—is married."

"Married!"

"I feared it would be disagreeable to you."

"Married! But when? Whom has he married?"

"He was married the day before yesterday to Farmer Meggitt's youngest daughter."

"Cissy Meggitt! Cissy Meggitt! It is impossible! Why, in the first place, Cissy is a child."

"She is very young, certainly, for the vicar. But she is not exactly a child. She is turned seventeen."

"My father married to Cissy Meggitt!"

Veronica repeated the words as though they were unintelligible to her.

"You must not let it affect you too much. I am sorry for it, I confess. But you must hope for the best."

She remained silent and thoughtful for a few minutes, idly plucking at the lace around her sleeve.

"No," she said, at length. "I need not be afflicted. I don't know that it makes very much difference. In any case my father would not have been likely to do much to help me."

"Perhaps not. But I was not contemplating the event from that point of view. I was thinking, when I said I was sorry—of him," answered Mr. Plew, gently.

"Ah, yes—very true—of him. I suppose he will—it will be a bad thing for papa."

Mr. Plew had dreaded an explosion of wrath and mortification on Veronica's part when she should learn her father's marriage. He knew her pride, her sense of family dignity, and her father's superiority by birth and breeding to most of those with whom he was brought into contact at Shipley. Now that Shipley he vicar's marriage was looked upon as a terrible mésalliance. Every body was offended and disgusted: the gentry, that the vicar should have stooped so low; the farmers, that Cissy Meggitt should have been raised so high. Mrs. Scott made it a text for justifying her secession from orthodoxy, and for proclaiming the Pope Antichrist and all the Establishment. The men wondered what could have bewitched rosy-cheeked Cissy Meggitt, a mere child, as regarded her years and her place in the county, to go and tie herself up to an old man like that, and to her poor as a mate into the bargain. The women pitied the vicar, that they did. He was a fool, well and good, that they didn't grainsay. But Mrs. Meggitt's artfulness and cunning passed every thing. She'd wheedled the vicar till he didn't know which end of him was uppermost. They couldn't blame him, couldn't never come to good, having a governess, and a daughter like that to deal with. And now you saw, didn't you? If the height ('a mysterious and oft-recurring charge of Mrs. Meggitt had been unbearable before, what could you suppose it'd be now? Though what there was to be so high, they couldn't tell. She wasn't a lady, and wouldn't never be made into one, not if she married a dozen vicars.

Mr. Plew had been sent for by the vicar on the evening before the wedding, and had had a long and painful interview. The vicar, overwhelmed and tossed between haughty declamations that he owed an account of his conduct to no man, and that he only believed the step he was taking because he entirely for his happiness, and peevish lamentations over the unkindness of his children, who had left his home desolate and disgraced, and thus driven him to find sympathy and solace where he could be found, he could.

"Have you informed Ve— the Princess Barbelli," he had asked.

"Informed her! No, Sir, I have not informed her. I am not bound to ask my daughter's permission to what step I may take. I have no reason to confidence from me—none whatever!"

But presently Mr. Plew found the vicar very much desired that Mr. Plew should take upon himself the task of communicating the news to Veronica.

"I promised to wife to you," said Mr. Plew, finishing the sentence. Mr. Brown, of Shipley Rag, promised to look after my patients for a day or two. Shall—have—the—kindness—to—do—so?"

"Then," said Veronica, raising her eyes, and coming out of a black reverie in which Mr. Plew's words had had no meaning for her consciousness, "I am quite alone in the world now?"

"Don't say that! Don't say that, Veronica! Your husband—"

"My husband!"

The accent with which she uttered the words was so bitterly speaking in its utter hopeless bitterness, that Mr. Plew was startled and alarmed. What could be oppose to that despair? But he presently spoke the best words he could find.

"Yes, Veronica, your husband! If I cared less for you I should not have the courage to oppose you. But I must do it. I must plead with to consider well that your husband is your natural friend and protector. He is the natural link between you and him. It can not be that reconciliation between you is hopeless. You are both young. The love you—"

She burst out into a storm of passionate tears.

"Oh, what shall I do? what shall I do? No one will believe me! no one will understand! Did you read my letter? Did you read it? Did you? it? Gentle? yes, he is very gentle! Oh, very, very gentle! As velvet-footed as a tiger-cat! Would you like to see the mark of his claws?"

With a sudden fierce movement she tore open the long lace sleeve that she wore, and bared her arm to the shoulder. There were on the white, tender flesh two livid marks made by the brutal pressure of a clasping hand.

"Good God! you did not say—you did not tell me that he struck you!"

Mr. Plew's white face grew livid, and then turned crimson. He clenched his hand involuntarily.

"Oh, no! He did not strike me—he merely held me down in my chair with gentle violence, endeavoring to make me promise to remain a prisoner in the room to invite, and who had openly insulted me. I cried out with the pain, but I would not promise. I said he might kill me."

"Oh, my good Heavens, this is dreadful!"

"I should have come out, and up to the top, and perhaps I might have given way, for he hurt me, and I dread pain, I never could bear pain—and—and I am afraid of him. Oh, you don't know what deadly fear I am in sometimes! But a servant came into the room by chance, and I ran away and locked myself up.

"But—but he was sorry—he asked your pardon—he was almost crying! Oh, the fellow must be!" cried Mr. Plew, suddenly breaking down in his efforts to preach patience to Veronica.

"When I showed him the marks next day, he said I had provoked him by my obstinacy, and that if I had had an English husband he would have beaten me within an inch of my life for my disobedience."

Mr. Plew got up and walked about the room, wiping his hot forehead with his handkerchief.

Veronica came back to the sofa. His eyes were full of tears. He took her hand in one of his, and placed his other hand on her head.

"Poor child!" he said. "Poor, unhappy child! Veronica, I would lay down my life to help you!"

As he so stood looking at her with a tender compassion that was almost sublime in its purity from any alloy of self, the door was opened quickly and quietly, and Cesare de' Barletti stood in the room.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

BUSSIAN ROCK, the most dangerous obstruction in the harbor of San Francisco, was blown up on the 24th of April. The rock was submerged six feet below the surface at low tide, and has proved a great annoyance and danger to shipping. The difficulties to be encountered in an attempt to remove this huge mass were immense. Nevertheless, the work was undertaken about four years ago, with the utmost confidence of success. After laborious preliminary preparations of excavation in the rock commenced, and continued until a cavity was completed, large enough to by 50 feet. It is estimated that about 40,000 cubic feet of stone were removed in making it. Into this cavity about twenty-two tons of powder were placed, with the most perfect arrangements for expending the charge. It had been supposed by some that the explosion of such a quantity of powder, confined in the manner described, would produce terrifically grand. Between fifty and sixty thousand persons assembled to witness it; but the explosion was scarcely perceptible in the city: only a deep thud accompanied the blast. The water for, however, in a few minutes, was hundred feet in height, was thrown to a height of about one hundred feet, and the coarse being filled with rocks and stones. The success of this bold enterprise must certainly encourage engineers to the most expeditious measures to be taken in removing the obstructions at Hell Gate.

Last week a child of two years, while playing in front of a house with other children, ventured on the Harlem road track, and was run over, passing swiftly, knocked him down and passed over his body. Death ensued in a few minutes. This is by no means an uncommon incident—every few weeks some child is killed or injured by cars in the city. The fact calls for an increase of care on the part of car-drivers, and also on the part of parents who allow children of tender age to play in the streets.

The Hudson Amateur Rowing Association, an organization comprising the principal rowing clubs of the Hudson river, with the Atlantic, Jersey City, Hoboken, and Albany, as well as clubs of other localities on the Hudson River, have issued a challenge to the London Rowing Club to invite a six-oared crew to visit this city, and compete in a six-oared shell race with a crew composed of members of that association; the race to take place about the first day of October next. The course is to be three miles, with a turn, from buoy to buoy, boat and return, to be rowed over the Association course on the Hudson River, and it is to be understood with either crew to carry or dispense with a coxswain.

The Rothschilds of Paris have recently been robbed of about half a million of dollars by an employé named Tassilo. His position was that of manager of the banking department, and in that capacity he purchased immense quantities of bonds which were offered for sale. The discovery of his frauds was accidentally made, in consequence of the forwarding to a foreign bank of two English sovereigns, for which a customer had paid in gold. Tassilo, who had a fellow to reappear at the bank, his till and checks were searched, and it was discovered that nearly all the money received on the 10,000 francs were there. The police were immediately informed, and they succeeded in arresting Tassilo. A large part of the lost money was found among his effects, and also some correspondence which indicated that a certain physician was implicated with him in the frauds.

The proper names Mr. Dickens introduces into his novels are generally characteristic. Dickens-like, there is neither common nor pretty: Jasper and Tope are rare names; Rev. Septimus Crisparkle is odd enough: Mr. Grewgious, Mr. Tartar, Miss Twinkleton and Mrs. Tisher, will not be likely to be confounded with the great families of Smith and Jones.

The New York impressario, Mr. Max Maretzek, has gone to Vienna, to secure, so report says, the celebrated Strauss, with his band.

Not long ago the prima donna Nilsson witnessed a fatal accident in the streets of Paris, by which a young man on a velocipede was run down by a carriage and killed. The circumstance of her nervous terror and anxiety she lost her voice for a day or two, and the papers in which she had engaged to appear on the evening of the day of the disaster had to be postponed.

It is, or is not, true that in the lunatic asylum on Blackwell's Island there is a large number of sane inmates, who are desirous of friends to secure their emancipation from the hospital? Such an assertion has been made by some persons officially connected with public charities. The matter should be promptly investigated; ascertain if the report is true; and if not true, the public should have the satisfaction of knowing it to be false.

The "oldest inhabitant" of New Jersey, Miss Sallie Jeff, recently died at her residence in her native city of Elizabeth, in the one hundred and fifth year of her age. She was about ten years of age when the Revolutionary struggle broke out, and up to the time of her death remembered this event distinctly. She was fond of telling about her interviews with Washington and Lafayette, and of various incidents connected with the war. Although Miss Jeff kept up her knowledge of the progress of civilization, she had never seen a locomotive or rode in a street car. Indeed, for the last half century she had never left her house.

From Washington comes a curious story, which is told about Colonel Cheney, a California politician, who went to hear the Georgia troupe perform "the Marriage of Figaro." Finding the lower part of the house crowded to suffocation, Cheney, rather than miss the music, went up into the unknown regions, and seated himself in that part of the gallery appropriated to the sons and daughters of Africa. Just as he was becoming engrossed by the sweet concord he felt a light tap on the shoulder, accompanied by "Dis am de colled gallery," from a sable attendant. "S—h! All right," said Cheney, blandly, and again directed his entire attention to the stage, where Paradise was singing like a robin. "But this am de colled gallery," interposed the black tormentor. "All right, I know it. I'll not make a noise, but remain and enjoy the placid Cheney." "But it am not all right. Dis am de colled gallery, and you can't stay here," persisted the attendant; and Cheney had to clamber around and take a back seat among the "white trash" on the other side.

The floral decorations in the Arlington Street Church, on the occasion of the funeral of the late Anson Burlingame, were the most magnificent ever witnessed in Boston. Some idea of its extent may be gained by the statement that the array contained 40,000 violets, 10,000 pinks, 300 dozen roses, 1000 camelias, and 1000 Lilies-of-the-valley.

A Massachusetts lady who has been suffering from an inflamed neck has been told by her physician that it is caused by horrid insects called borers, inhabiting the Boston town drinking of pure chicopee. She has cast the chicopee from her, and has had her head shaved as smooth as a billiard-ball, fearing that the vile insects had taken up their abode in her natural back hair.

We are not responsible for the report which comes from abroad that a young French lady, who was by accident vaccinated from the lymph taken from a Bovaux, has cut her niece, to the delight of her family, given herself up to smoking, fencing, shinnies, and riding, à la cavalier.

The Russian government having admitted women to medical schools and medical practice, a foreign journal gives the following singular origin of this concession:

"Formerly it was found that the Cossacks objected to having attended by male physicians. The consequence it was discovered that they held a superstition that the physician's touch caused disease, and that all remedial agents related to the incantations, charms, &c. The Czar Alexander, who had a Cossack for a wife, and who had a female physician; and the tradition was so strong that when the Czar Nicholas ascended the throne he was importuned for authority to the medical school of St. Petersburg, a few of those were established, so strong was the feeling against their practice among the Cossacks. It was evidently intended to supersede the Cossack, but this seems to have been followed by a larger concession."

About five months ago a man traveling on the New Jersey Railroad found out that his ticket when it was called for by the conductor. He asserted that he had bought one, but could not produce it, neither had he the money to purchase another. The conductor told him he must get off of the car; and though in earnest in what he said, was not so in the act. In the station next reached, no such consideration was shown to the poor man. The train was leaving the little seaside bridge, and though it was dark, he was forced to leave the car or be thrown off by the conductor. Soon steps when he fell through the bridge into the river. Passengers testified that he shouted for help, but the conductor refused to stop the train or even to slow it. Last week his body was found by two fishermen. The conductor at once held a coroner's jury on the body, but it is said that the conductor has fled to parts unknown.

A very good story is told of General Sheridan during the late gathering of the officers of the Army of the Potomac in Philadelphia. Invitations had been extended to the members of the Army of the Cumberland of "Sheridan's Ride" at the Academy of Fine Arts. Most of them soon found that the crowd of visitors before the celebrated picture; but Sheridan himself was not disposed to look at his own picture at all when hundreds of his fellow-countrymen were discussing both the picture and the man. He was very not leave the city without seeing the painting, and therefore went alone and early in the morning to see what Mr. Read's idea of the ride of his life would prove to be. On leaving the hall he stopped for a moment before the door of the painting. The young man in attendance, ever anxious to extend the interest of the picture, and to hear the comments being up from the book in which he was rapidly entering the names of visitors) if he would like to buy one of these pictures. "A capital likeness, Sir, of General Sheridan, I'm told," was the reply. Sheridan waved his hands in the pockets of his riding-coat, and quietly replied that he did not care particularly for a likeness of himself.

"But the horse, Sir," said the young man. "That is what holds the interest. There is not a portrait of him in existence."

"Oh!" said General Sheridan, "I own the horse."

At Oberstein, in Germany, where there are large agate mills and quarries, the refuse is carefully turned to good account by being made into marbles, which are sold, from one shilling per dozen upwards. In Saxony a hard calcareous stone is used, which is first roughly shaped by means of a mallet and then by a hammer. These are thrown by the hundred into a large wooden barrel, which is formed of a horizontally slab of stone, with a number of concentric furrows on its face. A large stone wheel, of the same wood, of the same diameter size, is placed over the small stone and partly resting upon them. This block or log is kept revolving, while water flows upon the stone slab. In about fifteen minutes the stones are taken out, and thrown into a sieve, which finishes, containing only three of these rude mills, will turn out full sixty thousand "marbles" in each week.

In Oregon, Washington Territory, and Alaska, there are 1,000,000 acres of salmon streams. The average certain reasons of the year are literally jammed with these fish. Contracts are frequently made with the Indians to catch and pack a barrel of salmon for $1 50. The effects to export salmon in barrels have not been very successful. Being fat, they do not keep well, and, after a long voyage round the Horn, are not in good enough condition. In order to keep well during a long overland transportation they must be packed in ice. The process by artificial process, and as there are parties ready to freeze the salmon, and the Pacific Railroad will transport, Eastern markets may be furnished with the best fish in the world abundantly

NEW YORK NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN—AT THE HEAD OF THE STAIRCASE.—[See Page 317.]

CONSECRATION OF A JEWISH SYNAGOGUE.

NEW SYNAGOGUE IN LONDON.

On this page we give an illustration of the consecration of the new Central Jewish Synagogue in London, which took place on the 7th of April. The building is a fine specimen of Moresque design, its thoroughly Oriental style being especially exemplified in the interior, with its tiers of columns decorated with Saracenic capitals, supporting the gallery, clear-story, and lofty vaulted roof. The ark, in which are placed the sacred scrolls of the law, is situated at the southeast end of the building, looking toward Jerusalem, and is covered by a heavy curtain, embroidered with gold. Immediately over it are the two tables of stone inscribed with the Ten Commandments; and above them, through a small circular window, shines the "perpetual light," which is never extinguished. The ark rests on a platform of white marble, raised several steps above the floor. The almemar, a large raised pew, where the readers, choristers, and harmonium are placed, stands conspicuously in the centre of the Synagogue, and is richly ornamented with gilt stanchions.

The ceremony chosen by the artist for illustration took place at the beginning of the service—bearing the scrolls of the law under a crimson canopy to their future resting-place in the ark, which was opened to receive them by Sir Moses Montefiore. These scrolls are wound round silver cylinders, decorated at the top with innumerable little bells, and are encased in gold-embroidered covers.

Before their deposition in the ark they were carried seven times round the almemar, the choir meanwhile singing dedicatory psalms. The leading members of the Jewish community were present at the ceremony, among others the ROTHSCHILD family, who contributed liberally toward the construction of the synagogue.

Some of the finest specimens of ecclesiastical architecture in this country are to be found in the religious edifices erected by our fellow-citizens of the Jewish faith, among which the splendid synagogue situated at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Forty-third Street, in this city, built in the Moresque style, is one of the most celebrated. It will have a magnificent rival in the synagogue now in process of erection in Lexington Avenue, and Fifty-fifth Street, as well as by one in this city, for which land has been recently purchased at the corner of Lexington Avenue and Fifty-fifth Street. The latter building will be constructed of freestone, at a cost of from $150,000 to $200,000.

THE ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

Our illustration on page 316 may be taken as a companion picture to that entitled "Varnishing Day," published in our last Number. The Exhibition this spring is, to say the least, interesting. It contains fewer really bad pictures than any one we have had for years back, and gives a very fair impression of the condition of art in America at the present time, as well as encouraging promise for the future.

A SONG OF THE WIND.

SEE went across the autumn woods,
The noted beeches through;
And the rotted leaves clung to her feet,
And to her hair the dew.
"O wind!" she cried, "for the Spring's sake,
And the love beyond the sea,
O south wind! O tender wind!
Oh, blow him back to me."

She went across the winter fields,
The salt tears rising fast,
With her folded palms about her head,
Against the bitter blast.
"O north wind! O winter wind!
Because the sun is gone,
Oh, tell him thou art keen and cold,
And I am all alone."

The wind came over the fair fields,
And the wind came through the woods,
And strange feet crossed the pale spring grass,
And strange eyes saw the buds.
"O love!" he cried, "who called to me,
And I was slow to come;
The wall of the wind is in my heart,
But death is in my home."

GREEK BRIGANDS.

THE recent massacre of a party of travelers by Greek brigands, near Athens, will lend new interest to the following account of the system under which these highwaymen-patriots are conducting. It is taken from a curious pamphlet written last year by a certain Andrew Mousaios, a cavalry lieutenant in the Greek army. He states that after the fall of Constantinople, in 1453, and the subjugation of Greece by the Turks, bands of patriots, particularly from among the tribes known as the Cleptis and the Armatoli, joined together to resist the tyrants, and, retreating to the mountains and fast-holds of nature, there set up a code of laws, and formed a small but independent government in the midst of the conquered country. Gradually, however, these heroes dwindled into robbers; and the warfare against tyranny became a spoiling of the weak. Their code of laws, as at present existing, is a strange mixture of barbarity and chivalry. It contains fifteen clauses, which are as follows:

1. All treachery to be punished by cutting off the extremities of the traitor, as an example to others.

2. On a second offense, the traitor to be killed and exposed.

3. The rich to be captured, and not allowed to depart till they have paid ransom, and sworn not to injure the brigands by a reladon of their adventures to the authorities.

4. The captives, if not ransomed, to be strangled.

5. If the ransom be short of the sum named, lots to be cast whether the captive shall live or live, having one ear cut off to show that the sum was deficient, or shall be killed.

6. Captives once ransomed must, if recaptured, pay a second time.

7. All soldiers to be killed.

8. The bearers of the ransom to be respected, and small money to be given them on their departure.

9. After the ransom is paid, before the captive is released, he is to be kept and entertained some few days, to see what manner of man he is; and before he goes his beard is to be shaved off.

10. All robbers plotting with government to be killed.

11. No one to be admitted into the band as a member who has not previously committed a criminal act.

12. Should a captive escape, his keeper is to be held responsible, and expelled from the band.

13. Never to steal the goats and sheep from the shepherds, but to pay for all taken.

14. To offer gifts at any monastery or hermitage, by way of expiation for sin.

15. Not to be cruel to captives; to go shares in every thing; and never to injure women.

It is the shepherds who support the brigands, and by whose means they are so well hid from the authorities. The shepherds supply them daily with bread, meat, and wine, serve them as guides in times of danger, and it is their children who are educated to be brigands, and who reinforce their ranks. Immense precautions are taken by the robbers against surprises. In the first instance they come down from their strong-holds among the rocks and evergreen olives to the more sheltered country, to retire again in the winter. They always travel by night, proceeding in file through the open country; never taking the narrow passes, for fear of ambushes. The smallest object, the faintest sound, startles them, and down they drop flat on their stomachs till their confidence is renewed. A tree waving in the breeze, or the rustle of dead leaves as they move over them shoulder for fear of noise, is often enough to cause one of these panics. Before starting on any of these journeys, they always appoint a rendezvous in case of separation. Their scouts go in front, driving flocks or cows, and halsted as drovers. Under their shelter follows the main body, peeping cautiously over the cattle to see if an enemy is approaching; and behind come the rear-guard, who, if any thing is amiss, whistle like a night-bird, and the band disperses.

It is said that the crows are the best detectives of the robbers. When the band are camping in a marsh, their clothes, owing to their uncleanly habits, emit so strong a smell, that the crows, imagining it to be carrion, collect in swarms, and hover above them, so that the soldiers are often guided to the spot by seeing the dark cloud in the air.

There is a regular system of treating for the ransom of the captives. A letter is first conveyed by the robbers from the captive to his friends. This generally contains a safe-conduct for the messenger who shall be chosen to go to the robber camp and treat, and a plan marking out certain places he must stop at. He travels by night, on a white horse, and carries a small bell, which he rings at certain convenient and solitary stations, where he is answered by a shrill whistle if all is well. When the whistle is heard he must not go on, and the whole plan is so arranged that the man himself does not know where he is till actually going to, so as to be impossible for the authorities to discover the brigands' haunts thereby. The ransom is delivered to their men him, and conduct him into the presence of the chief. Then a regular bargaining is commenced. The chief names a sum, which the messenger, if he is a man of determination, and represents well the insufficiency of means of captive, can often get reduced. When the bargain is finally struck, the messenger goes back for the money by a different road to that he came by, and returns with the same ceremonies and precautions. The ransom is delivered in the chief in presence of all the band, who light a taper and examine the coins to see if they are good. The captive is then brought forth from his cave or hiding-place, and, with a pistol to his head, is forced to take off his clothes, and put on those of the robber. Then a regular bargaining is commenced. The chief names a sum, which the messenger, if he is a man of determination, and represents well the insufficiency of means of captive, can often get reduced. When the bargain is finally struck, the messenger goes back for the money by a different road to that he came by, and returns with the same ceremonies and precautions. The ransom is delivered to

REMOVAL.

S. W. GERRY & CO. will remove to southeast corner of 3d Ave. and Broadway, 1st of May. Importers and Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Teas, Wines, Cigars, and

CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES,

Formerly 1 & 3 Wall Street. No. 70 Broadway.
Established in 1794. New York.
The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been the special business of this house for years.
Orders from the trade and assortments of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade, Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for in the city every morning, if desired.
Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

Reliance Wringer,

IMPROVED.

Keyed Rolls.
White Rubber Spiral Cogs, Easy Working. Has Curved Clamp. Fits any Tub.
The Best. The Cheapest.
TRY IT.

PROVIDENCE TOOL CO.,
29 Beekman St., N.Y.; PROV., R. I.

REMEDY FOR PIMPLES.

To all who desire it the undersigned will mail (free), on receipt of 6c. stamp, the recipe and full directions for preparing and using a Genuine Vegetable Balm that will immediately remove Pimples, Freckles, Blotches, Tan, Moth Patches, and all eruptions and impurities of the skin, leaving the same clear, with a healthy glow, and the form and features unobscured and developing a growth of hair on bald heads or smooth faces.
The above can be obtained of druggists, or mail, by addressing J. F. W. THURE, Chemist, 113 Broadway, New York.

HARTSHORN'S
PATENT
Shade Rollers.

NO CORDS OR BALANCES USED.

FOR WINDOWS, AWNINGS, CARRIAGES, ETC.

For sale by all upholsterers. The trade are invited to send for circulars and price-lists. Goods filled only through the trade.

STEWART HARTSHORN,
Manufacturer, 62 Centre St., New York.

BOOSEY'S FIFTY-CENT OPERAS fill the place of every other, complete, with pianoforte accompaniments, 48 to 58 pages, 50c cents each—Der Freischutz, Figaro, William Tell, Don Giovanni, Martha, Sonnambula, Puritani, Massiello, Domino Noir, Fidelio, Somnambula, Don Pasquale, Lucrezia Borgia, Barber of Seville, Lucia, Bohemian Girl, Barber of Seville, Crispino, Ballo in Maschera, Two Foscari, Traviata, &c. To be had of all music and book sellers. Catalogues free.
BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Great St. N. Y.
Removed from 651 Broadway.

Fishing in American Waters.

Opening of the Season for Angling and Fish-Farming. To the angler or the fish-culturist Scott's book on "Fishing in American Waters" will prove a real trade means in every thing about angling and breeding fishes.
Sent throughout the United States, postpaid, for $3 50.
HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, N. Y.

FURNITURE of every description, and Hard Wood Dolls Heads, Horse Heads and Wheels, coating for Dolls, of leather, at reasonable prices. LOUIS LEITZ & SON, 27 Spring St., and Manufactory, 521 Broadway, New York.

PSYCHOMANCY, Fascination, or Science of the Soul, as applied to the purposes of life. 400 pp., Cloth. By Herbert Hamilton, M.D. The only book for inquisitive people. It contains complete instructions to acquire this wonderful power over human or animals. Can be obtained by sending 10 cents for postage, and address, S. W. BENEDICT & CO.,
21 South Eighth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

TO USE THE FINE ALPACA.
GOFF'S
BRAID
10 Cts. a Piece.
IN BLACK and COLORS.
Half the price of Braids sold by the yard.
TRADE MARK.

ORIENTAL MOTH POWDER

Preserves Carpets and all woolen goods from moths or other insects. Can also be used as a sachet powder. Sample package sent by mail on receipt of 10 cts. C. B. WOODWORTH & SON, Rochester, N. Y.

BIG PROFITS to Agents on a new Illustrated Book. Send stamp for circulars to
J. B. BURR & CO., Hartford, Conn.

NEW BOOK.—Agents sell 150 per week. Price $2 50. Address L. STEBBINS, Springfield, Mass.

MODEL HOUSES!—Are you going to build? 344 Descriptive circulars of Houses, Villas, &c., sent free. Address Geo. J. COLAY, Architect, Waterbury, Vt.

EVERY BODY READ THIS!

We will Pay Agents $25 a Week and expenses to sell the Greatest, Discoveries of the Age. Address WHEATON, HENRY, & CO., Marshall, Mich.

AGENTS LOOK!—$12 a day made selling our Cheap Wire Clothes Pins. Sample package by mail, 25c. Address, H. L. WORCESTER, Cohoes, N. Y.

SILVER HOOK-MARKS.—New and neat. Six for 25 cts. S. E. ROSE, Tunnewville, N. Y.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.
C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

MADAME FOY'S
COMBINED
Corset, Skirt Support,
AND BUSTLE
Is just the article needed by every lady who consults
HEALTH, COMFORT, and STYLE.
Testimonials in its favor are constantly being received from all parts of the country.
Last Orders wanted in every county of the United States.
HARMON, BALDWIN, & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

A GREAT OFFER!!

HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N.Y., will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Chickering & Sons, at Extremely Low Prices, for cash, during this month, or will take from $5 to $25 month-ly until paid.

ROGERS'
GROUPS OF STATUARY.
These groups, suitable for wedding presents or ornament, will be delivered, with all express charges prepaid, at any part of the United States, on receipt of the price viz., from $10 to $150. Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-List, to
JOHN ROGERS,
Taking the Cuts. 210 Fifth Ave., New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Every machine needs full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., which we have published in a pamphlet-book of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., to cuts. Sent FREE. KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

WANTED—Agents to sell a thoroughly good domestic sewing machine in every town in the Confederation. Exclusive territory given. Business confidential. Agents have only to show the machine and offer it per day. One sold 350 in a small town, another 1000 in a town, another 75 selling on 24 families. Cost of outfit, $3. No danger of imposition. Best of references given. Send for circular. To 100 Agents wanted. Address, LITTLEFIELD & DAME,
Boston, Mass.

STAR-SPANGLED BANNER.—A large and splendid Steel Engraving, Lafayette Visiting Washington at Mount Vernon, 1784. Size of Engraving, 20x24 inches. Sent to Sketches, Poetry, Wit, Humor, ensuite Fun, Non-sense of a spicy kind, and a G. to. ore more readable, dwindling, Humbugs, &c. Only 15 cents a year, and worth a dollar. Specimen copy sent free. Address, Box 2,000, Boston, Mass.

DIABETIC FLOUR.

Prepared Flour of Bran, for making Biscuit for Diabetic and Dyspeptic.
JOHN W. SHEDDEN, Pharmacist,
363 Bowery, Corner 11th St., New York.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.
MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.
Price of Presses, $5, $12, $16; Press and Office, $18, $30, $36. Send for circular to KELSEY & CO.,
15 Spring Lane, Boston, Mass.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE
Co.
FOR FAMILY USE—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits Every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Circular and samples free. Address HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 176 Broadway, N. Y.

$200 per Month guaranteed. Agents wanted in every County to sell the Wilcox & Gibbs Automatic Silent Sewing Machine. Price $18. Sells on sight. Address WILCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO., 658 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED—SAMPLES FREE.—$30 TO $50 per week guaranteed to either sex. Address, Boston, Mass., and as single as flour. Send 6c. for return postage. D. S. JOHNSON, St. Louis, Missouri.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—Providentially my daughter was restored to health by simple means, after suffering several years with a severe lung affection. Will send the prescription free of charge. Address, Mrs. RUTHER F. HOUSEUM, Stockton St., Brooklyn, L. I.

B. W. S., That spicy book, "Tare," free, with 25c. Stamps sent free. B. B. SHAW, Alfred, Me.

WATCH free and $250 a day sure, and no humbug. Address (with 3c. stamp) H. C. BRADLEY, Boston.

$50 A WEEK paid agents in a new business. Address SCRANTON & CO., Scranton, Pa.

STEEL SHIRT COLLAR, superbly enameled white (Display), 30c.; American, Snow White, 81. Mailed on receipt of price. HENRY GUTT, 79 Nassau St.

$250 a Month, with Stencil and Key-Check Outfit. Does a Town's bill to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

$20 A DAY! Business new. For circulars and samples, address J. C. RAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 237 Pearl St., N.Y., furnish Printer's Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Oroide).—These justly celebrated Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and as imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Full-jeweled Patent Levers, $18, equal in appearance and for time to gold ones costing $150. Those at $25 have the finest 18-carat, equal to $250 gold cases. We also have a still extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled patent levers, hunting cases, equal to $300 gold watch. Also, a full-jeweled movement, extra heavy $18. All our watches fully guaranteed by responsible certificate. All our watches are in hunting cases, gent's and ladies' sizes. Chains, Collins Metal, $2 to $8. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.
The Collins Metal is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.
Address C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.
One of the $18 Watches I wore in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

Send for circular, and if you cannot find what you want, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.
C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

The New Books of the Spring

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THE LIFE OF COUNT BISMARCK, Private and Political. With Descriptive Notices of his Ancestry. By Dr. GEORGE HERESER. Translated and Edited, with an Introduction, Explanatory Notes, and Appendices, by KENNETH R. H. MACKENZIE, F.S.A., Scot. 1 vol. 12mo, pp. about 400. Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. JOHN SCUDDER, M.D. Thirty-six Years Missionary in India. By Rev. J. SCUDDER and Rev. S. WELLS WILLIAMS of Dr. Scudder and Wife. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

BAFFLED; or, Michael Brand's Wrong. A Novel. By JESS. BRAMLEY. Author of "Joyce's Temptation," "The Search for the Grail," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS. By An Old Boy. New Edition. With numerous Illustrations by Arthur Hughes. Preliminary Prize Ball. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

STYLE, TASTE, with Illustrations of Character, Conduct, and Personality. By SARTOR SARTORIS. Author of "Counsel and Experiences," "History of the Huguenots," &c. 1 vol. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. Fifth Edition. Revised and Corrected.

BAZAR BOOK OF DECORUM. The Care of the Person, Manners, Etiquette, and Ceremonials. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. Fifth Edition. Revised, $1 00.

DEBENHAM'S VOW. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "Barbara's History," "Half a Million of Money," "My Brother's Wife," &c., &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. History of the American Civil War. By Captain JOHN B. DAVIES, B.A., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of Michigan, &c., &c. In Three Vols. Vol. III. just ready. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00 per vol.

THE BRAVE LITTLE HOLLAND. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, and ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE. By Rev. JOHN M'CLINTOCK, D.D., and JAMES STRONG, S.T.D. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. To be completed in about Twelve Volumes. 8vo, of about One Thousand Pages each. Vols. I., II., and III., comprising A to G, are now ready, and the remaining Volumes are in progress. Price, per Volume, Cloth, $4 00; Leather, $5 00; Half Morocco, $5 00.

THE UNSEEN WORLD, and Other Stories. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

TRAVELS AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By JAMES GREEN, M.A. Professor of Natural History in Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia. With a New Map of Equatorial America and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00. Fifth Edition.

JOURNAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO THE EAST. Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Constantinople, Athens, Greece, &c., in the Suite of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By the Hon. ARTHUR GRIMBLE. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

GARIBALDI'S NOVEL. The Rule of the Monk; or, Rome in the Nineteenth Century. By General GARIBALDI. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numerous Illustrations and a New Characteristic Portrait. New Edition. Now Thousand. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

MISS MITFORD'S LIFE AND LETTERS. The Life of Mary Russell Mitford, Authoress of "Our Village," &c. Told by Herself in Letters to Her Friends. With Additional Letters from Her Literary Contemporaries. Edited by Rev. A. G. L'ESTRANGE. 3 Vols., 12mo, Cloth, $5 00.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY. A Novel. By Mrs. A. C. KINSEY, Author of "Gordenhaust." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HAND-BOOK OF THE SULPHUR-CURE, as applicable to the Vine Disease in America, and Diseases of Animals other than Cattle. By Dr. C. IMMISCH. Author of "Three Seasons in European Vineyards." 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

UNDER FOOT. A Novel. By ALTON CLYDE, Author of "Maggie Lynne." Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WILD SPORTS OF THE WORLD: a Book of Natural History and Adventure. By JAMES GREENWOOD, Author of "The Adventures of Reuben Davidger," "The True History of a Little Ragamuffin," "The Seven Curses of London," &c. With 147 Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents; Cloth, $1 25.

HIRELL. A Novel. By the Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," "Lizzie Lee," "Married to the Wheel," "Martin Pole," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Due attention is also given to topics of especial interest to women. The best writers in the country are constantly engaged in the department of Fiction, and the Publishers are pledged to spare no pains in placing before all the large circle of America, European, and the East for prompt and valuable contributions.
As a Literary Journal, HARPER'S WEEKLY is recognized as the most entirely independent weekly which ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a place in its profession.
The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY consists of Leading Articles upon current topics; Literary Gossip; Notices of New Books; Social Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Miscellaneous Matters.
In No. 91, for November 28, was commenced the new story "MAN AND WIFE," by WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Armadale," and "The Moonstone." Subscribers receiving $4 00 for each single subscription will be furnished with the WEEKLY from the commencement of the story to the close of 1870.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for A Year's Enjoyment.

Harper's Bazar.

A REPOSITORY OF

FASHION, PLEASURE, AND INSTRUCTION.

HARPER'S BAZAR has gained a success the most rapid and unprecedented ever known in periodical literature, and is recognized as the best and most attractive family paper now published. Its articles are original, and are written expressly for it. Without a rival in this country, special arrangement, involving great expense, with the publishers of the Berlin Jour-nal des Modes, the journal of fashion in Europe—its fashion-plates are published simultaneously with their issue in that city.
Every number of HARPER'S BAZAR is every-where devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter—Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, Travels, &c. The Editorial notices are always spicy, and cover every thing of interest. The Fashion Plates and Letters will be found to be permanently secure for the journal the victory which it has won in its early days, and which is well deserved.

In the Number for April 16 was commenced "The Prince of Wales's Visit to India," by WILLIAM HOWARD RUSSELL, the Author of "Cod and Cocoa," "The Dodge Club," &c., profusely illustrated.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.
The Best Monthly Periodical out in this country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

The May Number completes the Fortieth Vol. of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. Its success hitherto—unrivaled by that of any similar monthly periodical published in America—has been due to the popular character and variety of its contents, and to the enterprise with which it is securing for its pages, at any cost, the best literary contributions that can be had. Its numerous writers in its profusely-illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration—its short stories, novelettes, and the popular treatment of its papers upon scientific subjects, upon Literature, Biography, and the Fine Arts, have made it the favorite monthly visitor and journal of the special Editorial Departments—to which recently a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Obituary Record. The elements upon which the past success of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be its leading characteristics; and the Publishers are confident that with the increased attention to the wants of the reading public they will be able to enhance even its present popularity.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred more pages of reading matter than any periodical issued in the English language. Thus the ample space of the Magazine is given to the publication of many articles of all the topics usually found in periodicals.
The Publishers feel themselves warranted in asking the continuance for the future of the patronage of the favor which has been accorded to their enterprise in the past.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE, 24 cents a year; the WEEKLY, 52 cents a year; the BAZAR, 52 cents a year. The Postage must be paid by, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 96 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions will commence with any Number.
When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is to begin with the Number next after the receipt of his order.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE subscribers will be charged, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to return the numbers received.
In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $63—inside matter, or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—Inside Page Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A DANGEROUS GAME.

AN OLD FABLE WITH A MODERN APPLICATION.

A Bear, climbing over a fence to a place where Bees were kept, began to plunder their hives and rob them of their honey. But the Bees, to revenge the injury, attacked him in a whole swarm together; and, though they were unable to pierce his rugged hide, yet, with their little stings, they so annoyed his eyes and nostrils, that, unable to endure the smarting pain, with impatience he tore the skin over his ears with his own claws, and suffered ample punishment for the injury he did the Bees in breaking open their waxen cells. —ÆSOP.

One Million Acres of Choice Iowa Lands

FOR SALE, at $3 per acre and upward for cash, or on credit by the Iowa Railroad Land Co. Railroads shortly built through the Lands, and on all sides. Great inducements to settlers. Send for our free Pamphlet. It gives price, terms, location; tells what should come first, what they should bring, what it will cost; gives plans and elevations of 18 different styles of rough-and-ready houses, which the Company furnish at from $250 to $4000, ready to set up. Maps sent if desired. Address

W. W. WALKER, Vice-President, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

SMITH'S AMERICAN ORGANS,

FOR THE

Services of Chapels and Lodges, as well as for Home Recreation.

A Thorough Comparison Invited.

Never to rest satisfied with mediocre success has been the motto of this house. And with every year's experience they expect not only to maintain their present position, but to produce instruments of greater and more varied power, thus anticipating the increasing demands of the most cultivated taste.

Instruments with Pedal-Bass and Double Manuals, for Organ Students.

Also, a variety of

ELEGANT PARLOR INSTRUMENTS.

An Illustrated Circular, containing full descriptions and prices, will be sent postpaid, on application.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH, Boston, Mass.

Woodward's National Architect.

1000 Working Drawings, TWELVE DOLLARS, Postpaid.

GEO. E. WOODWARD, Publisher, 191 Broadway, N. Y.

Illustrated Priced List of all books on Architecture mailed free.

Ladies Desire what Men Admire.

And this little thing is beauty. What do we say is beautiful? A transparent complexion and a luxuriant head of hair. What will produce these? Hagan's Magnolia Balm will make any lady of thirty appear but twenty; and Lyon's Katharion will keep every hair in its place, and make it grow like the April grass. It prevents the hair from turning gray, eradicates Dandruff, and is the finest Hair Dressing in the world, and at only half ordinary cost. If you want to get rid of Sallowness, Pimples, Ring-marks, Moth Patches, &c., don't forget the Magnolia Balm, ladies.

BLUNT & CO., 179 Water St., N. Y.

SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS. First Quality only. At Very Low Prices. PRICE-LIST SENT FREE.

THE PARLOR AIR TARGET PISTOL,

Boody's Pet, Jan 1, 1866.

No dirt, dust, nor danger; very compressed air. No cost for ammunition. Shoots with great force, and is safe to be used in any room. Great ability to fifty feet, where rats an any pistol. A great favorite with ladies and gentlemen for practice and amusement. Price $5 00. Sent by mail on receipt of price and $1 50 for postage, or by express, C. O. D., and charges. AGENTS WANTED. P. C. GODFREY, 179 Nassau St., Room 4, New York.

PRANG'S CHROMOS.

WEEKLY BULLETIN.—"FOUR SEASONS," by J. M. HART. For sale in all Art Stores throughout the world.

CLOVERINE

Maintains its pre-eminence on the Ladies' Toilet Tables, over all other Cleansers, for removing DIRT and GREASE from Gloves, Silks, Satins, Velvets, &c. In bottles, at 18 and 25 cents.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS

20,589

Advertisements (Gun's Index to), for Next of Kin, Chancery Heirs, Legatees, and cases of Unclaimed Money, since 1828. Price 60 cents.

JOHN HOOPER & CO., 41 Park Row, New York.

Brewster & Broome St
Offer at their Warerooms
5th Avenue Cor of 42d St
Elegant Carriages & Road Wagons
In the newest Designs
and of the most perfect construction
exclusively the production of their
Broome St Factory
and in all respects equal to the vehicles
built to the order of their most valued
Customers. Sole manufacturers of the
"Brewster Wagon."

BISHOP & REIN,

JEWELERS,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel, NEW YORK.

45,000

Now in Use! Geo. A. Prince & Co.'s ORGANS and MELODEONS will be delivered in any part of the United States reached by Express (where they have no Agent), free of charge, on receipt of list price.

Send for Price-Lists and Circulars.

Address GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Buffalo, N. Y., or GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Chicago, Ill.

PATENTS! INVENTORS who wish to take out Letters Patent are advised to counsel with MUNN & CO., Editors of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, who have prosecuted claims before the Patent Office for Twenty-three Years. Their American and European Patent Agency is the most extensive in the world. Charges less than any other reliable agency. A pamphlet, containing full directions for obtaining Patents, is sent gratis. Address MUNN & CO., 37 Park Row, N. Y.

FISHERMEN!

TWINES and NETTING,

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS,

127 Send for Price-List. Baltimore, Md.

$20 A DAY to MALE and FEMALE Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE sold in the United States for less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. GEYER'S FAIR. Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

JANES & KIRTLAND, 79 BEADE ST., New York.

FOUNTAINS, VASES, SETTEES, &c., for Gardens and Lawns. Send for a Catalogue.

Waltham Watches,

IN 3-OZ. CASES,

For Merchants, Clerks, and Professional Men.

Waltham Watches,

IN 3-OZ. CASES,

For Farmers, Carpenters, and other Mechanics.

Waltham Watches,

IN 4-OZ. CASES,

For Mariners, Soldiers, and Expressmen.

Waltham Watches,

IN 5-OZ. CASES,

For Conductors, Engineers, and Baggagemen.

Waltham Watches,

IN 6-OZ. CASES,

For Miners, Lumbermen, and Stage Drivers.

Waltham Watches,

IN 7-OZ. CASES,

For all who wish something very substantial.

All the above are described in our Price-List. Write for it as follows:

Messrs. HOWARD & CO., No. 785 Broadway, N.Y.: Please send me your illustrated Price-List of WALTHAM WATCHES, as per advertisement in Harper's Weekly.

SIGN NAME AND ADDRESS IN FULL.

And you will receive it, postpaid, by return mail. It gives all the information you desire, and explains our plan of sending Watches by Express without any risk to the purchaser.

HOWARD & CO.,

785 Broadway, New York,

(Formerly of No. 619 Broadway).

THE BLEES PATENT

NOISELESS, LINK-MOTION, LOCK-STITCH

SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion.

Call and examine, and, for agencies and circulars, apply at 623 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

"THE CARRIAGE OF THE PERIOD."

The above spirited engraving represents a Lady's Basket Pony Phaeton, with Rumble—a style of Carriage growing rapidly into public favor, and seen at all our fashionable summer resorts. This design is from the Establishment of

A. S. FLANDRAU, Carriage Builder, 7 & 18 East 18th Street, N. Y.,

where can be found an elegant display of this

"CARRIAGE OF THE PERIOD,"

at prices ranging from $150 upward; or, with Rumble, $250 upward. Together with a full stock of Clarences, Landaus, Coupés, Rockaways, and other fashionable vehicles, all of the newest style and at reduced prices.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

WITH THE DICKENS SUPPLEMENT.

VOL. XIV.—No. 699.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

SWALLOWS' NESTS.

For several centuries the common swallow has disputed itself in our crowded cities, and with its friendly masonry attached itself to our houses. The chimney swallow, still more familiar and audacious, often builds in the smoky shafts of our domiciles, or even in the noisiest factories, undisturbed by the din, or the fires, or the movement around them. Such habits must form a strong contrast with those of their predecessors in times long gone by. When our ancestors wandered untutored savages in the prehistoric times, or when, still later, they constructed lacustrine towns, or megalithic monuments, the habits of the birds can scarcely have been identical with those of to-day, for such human edifices afforded little security or shade. They must then have built among rocks. Nearly the same remarks apply to the storks, which have not remained stationary, but have preferred to their less commodious dwellings those offered to them by man. These changes in the industry or manners of birds are perhaps even more rapid than we might at first sight suppose: and notable improvements have been adopted by swallows in their modification during the first half of the present century. A distinguished French naturalist, having directed a number to be collected for the purpose of having drawings made from them, was astonished to find that they did not resemble those he had collected some forty years ago, and which were still preserved in the museum of Rouen. The swallows of the present generation have notably improved on the architecture of their forefathers, especially those still building in the arches and against the pillars of the churches. Some, however, still adhere to the old methods, or such nests may possibly have been old ones which have undergone reconstruction. In the streets, on the other hand, all the nests appeared to be constructed on the new method. And now for the differences observed. The old nests show, and all ancient writers describe, the nest of the house swallow as globular, or as forming a segment of a spheroid with a very small rounded opening, scarcely exceeding the ingress and egress of the couple that inhabit it. The new nests, on the contrary, have the form of the segment of a hollow sphere with very elongated poles, and the three sectional surfaces of which adhere to the wall and ceiling throughout their whole extent, with the exception of the upper one, where the orifice of the nest is situated; and this is not in the centre of hole, but a very long transverse fissure formed below by an excavation of the border of the section, and above by the wall of the building to which the nest is attached. This opening has a length of more ten centimetres, and a height of two centimetres. This new form affords more room for the females, and especially for the young, which are not so crowded, while they can put out their heads for a mouthful of fresh air, and their presence does not interfere with the entrance and exit of the parents. Lastly, the new form protects the inhabitants of the nest better than the old one from rain, cold, and foreign enemies.

A SPRING SCENE NEAR RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—[DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 21, 1870.

THE FOLLY OF POLITICAL DESPONDENCY.

POLITICAL events at Albany and at Washington, with reports of the venality of the Southern Legislatures, occasion a great deal of political despondency in the minds of certain persons, and the only remedy they can see is of the heroic kind. "There is no such thing as honor, left in politics," they exclaim; "Republicans don't hesitate to make bargains with the most notoriously corrupt Democrats. Corruption, indeed, is universal; and there is nothing for it but to let things drive to destruction as speedily as possible, and then we shall see daylight." But the policy of allowing things to become so bad as they can be, in the hope of thereby creating a revolution of some kind, is not the wisest policy. The tendency of "things" in the bad direction needs no encouragement, and in allowing them to thrive more, or in hastening them downward, the most tremendous risks are incurred, by subjecting the public mind to total demoralization.

What, for instance, would have been gained in 1868, if the Democrats had been allowed, through the indifference of good citizens, to elect Mr. SEYMOUR and Mr. BLAIR, with Mr. WADE HAMPTON as the chief Southern friend of the Administration, and Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON'S performances continued as its policy? The country has a great deal of corruption to encounter now; but in that event it would have been confronted with corruption and disaffection combined. Or what advantage would it have been in civilization if the anti-slavery reformers had said, forty years ago, that they would give slavery rope enough and let it hang itself? Is it not a little doubtful which would be now dangling, slavery or liberty? The only practicable and honorable method in a free government, conducted by parties, is to act with a party if you can, and if not, to protest against both parties in the interest of the country. But in both cases a man resists the "drifting" of affairs with all his power, and does what seems to him best to withstand a bad tendency. If he decides that his party can no longer be expected to benefit the country, he will withdraw from it; but he will hardly look on quietly and see the country imperiled as the result of disorganization. It is evident that for some time the political interests of the country will be done by these two parties; and the practical, patriotic question, therefore, is, whether to act with or out of them, or to withdraw, and, protesting against both, to begin the formation of a new party. For a Republican this is a very serious question, because his party is in power, and to desert it is to abandon the country to Democratic control. That this would be a serious disaster in every way can hardly be doubted.

We are just recovering from a terrible civil convulsion, the issues of which are in course of settlement according to the principles which have triumphed. It will not be questioned that the great mass of what are known as loyal men is to be found in the Republican party; nor will it be doubted that what is known as the more intelligent and moral part of the population is, as a rule—certainly not exclusively—friendly to the same party. On the other hand, the disaffected, the "irreconcilables," of all degrees, and the less intelligent, swell the ranks of the Democratic party. Corruption, despite the Honorable Mr. PETERS, is unhappily, to be found in both parties; but he would be more daring than well informed who should allege that the Democratic party is more honest than its opponent. Yet, because of corruption, ought a Republican, under these circumstances, to leave his party, or to remain in it and strive earnestly to purify it? Is the task so hopeless that the only wise course is to yield to the greater corruption of the Democracy?

If we look for the answer which we ought now to be desired, we find that they are, in the first place, economical administration. Now, with all the alleged extravagance, the debt has been reduced nearly ninety-eight millions of dollars during the last year. Would the Democratic party probably have done better? In the second place, we ought to wish an honorable maintenance of peace with other nations. Has the party in power failed in this duty, and is there any reason to suppose that the foreign policy of a party which contains the Fenian and filibuster elements would have been more conservative and wise? In the third place, we have a right to demand greater efficiency and purity in the civil service. And does not every effort to that end proceed from the Republican party? Even if we take the most disheartening view of we admit that under our present wretched system of patronage and the caucus, many of the most prominent members of Congress owe themselves into conspicuous positions, do the chief representatives of the Republican party compare disadvantageously with their opponents, and is there not always the saving consciousness of the general character of the party?

A wise man takes counsel, in every question, of his discretion, not of his disgust. If, in the conduct of our foreign affairs, a man sees the signs of impatience and disgust, he does not say that of Mr. MOTLEY and Mr. JAY, and the continuance of Mr. MARSH and Mr. BANCROFT-DAVIS in public affairs, but he says that Mr. BAILEY only, forgetting the host of honest officers—if, in reconstruction, he knows only some of the Bullock-Seggers, if, in the Indian service, he involved, nor the comparative pacification of a community so lately and so long fiercely convulsed, in this State, by the reconciliation even the Albany bargains, and not the tone and the nominations of the Judiciary Convention, for instance, he will not say that that is in any way of political hopelessness. But does he think the campaign and election of 1868 show it? Does he think the present and the last Legislature shows it? Does he not think that the nomination of a technically "respectable" man like Mr. HOFFMAN by the Democracy, that even the Tammany managers recognize a moral sentiment, to which they must at least seem to defer? The golden age of politics never will be the past. We praise the good old times; but we run away from them. LINCOLN will be as precious a name to the future as WASHINGTON; and the Fifteenth Amendment will be seen to be as great a step in human progress as the Declaration of Independence.

A GREAT REFORM POSTPONED.

WE feared, from his long silence, that Mr. JENCKES was in despair, and that he would not again present his Civil Service bill. But we are glad to have been mistaken, and every friend of this most desirable reform is indebted to him for more money summoning its opponents to expose the weakness of their opposition. The difficulty with the gentlemen who oppose it, is, that they can not urge the real reason of their hostility. They summon the spectre of a "privileged class" as a cry to defeat it; the truth being, that the bill is a blow at the privileged class of politicians. It virtually proposes to abolish patronage—the sole magic by which an unworthy husband of influence holds their places. That the civil service of the country is properly the spoils of victory is a principle so established that to question it is to confuse the voter. That one man is as good as another or he believes as an American. That, therefore, it is fitting for the dominant party not to reward its supporters, he believes as a politician. Consequently, every petty officer of the government, theoretically or practically, in his party, must pay a heavy tax out of his miserable salary for the party expenses, or be discharged. Every election is, therefore, not so much a question of political policy as of bread-and-butter to thousands and thousands of persons. What the result must be under such a system is easily imagined. What it is, is plainly seen.

Now the civil service reform proposes substantially this: that every person who wishes a government office shall undergo an examination of his general qualifications for capacity, and that the appointments shall be made from those who are proved to be competent and fit. The details of any bill, of course, may be modified. Mr. JENCKES proposes to apply the principle to the officers appointed by the heads of departments. Mr. SCHURZ would include all of the Presidential appointments except the highest: the Cabinet, the Judges of the Supreme Court, the foreign Ministers, etc. But, whatever the details, the principle is the same.

It is objected that such a system can not ascertain business ability nor moral character. But certainly it will do more toward ascertaining them than a system of partisan appointment. No system is ideal, nor will obviate every objection. But if no man employs another to do any work without some inquiry into his capacity for it, it certainly can not be unwise in a state or a great political partnership to do the same thing.

It is objected that such a system is aristocratic, and removes the public service from the control of the people. But the people have tried their present system for forty years. They find that it is extravagant, corrupt, and nonsensical; that nothing does more to weaken the government and exasperate the chief peril of a republic, party spirit. It is therefore proposed that they try the old system, the system approved by experience and common-sense; and if that is equally unsatisfactory they can abolish it and try another. It is an argument against the President that the term is four years, and that during that time, except by impeachment, no change is beyond popular control? Suppose that the law makes the term of the civil offices eight years, as Senator SUMNER proposes, what would such a law be but the expression of the popular conviction that the public welfare would be promoted by that change? Moreover, if it be a principle that a man shall hold a minor office during a certain term, and while he is faithful and competent and honest, because every body else in the country has as sound a claim to it as he, the argument is equally applicable to the present system. Those who hold the offices for four years, or during an administration, are but a handful compared with those who want an office, and whom claims as citizens are just as strong. By a good civil service bill the country says merely that it wishes its routine business to be done in the most efficient and economical way. If a system of patronage is that way, very well. Let every politician take care of his supporters. But if political permanence should end in reason and experience, with ascertained capacity and character, is a better way, the country would be very deluded if it feared the result, in adopting it, it was establishing an aristocracy.

Nothing can be worse than our present system. Senators and Representatives, as Mr. FESSENDEN said, are chiefly office-brokers. Secretary COX and Professor, Mr. BROWNE, declare that some reform is imperative. Senator TRUMBULL would make it an offense in a Senator to vote for any Mr. BAILEY who would accept a renomination only upon the distinct understanding that he is not to be wholly given up to such duties. Mr. KELLEY heartily agrees to "almost any form" in which Mr. JENCKES might put his bill. The bill was reported unfavorably in a lot for the present. But Mr. JENCKES appeals, and justly, from the politicians to the people. The press is generally with him. Mr. GRESHAM pools-pools the press. But why should so experienced a politician man do so foolish a thing? Mr. BRESHAM knows that the press influences public opinion much more directly and powerfully than Congress—and that public opinion is the American LAW-GIVER. The civil service reform is really a fight between the politicians and the people. The politicians are very strong, and can do infinite mischief; but it is a lost fight for them, when they really move. We beg Mr. JENCKES to persevere. His action stimulates interest and discussion, and we are all that the friends of the reform need to secure their victory.

GENERAL JORDAN AND CUBA.

GENERAL JORDAN has arrived from Cuba, and tells the most cheering tale of the fertility and value of the island, and the invincible desire of the confident and hopeful inhabitants to be annexed to the United States—in order to avoid the fate of the South American republics. This is rather a dismal ending of the story. It is practically a confession that the inhabitants can not govern themselves; and what advantage to this country a large increase of that kind of population would be is not evident. The substance of General JORDAN'S statement is, that the Cuban insurrectionists are waging a guerrilla warfare, which, while they prefer, but that they are virtually without arms and ammunition, which he hopes to find means to supply. He thinks that, if the General does not like the guerrilla method, which is endless; and he thinks that, with a nucleus of hardy and disciplined American soldiers, he could gather an efficient army, which, properly armed, would "drive the Spaniards into the sea in ninety days." He says distinctly that in Camaguey, which is the most reactionary district and the seat of the republic, there is "a regular civil organization, including an efficient postal service and judiciary." He adds that the government is effectively organized in all its parts, "the civil power being, perhaps, invested with too much authority for the situation of the country."

But the implication of the General's account of the insurrection is, that it is a movement against an oppressive foreign government. Is that the fact? The old Spanish rule was undoubtedly tyrannical; but that rule has been thrown off in Spain, and there is no evidence that the new Spanish rule in Cuba would be harsh, nor that there would be any general wish to overthrow it. The denunciations of the insurrection are buried at a régime in Spain which has ceased to exist. The new régime found itself confronted with opponents in arms, and has done what every other government would in the same circumstances would do. The Cubans in arms owed to themselves, to Spain, and to the good opinion of mankind, which they invoke, to ascertain whether the Bourbon system in Cuba fell with the Bourbon monarchy in Spain. If it did, against what were they contending? And why could they ascertain while they persisted in war?

General JORDAN will find that this is one of the chief reasons of the widespread joy of the public mind in this country toward the situation in Cuba. Sympathy for suffering men, women, and children he will unquestionably find. But certainly he will have to try very hard before he discovers much faith in the revolution as the rising of an intolerably oppressed people against a cruel government. Yet had the movement in Cuba been stayed until it was evident that the new government of Spain designed to continue the Bourbon oppression, or that the "Volunteers" in Cuba truly represented the new Spanish spirit, it and had been broken out in a way which showed that it was not a job for annexation, the island might by this time have been independent. The sympathy for this country would have been active, not passive. General JORDAN is an American, and he ought to understand his own countrymen. If he think that even the city of New York can not be roused to excitement upon this subject, let him rather reflect upon the reason that denounce the fact.

THE SPRING TRADE.

THE trade of the country turns more upon the success of the planting and farming interest than upon any other, as the mass of those engaged in it, in the shape of owners, laborers, and families, constitutes six or seven tenths of the population of the United States. The country merchant is ordinarily keen to make his spring purchases a little in advance of the period of selling, so that he may be able to dispose of many of his goods in the interim after cold weather that precedes plowing and planting, for, when these duties commence, they are too engrossing to allow of cessation. The bottom merchant is earliest on the ground, and, as the season opens, each portion of the Union in its succession represented, until the extreme Northern line is reached. The soil is now being warmed up in the coldest latitudes, and the active portion of the spring trade is now nearly at an end. On the shelves of our importing and jobbing houses winter goods already appear, but this is to supply the establishments which make up clothing, who are the first to commence trade with spring and fall purchases, as their business involves the necessity of stocking their materials into a form convenient for use. The jobbing trade has arrived at when a correct view of the spring trade may be taken.

It may be said of it that it has been prosecuted under very serious disadvantages, and generally at a loss. We stated at the opening of the season that our crops of cotton and food of consumption and export were large—sufficient to afford a prosperous trade—and that in forcing down the price of gold the produce of the country would be exempted from it, and cause extensive depression. The sensitiveness of the market to this influence is now generally admitted. Cotton opened to a limited interest during the upward movement of gold, from 110 to say 115, which is about its present rate, and at $1 2½. They are now selling at $1 15. Lace ingrains are now selling at 80 cents per yard, which is below the cost of production; and the consequence is, that those engaged in this industry are closing up work as fast as they can. Unless there shall be an advance in price, there will not be a sufficient supply to satisfy the wants of the country. A large number of carpet factories have already been closed, and particularly at Kensington, and hands are thrown out of employment. Many which still made cloths and cassimeres have also been compelled to stop work, with the same results. Those only go on which have large capitals, and expect ultimately to derive advantage from the inability of others to continue their production. What interests so important as these are crippled, so really active general and satisfactory trade can exist. Other manufactures in many sections have been more or less affected by the condition of affairs, but to a less serious extent than the woolen interest. A large hosiery establishment, whose manufactures three years ago reached seven hundred thousand dollars, and the next year about four, expects to limit its production this season to one hundred thousand, although it has capital and power sufficient to produce goods to the extent of a million in value in any one year. This must tell seriously upon our internal revenues, although, from the concurrence of extraordinary efforts in collection and economy in public expenditure, the amount received for such revenues furnishes to the public no indication of our largely diminished industry.

The circumstances favorable to a revival in this respect, and of trade generally, are these: that Congress is not expected to do anything further depression; that the cotton crop is expected to reach three million bales; that the price of what remains here can be controlled by the country; that we have tolerably large supplies of wheat; that its price has stiffened at London and Liverpool, and that our surplus of cotton and grain will be wanted abroad.

It is supposed that in California, from which State the largest receipts have usually been made —obtained there because it is flinty and dry, and suitable to mix with the grain of the moist climate of Illinois—the season is backward, and such is also the case in Great Britain. The grain dealers of London and Liverpool are therefore more than usually purchasers of what has been. Since January the consumption in England has been steadily gaining upon the large stock which had been accumulated in the beginning of the year, and there will undoubtedly be a necessity for taking a large portion of the surplus from this country. This will benefit the Northwest, which still holds a large amount of grain.

If it were not that our imports still continue to exceed our exports, and that we are still running heavily into debt to foreign people upon railroad securities, the prospect would be hopeful; but there seems to be no help for our imprudence except in the refusal of the other side to encourage it—a result greatly to be desired, and as to which, at some money centres in Europe, capitalists seem to be in action.

THE MASSACRE IN GREECE.

THE recent massacre of English travelers, by brigands in Greece, has naturally produced a great excitement in England. A party of eight persons left Athens on the 11th of April, in two carriages, under the escort of four gens d'armes for Marathon. Upon their return in the afternoon the party was fired upon by brigands, two of the escort were killed, and the travelers were made prisoners. The latter were sent to Athens, and the five gentlemen were allowed to send one of their number to negotiate in the city for a complete pardon, and a ransom of twenty-five thousand pounds. The ransom money was raised, but the amnesty was not promised, for the Government could not endure the humiliation of yielding to the demands of brigands. It dispatched troops in pursuit. The brigands retreating from the mountains toward the sea were unable to keep together, and, in revenge, murdered their fair captives, except Lord MUNCASTER, who had carried on the negotiation.

The event proves both the folly and the weakness of the Greek Government; and the London Times is of opinion that it will prove to be of great political importance. It is a matter in which Americans are not less concerned than the English, and it is absurd that the most interesting localities in the world should be inaccessible to scholars and travelers, because of the imbecility of the local authorities in a country which is under the protection of three great powers. The Times remarks that many millions of pounds were spent upon an expedition to Abyssinia to punish a much smaller provocation; and undoubtedly public opinion in England, which always resents an injury done to any traveling Englishman, will compel the Government to some decided action.

And apropos of injuries and insults, we hope that we have not heard the last of the indignity offered to the United States Consul in Santiago de Cuba. The United States man-of-war Swatara went "to inquire." What did she ascertain? Are our consuls to be protected only by the English flag? Has the outrage of which Mr. SCHERY received any explanation or apology from the Spanish authorities? And if not, why not?

MRS. LINCOLN'S PENSION.

THE Senate Committee on Pensions have decided that MRS. LINCOLN ought not to receive a pension. They have evidently examined the subject carefully, and their conclusions can not be hitly questioned. So long as it was generally supposed that MRS. LINCOLN was in straitened circumstances, the demand for a proper pension, and impatience at the delay in granting it, were but natural. MR. LINCOLN'S services had been so great that there seemed to be something unpleasantly pitiful in hesitating and hitching about the allowance for his widow. But it now appears that there has been a general misunderstanding of the facts. MRS. LINCOLN has a fortune of about sixty thousand dollars, and it is to be presumed that any person of taste requires more than the income of that sum. In her petition from Frankfort she states that she has been advised to try the mineral waters during the summer, and then to go to Italy. But she adds, "My financial means do not permit me to take advantage of the urgent advice given me, nor can I do so with any becoming the widow of the chief magistrate of a great nation, although I live as economically as I can."

Of course it is impossible to decide what style of living might be thought by MRS. LINCOLN becoming the position. But with the best feeling for her position, and the very proper desire that she should not suffer from poverty, the Committee are of opinion that neither sentiment nor duty requires the pension from the Treasury for her maintenance. It has been throughout a painful subject. Nothing could be more repugnant, we are sure, than the petitor EDMUNDS, the chairman of the Committee, and to the majority of the Senate, than to seem even to be reluctant to show any mark of respect for the great and good President. But they have no right to recommend generosity without justice, nor to establish a precedent which could very easily, and would very certainly, be disastrously abused. They have therefore honorably discharged a disagreeable duty in recommending the indefinite postponement of the bill.

THE FATE OF GOICOURIA.

WE invite the attention of MR. WOODWARD, of Pennsylvania, and the other gentlemen who are never weary of denouncing the malignant despotism of the United States Government in its treatment of rebels, to the brief dispatch which announced last Sunday that the Cuban General GOICOURIA arrived in Havana on the night of Friday, the 6th of April, under a strong guard; that he was instantly carried to the jail, where a court-martial was summoned without delay, which sentenced him to be shot at four o'clock on Saturday morning he was taken to the fort, and at eight o'clock was garroted. This is the usual manner in which treasonable rebels have been every where treated when they were captured. But when we compare the character and conduct of the rebellion in this country, and the conduct and provocation of its leaders, with those in Cuba or any where else, at any period of history, the folly of the Rebel States shines without parallel for clemency and wisdom. This Government is stained with the blood of no traitorous leaders for conscience. It has not even prosecuted rebel leaders incomparably more guilty than the Earl or the General. Its only vengeance has been to have been securing equal rights to all citizens. And whoever denounces such a Government as malignant, unprincipled, and unwisely unjust, only judges and condemns himself.

The folly of a ferocious policy will doubtless be made evident not only by a feeling of sympathy for the cause in which General GOICOURIA has suffered. The political scaffold is always a mistake. It is the last appeal to those who erect it. The Cuban insurrection has not gained a very firm hold upon the real sympathy of this country. But GOICOURIA, a resident of Havana, had been merely sent out of the country again, even that slight hold would have been relaxed at once,

POPULATION OF AN INDIAN VILLAGE MOVING.—Drawn by Theo. R. Davis.—[See Page 327.]

LUCRETIA MOTT.

MRS. MOTT is the daughter of THOMAS COFFIN, a Quaker of Nantucket; and upon that island she was born in 1793. In 1811 she married JAMES MOTT, of Philadelphia. Her Quaker education early turned her mind and heart to the question of slavery; and after the business reverses of her husband, following the war of 1812, Mrs. MOTT taught school, and in 1818 became a preacher in the Society of Friends. Like JOHN WOOLMAN, she traveled and preached against slavery, even in some of the border slave States, and received all Christian people to abstain from the use of products of slave labor. When the Friends, in 1827, separated into the Orthodox and Hicksite branches, Mrs. MOTT adhered to what she believed to be the simpler and more Christian part. Naturally, when the abolition movement began under Mr. GARRISON, she was fully ready. In 1833 she was among the founders of the American Anti-Slavery Society. And when Pennsylvania Hall was destroyed by the mob in Philadelphia, because of the abolition meetings, Mrs. MOTT was present, sharing the peril and exhorting her friends steadily to bear their testimony whatever fire befell. In 1840 Mrs. MOTT was sent as a delegate to the World's Convention in London; and, although refused a seat as a delegate, she was most courteously and hospitably received as a guest. Her interest in the cause was unflagging to the end. Always present at the annual meetings, she was one of the most impressive and delightful of the speakers. Indeed, the loftiness, the purity, the tranquillity of her mien and manner will be always memorable to those who have heard her. The precision peculiar to her society of believers is in her only elegant repose and a simplicity as lovely as it is severe. In 1848 Mrs. MOTT was a leader in the first Woman's Rights Convention at Seneca Falls; and her active interest in the subject is unabated. She recently came from Philadelphia to New York to join in an endeavor to unite the two national societies; and had it been a mere matter of will upon the part of the representatives, she would have ascended. Time seems not to have touched her intellectual vigor; and her clear and profound moral insight, the nobility of her nature, the inexpressible sweetness of her manner, the consecration of a spotless life to the welfare of the oppressed—a life showing that the most active interest and participation in the common interests of society may enhance the loveliest womanliness—all these inspire the most affectionate reverence for LUCRETIA MOTT.

LUCRETIA MOTT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY F. GUTEKUNST, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.]

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON.

MR. GARRISON was born in Newburyport, Massachusetts, on the 12th of December, 1804. At the age of ten he was placed with a Quaker in Lynn, to learn the mystery of shoemaking, but soon returned to Newburyport, where he went to school and helped to support himself. When he was fourteen he was apprenticed to a cabinet-maker; but he did not like the business, and was soon after indentured to an editor in Newburyport, and so, to his great satisfaction, became a printer. When he was sixteen or seventeen he began to write upon subjects of public interest, sending his articles anonymously to his employer, and receiving from him thanks and requests to continue. He wrote also notable articles for other papers; and in 1826, when his apprenticeship ended, he began a paper of his own, which failed; and in the two following years was an editor in Boston, and Bennington in Vermont. In the latter town he aroused public opinion upon the subject of slavery; and in Boston he became acquainted with BENJAMIN LUNDY, the editor of the Genius of Universal Emancipation, published in Baltimore.

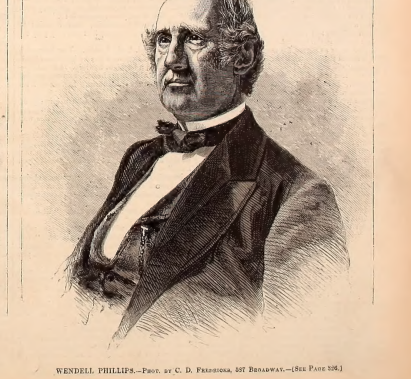
On the 4th of July, 1829, Mr. GARRISON delivered an oration in Park Street Church in Boston, in which he vigorously denounced slavery. In the autumn he went to Baltimore with Mr. LUNDY, and, as joint editor of the Emancipator, he demanded immediate emancipation as the duty of the master and the right of the slave. Presently a Newburyport ship took a cargo of slaves from Baltimore to Louisiana. Mr. GARRISON instantly denounced it as "domestic piracy," and declared that he would "cover thick with infamy" all who were engaged in the transaction. Baltimore, a chief seat of the domestic slave trade, hummed about his ears. He was convicted of "a gross and malicious libel" upon the captain of the ship and FRANCIS TODD the owner, and was imprisoned for forty-nine days, until the fine and costs were paid by ARTHUR TAPPAN, of New York. HENRY CLAY had been appealed to, and was about to pay the fine, and DANIEL WEBSTER spoke kindly and hopefully to the young man upon his release.

Mr. GARRISON had now seen the great enemy Slavery face to face. He instantly issued proposals for an anti-slavery paper, and delivered lectures in various cities to raise the money. He saw that the anti-slavery attack must be made upon public opinion in the Northern States, and on the 1st of January, 1831, he issued in Boston the first number of the Liberator. Its motto was, "My country is the world: my countrymen are all mankind." Its first words, addressed to a country curiously dull and indifferent to the subject of slavery, were: "I am in earnest. I will not equivocate; I will not excuse; I will not retreat a single inch; and I will be heard." From that moment Mr. GARRISON'S history is really that of the country. When these words were written, slavery was established in half the Union. Its power was supreme. Society, politics, trade, literature, the church, all the great interests, were subservient to it or silent. If it was felt to be horrible, it was acknowledged to be hopeless. But the young man of twenty-seven, almost without capital, without promise of support, with nothing but his clear conscience, his uncompromising will, and his skill as a writer and printer to sustain him, closed in the deadly struggle with American slavery; and now, at the age of sixty-six, he sees it utterly swept away, and four millions of slaves freed and made equal citizens with himself.

The contest was as fierce as it was brief. Mr. GARRISON kept his word. He did not retreat a single inch, and he was heard. From the first he demanded immediate and unconditional emancipation, and a party of persons of similar conviction and resolution arose around him. They were almost universally denounced as fanatics, mischief-makers, and traitors. They were hated and ridiculed, reviled and mobbed. A price was set upon Mr. GARRISON'S head. The name Abolitionist—which should have been only another name for American—became the most odious of epithets. Yet Mr. GARRISON waged only a moral warfare. He would not vote, because voting would be a recognition of the Constitution, which he held to be, by its fugitive slave provision, a bond of slavery. He disapproved appeals to force, as a Christian disciple; and he was one of the most earnest advocates of non-resistance. Moreover, he claimed for women an equal liberty of choice and action with men; and refused to sit in the "World's Anti-Slavery Convention," in England, in 1840, because female delegates were excluded. In the same year the American Anti-Slavery Society divided upon the question of the participation of women, and the part that favored it became, under the name of Garrisonian Abolitionists, the chief and aggressive wing. In 1843 Mr. GARRISON was chosen President of the American Society, and held the office until the war ended and slavery was abolished.

During all this time his paper was published every week, and the pen and tongue of the editor were never idle. Mr. GARRISON'S style, both as writer and speaker, was clear, trenchant, and precise. Upon the platform he was always calm and deliberate, giving the impression of entire self-possession, of thorough knowledge of his subject, and of indomitable will. His strongest phrases were not the rhetorical bursts of excitement, but the careful statement of matured conviction. If he called the American church the bulwark of American slavery, or the Constitution a compact with death and a league with hell, he meant exactly what he said, and was ready to justify his words.

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY J. W. BLAGE, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.]



WENDELL PHILLIPS.—PHOT. BY C. D. FREDRICKS, 587 BROADWAY.—[SEE PAGE 326.]

When the public mind had been thoroughly aroused by the incessant agitation of the Abolitionists, and by the aggressions of the slavery influence in the government, the anti-slavery movement passed into politics. The annexation of Texas and the repeal of the Missouri Compromise produced the Republican party. But Mr. GARRISON and the Abolitionists maintained their independence and their purity. They appeal, regarding the Republicans as men who saw the right but were timid in its support. The Republicans, on their part, found all their arguments and their array of facts already prepared for them by the Abolitionists. Indeed, however much better and the advanced Republicans there was only a difference of method. Mr. GARRISON always recognized the great purpose of the Republicans before the war, and when they proposed the great measures of the war and of reconstruction, they had no firmer friend and supporter than he. His late letter to the Union League Club in New York, upon the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment, expresses his full appreciation of the patriotic work of the Republican party.

The United States have no patents of nobility for those who have best served their country. They make no flakes, they build no monuments, nor do they offer to them such a noble fortune as was justly given to RICHARD CARVEL by his admiring friends. But some of those who appreciated Mr. GARRISON'S immense service to his country and to civilization, and who knew that at sixty years of age he was as poor as when he began the struggle, quietly raised a modest sum, which has been invested for his benefit. Meanwhile his activity and zeal in all humane reforms is not decline. He has a residence upon Roxbury Heights, near Boston, interested in the movements for temperance, for peace, and especially for the equality of women.

Few men in history have ever devoted themselves more unreservedly than Mr. GARRISON to a great moral and social reform, and very few have ever lived to see so marvelous and beneficent a triumph.

WENDELL PHILLIPS.

The first number of the Liberator was issued, as we have said in speaking of Mr. GARRISON, on the 1st of January, 1831. The anti-slavery debate, unwittingly urged by the Abolitionists, provoked the intensest feeling, and on the afternoon of the 21st of October, 1835, a mob assailed the building in Boston in which the Female Anti-Slavery Society was to meet. The object of the mob, in which were many well-called respectable persons, was GEORGE THOMPSON, an eloquent English Abolitionist. But he had left the city, Mr. GARRISON, who was present, was their next prey. The mayor of the city had but a few constables at his command, and his only further authority under the law was to summon by-standers to his aid, and, if the riot became unmanageable, to appeal to the Governor of the State. Mr. GARRISON in leaving the building was seized by the mob, and was hurried along the street with a rope around his waist. He was finally rescued from the mob by the mayor, and to save his life was committed to the jail, where he passed the night. At the height of the tumult a young lawyer, twenty-seven years old, who had been admitted to the Boston bar a year before, after graduating at Cambridge in the brilliant class of the historian MOTLEY, CHARLES EAMES, WILLIAM H. SIMMONS, and others, stepped in the street and waved his hand. He had no sympathy with the Abolitionists, but he had a very clear perception of the rights of American citizens, and the distantly attempt to stifle free speech in the town of JAMES OTIS and SAMUEL ADAMS so stirred his manhood, that he investigated the question which Boston was afraid to hear discussed, and joined the Abolitionists. It was like one of the Medici entering the Lutheran. In college a chief among the chiefs, a favorite, a beauty, and a lover of horses, yet so given to chemistry and mechanics that he used their skill, when he became a lawyer, that a good carpenter was needed, already a graceful and persuasive orator, it was incredible that, with all the ordinary prizes of life within his grasp—position, ease, fame—he should surrender them, and turn away to join those odious fanatics, the Abolitionists. But there was no doubt of it when he rose so after the evening of the 8th of December, 1837. Upon that evening there was a meeting of the citizens of Boston, to express their sentiments upon the murder of E. P. LOVEJOY, on the 7th of November, at Alton, Illinois. Rising had spoken, and some resolutions becoming honorable men and honest Americans had been offered, when JAMES T. AUSTIN, then attorney-General of Massachusetts, vehemently justified the Alton murder, declaring that LOVEJOY died as the fool died. The excitement was intense, and the feeling of the audience was evidently strongly divided, when Mr. PHILLIPS, then twenty-six years old, appeared upon the platform, and in a brief speech, which recalled to Faneuil Hall its old glory of eloquence and patriotism and humanity, and seemed to be the living echo of the fiery tongues of the Revolution, recalled the audience to itself, and spoke for the heart and conscience of NEW England. The resolutions were adopted; and from that evening until the abolition of slavery Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS was the great orator of the cause and of the country. Like Mr. GARRISON'S, his life has been devoted to influencing public opinion upon the question of slavery. The two have been the representative Abolitionists. But those who for so many years heard Mr. PHILLIPS with a shudder as the arch-agitator, could not believe, when they saw a tranquil, manly, graceful, polished gentleman upon the platform, that it was WENDELL PHILLIPS. "A great orator," said one; "why, it is only a man pleasantly talking." An accomplished scholar, a gentleman of courtly demeanor, graced with all the orator's gifts, Mr. PHILLIPS, constantly speaking, has never lost his charm. His oratory is the perfection of art—simplicity of art. His rhetoric is faultless, his manner superb," said recently the most scholarly and eloquent of English critics, who yet thought him an advocate, and not quite fair. But we have no space to say more. In 1859 Mr. PHILLIPS renounced the profession, because he would not take an oath to support the Constitution. He began, in search of ample resources, he lives with Spartan simplicity, and with a boundless benevolence. He is the incessant friend of their sweetest use. When Mr. GARRISON retired from the presidency of the American Anti-Slavery Society, because it had ceased, in his opinion, to exist, WENDELL PHILLIPS, thinking that an outside organization was still necessary, and the Republicans its friends, was elected president. But upon the recent adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment the Society was formally dissolved.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.)

MAN AND WIFE

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

ELEVENTH SCENE.—SIR PATRICK'S HOUSE.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-SECOND.

THE SMOKING-ROOM WINDOW.

"I CAN'T believe it! I won't believe it! You're trying to put me from my husband—to make me a stranger to my own reputation. It's infamous. It's horrible. What have I done to you?" she cried, my head! Are you trying to drive me mad?"

Pale and wild; her hands twisted in her hair; her feet beating her impatient will to do its will—so Blanche answered her step-mother, when the officer of Lady Lundie's household had been accomplished, and the cruel truth had been plainly told.

Her hardship sat, superbly composed, looking out through the window at the placid landscape of woods and fields that surrounded Ham Farm.

"I was prepared for this outbreak," she said, coldly. "Those wild words relieve your overwrought feelings. Be quiet, dear, and talk to me. Blanche—I can wait!"

Blanche stopped, and confronted Lady Lundie.

"You and your likes! liked each other," she said. "I wrote you a pet letter from this place. I have always called all my friends pets—you. I have shown you plainly—rudely, I dare say—that I was glad to be married and get away from you. I sent you my revenge, in that letter."

"Oh, Blanche, Blanche, what thoughts to think! what words to say! I can only pray for you."

"I am mad, Lady Lundie. You bear with mad people. Bear with me. I have been hardly more than a fortnight married. I love him—I love him—with all my heart and soul—and you have told me about them. Remember! remember! remember!"

She repeated the words with a low cry of pain. Her hands went up to her head again; and she returned restlessly to pacing this way and that in the room.

Lady Lundie tried the effect of a gentle remonstrance. "Of course, Blanche," she said, "I don't persist in estranging yourself from me. In this dreadful trial, I am the only friend you have."

Blanche came back to her step-mother's chair, and looked at her steadily. The face of Lady Lundie submitted to inspection—and bore it perfectly.

"Look into my heart," she said. "Blanche! it bleeds for you!"

Blanche heard, without heeding. Her mind was painfully intent on its own thoughts. "You are a religious woman," she said, abruptly. "Will you swear on your Bible, that you have told me is true?"

"My Bible!" repeated Lady Lundie with sorrowful emphasis. "Oh, my child! have you no part in the precious inheritance? Is it not your Bible, too?"

A momentary triumph showed itself in Blanche's face. "You daren't swear it!" she said. "That's enough for me!"

She turned away scornfully. Lady Lundie caught her by the hand, and drew her sharply back. The suffering spirit disappeared, and the woman who was no longer to be trifled with took her place.

"There must be an end to this," she said. "You don't believe what I have told you. Have you courage enough to put it to the test?"

Blanche started, and released her hand. She trembled a little. There was a horrible certainty of conviction expressed in Lady Lundie's sudden change of manner.

"How?" she asked.

"You shall see. Tell me the truth, on your side, first. Where is Sir Patrick? Is he really not, as his servant told me?"

"Yes. He is out with the farm bailiff. You have taken us all by surprise. You wrote that you were not to call on you by the next train."

"When does the next train arrive? It is seven o'clock now."

"Between one and two."

"Sir Patrick will not be back till then?"

"Not till then."

"Where is Mr. Brinkworth?"

"My husband is—"

"Your husband—if you like. Is he out, too?"

"He is in the smoking-room."

"Do you mean that long room, built out from the back of the house?"

"Yes."

"Come down stairs at once with me."

Blanche advanced a step—and drew back. "Why do you want me?" she asked, inspired by a sudden distrust.

Lady Lundie turned round, and looked at her impatiently.

"Can't you see yet," she said, sharply, "that your conduct in this matter is my interest in one? What have I told you?"

"Don't repeat it!"

"I must repeat it. If I have told you that Arnold Brinkworth was privately at Craig Fernie, on the 15th of May, he has acknowledged character of her husband—when we supposed him to be visiting the estate left him by his aunt. You refuse to believe it. I am about to put it to the proof. Is it your interest or is it not, to have Arnold Brinkworth shown to be what he is?"

Blanche trembled from head to foot, and made no reply.

"I am going into the garden, to speak to Mr. Brinkworth through the smoking-room window, pursued Lady Lundie. "Have you the courage to come with me? to wait behind out of sight; and to hear what he has to say with his own lips? I am not afraid of putting it to that test. Are you?"

The tone in which she asked the question roused Blanche's spirit.

"If I think you to be guilty," she said, resolutely, "I should not have the courage. I believe him to be innocent. Lead the way, Lady Lundie, in the name of God, please."

They left the room—Blanche's own room at Ham Farm—and descended to the hall. Lady Lundie opened and controlled the railway timetable hanging near the house-door.

"There is a train at Craig Fernie at a quarter to twelve," she said. "How long does it take to walk to the station?"

"Why do you ask?"

"You will soon know. Answer my question."

"It's a walk of twenty minutes to the station."

Lady Lundie referred to her watch. "There will be just time," she said.

"Time for what?"

"Come into the garden."

With that answer, she led the way out.

The smoking-room projected at right angles from the wall of the house, in an oblong form—with a bow window at the farther end, looking into the garden. Before she turned the corner, and showed herself within the range of view from the window, Lady Lundie looked back, and signed to Blanche to wait behind the angle of the wall. Blanche obeyed.

The next instant she heard the voices in conversation through the open window. Arnold's voice was the first to speak.

"Lady Lundie! Why, we didn't expect you this morning!"

Lady Lundie was ready with her answer.

"I was able to leave town earlier than I had anticipated. I want to cut your cigar; and don't move. I am not coming in."

She paused, in exchange of question and answer on; every word being audible in the perfect stillness of the place. Arnold was the next to speak.

"Have you seen Blanche?"

"Blanche is staying really to go out with me. We mean to have a walk together. I have many things to say to her. Before we go, I have something to say to you."

"Is it my thing very serious?"

"It is most serious."

"About me?"

"About you. I know where you went on the evening of the 15th of May—by Windygates—you went to Craig Fernie."

"Good Heavens! how did you find out?"

"I know where you went to meet—Miss Silvester. I know what is said of you and of her—you are man and wife."

"Hush! don't speak so loud. Somebody may hear you!"

"What does it matter if they do? I am the only person whom you have kept out of the secret. You see I know, you know it here."

"Nothing of the sort! Blanche doesn't know it."

"What! Neither you nor Sir Patrick has told Blanche of the situation you stand in at this moment?"

"Not yet. Sir Patrick leaves it to me. I haven't been able to bring myself to do it. Don't say a word, I entreat you! I don't know how Blanche may interpret it. Her friend is expected in London to-morrow. I want to wait till Sir Patrick can bring them together. Her friend will break it to her better than I can. It's my notion. Sir Patrick thinks it a good one. Stop! you're not going away already?"

"She will be here to look for me if I stay any longer."

"One word! I want to know—"

"You shall know, later in the day."

Her ladyship appeared again round the angle of the wall. The next words that passed were words spoken in a whisper.

"Are you satisfied now, Blanche?"

"Have you mercy enough left, Lady Lundie, to take me away from this house?"

"My dear child! Why else did I look at the time-table in the hall?"

CHAPTER THE FORTY-THIRD.

THE EXPLOSION.

ARNOLD'S mind was far from easy when he was left by himself again in the smoking-room. The words passing some time in vainly trying to guess at the source from which Lady Lundie had derived her information, had put on his hat, and took the direction which led to Blanche's favorite walk at Ham Farm. Without absolutely distrusting her friend's discretion, the idea had occurred to him that he would do well to join his wife and her step-mother. By making a third in the party, and overseen them, he might prevent the conversation from assuming a perilously confidential turn.

The search for the ladies proved useless. They had not taken the direction in which he supposed they had gone.

He returned to the smoking-room, and composed himself to wait for events as patiently as he might. In this passive position—with his thoughts still running on Lady Lundie—his meeting referred to a brief conversation between Sir Patrick and himself, occasioned, on the preceding day, by the latter. Sir Patrick's statement of her proposed visit to Ham Farm. Sir Patrick had at once expressed his conviction that his wife's object in the journey south had some acknowledged purpose at the bottom of it.

"I am not at all sure, Arnold" (he had said), "that I have done wisely in having her letter unanswered. And I am strongly disposed to make a clean breast of it, and to let you take him the secret when she comes to-morrow. We can't help the position in which we are placed. It was impossible (without submitting your wife to our confidence) to prevent Blanche from writing that unhappy letter to her—and, even if we had prevented it, she must have heard in other ways of your return to England. I don't doubt your discretion, so far; and I don't doubt the convenience of keeping her in the dark, as a means of getting rid of her, and settling in this business of yours, until I have had time to set it right. But she may, by some unlucky accident, find out the truth for herself—and, in that case, I strongly distrust the influence which she might attempt to exercise on Blanche's mind."

Those were the words—as Arnold had happened on the day after they had been spoken? Exactly. He had discovered that, and what she was, at that moment, alone somewhere with Blanche. Arnold took up his hat once more, and set forth on the search for them, in search of another direction.

The second expedition was as fruitless as the first. Nothing was to be seen, and nothing was to be heard, of Lady Lundie and Blanche.

Arnold's mind told him that it was not far from the time when Sir Patrick might be expected to return. In all probability, while he had been looking for them, the ladies had gone back by some other way to the house. He entered the house on the ground floor, and after another. They were all empty. He went up stairs, and knocked at the door of Blanche's room. There was no answer. He opened the door and looked in. The room was empty, like the rooms below. He was just about to close entrance, there was a trifling circumstance to attract notice, in the shape of a note lying on the carpet. He picked it up, and saw that it was addressed to him in the handwriting of his wife. It was sealed. The note had been, without the usual form of address, in these words:

"I know the abominable secret that you and my worst enemy have hidden from me. I know your infamy, and her infamy, and the position in which, thanks to you both, I stand in the world. Reproaches would be wasted words, addressed to such a man as you are. I write these lines to tell you that I have placed myself under my step-mother's protection in London. It is useless to attempt to follow me. Sir Patrick will find out whether the ceremony of marriage which you went through with me is binding on you or not. For myself, I know already that it is. I have gone, never to come back, and never to let you see me again.—BLANCHE."

Hurrying headlong down the stairs with but one clear idea in his mind—the idea of instantly following her—Arnold encountered Sir Patrick, standing by a table in the hall, on which cards and notes left by visitors were usually placed, with an open letter in his hand. Struck in an instant what had happened, he threw one of his arms round Arnold, and stopped him at the house-door.

"You are a man," he said, firmly. "Bear it like a man."

Arnold's head fell on the shoulder of his kind old friend. He burst into tears.

Sir Patrick let the irrepressible outbreak of grief have its way. In those first moments, silence was mercy. He said nothing. The letter which he had been reading (from Lady Lundie, it is needless to say), dropped unheeded at his feet.

Arnold lifted his head, and dashed away the tears.

"I am ashamed of myself," he said. "Let me go."

"Wrong, my poor fellow—doubly wrong!"

returned Sir Patrick. "There is no shame in shedding such tears as those. And there is nothing to be done by leaving us."

"I must and will see her!"

"Read that," said Sir Patrick, pointing to the letter on the floor. "See your wife? Your wife is with the woman who has written those lines. Read them."

Arnold read them.

"DEAR SIR PATRICK,—If you had honored me with your confidence, I should have been happy to counsel you before I interfered to rescue Blanche from the position in which Mr. Brinkworth has placed her. As it is, your late brother-in-law's child is under my protection at my house in London. If you attempt to exercise your authority, it must be by main force—I will submit to nothing less. If Mr. Brinkworth attempts to exercise his authority, he shall establish his right to do so (if he can) in a police-court.

"Very truly yours, JULIA LUNDIE."

Arnold's resolution was not to be shaken even by this. "What do I care," he burst out, "about authority? whether I am dragged through the streets by the police or not! I will see my wife. I will clear myself of the horrible suspicion that rests about me. You have shown me your letter. Look at mine!"

Sir Patrick's clear sense saw the wild words that Blanche had written in their true light.

"Do you hold your wife responsible for that letter?" he asked. "I see her step-mother in every line of it. You descend to something worse than cruelty, if you seriously defend yourself against this? You can't see it? You persist in holding to your own view? Well, then, I can't get to her—your letter may. No! When you leave this house, you leave it with me. I have connected something, on my side, in allowing you to write. I insist on your conceding something, on your side, in return. Come into the library! I answer for setting things right between you and Blanche, if you will grant me the interests in the hands. Do you trust me or not?"

Arnold yielded. They went into the library together. Sir Patrick pointed to the writing-table. "Relieve your mind there," he said; "and let me find you a reasonable man again when I come back."

When he returned to the library the letter was written; and, could a mind was so far relieved —for the time at least.

"I shall take your letter to Blanche myself," said Sir Patrick, "by the train that leaves for London in half an hour's time."

"You will let me go with you?"

"Not to-day. I shall be back this evening to dinner. You shall hear all that has happened, and you shall accompany me to London to-morrow—if I find it necessary to make my lengthened stay there. Between this and then, I will do the shock to you that you have suffered, you will do well to be quiet here. Be satisfied with my assurance that Blanche shall have your letter. I will force my authority on her step-mother to that extent (if her step-mother resists) without scruple. The respect in which I hold your wife only lasts as long as she sex deserves it—and does not extend to Lady Lundie. There is no advantage that a man can take of a woman which I am not fully prepared to take of my sister-in-law."

With that characteristic farewell, he shook hands with Arnold, and departed for the station.

At seven o'clock the dinner was on the table. At seven o'clock Sir Patrick came down to eat it, as perfectly dressed as usual, and as composed as if nothing had happened.

"She has got your letter," he whispered, as he took Arnold's arm, and led him into the dining room.

"Did she say any thing?"

"Not a word."

"How did she look?"

"As she ought to look—sorry for what she has done."

The dinner began. As a matter of necessity, the subject of Sir Patrick's expedition was dropped while the servants were in the room—to be regularly taken up again by Arnold in the intervals between the courses. He began when the soup was taken away.

"I confess I had hoped that our Blanche would back with you" he said, sadly enough.

"In other words," returned Sir Patrick, "you expected me to bring wrong. Let her go with me and leave your letter to have its effect. The serious difficulties on our way back to your Blanche. Content yourself with knowing that."

The fish came in, and Arnold was silenced—until his next opportunity came round the next interval in the course of the dinner.

"What are the difficulties?" he asked.

"The difficulties are my difficulties and yours," answered Sir Patrick. "My difficulty is, that I can't assert my authority, as gentlemen do in the same my niece (as I do) to be a married woman. Your difficulty is, that you can't assert your authority as her husband, until it is distinctly proved that you and Miss Silvester are not man and wife. Lady Lundie acts perfectly naturally in taking your place us in that position, when she removed Blanche from this house. She has no authority, and Mrs. Inchbare; she has written to your steward for the date of your arrival as your estate; she has done every thing, calculated every thing, and foreseen every thing—except my excellent temper. The one mistake she has made, is in thinking she could get the better of that. No, my dear boy! My trump card is my temper. I keep it in my hand, Arnold—I keep it in my hand!"

The next course came in—and there was an end of the subject again. Sir Patrick enjoyed his mutton, and entered on a long and interesting narrative of the history of some rare white Burgundy on the table imported by himself. Arnold resolutely resumed the discussion with the departure of the mutton.

"It seems to be a dead lock," he said.

"No slang!" returned Sir Patrick.

"For Heaven's sake, Sir, consider my anxiety, and tell me what you propose to do!"

"I propose to take you to London with me in the morning, on this condition—that you promise me, on your word of honor, not to attempt to see your wife before Saturday next."

"I shall see her then?"

"If you give me your promise."

"I do, Sir."

The next course came in. Sir Patrick entered on the question of the merits of the partridge, viewed as an eatable bird. "By himself, Arnold—plainly roasted, and tested on his own merits—not stuffed with forcemeat. I am fond of shooting him in this country, we become too fond of eating him next. Properly understood, he is a welcome bird to the table—nothing more. Or no—that is hardly doing him justice. I am bound to add that he is honorably associated with the famous French receipt for cooking an olive. Do you know it?"

"Here we are at the end of the bird; there was an end of the jelly. Arnold got his next chance—and took it.

"What is to be done in London to-morrow?" he asked.

"To-morrow," answered Sir Patrick, "is a memorable day in our calendar. To-morrow is Tuesday—the day on which I am to see Miss Silvester."

Arnold set down the glass of wine which he was just raising to his lips.

"After what has happened," he said, "I can hardly bear to hear her name mentioned. Miss Silvester has ceased to be any thing to me."

"Miss Silvester may atone for that, Arnold by uttering you again."

"She has been the ruin of me so far."

"She may be the salvation of you yet."

The dinner came on. Sir Patrick returned to the Art of Cookery.

"You know the receipt for cooking an olive, Arnold?"

"No."

"What does the new generation know? It knows how to row, how to shoot, how to play at cricket, and how to bet—and that is to say, when it has grown old—what a generation it will be! I should hunter: I sha'n't live to see it. Are you listening, Arnold?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Well, to cook an olive: Put an olive into a lark; put a lark into a quail; put a quail into a pheasant; put a plover into a partridge; put a partridge into a pheasant; put a pheasant into a turkey. Good. First, partially roast; then stuff elaborately with the whole of the birds next to the olive. Good again. Next, open the window—throw out the whole of the contents of partridge, the plover, the quail, and the lark. Then, eat the olive. The dish is expensive, but the result is the highest attainable in the art of the sacrifice. The quintessence of the flavor of six birds concentrated in one olive. Arnold's toast! Try another glass of the white Burgundy, Arnold."

At last the servants left them—with the wine and dessert on the table.

"I have been at it as long as I can, Sir," said Arnold. "Add to all your kindness to me by telling me at once what happened at Lady Lundie's."

It was a chilly evening. A bright wood fire was burning in the room. Sir Patrick drew his chair to the fire.

"This is exactly what happened," he said. "I found company at Lady Lundie's when I got with. Two perfect strangers to me. Captain Newenden, and his niece, Mrs. Glenarm. Lady Lundie introduced me to see me a member of the two strangers offered to withdraw. I declined the proposal. First civility to Arnold, which Sibe has reckoned throughout, Arnold, on our being afraid to face public opinion. I showed her at starting that we were not afraid of it—as she was. 'I always accept what the French call accomplished facts,' I said. Next civility. I brought matters to a crisis, Lady Lundie. So let it be. I have a word to say to my niece (in confidence, Arnold!) and I have a word another word to say to you afterward—without presuming to disturb your guests. Civility to myself—and to Arnold (naturally devoured by curiosity). Could her lalyship decently refuse me an interview with my own niece? Not if the newspapers were looking on? Impossible. I saw Blanche in the inner room privately. It is needless to say I was back drawing-room. I gave her your letter; I said a good word for you, I was quite sure of your story; and I have come back —and that was enough. We went back into the front drawing-room. I was left to open on the question of the question before it appeared, to my astonishment and delight, that Captain Newenden was in the dilemma of the question that had brought me into the house—the question of you and Miss Silvester. Captain Newenden's guests of my niece, was to deny your marriage to the lady. His business, in the interests of his niece, was to compel the marriage to the lady. To the unutterable disgust of the two women, we joined issue, in the most friendly manner, on the spot. Charmed to have the pleasure of meeting you, Captain Newenden.'—Delighted to have the honor of making your acquaintance, Sir Patrick.'—I think we can settle this in two minutes.'—I think we can settle it in two minutes.' Upon your position, Captain.'—With the greatest pleasure. Here is my niece, Mrs. Glenarm, engaged to marry Mr. Geoffrey Delamayn. All very well, but there happens to be an obstacle—in the shape of a lady. Do I put it plainly?'—'You put it admirably, Captain; but for the loss to the British navy, you ought to have been a lawyer. Pray, go on.'—'You are too good, Sir Patrick.' In course. Mr. Delamayn asserts that this person in the back-ground has no claim on him, and backs his assertion by declaring that she is married already to Mr. Arnold Brinkworth. Lady Lundie and my niece assure me, on evidence which, on this occasion, I see that the assertion is true. The evidence does not satisfy me. I hope, Sir Patrick, I don't strike you as being an excessively obstinate man?'—'My dear Sir, you impress me with the highest opinion of your capacity for sifting human testimony!' May I ask, next, what course you mean to take?'—'I am very sorry, I am going to return to my hotel.' This is my course. I refuse to sanction my niece's engagement to Mr. Delamayn, until Mr. Delamayn has publicly proved his statement by appeal to witnesses of the lady's marriage. He owes me or his own character, but decline witnesses at once in the matter for himself, on the ground that he is in training for a foot-race. I admit that that is a reason, and consent to wait either for bringing the two witnesses to London myself. By this post I have written to my agent here in Perth to look the witnesses up; to offer them the necessary terms (at Mr. Delamayn's expense) for the use of their time, and to produce them by the end of the week. The foot-race is on Thursday next. Mr. Delamayn will be on the ground after that, to establish his own assertion by his own witnesses. What do you say, Sir Patrick, to such a course?'—'I say you have my permission) in this room?'—There is the substance of the captain's statement. He is to wait all I am, and is devoted to look like thirty, but a very pleasant fellow for all that. I struck my sister-in-law very agreeably accepting the proposal without a moment's hesitation. Mrs. Glenarm and Lady Lundie looked at each other in mute amazement. There was a difference about which two women would have mortally quarreled; and here they were agreeing at once in the friendliest possible manner. I wish you had seen Lady Lundie's face, when I declared myself deeply indebted to her for having forestalled by reducing my prolonged interview with her lalyship quite unnecessary. 'Thanks to the captain,' I said to her, in the most cordial manner, 'we have absolutely nothing to discuss. I shall catch the evening train, and Arnold Brinkworth's affairs are quite at ease.' To come back to serious things, I have engaged to produce you, in the presence of every party now with us, at the appointed time. I put a bold face on it before the others. But I can tell you that it is by no means an easy to say—situated as we are now—what the result of Saturday's enquiry will be. Much, very much depends in the way of my interview with Miss Silvester to-morrow. It is no exaggeration to say, Arnold, that your life is in her hands.'

"I wish to heaven I had never set eyes on her!" said Arnold.

Sir Patrick took the right horse, returned Sir Patrick. "Wish you had never set eyes on Geoffrey Delamayn!"

Arnold hung his head. Sir Patrick's sharp tongue had got the better of him once more.

CHAPTER IV.

We can imagine no greater mistake in life than for a man or woman to preserve an apparent constancy in action after their affections have gone away from the person to whom they have pledged it. It is a mistake which is frequently committed, we know, but it is not less a mistake. It is a burlesque of honor, and a violation of truth, and yet it is the sacrifice which many an ardent lover demands. His sweet mistress promises to marry him, one quiet summer evening, when a sudden access of affection makes them picture their future as if it could only be a repetition of the present. It was a beautiful picture, doubtless, and in the fresh flush of youthful devotion they gave each other tender assurances of constancy, and swore to be husband and wife. Now some three years are over and gone, and the lover returns to claim the promised prize. During his absence the fickle jade has given to a woman, and she has acquired very different notions of the world. In spite of herself—in spite of all honor—she finds new tastes, and duties by which a woman may preserve the memory of a man—the old love has necessarily faded away. She regrets with dismay his return. Her first impulse is to meet him frankly, tell him the whole story, and bid him take back his vows, to release her from the engagement. Then, again, she shrinks from the pain she knows she will inflict upon him. She shrinks, also, from lowering herself in his opinion and the opinion of others. She will not sin, but she will be a heartless and faithless creature, unworthy of the patient devotion with which he has labored for her and thought of her during that long separation. Very probably some such motive as this will prompt her to act in a strange notion of duty will prompt her to act in direct violation of her pledge, which is now a mockery and a delusion. Even suppose she possesses sufficient courage to tell him, that during these years, she has come to think differently, and that she is afraid for affection to be extinguished between husband and wife, she is likely to overcome her scruples by his vehemence. Does she love somebody else? he demands. No. Has she any thing to find fault with in him? No. Then is not this strange notion merely a whim, a caprice? Will not use and wont revive the old love, even should it have been partially faded? Has he not sufficient love to make their union a happy one? And so forth, and so forth—all reasonable proposition, all false. From time immemorial, have uttered. Add to these his declaration that, if she does not marry him, she will break his heart and ruin his life; he will blow his brains out, or enlist as a soldier, or do something equally wild and unnecessary. Trembling, excited, and deeply commiserating her lover's plight, the girl receives to remain "constant." She meets him at the altar, and promises what she knows she can not perform. She enters her new sphere of life with little of hope, if not with downright aversion, and the consequences of that act may imbitter her whole life in misery. Yet she knows herself a miracle of constancy; and the world will applaud her good conduct.

INDIANS MOVING.

ON illustration on page 324 shows the manner in which the populaton of an Indian village make a journey from one place of encampment to another, taking their habitations with them. The long poles on which the tent-skins were stretched serve to form as a rude kind of sledge or drag, for the conveyance of such household goods as make the scanty furniture of an Indian lodge. Such a procession makes a very picturesque spectacle, moving leisure-ukelee over the plains, warriors, squaws, young ones, dogs, and ponies, all mingled together. Perhaps no sight is more grateful to the Western settler than that of these aborigines obeying the general law of "Westward ho!" The farther and quicker they go the better, as the extinction of the white intruders, until they meet the tide of white civilization advancing Eastward from the Western coast, when the northernmost Territories will be the only place of refuge for such as refuse to die or become civilized.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

As Iowa girl wents to die, but she prefers to be remembered with a kiss.

"Dah," said an ancient legislator to his indulgent parent, who had gratified him with a visit to the gallery of the House, "say, de pros are always going on! I don't." "No," said the astonished father, "of course not. Why did you ask?" "Cause the man in the bag desk says 'the ayes have it?' and just as I was a-going to answer, I thought I'd have some fun down there somwen."

A Bibernian, entering a menagerie, was asked if he knew by what animal the lion's mane was made. "Ah, faith," said Pat, "I've seen many a one in swate Ireland an' not a two of them."

When the Fifteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry entered the town of Dawson, Georgia, on the march to the sea, a young secesh widow welcomed them was a negro woman. Her natural repugnance deserted her at once, and, moved by curiosity, one of "boys" rode up to her and inquired, "Aunty, what do you think of us?" "Oh, chile," she replied, "I don't 'nicity know nuffin' but I like you all de same as if you was white."

UNIVERSAL PROPOSITION.—A gold-cheer.

"Would ye plase, mum," said Bridget, the other evening, "an' I'd like ye to find me the loan of your husband's razor to a party." "Why, Bridget," replied she, for bortured clothes sizer fit me like me own."

CAN a cow cover the forehead be called, "Locke on the Understanding?"

An enthusiastic old lady, living near Detroit, whose husband had, but a few days previous, been attended to his last resting-place by the Masonic Fraternity, was very much elated with the obsequies. Narrating the particulars of the occasion to a neighbor, she would up by saying, "Oh, you ought to have been there—we had a splendid time!"

"Every man his own sauce," is the way the new flying-machine is announced in NEW YORK.

"What do you mean," inquired an inquisitive lady of a little boy, "by the term 'putting a leading question?'" "Why when I ask my teacher if I can go out," replied the learned gentleman, suiting the action to the word.

AN Sunday-school in Bijou's teacher asked a little boy if he knew what the expression "sowing wild oats" meant. "Yes, ma'am," he replied, "it means the seat of his little trowsies around in front." "There's a letter for you in Detroit," said a friend to Mr. Bell.

Letters, like fashionable young ladies, must have the stamps before the mails (unless) will take them.

THREE things a lady can not do:

1. She can not pass a shoemaker's shop without stopping.

2. She can not see a piece of lace without asking the price.

3. She can not see a baby without kissing it.

A baby turns the table on the gentlemen, as follows: A gentleman goes to church with a baby.

1. He can not go through the house and shut the doors after him.

2. He can not have a shirt made to suit him.

3. He can not be saluted with the ladies' fashions.

CLERKS FOR RAILWAY LOCOMOTIVES.—The "Smasher," the "Finisher," the "Crusher," the "Grinder," and the "All in at Death."

SCENE IN A SCHOOL-ROOM.

Said Master Beach to Willie Smith,
"Your head is very full of pith."
Said Willie Smith to Master Beech,
"Twill just do, Sir, I am thankful."

"And if I will answer just as well,
I'll never my hand to Lilly Bell."
Now know 'twon't hurt nor scar so bad,
And Lilly dear will be so glad."

The master looked as sweet
As if he'd just been kissed;
And with a mild expression
The school is now dismissed."

WYOMING nurses calm the rising generation by singing:

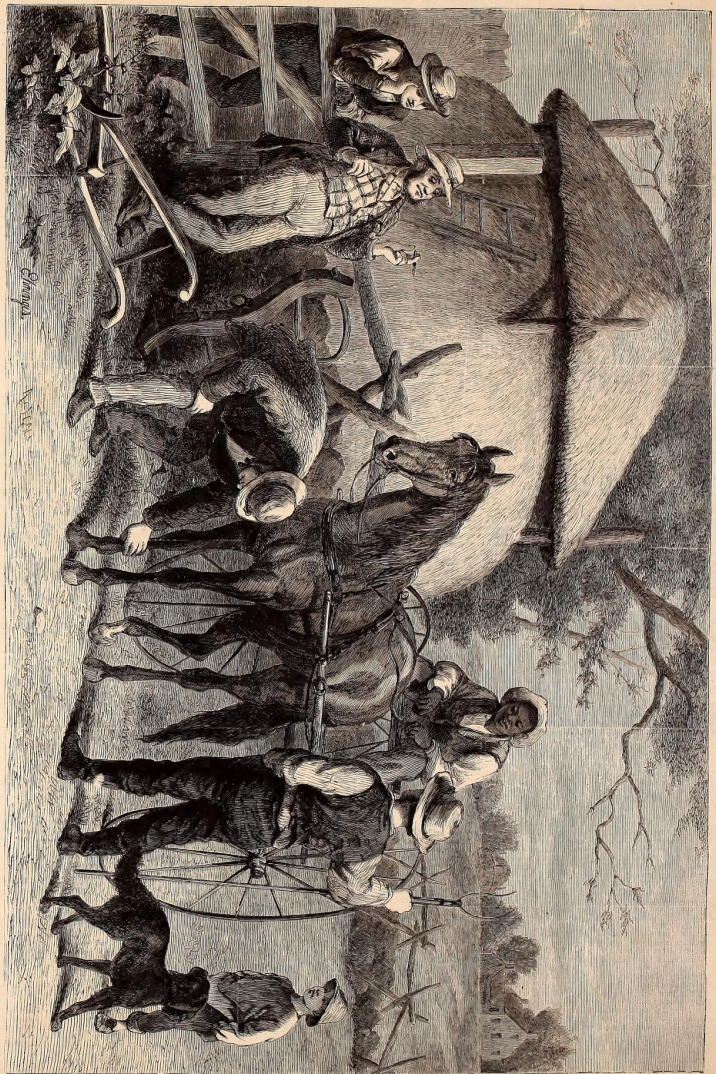
"Nice little baby, don't get in a fury,
Cause mamma's gone to sit on the jury."

THE cat that serenaded a literary lady the other night has not been able to be out since; and the lady is minus one boot, one flower-pot, a patent inkstand, and a new chignon.

AN old soaker replied to a temperance lecturer by the following poser: "If water will make the stem of a tree wax, will it not make the stem of your stomach?"

COURT-PLASTERER.—Awards for damages.

SPRING BLOSSOMS.—[DRAWN BY WINSLOW HOMER.]



THE FOURSOME.—[DRAWN BY W. HAMILTON.]

REGRET.

My love is gone: the summer sea
Shall sing the rocks their roundelay;
But who will care to sing to me,
I am so full of misery?

My love is gone: in angry mood,
From my caprice and scorn, this day
He passed, and left me where I stood;
And I am full of misery.

My love is gone: the girdled bee
Shall kiss the bluebell day by day;
But who will care to comfort me,
I am so full of misery?

My love is gone: my aching breast
Shall wear cold sob, and weep away
Its grief; but it will never rest,
It is so full of misery.

VERONICA.

By the Author of "Aunt Margaret's Trouble."

In Five Books.—Book V.

CHAPTER XV.

EXPLICIT.

CESARE advanced into the room silently, with his eyes fixed on his wife. He was very pale, and his hand plucked at his mustache with the little, scrupulous motion of the fingers that was so suggestive of cruelty. Veronica, when she saw him, started violently, and dropped Pliny's hand. The surgeon stood firm and still, and looked at Cesare quietly, neither apprehensive nor defiant. For some seconds no one spoke. The room was as still as death. Cesare's eyes glittered like fire, and wandered round the boudoir, looking more than ever like the inscrutable eyes in a picture on which you can not get a good light. His glance took in every detail of the scene. The preparations for supper, the half-emptied flasks of wine; above all, his wife's torn sleeve, and the wasted arm with its livid bruises. Then he spoke.

"Mille scusi! I intrude. No wonder you preferred to stay at home, cara gioja! But why did you not tell me that you expected a guest? Ha! Quite a caravese—a banquet! Per Dio! It is diverting! Like a scene in a comedy. It is complete! Wife and Roussero—and the husband!"

He spoke in Italian, and with an insolent, mocking bitterness of irony, which perhaps only an Italian can attain. Veronica did not speak. She sat still, with parted lips and dilated eyes, and her heart beat with such suffocating rapidity that she could not breathe at the sound. Suddenly Berletti turned to Pliny, and addressed him in English, with a total change of tone.

"What is your fare?" he asked coldly.

"I came here, Prince Barletti, because—" He saw in Veronica's face a secret which revealed the fact that she had sent for him. "Because I happened to be in town, and thought that, for old acquaintance sake, I might venture to call on your wife. I am sorry to perceive by your manner, unnecessarily insulting though in courteous manner, you will allow me to say, toward one whom you consider your inferior—that my visit is distasteful to you."

"Distasteful! Come? How can you think it? Come, cara? How distasteful? Schiavo mio! I am your slave."

"I think, Cesare, you—might—be—decently civil—if not kind—to an old friend of mine—whom—I—so—value," gasped out Veronica, with her hand pressed to her side to restrain the painful tumult of her heart.

"Angelo mio diletto! I have a great defect. I confess it with much penance. I am not of those husbands—those amiable and dear husbands—who are kind to the old and valued friend of their wife. Ce sont! I am made so. Son fatto così."

"You are mad, Cesare!"

"Not at all. Ah no! I have the disgrazia —the disgrace—to be in my sound mind. I have a memory—oh! good memory—and I tell you of my antipathy—another defect—I am full of them—for a certain person. And did I say that I like him not to come in my house?"

All this while Cesare was standing, with folded arms, on the opposite side of the table to his wife and Pliny. The latter left his position near Veronica, and advanced toward Barletti, still, however, keeping the table between them.

"I shall not trust myself to say what I think of your conduct," said the surgeon, quietly, "lest you trust ser matters little—"

"It matters nothing. You are right. It matters not that!" returned Barletti, snapping his fingers close to the surgeon's face. The latter stood like a rock.

"You had better take care," said he, quietly. "You might chance to touch me if you did that again."

"And if so? Even if so, eh? Maledetto canaglia che tu sei?"

Pliny did not understand the words, but the look and tone that accompanied them were intelligible enough. He colored high, but spoke still in the same quiet manner, that in its unaffected manliness had a certain dignity.

"You have told your wife in my presence that you had an antipathy to me—why, Heaven knows!—and that you had desired never to see me in your house. Even had I known this, I do not think it would have prevented me from coming—"

"Without doubt! Oh, without doubt! He is pleasant, this buffone!"

"But I did not know it. And my errand here to-night was—partly—to deliver a message to your wife from her father.

"You lie!" Cesare!! Per pieta!" cried Veronica, rising and holding up her hands as though to shut out the words from the surgeon's ears.

"Don't be afraid, Veronica," said Pliny, with a quivering lip, "I am not a child, to be carried away into passion by a vile, vulgar insult from one whom I despise."

"Be silent, then!" cried Cesare, turning on her with savage fury. He spoke now in his own language, and poured out a torrent of opprobrious taunts and invectives with the volubility of an angry lazzarone.

He was ignorant of Mr. Plew. Wild and incredible as the idea appeared to Veronica, it nevertheless was true. Some jocular disparagement of the vicar about Mr. Plew's old adoration for his daughter had first attracted his attention to the behavior of Veronica toward this man. He had been struck by the unexampled fact of her taking the trouble to write letters to him from Monte Magna. He had more than once told Veronica, as the reader knows, that the village surgeon was, as he phrased it, sotto-prete di loro. So all she persisted in communicating with him. Cesare had watched the posting of her letters. Why should she care to write to Mr. Plew? Friendship? Bah! He was not a fool. What friendship could there be between a man of brilliant young women like his wife and a man who, however unattractive he might be in Cesare's eyes, was still far from old, and, moreover, had loved Veronica in years gone by? Che, che! He did not love him, she declared. Then he must love to her. Cesare's jealousy was alert and furious at the thought. Then one night he comes home unexpectedly, and finds this man with his wife—with his wife, who had refused to go out with him in spite of his repeated requests to her to do so. She had been complaining of him, too, to this accursed doctor. Did he not see the torn sleeve, and the bruised arm? Assuredly he did. To preach that could lucrate a woman's feelings had he but heap on her the blame?

"Oh, merciful Heaven!" she cried, pressing her hands to her throbbing temples, "this is more than I can bear. Cesare, I implore you—I implore you—I implore you—I implore you, insanity—yes, insanity—is in your family—you will tell you now the truth. I can not remain with you. I have made up my mind to separate from you, and to live alone. You shall have the money—all the wicked, weary money: give me only enough to live on, and let me go. I am broken and crushed. I can bear no more."

"You hear the Signora Principessa?" said Cesare, pausing for a moment in his invectives.

"You hear her! Can not you, you valued friend, persuade her to be wise? I am her husband. Ah, I know your English law! I am master, she is slave. Can not you advise her? Eh? I fear you are disinclined to do so. I will give her wise. See, here is the fiasco nearly void. Do you not know that she has too great penchant for the wine, in these unfortunate days? Or did you perhaps teach her to love it, like the sister of the Signora?"

"You are more base and contemptible than I could have believed is possible for a man to be. I shall not remain longer in this house. Veronica! But I would have you know, and to understand, not to lay to my charge, that this visit was made by friends and protectors, and that the English law, which you profess to know so well, does not permit you to treat your wife with the brutality which I can bear witness."

"Ciuro a Dio!" cried Cesare, in a transport of fury. "This to me—to me! You are perhaps her protector—cane maledetto!"

"Don't go!" screamed Veronica, clinging to the surgeon's arm, and cowering away from her husband. "He will kill me when you are gone!"

With a tremendous effort Cesare seized a knife from the table, and made a thrust at the surgeon. Pliny caught the descending weapon, and, self between the two men, and the knife, glancing off Pliny's thick coat, was plunged into her side.

"O God! Veronica!" cried Pliny, instantly sorting her in his arms, and, as her weight sank, kneeling down upon the ground, and resting her head on his knee. "Oh, my beloved!"

Cesare stood transfixed and motionless, looking at the flowing blood. The long, black hair that covered the surgeon's knee, the white face that lay upon it.

"Get assistance! Call for help! You have murdered her. Veronica! Veronica!"

"I—is she dead?" said Cesare. Then, without waiting for a reply, he rushed out of the room with a long, tremendous step, descended the stairs with headlong vehemence, and was gone. The surgeon's cries presently brought up a crowd of startled servants, most of them beasts, and hurried with a revel they had been holding in their own domain, and which had been prolonged by hearing Cesare rush down the stairs and from the house. There was a chorus of exclamations—a confused Babel of voices. Then the old woman screamed murder.

"Silence, you fools!" she said. Help me to lay her on the couch."

He had snatched the blood as well as he could, and it still flowed, and as they lifted her to lay her on the couch it broke forth afresh, and left a ghastly path as it marked their path across the gayly-flowered carpet.

"Go for a doctor instantly! Go you!" said Mr. Plew, singling out one man who looked less scared and more self-possessed than the others. He was a groom, and had not long been in the prince's service.

"I am a medical man myself," said Mr. Plew, "but I must have assistance."

The man set off, promising to make good speed. Several doctors lived within a short distance of the house. He would not return without some one. Mr. Plew then asked for water and fresh linen, and, the servants all busy, he made two of the women assist him to do what could be done. They laid a white sheet over her, and put pillows and cushions beneath her head. In a few minutes, as he hung over her with an agonized face, she opened her eyes.

"Lord be merciful! She's alive!" cried one of the women.

Mr. Plew checked her by putting his hand over her mouth.

"Be quiet. It's a matter of life and death that you should be quiet. Veronica," he added, putting his lips close to her ear, and speaking very softly. "Do you know me?"

She formed the word "yes," with her colorless lips. Then her eyes languidly wandered about the room as though in search of some one. Then they met his face. She frowned. Cesare's absence. He had hitherto had eyes and ears only for her.

"Where is—your master?" he asked of one of the women, interpreting Veronica's look.

"Master? Master? I don't know! Did he come in?"

"Yes, yes; he was here. He was here just now."

"Then," cried one of the women, clasping her hands, "was it he that done it?"

Veronica made a violent effort to speak. "It was not all his fault," she gasped. "I—fell—on the knife."

The exertion was too great for her, and she drooped again. In a few moments the groom returned, bringing with him the doctor and a policeman.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE END.

"THERE is not the least hope. You had better send for your friends at once. Are they in London? She can not last many hours."

The sickly gray dawn was creeping in at the windows of the room where Mr. Plew had watched all night by the side of the dying girl. Dying? Ay, ay, too surely. Both the surgeon's verdict had been uttered Mr. Plew had known full well, although he had striven against the knowledge, that it was beyond mortal skill to save her. The light of a shaded lamp struggled with the dawn, but he had not dared to remove Veronica from the couch on which she had been placed at first. The growing daylight gradually revealed more and more of the horrible aspect of the chamber. The contrast of its gaudy richness and bright gilding with the awful stains that ran along the floor, and with the ghastly whiteness of the covering that concealed the helpless form on the couch, and with the blanched and forlorn, disheveled hair tossed wildly around it, was horrible.

They had cut the hair off roughly here and there, in jagged owls, to keep it from distressing her by its weight and heat. Both the doctors had at first conceived in thinking that there might be some hope. When it was desired to take her dangerous, the medical men had said that to disturb her with questions would be at that moment cruelty. But she had lain in this quiet and patience, she might be able by-and-by to speak.

Meanwhile search was being made for her guilty husband, who, it was clear, had fled from the consequences of his crime. But, after two hours, a violent fever set in. From that moment Mr. Plew knew that she was doomed. She had been delirious all night, and had asked constantly for water, water, water. But she spoke chiefly in Italian. Her faithful, loving friend had watched by her through the long night of agony, such as breaks the heart and blanches the head. Then, with the first light of morning, came the words that head this chapter:

"There is no hope."

Her father had been telegraphed for, but it was scarcely possible that she should survive to see him, for illness was the utmost speed he could.

After the long night of pain, fever, and delirium, the first rays of morning found the sufferer sleeping. It seemed not, indeed, so much a sleep as a lethargy that weighed on her eyelids, surrounded by the violet circles that made the pallor of her cheeks and brow startling.

"Has any news been heard of the man—the Prince Cesare," asked the London physician, in a low voice, of Mr. Plew. The former had not raised the head supported by Veronica's couch, as her old friend had done. He had contented himself with sending a nurse, and promising to come again in the early morning. This promise he had kept. Mr. Plew shook his head in answer to the doctor's question.

"I hope they'll catch the villain," said the physician.

Mr. Plew at that moment had no thought or care for Cesare's punishment. His whole soul seemed to hang upon the prostrate form from which the life was ebbing away drop by drop.

"The magistrate will be here by-and-by," said the doctor.

"She must not be disturbed!" said Mr. Plew. "She must not be tortured."

The physician slightly shrugged his shoulders, and looked at the sleeper with a cool compassion in his face. "They must not delay very long, if they want to see her alive. The end is near," said he.

Mr. Plew remained perfectly still, watching her face, from which he did not withdraw his eyes for a moment, even in addressing the other man. His hands were folded together on his breast. In his heart he was praying that she might regain consciousness, and recognize him, before the end.

"O Lord, may this grace be vouchsafed to me!"

No ran his prayer.

Mr. Plew was not unskilled in his own science, and he did not pray for her recovery. That, he thought he, was to a miracle. A man can not hope for a miracle. It did not occur to him that any special answer to special prayer must be miraculous. The human heart is complex and illogical, and desires many contradictory influences from the simplest premise. Half an hour passed. Then there came a ring at the door, which sounded with painful metallic vibrations through the hushed house.

"I will go down and see them," said the physician, divining who the early visitors must be, and not sorry to leave a scene in which he could be of no use.

"But must she be disturbed," said Mr. Plew, still without moving or changing the fixed direction of his glance. The other nodded, and noiselessly left the room. The hired nurse sat, with closed eyes, in a chair in a distant corner of the room. She was not fully asleep; but she took a measure of repose in the half-waking fashion remembered by her avocations. There was a muffled sound of feet below; the closing of a door—then all was still.

Suddenly the surgeon's gaze, instead of looking on closed, violet-tinted eyelids, with their heavy black fringe, met a pair of wide-open, beguard eyes, that looked strange, but not wild: eyes without meaning.

"Mr. Plew!"

The whispered sound of his own name made him leap suddenly in his seat. All the night she had been calling on Cesare, begging him to save her from him or other; imploring him to give her a drink of water; appointing an hour for him to meet her in the Villa Resie: always associating him with some horror or trouble. And now she spoke in Italian; but her husband's name, and even his other words, had been heard to pass the watcher an idea of the images that filled her poor fevered brain.

"My dearest," he answered.

She feebly moved her hand, and he took it in his own. She looked her eyes full upward, as though to signify that that was what she had desired him to do.

Then she opened her eyes again, and looking at him with a terrible, wide stare, whispered, "Shall I die?"

His face was wrung with a bitter agony as he saw her plaintive, pleading face, full of the vague terror of a frightened child. He pressed her hand gently, and stroked the matted hair from her forehead. He tried to speak comfort to her. But it was in vain. He had not lied to her then.

"Don't let me die! I am very young. Can't I get better? Oh, can't I get better? I am so afraid! Keep me with you. Hold my hand. Don't let me go!"

"Veronica! My only love! Be calm! Have faith in me!"

"Oh, but I am afraid. It is so dreadful to—die!"

She hid her face against his hand, and moaned and murmured a little incoherently.

"Our Father, have mercy upon her!" sobbed the surgeon. But even as he sobbed he was careful to suppress the convulsive heaving of his chest, so far as it was in his power to command it, lest it should shake the hand she clung to.

Again she moved her head enough to enable her to look at him. "Are you there?" she said. "You can pray. God will hear you. Will he?—will he?—will he?" Oh, yes; yes! and Maud. You and Maud—you and— Do you see that tombstone in St. Giles's graveyard? I dreamed once that I was going to marry you, and he started out from behind the tombstone to forbid it. That was a dream. But the tombstone is there: white, all white on the turf. Don't you see it?"

"Veronica! Do you hear me?"

"Yes—Mr. Plew. Poor Mr. Plew! He loved me. Was it you?"

"I loved you. I love you. Listen! Do you think you can pray?"

"O-h-h-h! I am afraid! But if you say—if you say it—I will try."

He uttered a short prayer.

"Do you forgive all those who have done you wrong?"

"Forgive! I am very sorry. I am sorry. I hope they will forgive me. Yes: I forgive."

"My darling, let me kiss you. You are not in pain?"

"No. It is so dark now! That old yew-tree shadow that will grow too much. I wish I could go away where there is more light, shan't we? We won't stay here."

"We will go where there is more light, my treasure. Lean your dear head on my arm, beloved. You can not feel pain with me near."

"Not frightened now; tired—so tired! How dark the yew-tree makes the window! Ah!"

She gave a long, quivering sigh, and drooped her head quite down upon his hand.

* * * * * * *

When they came to see if the sufferer could be spoken to, they found him standing, rigid, with her fingers locked in his. He had his hand to warn them to be silent as they entered.

"She must not be disturbed!" he whispered.

Disturbed! echoed the physician, advancing hastily. "She will never be disturbed more. My dear Sir, you must compose yourself. I feel for your grief. You were evidently much attached to the unfortunate lady. But there is no more to be done—she is dead."

* * * * * * *

Several years later there arrived in Leghorn, from the United States, an Italian—a sicilian he called himself—who was supposed by those who understood such matters to be mixed up with certain political movements, of a republican tendency, in the South. He was an agent of Mazzini, said one. He was a rich adventurer, who had been a filibuster, said another. He was a mere adventurer of industrie, declared a third, and the speaker remembered his face in more than one capital of Europe. Doubtless he had been attracted to the neighborhood of Florence by its recent elevation to the rank of a metropolis. Or it might be that he had made New York too hot to hold him.

One night there was a disturbance at a low café in Leghorn, near the port, frequented chiefly by Greek sailors. A man was stabbed to the heart, and his assassin, a certain Greek of infamous character, named Polypopulo, was condemned to the galleys for life.

Of the murdered man little was known. The landlord of the café deposed that he had entered his house together with the Greek, the latter seeming more lavishly provided with ready cash than was his wont; that he (the landlord), perceiving that the stranger was of a different class to the generality of his customers, was induced by curiosity to pay some attention to his conversation (in other words, to listen at the door of the miserable room occupied by the Greek); that he had heard the two men quarreling, and the Greek especially insisting on a large sum of money, increasing over and over again that twenty thousand francs was a cheap price to let him off at. He supposed there had been a struggle, for he had soon heard a scuffling noise, and the voice of Polypopulo crying out that he should not serve him as he had served his wife! He had got assistance, and broken open the door. By the time he was dead: stabbed to the heart. Che vuole? Pazienza! Polypopulo had tried to escape by the window, but was too great a coward to leap. So they caught him. That was all he knew. Ecco!

The murdered man was known in Leghorn as Cesare Cesarino. But there was more than one disinguished noble who could have given a different name to him. But they never thought of doing so. The man was dead. There had been sundry unpleasant circumstances connected with his history. And would it not have been exceedingly reasonable to stir up all those disagreeable recollections, to the annoyance of a really illustrious Neapolitan family, who had become quite the talking of society since their wealth, or wealth from the sale of some property to an English company, had afterward served to smash?

Che, che! let by-gones be by-gones!

So Cesare de' Barletti sleeps in a pauper's grave, and the more people know of his story the more.

Maud was not told of Veronica's tragic fate until some weeks after her marriage—her husband feeling that it would cast a deep gloom over the early brightness of their wedded life. Her grief, when she knew the truth, was sincere and intense. And her only consolation was—as she often said to the poor sorrower—that they had her dear girl had died with his loving hand in hers, and had not been quite lonely and abandoned at the last.

The vicar's affliction was more demonstrative, but briefer, Maud. In less than a month's time enough in the present to prevent his brooding over the past. His young wife speedily discovered the anomalous nature of her husband's grief received by the gentry, and looked on with cold jealousy by those of her own station. She became fretful and saturnine, and turned out to have a shrewish tongue, and to be energetic in the using of it. And the vulgar family connections threatened all the scarcely, and lorded it over the vicar as the very callousness of religion.

Old Joanna left her old master with regret. But, as she said, she could not stand being envied over by Mrs. Meggitt. The landlord of the man went to live with Mrs. Hugh Lockwood, whose children—especially a boy about a little girl, named Veronica—she spoiled with supreme satisfaction to herself, and under the delusion that her discipline was Spartan in its rigor.

Miss Turtle inherited a trifling legacy from a bachelor uncle, who was a trustee in London on the strength of which legacy she set up a dayschool for the children of small shop-keepers, and such people, as she was very genteel, very modest, and very industrious, she prospered. She never married; and she and Mr. Plow continued fast friends to the end of their days.

Of the little surgeon—if these pages have succeeded in preserving him as he was—it need not be said that his life continued to be one of humble usefulness and activity. He was never merry, and seldom so outwardly sorrowful as total —sad. Once a year he made a pilgrimage to London, where he visited a lonely tomb in a suburban cemetery. But of these visits he never spoke.

And it was observed in him that, while he was always kind and gentle to all children, he was especially attached to one of Maud's little girls. But he always gave her the uncouth name she had bestowed upon herself in her baby efforts to talk—Wonca!—and he never called her Veronica!

THE END.

HAND-SHAKING.

How did people first get into the habit of shaking hands? The answer is not far to seek. In early and barbarous times, when every savage or semi-savage was his own lawgiver, judge, soldier, and policeman, and had to watch over his own safety, in default of all other protection, two friends or acquaintances, or two strangers desiring to be friends or acquaintances, when they chanced to meet, offered each to the other the right hand—the hand alike of offense and defense, the hand that wields the sword, the dagger, the club, the tomahawk, or other weapon of war. Each did this to show that the hand was empty, and that neither war nor treachery was intended. A man can not well stab another while he is engaged in the act of shaking hands with him, neither is he able to deliver a blow with a villain, and strives to aim a cowardly blow with the left, while giving the right and pretending to be on good terms with his victim. The custom of hand-shaking prevails, more or less, among all civilized nations, and is the tacit avowal of friendship and good-will, just as the kiss is of a warmer passion.

Ladies, as every one must have remarked, seldom or never shake hands with the cordiality of gentlemen; unless it be with each other. The reason is obvious. It is for them to receive homage, not to give it. They can not be expected to show to persons of the other sex a warmth of greeting not common to themselves; and, unless such persons are very closely related to them, they do not shake hands. In such cases hand-shaking is not needed, and the lips do more agreeable duty.

Some ladies use the "robustious" to a altogether pleasant. They take the offered hand with the grasp of a vise, and as if they, in a fit of antique prepense, resolved to squeeze all the delicate little bones of your knuckles into pulp or mince-meat. And while they are doing of agony runs into your eyes, and run down your cheeks, they smile at you benignantly, as if they were giving you delicious of their strength, and of the tyranny with which they exercise it. Many of them are truly good fellows, and must all the cordiality of which their awful squeeze is the manifestation. They would excel all the more-refined of their sex in such hand-shaking in rescuing you from danger, if you were in it, or in doing battle against your enemies if you were assailed by superior numbers. Yet when such seemingly cordial good fellows manifest the same cordiality toward people whom they never feel the least friendship, and toward those prith whom they may have been intimate for years, it is impossible to avoid a suspicion that they act from habit, rather than from the ebullition of the feelings of all the while to be worldly, he who squeezes your hand in this excruciating fashion, on a false pretense, is a hypocrite. Big dislocates your joints to convince you that he love you very dearly, and as soon as you are out of sight forgets you, or feels glad that you are in "great shakes" after all, or, worse still, abuses you behind your back in the basest companions whom he meets. Him, in his turn, he serves in the same manner, and gradually establishes for himself the character, "a good fellow," despite of being a snob and a humbug of a particularly offensive type.

Another, and even more odious kind of hand shaker, is he who offers you his hand, but will not permit you to get fair hold of it; one of whom it has been sung—

"With finger tip he condescends
To touch the hand of friends,
As if he feared their palms might brand
Some social stigma on the hand."

To be treated with the cool contempt or supercilious scorn which such a mode of salutation implies, is more than the flesh can endure. Better a foeman, with whom you feel on terms of equality, than an acquaintance—he can not be called a friend—who looks down upon you as if he were a superior being, and will not admit your equality even by the touch of hand and a discount. It sometimes happens, however, that this result is due to the diffidence of the shaken rather than to the pride of the shaker. Such a man will not hold his hand out far enough to enable another to grasp it. This is a fault, a great fault, and betrays a weakness in his own character, and not a defect in that of him who would gladly shake with him.

Another hand-shaker whose method is intolerable, and with whom it is impossible to remain on friendly terms, is the one who offers you one finger instead of the tips of the whole five, as much as to say, "I would have offered you pied in myself, or think too little of you, to give you my whole hand. With such a man the interchange of sentiments but the barest possible courtesy is rendered difficult by any one who has the misfortune to be shaken.

To shake hands without removing the glove is an act of discourtesy, which, if unintentional and thoughtless, requires an apology for the seeming inadvertence which led to it. This idea would also seem to be an accurate one, and to rest on the notion that the glove might conceal a weapon. Hence true courtesy and friendship require that the right hand should be offered with both gloves off.

To refuse pointedly to shake hands with one who offers you the opportunity in a friendly manner amounts to a declaration of hostility. And where a quarrel—or act of discourtesy for the acceptance of the hand offered is alike the sign and the ratification of peace.

The nations of continental Europe are scarcely so much addicted to hand-shaking as the English, while the Orientals have a mode of their own less demonstrative and apparently cordial than the Americans, in which the hand is not offered or even hand-shaking at all. The Turk, for instance, places his hand upon his breast, his forehead, and his mouth, in succession, and thus conveys the assurance that he is sincere, or at least intends to be so. The Japanese, on the other hand, touch the ground with the forehead, and remain in that position for a length of time, which is supposed to be proportioned to the depth of their respect.

Our own Indians, who are Orientals in their habits of thought, have a mode of their own of expressing their friendship, which is not unlike that of the Japanese. They sit down in front of the person whom they wish to honor, and remain in silence for a length of time, which is supposed to be proportioned to the depth of their respect.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

FLYBOOTA CURTIS, of Brooklyn, and its current, unfashionable name, are well known throughout the country. And the fact that on the beautiful Sabbath that dawned on the morning of May ninety-eight persons united with that church, is of interest to many outside the immense throng that passed its doors on Sunday. The first Sunday in May has been regarded as a sacred and joyful anniversary in Plymouth Church since about eleven years ago, when two hundred individuals together made a public profession of their Christian faith. And then, May morning the pastor, whom which is the pastor's pulpit, was fragrant with the blossoms of spring, and the platform and ante-room stands, while a double border of mosses and trailing vines surrounded the entire platform. Some of the flowers were sent as a memorial of loved friends "not lost, but gone before," to whom the day had been consecrated; others, "the first-fruits to be wafted, by who squeezes your hand in this excruciating fashion, on a false pretense, is a hypocrite. Big dislocates your joints to convince you that he love you very dearly, and as soon as you are out of sight forgets you, or feels glad that you are in "great shakes" after all, or, worse still, abuses you behind your back in the basest companions whom he meets. Him, in his turn, he serves in the same manner, and gradually establishes for himself the character, "a good fellow," despite of being a snob and a humbug of a particularly offensive type.

Another, and even more odious kind of hand shaker, is he who offers you his hand, but will not permit you to get fair hold of it; one of whom it has been sung—

"With finger tip he condescends
To touch the hand of friends,
As if he feared their palms might brand
Some social stigma on the hand."

To be treated with the cool contempt or supercilious scorn which such a mode of salutation implies, is more than the flesh can endure. Better a foeman, with whom you feel on terms of equality, than an acquaintance—he can not be called a friend—who looks down upon you as if he were a superior being, and will not admit your equality even by the touch of hand and a discount. It sometimes happens, however, that this result is due to the diffidence of the shaken rather than to the pride of the shaker. Such a man will not hold his hand out far enough to enable another to grasp it. This is a fault, and betrays a weakness in his own character, and not a defect in that of him who would gladly shake with him.

Another hand-shaker whose method is intolerable, and with whom it is impossible to remain on friendly terms, is the one who offers you one finger instead of the tips of the whole five, as much as to say, "I would have offered you pied in myself, or think too little of you, to give you my whole hand. With such a man the interchange of sentiments but the barest possible courtesy is rendered difficult by any one who has the misfortune to be shaken.

To shake hands without removing the glove is an act of discourtesy, which, if unintentional and thoughtless, requires an apology for the seeming inadvertence which led to it. This idea would also seem to be an accurate one, and to rest on the notion that the glove might conceal a weapon. Hence true courtesy and friendship require that the right hand should be offered with both gloves off.

To refuse pointedly to shake hands with one who offers you the opportunity in a friendly manner amounts to a declaration of hostility. And where a quarrel—or act of discourtesy for the acceptance of the hand offered is alike the sign and the ratification of peace.

The nations of continental Europe are scarcely so much addicted to hand-shaking as the English, while the Orientals have a mode of their own less demonstrative and apparently cordial than the Americans, in which the hand is not offered or even hand-shaking at all. The Turk, for instance, places his hand upon his breast, his forehead, and his mouth, in succession, and thus conveys the assurance that he is sincere, or at least intends to be so. The Japanese, on the other hand, touch the ground with the forehead, and remain in that position for a length of time, which is supposed to be proportioned to the depth of their respect.

Our own Indians, who are Orientals in their habits of thought, have a mode of their own of expressing their friendship, which is not unlike that of the Japanese. They sit down in front of the person whom they wish to honor, and remain in silence for a length of time, which is supposed to be proportioned to the depth of their respect.

The divorce courts would make much of a certain law passed in England in 1770, if it could be re-enacted now. This is to the effect, "If any person, who shall by means of force or of blaze, of perfumes, of essences, of artificial teeth, of false hair, of cotton, of paper, of false busts or boops, of high-heeled shoes, or of false hips, entice any of his Majesty's male subjects into marriage, he, or she, shall incur the penalty, and the marriage shall be declared null and void."

An old-fashioned American, after having viewed the wonders of the Rhine with his accustomed eagerness, was asked his opinion of it. "Wa'al, Sir," said he, "it is not at equal to our North River. We haven't got them old castles, to be sure; but our water's as broad, and our rocks air twice as big and mostly perpendicular." A Frenchman remarked that the scenery on the Rhine were extremely picturesque, he coolly replied, "Yes, Sir, very much. I wonder if one could n't just put up a few if we offered them the contract; but our folks don't seem to think much of ruins, Sir, and when you come to think of it, you can't say there's much use in 'em."

Harriet Hosmer has received an order from the children of Edward Everett for a monument of bronze and red sandstone, to be placed in Mount Auburn Cemetery.

Ever since the city passenger cars have been running in Baltimore, colored people, though paying the same fare as white, have been compelled to ride upon the front platform. No seats were provided, and only the roof overhead protected them from the storm. Now, for has been recently brought into the United States Circuit Court, where it was explicitly declared that the law confers an equality of accommodations provided for all classes. Consequently the railroad authorities have been ordered to provide seats for colored people. It is, however, predicted that white people will prefer anything to the privilege of horses to waiting for others, provided white people are to be "allowed" in those reserved for colored people!

Since the fourteenth birthday of the Prince Imperial of France he has been by every act of flattery to the government of his household is as valid as if he were born in a palace. He is said to be a lovable boy with many good qualities to outweigh the prominent defect of disorder and boyishness, which is not to be reconciled by the habitual politeness of address ingbut by education. He is well informed on general subjects, but has no taste for school. In a word, he is what he was taken by the Empress to be presented to the inhabitants of Bordeaux: a child in consequence of a shock given to his nerves by the sudden firing of a cannon at that time, until last year, even the report of a pistol would cause him to turn pale, while the same can down his cheeks in spite of self-command which prevented him from uttering any exclamation indicative of the annoyance it gave him. His present excellent health and fine appearance have enabled him to overcome the most trying of the ordeals to which, although but a child, he has been exposed, the dislike which seeks avoidance still remains.

Somebody suggests that the marriage service should now be changed to read, "Who dares take this woman?" As the groom can then answer, "I dare," even if he feels courageous enough when the crisis comes.

Last April Wagner's great opera, "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," was performed for the first time in Munich, under Wagner's direction. The whole spot in the house was unoccupied, and hundreds applied in vain for tickets. A musical critic in the place was of course heightened by the conflicting opinions which prevail in musical circles about the merits of Wagner's operatic compositions. The task of bringing the "Meistersinger" before the public was anything but easy. Even the King himself for a long time having been judged necessary. On the whole, the execution of the performance was good, and the performance was well received. The "Meistersinger" is Wagner's first attempt at the comic opera; and those who know him only though his graver compositions can not but wonder at the versatility of his powers.

It is rumored that Ristori, having a young and handsome husband to provide for and children, and thinking that it will be a good means of furthering their interests, has decided indefinitely to act as a nurse, is about to leave the stage, and, as Marchioness del Grillo, settle in her native city.

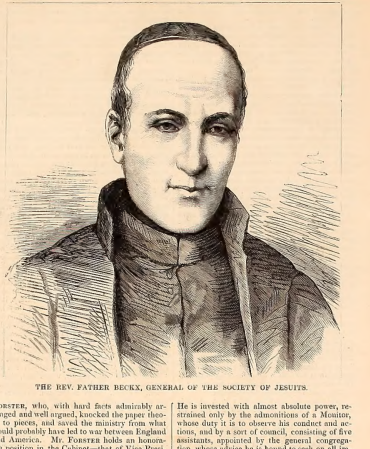
One of the games much appreciated by the Emperor of France is that of Les Définitions, at which he has made the Prince Imperial an great an adept as himself. In this game the boy has never to be the master the mysteries of its construction. One night great laughter was created in the imperial circle by the question propounded by M. Labrière: "What is a usurer?" "An unlawful banker," replied the Emperor, quickly. "Then what is a banker?" asked the Empress, in some surprise, as the laughter went round. "Why, a lawful usurer, to be sure!" replied the Emperor, amidst a perception of merriment, as the circle felt that the Emperor does not consider bankers, and there were two of the fraternity present at the moment, who joined in the laugh, notwithstanding the political nature of the joke.

THE RIGHT HONORABLE W. E. FORSTER, M.P.

WILLIAM E. FORSTER, M.P.

THIS distinguished English statesman, who has peculiar claims to the respect of Americans, was the son of WILLIAM FORSTER, a minister of the society of Friends, and was born at Bradpole, Dorsetshire, England, July 11, 1818. He was educated at Tottenham, in the school belonging to his society, and afterward settled at Bradford as a worsted manufacturer. In April, 1859, he was an unsuccessful candidate for Parliament at Leeds: but in February, 1861, he was returned for Bradford, for which borough he has continued to sit. In politics he is what is termed a "Philosophical Radical," and by his great ability has won for himself a foremost position in his party.

MR. FORSTER has made his mark in Parliament less by oratorical eloquence—for he is not what is generally termed an eloquent speaker—than by his thorough mastery of the subjects with which he dealt, and by his power, so valuable in debate, of being able to convince waverers, if not convert opponents. A memorable instance of this occurred in the important debate on the blockade of our Southern ports early in the war, when the English government, sore pressed by the opposition argument that the blockade was but a paper one, and ought therefore to be disregarded, was saved by the timely rising of Mr. FORSTER, who, with hard facts admirably arranged and well argued, knocked the paper theory to pieces, and saved the ministry from what would probably have led to war between England and America. MR. FORSTER holds an honorable position in the Cabinet—that of Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, which he is well fitted to occupy by training, sound judgment on the matter of national education, and general acquaintance with the requirements of the working-classes.



THE REV. FATHER BECKX, GENERAL OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUITS.

THE JESUIT GENERAL.

As every thing connected with the powerful society of Jesuits derives new interest at present from their influence on the great questions now before the Œcumenical Council, we give this week the portrait of the Rev. Father BECKX, who has been their General since his election in 1853. The General of this society is second only to the Pope in ecclesiastical importance. He is invested with almost absolute power, restrained only by the admonitions of a Monitor, whose duty it is to observe his conduct and actions, and by a sort of council, consisting of five assistants, appointed by the general congregation, whose advice he is bound to seek on all important occasions.

The operations of this powerful society embrace every part of the world, and are carried on by means of the most intricate and ingenious machinery ever contrived by man. The society is divided into five classes: 1st. Professed Members (Professi); 2d, Spiritual Coadjutors; 3d, Lay Coadjutors; 4th, Approved Pupils; 5th, The Novices. The professed members constitute the governing body of the society, and take upon themselves a fourth vow to go as missionaries wherever the Pope may send them. The spiritual coadjutors take the three vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, but not the fourth. The approved pupils are students accepted after a novitiate of two years, and on taking the three vows. In this second stage of his ecclesiastical training, the pupils sometimes devote fifteen years, or even more, to study and teaching. At the end of this period they may take the fourth vow in regard to missions. They are prohibited from accepting ecclesiastical honors unless by direct command of the sovereign pontiff: and their whole life must have but one aim—the advancement of the order to which they are attached. The Jesuit is not allowed to accumulate personal wealth, but is obliged to labor incessantly to increase the wealth, power, and influence of the society. This entire self-abnegation is the secret of the success of the Jesuits as an order.

BLOWING UP BLOSSOM ROCK, SAN FRANCISCO HARBOR.—FROM A SKETCH BY L. R. TOWNSEND.—[SEE PAGE 334.]

AFTER THE MATINEE.

From his residence in Rome the General directs the movements of the society in every part of the world, by means of a system in which the act of espionage is brought to perfection. Every month or every quarter he receives reports from the heads of all subordinate departments; and every third year the catalogues of every province, with detailed reports on the capacity and conduct of every member, are laid before him. Besides this, the most active correspondence is maintained with all parts of the world, in order to supply the officers of the society with the information they require. In the central house at Rome are kept voluminous registers, in which are inscribed the names of all Jesuits, of their adherents, and of all the considerable persons, whether friends or enemies, with whom they have any connection. In these registers, we are told, "are reported, without alteration, without hatred, without passion, the facts relating to the life of each individual. It is the most gigantic biographical collection that has ever been formed. The frailties of a woman, the secret errors of a statesman, are chronicled in these books with the same cold impartiality. Drawn up for the purpose of being useful, these biographies are necessarily exact. When the Jesuits wish to influence an individual, they have but to turn to these volumes to know immediately his life, his character, his faults, his family, his friends, his most secret ties." By the use of such machinery the order has attained its high position and wide-spread influence.

In EUGENE SUE'S powerful novel, "The Wandering Jew," there is a remarkable scene between the Marquis D'Aigrigny, General of the order of Jesuits, who once had held a command in the French army, and his former mistress. The Marquis is lamenting that he had never been able to attain to the complete abnegation demanded by the order. She replies:

"No doubt, Frederic, such renunciations are painful—but, in return, what influence! what power!"

"True," said the Marquis, after a moment's silence; "what would you not sacrifice for such a reward, over the mighty of the earth, over the people, openly? Yes, you are right, Rose; that I have just made, has given me a new idea of our formidable power."

"Oh yes! that power is great, very great," said the Princess; "and the more formidable and sure because it acts mysteriously on the mind and the conscience."

"Listen, Hermina!" said the Marquis; "I have had under my orders a magnificent regiment. Often have I felt the vigorous and deep enjoyment of command. At my voice my cuirassiers were all in motion, the trumpets sounded—my officers, glittering with gold embroidery, flew to repeat my orders—and when all those brave and ardent soldiers, marked with the scars of battle, than I observed a stir there. I felt myself proud and strong, looking in my hand, as it were, the courage that I could wish to possess in a world controlled by fear and selfishness. Well, in spite of our evil days, I am powerful, at the head of this black stranger and his race, which thinks, wills, acts, obeys, the passive instruments of my designs."

The man who now wields this tremendous power is a quiet, refined Belgian priest, about seventy-five years of age—a man of great energy, shrewdness, and practical wisdom. He is the twenty-second man who has held the position of General since the foundation of the order.

OLD LOVES.

WAITING beside a brook to-day.
By the ripple of sunny dawn,
I thought of the girl who had loved me once,
When life was all in tune.

Gazing into the brook, I saw
Her face as it looked of old;
The smiling lips that were rosy once,
With kisses that now are cold.

Listening beside the brook, I heard
Her laugh and quick replies;
Sparkling without its sheen, I saw
The light of her glorious eyes.

Stooping beside the brook, I said,
"O brook, with song and whirl,
You can give back all my old vain dream,
But never that darling girl!"

THE MONSTER BLAST.

OUR SAN FRANCISCO artist sends us a spirited illustration of the monster blast by which the beautiful harbor of that city was recently deliv-ered from the obstruction known as "Blossom Rock." This was a mass of rather soft sand-stone, about one hundred and eighty feet long, ninety feet wide, with abrupt sides and a comparatively smooth surface. It lay near the chan-nel, and a large number of vessels have been wrecked on it, notwithstanding its exact location was known and marked with a buoy. At inter-vals during the past twelve or fifteen years efforts have been made by government engineers to either remove the rock or reduce it so low as to allow ships to pass over it; but every attempt ended in failure.

About a year ago Colonel A. W. VON SCHMIDT was awarded the contract for the removal of this dangerous obstruction to the navigation of the harbor. A coffer-dam was ingeniously con-structed on the surface of the rock, and within this shaft a tunnel was sunk to the depth of twelve feet, and from the bottom tunnels were run in every direction. The lower part of the rock was cut out, was hoisted up and, by means of an immense crane, swung off into deep water. The excavation, when completed, resembled an immense bake-oven. Its dimensions were as fol-lows: Extreme length, 132 feet; width, 60 feet; height at the sides, 12 feet; the bottom, 8 feet; the thickness of the crust or shell, about 10 feet 6 inches, as near as could be ascertained.

Into this chamber twenty-three tons of Cali-fornia blasting powder were packed in barrels, and connected by wires with a battery placed on a scow one thousand yards distant from the rock. Saturday, the 7th of April, was fixed upon as the day for the blast; and for days previous it was the sole theme of conversation in San Francisco. All manner of conjectures were indulged in. Some people thought it would shake the city like an earthquake; others that every vessel in the bay would suffer more or less damage, and that not a fish within a radius of five miles would be alive after the explosion. When the day ar-rived every wharf whence the rock could be seen was covered with spectators. The entire shore of the bay was dotted with steamers and boats of every description. Every roof commanding a view of the harbor was crowded. Probably fifty thou-sand people were gathered to witness.

Precisely at two o'clock the blast was ignited, and a magnificent spectacle rewarded the pa-tience of the watchers. A single jet of water, probably fifty feet in diameter, was thrown into the air to the height of nearly 300 feet, while an instant later only 110 feet above the sea at first white with foam, and then cream-colored as the spray died out, showing the water discol-ored with the mud and rock, was the limit of elevation perhaps a hundred feet less. High above the water could be discovered, flying through the air, pieces of timber and rock, some of which were thrown a distance of a thousand yards. A few seconds later a second explosion took place, and then the agitated waters settled quietly over the spot, and the grand spectacle was ended.

DEAD CALM.

CALMS are quite as natural as storms in the ocean, though far less frequent. The varying heat at the surface of the earth is the main cause of both of them. Trade-winds, monsoons, si-mooms, aircoca—all depend on the fact that one locality is warmer than another, and that air rushes in from the colder to the warmer regions. The daily rotation of the earth determines the direction of some of these winds, but the winds themselves owe their origine to the cause just named. There are two kinds of calms—those which depend permanently on the latitude, and those which result from temporary peculiarities in winds counteractive of each other. The for-mer are for the more important of the two. There is a region of calms near the equator. When the sun is in the northern hemisphere (our winter), the calms extend nearly from the equator to the lat-itude of England. Only a small portion of this wide-spreading region is, however, calm at any one time, a belt varying from two to ten degrees of latitude in width. This belt is always north of the equator in the Atlantic, a fact supposed to be due, in some degree, to the relative conform-ation of Africa and America.

It is often a terrible time while a ship is pass-ing through these calms. If the vessel be a steam-er, she can forge along by paddle or screw, wheth-er there be any wind or not. But if she be under sailing ship, she remains like a log on the wa-ter—her sails flapping utterly useless. The tem-perature in those latitudes is usually very high; and in such cases the mariners are exposed to a fierce heat which there is no escaping. The old navigators, before the days of steam, suffered more from the calms than from the severest storms of the present day, and their narratives contain frequent allusions to these matters. Adamson, who coasted along the west side of Africa about a hundred and twenty years ago, says: "At the time when we were within two hundred leagues of the coast, between seventeen and eighteen de-grees of latitude, a calm came on which lasted almost three days, with sufficient weather, that I was so still that the ship did not seem to change situation. During this time the provisions began to be in a vessel becalmed, and nothing more dreadful than to be fair out at sea when pro-visions begin to run short."

But the extraordinary part of this phenomenon is the danger which it sometimes incur of slowly grinding and crushing each other. It is about the very last thing we should expect in ves-sels lying motionless on the water. Some kind of attraction seems to arise, the nature of which has not been fully ascertained. Captain Basil Hall states that many such instances as the fol-lowing are known to have occurred. An awk-ward alarm prevails among the crews when they perceive two ships slowly drifting toward each other. The motion, slow and gentle as it may appear to the eye, becomes irresistible in its force. As the chances are against the two ves-sels moving exactly in the same direction and at the same moment, they must speedily grind or tear each other to pieces. Supposing them to come in contact side by side, the first collision would probably tear away the fore and main chains of each ship in the beginning of the shock; and entangling the spars of one ship with the shrouds and back-stays of the other, would in all likeli-hood bring down the masts of both ships—not piecemeal, but in one furious crash. "Beneath all this would be the coils of cordage, rigging, and the enormous folds of canvas, might be crushed many of the best hands, who, from being always the foremost to run aloft and the last to descend in danger, are surest to be sacrificed. After the first catastrophe, the ships would drift clear of each other, to run one another to a little while, only to tum-ble together again and again, till they had ground one another to bits. Not a mast, not a spar, not a rope of them would fill and go down. In such en-counters it is impossible to stop the mischief, and oak and iron, like bones and flesh, are pieces like sealing-wax or pie-crust.

"Of course we are to suppose that such ter-rible disasters are always, or even generally, the result of being becalmed. Only under special circumstances can they occur. Thus usually, the mariners are able to detect the approach of this very dangerous calm long before it comes. It They hoist out the boats in readiness, and tow the two ships to a safe distance apart, or, which is generally more effectual, they get up steam in opposite positions; seeing that every ship, by its very build, has within it a kind of anchor to keep ahead rather than astern. When there is not a breath of wind to act upon the sails there may still be a slight movement in the water beneath, and the sailors have a method of ascertaining in which direction it sets. They throw over a row boat out to a little distance from the ship, and throw overboard a jib-mast, weighing forty pounds or so, attached to a line. When they expect a to depth of two hundred fathoms, where it acts (we quaintly still in the days of steam) as anchor to keep the boat in its place. The boat turns its head in the direction of whatever current there may be, and the ship follows in her wake.

Nor are we to suppose that the calm latitudes are often absolutely calm, else steamers from the English ports to India would espy those fleets of helpless mid-ocean very time of steaming up and down the Atlantic. There are, however, some-times blow in the Region of Calms, usually from some point between south and west; and besides this, the calms are frequently interrupted, and by a wind which lasts a quarter of an hour or twen-ty minutes. Sometimes even a belt of well-defined cloud forms near the east, and is followed by a sharp gust of wind for a few minutes, ac-companied by drops of rain. All this work clears off, and the calm resumes its monotonous reign. The navigator makes use of every such puff of wind as a godsend, helping him by some short distance across the Region of Calms.

BEWARE OF LEAD POISONS

In the form of liquid washes for the complexion or mineral cosmetics, such as rouge and sham-blo. There is but one way of removing impurity from the complexion, and that is by removing it from the blood. This is accomplished in a natural way by taking STAFFORD'S IRON AND SULPHUR POW-DERS, one element of which infuses new life into the torpid circulation, while the other separates from the blood the infectious principle which causes external eruptions and discolorations, and sends them to the surface with the perspiration, whence they are ejected through the sweat-like structure of the epidermis.

Sold by all druggists. Price, 50 cents per package, $2 25. Mailed free. Money sent at our risk.—HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich Street, N. Y.

INTERESTING TO LADIES.

"I AM totally blind, and have been from child-hood. Some time since I concluded to purchase a sewing machine. In making my selection, it was necessary for me to procure the simplest, as well as the lightest-running and the easiest-man-aged machine. After testing the various ma-chines, I was fully convinced that the GROVER & BAKER had all these required qualities com-bined. I purchased one, and in a very short time could hem, fell, tuck, and do all kinds of sewing with the greatest ease. One of the many great advantages I find that the GROVER & BA-KER has over all other machines is that you can sew from the finest to the coarsest fabric without change of tension. I cheerfully recommend it to all who desire a first-class machine."—MRS. RACHEL WOOD, 803 South Ninth Street, Philadelphia.

LOOK AT THE RESULT: Aye, look at the ruins of what once were magnificent sets of teeth, to be seen every where in society. Look at them, and ask your-self if it is not a matter of more importance than ad-mitted, when, by simply using SOZODONT, any tooth, however Fearful Ruin, may be preserved from decay or bless-ing as long as life lasts?—[Com.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pimples on the Face.

For Comedones, Black-Worms or Grubs, Pimply Eruptions, with Blotched Discolorations on the Face, use Perry's Comedone and Pimple Remedy. Depot, 120 Bond Street, N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.

For Moth Patches, Freckles, & Tan.

Use Perry's Moth and Freckle Lotion. The only reliable and harmless remedy known to science. Pre-pared by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by Druggists every where.

THIRTY YEARS is certainly a long enough time to prove the efficacy of any medicine, and that the PAIN KILLER is deserving of all its proprietors claim for it is amply proved by the unparalleled popularity it has attained. It is SURE and EFFECTIVE remedy, and is sold in almost every country in the world, and is be-coming more and more popular every year. Its brilliant properties have been fully tested all over the world, and it needs only to be known to be prized.

Sold by all Druggists.

The Wear and Tear of Business Life.

The cares and labors of business life are apt to tell severely upon the mind and constitution of the re-sident, energetic business man. Under the pressure of these exciting causes, he feels, stimulants that cause only a temporary excitement, and leave the system in a state of partial collapse when their first effect has passed off, are too often resorted to. As certainly as he leaves behind it a reaction of ashes, the use of the celebrated Hostetter's Stomach Bitters produces permanent exhaustion and decay. Touch them not. Tone and regulate the stomach and bowels with

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.

In that wholesome elixir the alcoholic element, which is the parent of so much evil from any source, is tempered by the choicest tonic, aperient, anti-bilious, and anti-febrile vegetable productions, which form a harmless, secret, solace, and purify the system in the mission of the great vegetable specific. The only antidote in a healthy state, the bile flows regularly, the bowels move freely and naturally, and the whole organization is invigorated. Dyspepsia in perfect working order an enormous amount of labor can be borne without pain, or inconvenience, and the use of Hostetter's Bitters is to promote the vigorous condition of the digestive organs which the nourishment of the body and the power of endurance mainly depend. The great tone and stimulus imparted by this unrivalled com-pounded, for its remarkable strengthening properties, to all upon whom the responsibilities of life press heavily, and who feel like fainting under the burden. A lively appetite, a natural, healthy interest in food, and a marvellous ability to withstand fatigue are among the blessings conferred upon a body invigorated by the action of this palatable and powerful cordial, and a feeling of contentment and happiness results in the materia medica that can be compared with it.

Pronounced to be one of the most remarkable in-ventions since the Electric Telegraph. Kerosene Lamps of all kinds may be instantaneously lighted without matches, and extinguished without smoke or chimney and without the risk and shock of the au-tomatic tops to fit all Lamps now in use, $1 50 each, and by the dozen at a liberal discount. For all Gil Lamps, state width of wicks now in use. Dis-counts to the trade.

Automatic Lamp Works,
232 PEARL ST., NEW YORK.

A limited number of State and County rights for sale. As the Self-Lighting Burner will certainly su-persede all others in use, a coagencure may be real-ized in every populous locality. Agents wanted.

EMPLOYMENT.—Light, Pleasant, and Profit-able. A new way to make money, selling popular books. Enclose stamp for terms.
J. B. WILKINSON, 25 Broadway, N. Y.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 237 Pearl St., N. Y., for-merly with Erieting Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

The New Books of the Spring,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THE LIFE OF COUNT BISMARCK, Private and Political. With Descriptive Notices of his Ances-try. By Dr. GEORGE HESEKIEL. Translated and Edi-ted, with an Introduction, Explanatory Notes, and Appendices, by EDWARD H. MACKENZIE, F.S.A., F.A.S.L. With upward of 100 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

MEMOIR OF THE REV. JOHN SCUDDER, M.D. Thirty-five Years Missionary in India. By Rev. J. B. WATERBURY, D.D. With Portrait of Dr. Scudder. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

BAFFLED; or, Michael Rand's Wrong. A Novel. By JEAN INGELOW, Author of "Mopsa the Fairy," "Story," "The Search for the Grail," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS. By An Old Boy. New Edition. With numerous Illustrations by Ar-thur Hughes and Sidney Prior Hall. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SELF-HELP; with Illustrations of Character, Con-duct, and Perseverance. By SAMUEL SMILES, Au-thor of "The Life of the Stephensons," "History of the Huguenots," &c. &c. A Revised and Enlarged Edition. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

A LOAN BOOK OF DEDHAM. The Chro of the Person, Manners, Etiquette, and Ceremonials. 16mo, Tinted Paper, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 00.

EBERHARD'S TRUDY. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "Barbara's History," "Half a Million of Money," "Miss Carew," &c., &c. Illus-trated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. History of the American Civil War. By JOHN W. DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Pro-fessor of Chemistry and Physiology in the Univer-sity of New York. 12mo, Cloth, Vols. VII., III., just ready. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00 per vol.

A BRAVE LADY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 00; Cloth, $1 50.

CYCLOPÆDIA OF BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND RELLESIASTICAL LITERATURE. By Rev. JOHN M'CLINTOCK, D.D., and JAMES STRONG, S.T.D. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. To be com-pleted in about Ten Volumes. Royal 8vo, about 800 One Thousand Pages each. Vols. I., II., and III., comprising the Letters A to G, are now ready. The remaining Volumes are in progress. Price per Volume, Cloth, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00; Half Morocco, $8 00.

SKETCHES OF CREATION: a Popular View of some of the Grand Conclusions of Science in Refer-ence to the History of Matter and of Life. To-gether with an Account of the Supernatural in Re-lation respecting the Primordial Condition and the Primeval Unity of the Earth. By the Rev. PATRICK MATTHEW BROWN, LL.D., Author of "Conchology, Ento-mology, Zoology, and Botany in the University of Edinburgh," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. Illustrated Sur-vey. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

THE UNKIND WORD, and Other Stories. By the Author of "Mabel Vaughan," &c., &c. 18mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON; or, Across the Continent of South America. By JAMES ORTON, M.A., Professor of Natural History in Vassar Col-lege, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Corresponding Mem-ber of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadel-phia. With Maps, and 100 Engravings on Wood, from numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

JOURNAL OF THE PRINCE OF WALES'S VISIT TO THE EAST. Journal of a Visit to Egypt, Con-stantinople, Greece, Italy, and Germany, in 1869, of the Prince and Princess of Wales. By the Rev. JOHN ROBERTS. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

GARIBALDI'S NOVEL. The Rule of the Monk; or, Rome in the Nineteenth Century. By General GA-RIBALDI. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE POEMS. With numer-ous Illustrations and Three Characteristic Portraits. New Edition, containing several Poems not hitherto included in the collected editions of his writings, and which have for the first time been arranged in Or-der under Poems of Childhood. Sixth Thousand. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK OF FOREIGN TRAVEL.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Aus-tria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Greece, Turkey, Switzer-land, Spain, Portugal, Russia, Sweden, Norway, Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map of Europe. By JAMES H. WORTH. Illustrated. New Revised Edition. Eighth Year. Large 12mo, Leath-er, Pocket-Book Form, $2 50.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK; or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk in French, Spanish, and Italian. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian, for the Use of Travellers. Ex-tended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe." By Francesco Fontanese. Adopted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With con-cise and copious Vocabularies for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 48o, Flexible Cloth, $1 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ALUMINUM-GOLD HUNTING-CASE

Watches received a Gold Medal at the Paris Exhibi-tion for the exact resemblance to 18-carat gold watch-es. The difference is perceptible only to the most ex-pert. Information offered heretofore to the public. The move-ments are of the finest and fully warranted quality. The cases guaranteed to retain the exact appearance and color of pure gold for ten years. Sold at the manufac-turer's Patent Agency, 414 Broadway, corner Walker St. Chains of the most approved styles, from $3 to $10 each. Expressed every where. Customers allow-ed to examine what they order on paying the express charges only to the express agent. Clubs of 10 obtain an extra watch free. HENRY GUY & CO., Sole Agents for the United States, No. 78 Nassau Street, N. Y.

MODEL HOUSES!—Are you going to build? Descriptive circulars of Plans, Views, &c., sent free. Address A. J. DOWNING, Newburgh, N. Y.

NEW BOOK.—Agents sell 160 per week. Price $1 50. Address L. STEBBINS, Hartford, Ct.

REMOVAL.
S. W. GEERY & CO. will remove to southeast corner of 34th Street and Broadway, 1st of May. Importers and Wholesale and Retail Dealers in Teas, Cream Cheese, and
CHOICE FAMILY GROCERIES.
Formerly J. & W. Geery, No. 719 Broadway.
Established in 1845. New York.
The selection of Choice Teas and Old Wines has been a special study for this house for years.
Constantly on hand, a full assortment of every thing appertaining to the Grocery Trade. Catalogues sent by mail. Orders will be called for (in the city) every morning, if desired.
Goods shipped to all parts of the country.

THE NOVELTY JOB PRINTING-PRESS is the best and cheapest press ever made with which to DO YOUR OWN WORK. It is simple, and is second to none in quality of work. Every Printer, Manufacturer, and Business Man should supplied that long-felt want—a simple, strong, well-finished, and low-priced press."—Scientific American. "Adieu, Va. "It does all that it is promised to do."—Enterprise, McMinnville, Tenn.
Price of Presses, $15.
$30, $32, $50. Send for full Circular, with testimonials and specimens of type and printing, to BENJ. O. WOODS, Manufacturer, 301 Fulton St., Boston, Mass., or to C. C. THURSTON, 16 College Place, New York. KELLY, MILLER & CO., LUDLOW, 911 Market St., Philadelphia, Pa.; A. C. KELLOGG, West 4th Street, Cincinnati, O. "The Novelty press gives entire satisfaction."—J. A. Waller, Evansville, Ind. "I like the Novelty Press. It is the work of good sense."—Inventive Child. Messrs. Leggett supplied that long-felt want—a simple, strong, well-finished, and low-priced press."—Scientific Gleaner, Auburn, N. Y.

ENOCH MORGAN'S SONS'
SAPOLIO
CLEANS, POLISHES, AND BEAUTIFIES
CHEAPER & BETTER THAN SOAP.
Depot, 211 Washington Street, New York.

OSBORN'S FIFTY-CENT OPERAS for the piano-forte, solos, duets, and quartettes, at 40 to 50 pages, fifty cents each—Dr. Pritchard, Pirate, William Tell, Grand Duchess, Norma, Martha, Huguenots, Masaniello, Domino, Puritan, Sonnambula, Don Pasquale, Lucrezia, Martha, Zampa, Robert le Diable, Don Juan, Barber of Seville, and Lucia. Also in Maschera, Trovatore, Traviata, &c. To be had of all music and book sellers. Catalogues sent by BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., N. Y.
Removed from 644 Broadway.

HARTSHORN'S
PATENT
Shade Rollers.
NO CORDS OR BALANCES USED.
FOR WINDOWS, AWNINGS, CARRIAGES, ETC.
For sale by all upholsterers. The trade are invited to send for models and price-lists. Orders filled only through the trade.
STEWART HARTSHORN,
Manufacturer, 63 Centre St., New York.

Use None but
TRADE MARK
THE BEST!!
OX AND SHEEP
SOUPS AND BEEF TEA FOR THE MILLION.
Strengthening Nourishment! Economy in Housekeeping! LIEBIG'S COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT, the sume that received the highest prize at Paris, Havre, and Amsterdam, and is recommended by the British, French, Russian, Prussian, and other Governments. None genuine without the signature of Baron Liebig, the inventor, and of Dr. Max Von Pettenkofer, designee on every jar.
J. MILHAU'S SONS, Company's Agents, 183 Broadway, New York. For sale every where.

$6 WATCHES. $8.
OUR SPECIALTY.—Silveride Watches, in hunting cases, elegantly engraved, and with the appearance of silver, "of which they are the exact imitation ever produced." With fine full-jewelled movements, patent lime-keepers, and are warranted in every respect. Our Gold Cosmopolite Watches, a perfect fac-simile of the most gold, in hunting cases, richly engraved, and warranted to always retain their present color, for $8, all sizes. Send for our price-list and descriptive catalogue. Persons at a distance desiring to save expensive charges can have their watches forwarded safely by mail by remitting 40 cents additional to prepay postage. LACKWOOD & ROGERS, Importers and Dealers in Watches, No. 197 Broadway, New York.

FURNITURE of every description, and HARD WOOD for Interior Work. Mirror Frames and Mouldings for the trade. Send for price list. Established 1850. G. L. & R. KEEN & CO., Importers and Manufacturers, 661 Broadway, New York.
Curtain Store at 647 Broadway, near Howard St.

DRAWING INSTRUMENTS,
Such as Dividers, Pens, Bow Pens, Protractors, and Scales, at very lowest prices. Also, Drawing Compasses, Microscopes, Spy-Glasses, Steel Tape Measures, &c.
A priced Catalogue sent on receipt of Ten cents.
W. Y. McALLISTER,
713 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

JAPANESE CORN PLASTER
Removes Corns without pain, 25 cts. Sold at Drug and Shoe Stores. E. H. BERTRAM, 54 Pine St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED—SAMPLES FREE—$20 TO $40 per week guaranteed to either sex. Goods new, and as staple as flour. Send 6c. for return postage. S. S. LIDINGTON, 36 South Jefferson St., Chicago.

JOHN FOGGAN, 79 Nassau St., N.Y., Importer and Manufacturer of the Genuine Improved Double-Gold Hunting-Case Watches. Wholesale and Retail. Send for descriptive circular, with enclosed stamp.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six watches are ordered at one time, we send a Seventh watch free. Goods sent by express to all parts of the United States, to be paid for on delivery.
C. E. COLLINS & CO., No. 335 Broadway, New York.

REMEDY FOR PIMPLES.
To all who desire it the undersigned will mail (free), on receipt of 6c. stamp, the recipe and full directions for preparing and using a Genuine Vegetable Balm that will immediately remove Pimples, Freckles, Moth Patches, Black-Worms, and all eruptions and impurities of the skin, leaving the same clear, soft, and healthy glow. He will also send (free) Instructions for producing a luxuriant growth of hair on a smooth face.
The above can be obtained in return mail, by addressing P. W. TRUER, Chemist, 113 Broadway, New York.

A GREAT OFFER.
HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N.Y.,
Will dispose of ONE HUNDRED PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for Cash during this month, or will take from $5 to $20 monthly until paid; the same to let, and rent money applied if purchased. Chickering Pianos are included in the above offer.

ROGERS'
GROUPS OF STATUARY.
These groups, suitable for wedding presents or ornament, will be delivered, with all express charges prepaid, on any point east of the Mississippi, on receipt of the price, viz., from $10 to $18. Send for Illustrated Catalogue and Price-List, to JOHN ROGERS,
Taking the Cards. 213 Fifth Ave., New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER
With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and money. Circulars containing full information about these presses, prices, recommendations, &c., sent free. Specimens of type, new type-books of faces, cuts, borders, &c., 10 cents. ADAMS PRESS CO., 81 Murray Street, New York.

ORIENTAL MOTH POWDER
Preserves Carpets and all woolen goods from moths or other insects. Can also be used as a sachet or Jame. Sample package sent by mail on receipt of 50 cts. C. A. WOODWORTH & SON, Rochester, N. Y.

HENKLEY KNITTING MACHINE
FOR FAMILY USE—simple, cheap, reliable. Knits every thing. AGENTS WANTED. Send for circular and sample stocking FREE. Address HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE CO., Bath, Me., or 28 Bromfield St., Boston.

$200 per Month guaranteed. Agents wanted in every County in the U. S., to sell Buck's Bugbar Alarm. Price $8. Sells on sight. Address G. H. BECKER & CO., 489 North 3d St., Philad'a, Pa.

GREAT CHANCE FOR AGENTS! $10 to $20 a month. Wanted, an Agent in every County in the U. S., on commission or salary. Address World Manufacturing Co., Parkers Vein-Pen Holder Co., will last 100 years. If you want profitable work, address (stating employment, address) Hudson River Pen Co., 15 Wallace St., N. Y., or 16 Dearborn St., Chicago.

$50 A WEEK paid Agents in advance. Address WELMAN & CO., Lansing, Mich.

$20 PRIZE to every 83 Subscriber! Samples FREE. WESTERN WORLD, Cleveland, New York.

BIG PROFITS to Agents on a new Illustrated Book. Send stamp for circulars.
J. B. BURR & CO., Hartford, Conn.

The celebrated IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES, "Collins Metal" (Improved Geneine), are now being manufactured. Watches have been so thoroughly tested during the last four years, and their reputation for time and no imitations of Gold Watches is so well established as to require no recommendations. Prices:—Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, $18, equal in appearance and for time to gold ones costing $150. These are extra fine Silver Watches, equal to $200 gold ones. We are also making an extra heavy and extra fine watch, full-jeweled patent levers, equaling in appearance a $300 gold watch. For these magnificent watches we charge only $25. All our watches fully guaranteed by specific certificate. All our watches are in hunting cases, pretty and durable. Address, Collins Metal, 335 B'd'y. Also, all kinds of Jewelry, equal to gold, at one-tenth the price.
The "Collins" model is the best imitation of gold we have seen.—N. Y. Tribune.
The goods of C. E. Collins & Co. have invariably given satisfaction.—N. Y. Times.
One of the Old Watches we worn in our office, and we have no hesitation in recommending them.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

EVERY MERCHANT AND MANUFACTURER can be his own STENCIL CUTTER, and save three quarters of the present cost of his Stencils by the use of MEECH'S STENCIL DIES. 19th Send for Circulars.
L. S. MEECH & CO., Manufacturers of Stencil Tools and Stock, 101 Union St., Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED.
We wish an Agent in every town to sell a new book wanted in every family, and recommended by the leading papers of the country. One Agent lately reports 54 orders in a day. One lady says: "I have sold five copies in the last three weeks, and intend to do my own house work." We received an order this week from a Lady and Gent Agent for 70 copies. There is money in this book. Send for private circular.
J. T. ELLIOTT & CO.,
Springfield, Mass. Chicago, Ill.

WANTED—Agents to sell a thoroughly good opportunity now existing in every County. Liberal inducements. Territory given. Call or write for circular. Agents have been selling 200 per day. One sold 300 in small town, another 700 in 5 towns, another 11 in calling on 23 families. Cost of outfit, $5. No danger of imposition. Best of references given. Send for circular, to 102 Washington Street, Room 5, Mason Block. J. C. LITTLEFIELD & DAME.

DIABETIC FLOUR.
Prepared Flour of Bran, for making Biscuit for the Diabetic and Dyspeptic.
JOHN W. SHEDDEN, Pharmaceutist,
363 Bowery, Corner 4th St., New York.

MITCHELL'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. Sold by Druggists. Send for Circular. Sole Agent, MITCHELL, Chicago, Ill.

VINEGAR, WINE, Molasses, or Sorghum, in 10 hours, without using drugs. For recipe, address F. I. SAGE, Vinegar Maker, Cromwell, Conn.

$100 to $250 per Month guaranteed. Sure pay. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

$25 every where, selling our Patent Silver-Mould White-Wire Clothes-Pins. Samples sent free. H. B. SLAW, Albany, N. Y.

WATCH free and $30 a day sure, and no humbug. Address AUSTIN & CO., Chelsea, Mass.

$60 A WEEK, paid agents in a new business. Address SACO NOVELTY CO., Saco, Me.

STEEL SHIRT COLLAR, superior enamel, white (English), 8c.; American, Snow White, $1. Mailed Samples, 10c. HENRY GUY, 78 Nassau St.

$250 a Month, with Stencil and Key-Check Outfit. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

$20 A DAY: Business new. For circulars and samples, address J. C. BAND & CO., Biddeford, Me.

Mineral Lands in 1870. State, Counties, Town. 200 p. M $1.25 by mail; map, 60c. J. W. McClung, St. Paul.

Decalcomanie, or Transfer Pictures. Send for Catalogue. W. Ashmore & Co., 1210 Br'dw'y, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have in Press:

PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE.
By CHARLES READE,
Author of "Hard Cash," "Griffith Gaunt," "Never Too Late to Mend," "White Lies," &c., &c.
From the Author's Early Sheets,
By Simultaneous Publication,
By Arrangement with Messrs. SHELDON & CO.
ELEGANTLY PRINTED ON SUPERFINE PAPER.

HARPER'S OCTAVO EDITION of "Put Yourself in His Place." With all the Illustrations, including the characteristic Vignettes not to be found in any other American edition. Paper, 75 cents; bound in Cloth, $1 25.

HARPER'S DUODECIMO EDITION of "Put Yourself in His Place." Uniform with the Boston Household Edition of Charles Reade's Novels, and bound in Green-Morocco English Cloth, to match that edition. Price One Dollar.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

THE PERIODICALS WHICH THE HARPERS PUBLISH ARE ALMOST IDEALLY WELL EDITED.—The Nation, N. Y.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is an illustrated record of, and a commentary upon all the important events of the time. Special attention is also given to topics of political and local interest. The best artists in the country are constantly employed to furnish original illustrations, and the Publishers are also largely indebted to photographic artists in the large cities of America, Europe, and the East for prompt and valuable contributions.

As a Literary and Family Journal, the Publishers think no fair criticism will deny that which has ever succeeded in establishing and maintaining a claim to precedence.

The Editorial matter of HARPER'S WEEKLY consists of the most able and interesting articles; it includes weekly articles upon National Politics, Finance, Commerce, and Miscellaneous topics.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The young lady who buys a single number of HARPER'S BAZAR is made a subscriber for ONE YEAR.—As an Illustrated Journal of Fashion, the BAZAR has no rival in this country. By a special arrangement with the Publishers of the Fashion Journal of the Berlin Jeitung für Toilette, the journal of fashion in Europe—its fashion-plates are published in the BAZAR simultaneously with their publication in Berlin and Paris.

A large portion of the BAZAR in every week devoted to instructive and entertaining reading-matter—Stories, Poems, Biographical Sketches, and Gossip.

Editorial articles are always spicy, and cover every topic of interest to the fashions. No effort or expense will be spared to permanently secure for this Journal, as it already is, the first place in family favor in which it well deserves.

The Publishers arrangements to supply the readers of the BAZAR with paper dress patterns, and the single Costumes which we give from time to time out-rival the Fashion Journals, and are pronounced by the best Parisian dressmakers, in conjunction with good artists, with a view to making them truly artistic. These patterns, so carefully adjusted that they can be cut to the measure, are sent, by mail, or the way we prepaid, on the receipt of Twenty-five Cents for the single pattern. Seventeenth number now ready.

In the BAZAR for April 16 was commenced "The Cryptogram," a serial story of thrilling interest, by Miss Braddon, "Lord and Lovel," by Dr. Dodge Holland, &c., profusely illustrated.

Published Weekly, with profuse Illustrations.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—N. Y. Observer.

The Best Monthly Periodical, not in this country alone, but in the English language.—The Press, Phila.

Harper's Magazine.

The MAY Number completes the Fortieth Vol. of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. Its success has been commensurate with that of any other monthly periodical in Europe or America. Its aim has been to be the purest and best and variety of its contents: to the enterprise of its Publisher in securing the best talent for its pages; to the liberality of the Proprietors of Engravings, Designs, and Literature; to its profusely-illustrated articles of Travel and Exploration; to its Historical sketches, which present a clear treatment of its papers upon scientific subjects, upon the mechanical improvements in the arts, upon the current topics; and to the variety and interest of its special Editorial and Departmental articles, recently a new one has been added, viz., the Monthly Scientific Record, through the pages of which in past numbers of the Magazine has depended will still continue to be its leading characteristics; and the Publishers are confident that with increased attention to the wants of its readers, which they will be able to give, it will continue to merit success.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from fifty to one hundred pages of reading matter than any other illustrated issued in the English language. Thus the single space of the Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE is equal to at least fifty of all the topics embraced in their plan.

Published Monthly, with profuse Illustrations.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly in advance at the office where received. Subscriber residing out the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, which, should the Order of Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Magazine—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $68—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 00 per Line, each insertion.
Harper's Weekly—Whole Page, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar—$1 00 per Line; Last and Supply, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

AN OLD SCHOLAR.

"There is a negro school at Meherrin Station, on the Richmond and Danville Railroad, where the teachers receive scholars of all ages and both sexes. Mr. ARVINS, of Lunenberg, had an old cook, 71 years of age, who took it into her head to learn to speak and write the English language correctly; so she entered the school, and bringing her ten cents per day and regularly paying it over to the teachers, she got along very well until, perhaps, at the end of the second week, she missed her lesson, and was kept in to play time. The idea! an old negro seventy-odd years of age kept in in play time."—Danville (Va.) Times.

Brewster & Broome St
Offer at their Warerooms
5th Avenue Cor. of 14th St
Elegant Carriages & Road Wagons
In the newest Designs
and of the most perfect construction exclusively by the production of their Broome St. Factory
and in all respects equal to the vehicles
built to the order of their most valued
Customers. Sole manufacturers of the
"Brewster Wagon."

Ladies Desire what Men Admire,
And this little thing is beauty. What do we say is beautiful? A transparent complexion and a luxuriant head of hair. Whatwill produce these? Hagan's Magnolia Balm will make any lady of thirty appear but twenty; and Lyon's Kathairon will keep every hair in its place, and make it grow. Use the Apeti gum. It prevents the hair from turning grey, eradicates Dandruff, and is the finest Hair Dressing in the world, and at only half ordinary cost. If you want to get rid of Ballowcens, Pimples, Roaches, Moth Patches, &c., don't forget the Magnolia Balm, ladies.

LOOK AT THIS!

A Patent propelling Swing, all complete, for $3 00. A child can swing itself without assistance. The safest, cheapest, and best swing in the market. Parties desiring the right to manufacture can obtain all particulars and illustrated circular by enclosing stamp. Address A. H. BEAVER, P.O. Box 4194, N. Y. City.

27	2 and 3 are 5, and 3 are 13, and 4 are 17, and 6
89	are 23, and 9 are 32, and 7 are 39—put down 9
56	and carry 3, and 1 are 4, and 8 are 12, and 3
34	are 15, and 1 are 16, and 5 are 21, and 8 are
48	29, and 7 are 36. Set the figures down and add
93	the total, 419. Now over it again, to prove it.
72	This is the mental operation by the old way.
419	With the WEBB ADDING MACHINE, seven turns of the little wheel gives the same result, in half the time, without mental effort or the possibility of mistake. This is guaranteed.
	Price, $8 and $10.

Address E. P. DUTTON & CO., 713 Broadway, New York.

BLUNT & CO., 179 Water St., N. Y.

SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS. First Quality only. As Very Low Prices. Price-List Sent Free.

JANES & KIRTLAND, 10 Reade St., New York.

FOUNTAINS, VASES, SETTEES, &c., for Gardens and Lawns. Send for a Catalogue.

One Million Acres of Choice Iowa Lands

FOR SALE, at $3 per acre and upward for cash, or on credit by the Iowa Railroad Land Co. Railroads already built through the Lands, and on all sides of them. Great inducements to settlers. Send for our free Pamphlet. It gives prices, terms, location; tells who should come West, what they should bring, what it will cost; gives plans and elevations of 18 different styles of ready-made houses, which the Company furnish at from $100 to $4000, ready to set up. Maps sent if desired. Address

W. W. WALKER, Vice-President, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

BISHOP & REIN, JEWELERS, Under Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York, OPEN FOR SALE DIAMONDS, EMERALDS, PEARLS, CAMEOS, Roman, Florentine, and Byzantine MOSAICS, And other FINE JEWELRY and SILVERWARE. WATCHES of all the principal makers. Sole Agents of M. F. Dent & Co. (Watchmakers to the Queen), the Cockspur Street, London. We call particular attention to our fine assortment of CORAL JEWELRY.

Armory of the 22d Regiment.

WOOD BROTHERS have removed their entire stock of fine

Pleasure Carriages,

embracing every variety for City, Park, and Road driving, to the Armory of the Twenty-second Regiment, 14TH ST., BETW'N 6TH AND 7TH AVS.

Attention is called to the fact that these Carriages are fresh stock, exclusively of their own manufacture, of the newest designs and most perfect finish, made for the present season to stock their new warerooms, No. 740 Broadway, but, owing to the late accident that necessitates the rebuilding of their warehouse, have been removed to the above Armory, on 14th St., and are to be Sold at Cost of Production.

Elegant Close Coaches	$1000
Landaus	$1500 to 1650
Clarences	1400 to 1650
Wagons	350 to 400

These Carriages have no superior in Elegance, Durability, or Finish.

Prices fixed, and every Carriage offered for sale is equal in quality to those built to order.

GUARANTEES MADE GOOD IN EVERY CITY OF THE UNION.

Pony Carriages, New Designs, for $150.

SOMETHING NEW.

Two Million Copies of the Annual SHAKESPEARE ALMANAC for 1870 will be given away, free of charge, to introduce the Buckeye 320 Shuttle Sewing Machine. Such offer can only be made once. Such Machine never before sold in the United States for less than $60. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Correct Fees. Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

THE BLEES PATENT NOISELESS, LINK-MOTION, LOCK-STITCH SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion.

Call and examine, and, for agencies and circulars, apply at 633 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

THE PARLOR AIR TARGET PISTOL, Bradley's Pet. Dec. 1, 1868. No dirt, dust, nor dangerous gas per; uses compressed air. No cap for ammunition; from one charging it shoots from five to ten shots, from thirty to forty feet, with accuracy and great force. A great favorite with ladies and gentlemen for practice and amusement. Price $3 00. Sent by mail on receipt of price and $1 25 for postage, or by express, C. O. D., and charges. Agents Wanted. P. C. GODFREY, 119 Nassau St., Room 4, New York.

20,589

Advertisements (God's Index to), for Next of Kin, Chancery Heirs, Legatees, and cases of Unclaimed Money, since 1600. Price 60 cents.

JOHN ROOFER & CO., 41 Park Row, New York.

NICOL & DAVIDSON, 686 BROADWAY, near Great Jones St., SUCCESSORS TO E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO., are closing out $200,000 of the Stock of the late Firm, AT REDUCED PRICES, and are opening 120 Packages of NEW AND ELEGANT FRENCH CHINA DINNER, TEA, AND DESSERT SETS, CLOCKS, BRONZES, VASES, AND MANTEL SETS, IMPORTED CHANDELIERS AND GAS FIXTURES, FINE GLASS, SILVER-PLATED WARE, AND CUTLERY. Superior to and Cheaper than any goods in the market.

45,000 Now in Use! Geo. A. Prince & Co.'s ORGANS and MELODEONS will be delivered in any part of the United States reached by Express (where they have no Agent), free of charge, on receipt of list price. Send for Price-Lists and Circulars. Address GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Buffalo, N.Y., or GEO. A. PRINCE & CO., Chicago, Ill.

ROMAN SASHES, SCARFS, AND TIES, GENUINE GOODS, OPEN TO-DAY, AT UNION ADAMS & CO., 637 BROADWAY.

DOOLEY'S BAKING POWDER

The standard reputation attained by this unrivaled and infallible Yeast Powder during twelve years past, is due to its perfect purity, healthfulness and economy. Put up in tins, actual weight, as represented, and will keep for years. The quantity required for one pint of flour, one-fourth to one-half less than any other Yeast Powder. Sold by Grocers throughout the United States. DOOLEY & BROTHER, Manufacturers and Proprietors, 69 New Street, New York.

FISHERMEN! TWINES and NETTING, MANUFACTURED BY WM. B. HOOPER & SONS, 23d Street Price-List.] Baltimore, Md.

$20 A DAY to MALE AND FEMALE Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE 320 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Stitch alike on both sides. Will sew from the finest muslin to heavy cloth. Sold in the United States for less than $60. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Correct Fees. Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, O.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT, 1000 Drawings. $15. Portfolio, Geo. E. Woodward, Publisher, 191 Broadway, New York. Send for priced Catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

MICROSCOPES for Scientific and Popular Investigations. Illustrated Price-List forwarded to any address.

MAGIC LANTERNS, Stereopticons, Dissolving Apparatus, for Public Exhibitions, &c. Illustrated Catalogue forwarded to any address. T. H. McALLISTER, Optician, 49 Nassau St., N.Y.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Those terrible Headaches generated by obstructed secretions, and to which ladies are especially subject, can always be relieved, and their recurrence prevented, by the use of Tarrant's Effervescent Seltzer Aperient.

PROCURABLE AT ALL DRUG STORES.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIV.—No. 700.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1870. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1870, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE SECRETS OF THE SEA.

THE energy with which in recent times men have sought to master the problem of deep-sea sounding and deep-sea dredging is, perhaps, one of the most striking instances ever afforded of the charm which the unknown possesses for mankind. Not long ago, one of the most eminent geographers of the sea spoke regretfully about the small knowledge men have obtained of the depths of ocean. "Greater difficulties," he remarked, "than any presented by the problem of deep-sea research have been overcome in other branches of physical inquiry. Astronomers have measured the volumes and weighed the masses of the most distant planets, and increased thereby the stock of human knowledge. Is it creditable to the age that the depths of the sea should remain in the category of unsolved problems? that its 'ooze and bottom' should be a sealed volume, rich with ancient and eloquent legends, and suggestive of many an instructive lesson that might be useful and profitable to man?"

Since that time, however, deep-sea dredging has gradually become more and more thoroughly understood and mastered. Seas so deep that many of the loftiest summits of the Alps might be completely buried beneath them have been explored. Dredges weighing, with their load of mud, nearly half a ton have been hauled up without a hitch from depths of some 14,000 feet. But not merely has comparatively rough work of this sort been achieved, but by a variety of ingenious contrivances men of science have been able to measure the temperature of the sea at depths where the pressure is so enormous as to be equivalent to a weight of more than 450 tons on every square foot of surface.

No light can be supposed to penetrate the enormous depths just spoken of. Therefore, how certainly we might conclude that there can be no life there! If, instead of dealing with the habitability of planets, Whewell, in his "Plurality of Worlds," had been considering the question whether at depths of two or three miles living creatures could subsist, how convincingly would he have proved the absurdity of such a supposition! Intense cold, perfect darkness, and a per-

IN THE PASTURE.—[FROM A PAINTING BY R. ANSDELL, A.R.A.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1870.

☞ Our readers will find in this Number of the WEEKLY the opening chapters of a very interesting account of THE TRAVELS IN ARMENIA, profusely illustrated from his own sketches. This will be followed by similar narratives of TRAVEL in various other countries, both savage and civilized, illustrating, with pen and pencil, whatever is interesting, curious, and noteworthy in their several fields. The manners, customs, and occupations of the inhabitants. The Publishers hope that this and subsequent papers will be met with as one of the most entertaining and popular attractions ever had before their readers.

☞ Arrangements have been made to furnish Civil Paper Patterns of the beautiful Single Costumes which appear from time to time in HARPER'S BAZAR, for the future at Twenty-five Cents for the entire Costume. The Pattern of the Costume will HARPER'S BAZAR No. 22, for May 28, is now ready, and will be sent by mail on receipt of Twenty-five Cents. Sewn-dozen supplied at the usual discount.

PARAGUAY AND ITS DICTATORS

GENERAL M'MAHON, late United States Minister in Paraguay, writes us a note concerning the interesting semi-tropical trade by us in a recent article upon LOPEZ. The substance of the view taken by us has always been that our government should be at the most absolute despotism, and that nothing was more preposterous than the appeal to the republican principles of this country as to Secession. In the particular article to which the General refers we spoke of slavery as existing in Paraguay as in Brazil, and of the skilful ALBERDI as the nephew and immediate successor of DR. FRANCIA. General M'MAHON states that slavery was abolished in Paraguay twenty years ago, and that the elder LOPEZ was neither the nephew nor the immediate successor of FRANCIA, who was succeeded by a committee of two members. The relationship is of no importance. If the elder LOPEZ were not the nephew of FRANCIA, he was probably believed to be so upon the Plate River. As for the other points, let us see.

The ecclesiastical absolutism of the Jesuits in Paraguay prepared the country for political despotism. DR. FRANCIA caused himself to be named Dictator for life in 1817. He made no relentless. Those who opposed it were shot. He closed the country to the world, imprisoned foreigners, and put to death those of all subjects whom he found endeavoring to escape. He died in 1840. His successors were the elder LOPEZ and another person as Consuls. But LOPEZ very soon disembarrassed himself of his colleague, and made himself "President." After FRANCIA's death the will of LOPEZ, whether as Consul or as "President," was supreme, and we therefore call him, and generally, FRANCIA's immediate successor. He also continued FRANCIA's policy. The seventh article of the Constitution which LOPEZ wrote made the authority of the President unlimited whenever he chose to think it necessary, and without responsibility of any kind. The Congress was to meet once in every five years. Its sessions lasted usually five days, and were devoted to voting the acts of the Executive. The Presidential term was ten years, but this was a feint merely, and in 1844 the Congress made the elder LOPEZ perpetual Dictator. In 1856 it authorized him to designate his successor by secret will. The Dictator had unrestricted control over the post, the roads, the education of the people, the finances, and the police, and "he was the exclusive judge of all political offenses and of the most important legal cases. Two-thirds of the landed estate belonged to the government, that is, to the Dictator, and he was the sole merchant. Guarantees of liberty were wholly unknown. There was no freedom of the press, of assembly, of worship in the matter, and left the country by will to his son, the late Dictator.

This was the "republic," as it is called, in which General M'MAHON says that slavery was abolished more than twenty-five years ago. But M. SARMIENTO, the President of the Argentine Republic, the ablest and best informed of South American statesmen, under whose administration, inspired by the spirit of our own institutions, the country is the most progressive and hopeful of South American states, says that slavery existed in Paraguay precisely as it did in Brazil. The Consul-Elect, Mr. CHARLES ASCHENFELDT, wrote to the present Provisional Government of Paraguay, soliciting the abolition of slavery, and it was decreed. The Argentine Consul, General's twenty-five years, the elder LOPEZ, in a decree concerning the revenue from stamped paper, ordained that the "slave trade should be authorized (or licensed) under the stamp No. 4." If there were a decree in Paraguay prohibiting slavery, it was not known to M. SARMIENTO, nor to the Count D'EU, and it was disregarded by the elder LOPEZ, which, of course, would not be surprising. But General M'MAHON will refer us to the document, we will certainly own that in company with those who may be presumed to know the facts, we were in error.

Yet even in that case the decree would be but a form, and the slave-trade would go uninterfered. Under such a government as we have described, a system of terror and superstition, like the whole Jesuit population, would be practically excluded, except for the purposes of the Dictator—was virtually enslaved. The proclamation of his supreme judgment is a sufficient indication of the system which it supplants. It abolishes in terms the decree which made the courts the mere execution of political offenses, and also abolishes the laws of confiscation and of torture. It provides that punishment shall be inflicted for no offender only, and that no kind of industry or trade shall be prohibited. By the treaty of alliance, into which the Argentine Republic entered with Brazil only after LOPEZ had invaded its territory and captured two men-of-war, it was stipulated that it was not waging war against the people of Paraguay, but against the Dictator, the independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity of the republic should be respected. There is no yet no disposition to disregard this understanding. The character of the Emperor of Brazil and the Presidency of the Argentine Republic forbids the suspicion of duplicity.

Of a population of General Mallana, who have been for two centuries crushed by an unparalleled despotism begun by the Jesuits, and remorselessly continued by FRANCIA and the elder and younger LOPEZ, little is to be hoped. But by the overthrow of the Dictator the country will now be opened to the world. Further information as to the character and conduct of the younger LOPEZ is unnecessary. On the 27th of December, 1868, his campaigning diary, full of official documents, was captured by the allies. It appears from these papers that between July and December of that year we have described, and the official proof of whose conduct was found in his desk, as General M'MAHON does when he calls LOPEZ "a wonder hero whose noble constancy was the admiration of the world."

THE LATE TRIAL AND TRAGEDY

THE verdict in the M'FARLAND case was rendered after our last issue went to press. No trial in the country has ever excited more interest, and the growth of that interest has only more bitterly discussed. During its progress we ventured to point out the reckless spirit of the counsel adopted by the defense, and to remind our readers that if there was a man on trial for his life, there was also a woman on trial for something still more precious than life. In the present state of public opinion the result of the trial itself was a foregone conclusion. The verdict was the inevitable response with the extraordinary concluding sentence of the plea of the prisoner's counsel, "that jealousy is the law of a man." But the law of God we can not, must not spare in the day of his vengeance." It is remarkable that an advocate who showed in his argument such familiarity with certain passages in the Bible should have betrayed total forgetfulness of one memorable text: "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord."

The trial before the jury being ended, that before the public has begun, and indeed, since the case in court was closed the affidavits of Mr. COLFAX and others in relation to the divorce, and a letter of Mr. RICHARDSON'S, to be opened after his death, have been printed. The statement of the unhappy lady who has been so tragically conspicuous in the case has also been published; and to counteract its possible effect Mr. M'FARLAND has printed some of her letters to him. It is not likely that any material facts can now be added to the case; and in very many aspects it deserves attention.

In the first place the conduct of the defense was inexcusable, and the Court itself deserves the severest censure for permitting the counsel such latitude of assertion and such treatment of the witnesses. It is astonishing, since the Court was so entirely unmindful of its duty, that none of the witnesses did not appeal to it for protection from the insults and insinuations of the counsel. In the second place, the charge of conspiracy which was the theory of the defense, and in support of which Mr. SPENCER publicly and most foully maligned a woman "of the personal purity of whose character," he simultaneously declared, "he had not the shadow of a doubt," was practically abandoned before the evidence began. The defense, in the very outset, acknowledged by its own organ that for the purposes of the case it denounced a woman of irreproachable purity as a pander and procuress. This was the end of the conspiracy theory, but it was not abandoned by the chief and manner in which the defense was to be conducted.

In the third place, the theory of insanity which was proposed to be established by the testimony of experts was also, as we showed at the time, virtually relinquished by the opening of the defense, and the remedy contained at its close. In opening, the counsel said that, under the same circumstances, he would do the same thing. In closing, the counsel said that he trusted the verdict would teach those who dishonored the husband that they would be left to answer to the husband. The defense evidently did not believe the plea of insanity, and there is probably no reader of the trial who says in his heart that Mr. CLARKE was insane in any other sense than all men are insane whose passions are violently excited. The verdict, therefore, really declared that one man kills another, if it be shown that he had reason to be violently excited, he shall not be punished. Practically, however, this principle is modified by requiring proof that the violent excitement proceeds from an injury to the honor of a husband —an honor which, in our judgment, can be stained only by the conduct of the husband himself.

There appears, further, to be no serious doubt expressed by the press or in private conversation that the statement of the unhappy lady who is most directly involved in the tragedy is substantially accurate; and a more pitiful tale was never told. Her letters which have been printed by the friends of her statement by showing that she wrote affectionately to her husband at the time that she says that her feelings were estranged from him, are generally of an earlier date than that which she ascribes to her estrangement. But one of the printed letters is dated in 1868, long after all intercourse between the husband and wife had ceased; a fact which shows at least a certain unscrupulousness in regard to the truth of correspondence. Moreover, the tone of a wife's letters who both fears her husband and who has a deep sense of wifely duty, can not be accepted as a faithful index of real feeling. We have also seen no disposition to doubt the substantial truthfulness of the statement made by Mr. RICHARDSON in the letter to his friend Mr. BROWNE, written in view of his possible assassination; and we see very many things to give us general belief that it is the letter of an adulterer, nor of an evil-minded man.

Mr. RICHARDSON acknowledges that his precipitate declaration was very wrong, and undoubtedly the lady sees now that, however estranged she may have felt, she should have remembered that she was legally a wife, and therefore should have peremptorily forbidden any overtures of love until the legal relation had been fully dissolved. But the lady's explanation of her own conduct and feeling will be at least very charitably and, therefore, only construed by those who reflect upon the cruel and bewildering position in which she was placed, and by all who understand how inconsistent and fallible and unsatisfactory the conduct of all of us is when judged by the severe standard of subsequent reflection. It was a great mistake also that the divorce was not openly sought. If, as she believed, and as those most intimate who accept her statement, she had just reason to separate from her husband, and sufficient grounds under the laws of Indiana to secure a divorce, the husband should have been summoned to the trial. It is plain that the trial of a man who had been present at the divorce had been granted, and the shooting had followed, public feeling and the result of the late trial would have been different. But that she believed herself to be legally divorced, that Mr. FROTHINGHAM and Mr. BECHER were so informed, and that they did not feel at liberty under the solemn circumstances to disregard the wishes of two persons whom they believed to be legally free to be married, will not be questioned by any one who knows them and who has carefully considered the facts.

One other point in this sad case should occasion very serious public reflection. Whatever may be thought of the statement of the unhappy wife, which few, as we believe, doubt, we all know that such a statement might be true. And if, in any case, it were literally true, should we not agree that the wife was justified in seeking a legal release from her husband, and that neither her duty to God nor to her children nor to society required that she should remain his helpless and hopeless victim? But if she is so, ought she to be forced to leave the State in order to be legally and honorably free? It is by reflection and experience that the laws are improved; and nothing has happened for many years that should turn public attention more thoughtfully than this case to the question whether the divorce laws require modification. It is said that thousands of wives suffer as much, and say and do nothing about it. But the public sentiment more pronounced by their silence than it would it be by their lawful relief? The fear that reasonable divorce laws would encourage what is called "free love" is the result of the same ignorance which told Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY that reasonable divorce laws would encourage theft. This trial should show that this is a subject not to be avoided. Whoever is afraid to deal with the undoubted questions in the light of common-sense and experience is as incompetent for a public critic as for a public office. Every effort made by all good citizens to deepen the sanctity of marriage. But it can not be deepened by requiring submission to outrages that impair life and revolt affection itself; nor by justifying assassination by all the forms of law.

REMEDY FOR THE ACCUMULATION OF NATIONAL BANK NOTES.

THERE is a general complaint on the part of the banks in this city that there is a superfluous plethora of national bank notes, for which they have no use. Some of them have an excess of gold and a surplus of legal tenders, and complain of inability to make advantageous loans of either. The abundance of money here is due, unfortunately, to depressed commercial and business—produced artificially in the face of abundant crops—and also to the defects of the national banking system.

The National Currency act provides, section 32, "that every association formed or existing under the provisions of this act shall have a lien upon its stock, for any debt or liability to said association, any and all notes or bills issued by any association existing under the laws of this act." Such a provision is no power to refuse these bills, and no means provided for adequately assorting and redeeming them, their accumulation in New York, at certain periods and in inconvenient amounts, results.

Each of the banks of St. Louis, Louisville, Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, New York, Albany, Leavenworth, Sou Francisco, Washington, Georgetown, and Richmond may keep "one-half of its lawful money reserve in cash deposits in the city of New York," at an association selected subject to the approval of the Controller of the Currency, at which it "must redeem its circulating notes at par." The banks not organized within the cities named above are also bound to select, under the approval of such Controller, one of the banks of those cities in which it will redeem its circulating notes at par." Under this provision, the nearest bank to the outside banks was undoubtedly selected by the latter.

The Controller has given appropriate notice to all the banks of the Union of each place of redemption, but the system fails to accomplish the object intended.

If the banks of the city were all equally sound, their interests would be one, and they would unite voluntarily to establish an agency for assorting and presenting those notes; but their interests are various as those of the respective circumstances of their condition. The weak banks want money plenty whatever may be its character, and will not unite to measure that may produce stringency. The duty of assorting and presenting such notes for redemption can be prescribed by act of Congress, which should provide some bureau in New York to record promptly to the banks.

The system will always be characterized by defects, because it is intrinsically bad. There will never be satisfaction until we go back to a specie basis, but judicious amendments may be made gently to the improvement of the act. There are haunts, however, to which we must be done. Great stress is laid upon the objection that our currency is not elastic, as if the requisite elasticity can be obtained in an unnatural system. It is one of the defects and, at times, one of the merits of the present scheme that the currency is a fixed quantity. We have sometimes a plethora of money as a consequence of it, especially after the quantity sent out to move the crops is returned to the sea-board; but there is this compensation for it, that when the season of scarcity exists from shifting the currency to the West, no drop of specie values can produce a panic. The quantity being fixed, and having no exportable character such as belong to the precious metals, it is returned to the East as soon as there is an earnest demand, and panics are always prevented. It may be affirmed of the present system that a serious panic is an impossibility except in the contingency of the destruction of the credit of the banks—a contingency too remote to excite present attention. The currency is probably as good as one that is convertible can be, with the single exception that the original plan for its redemption fails to accomplish the object. The fact that an effort was made in this direction, in the first instance, by Congress, may be regarded as an admission that the feature is essential. Its failure in this respect is an admitted and great defect, and ought immediately to be remedied. Banks in the interior, not obliged to redeem here, create a false accumulation of their bills in New York at certain seasons, and upon the failure to have them presented for redemption, and it seems to be a positive excess movement to unsound banking and speculation. The act itself may be said to contain the means of the ultimate destruction of the system. Banks, both strong and weak, ought to urge that this feature shall be eliminated from it, in order to preserve the general safety. It will be a step in the direction of specie payments, and it will enhance the credit of the currency and of the government. Until it is done, the currency will be exposed to all the vicissitudes of change. For the last eight months, notwithstanding that our crops are abundant, and that all the usual conditions for an active season existed, our trade and industry have been unremunerative and unsatisfactory. Is it the interest of the weak banks that this shall happen at another season? Can any compensation for it be found in the advantage of a redundant circulation? There can be no compensation for it whatever. The suffering which the country has lately endured under every interest will not soon cease, and it will take years to repair the loss. It could never have happened if an efficient plan of redemption had existed.

Last year, just as we were about to export our crops of cotton, grain, and other productions, all that had been produced and all the currency prices—high because the quantity of money, from want of redemption, was excessive—the failure of gunboat speculation in the country a severe blow. They had counted upon a continuation of the Treasury policy of accumulation. But such was the general distress occasioned by their operations that the Government offered four millions for sale. One of the consequences was that he could not promptly handle forty millions of Clearing-House gold than four millions of real gold. The power of the Treasury to instantly contract here, by Wall Street, and, for the first time, was known at Washington; and, from that day to this, it has been content to put down the price of gold, with a view to prepare for funding the debt at a low rate of interest. It was deemed necessary to have what our bonds were above par, measured by gold.

In this process the prices of all our productions have been lowered in nearly the same uniformity with the fall in gold. When it reached 109 and rebounded to 15 trade revived, and it is now very generally conceded that the panic and depression coincide with the changes in this medium in its relation to our paper system. If the rise in gold had been due to any new attraction of the currency, it would have been permanent and useful; but that it is artificial may be known in the accumulation in the new securities banks of vast bundles of national bank notes, which are regarded with great concern, although the aggregate difference between their sales of paper and gold is indicated by only 15 per cent. premium on the latter.

If the premium which existed when the raid took place still prevailed, these notes would be in tolerably active circulation; but the policy pursued from that time to this has been such that our whole industry is enormously diminished, and the circulation—too large for the business of the country—is infinitely too large for it in its diminished proportions. Now is the time for an act which shall provide for absorbing and redeeming these bills, and giving partial health to our circulating medium.

AN "INSPIRED" MEETING.

THE difficulty with the St. Domingo meeting in New York, as an "expression of popular sentiment," was that the meeting was "inspired" from Washington. It was not an expression of popular sentiment, but of the wishes of the Administration. The arguments were Mr. Mc. FISH'S, and that to expose the annexation is to be an old fogy; and General BANKS's, that "the key-points of the continent are in foreign hands." If every thing new were therefore true, Mr. FISH's argument would be sound. But it is only the new with a good reason that can expect to be immediately received. General BANKS said that the strength of the rebellion was sustained by the neighboring islands under British rule, which were a base for privateering. They were, undoubtedly, of great value to the rebellion. But the General should have shown us that the advantage of those foreign islands, in case of another rebellion, is greater than the disadvantage of immediately annexing civil war, ignorance, superstition, debt, and an alien tropical people to our population. This he did not do. If we want a coaling station in the West Indies, why did we treat the St. Thomas treaty so contemptuously? And if we are to absorb every island that may ask to be annexed, General BANKS tells us that there are eight hundred of them in the Gulf. Moreover, if we do not wish any European power to acquire more islands, we can say so in a tone that will be heeded.

Our last feat of annexation was Alaska. We paid several millions of dollars for it. On any bold person may examine the papers for the transaction, except the vague desire of increasing our territory? Except for that feeling there would be no reason for the acquisition of the St. Domingo bargain. Indefinite extension is not indefinite increase of power or prosperity. If we buy St. Thomas, General BANKS says that we need not take any other island. But here is Cuba fighting with Spain, with the hope of union with us; and the annexation of St. Domingo is infinitely stronger for acquiring Cuba. Moreover, Mr. FISH, in following him, immediately said that to get St. Domingo was to get all the rest. The General says that when our war began, Europe was ready to proceed to carve this country, but was prevented by our advantage. What does the General suppose that Europe thinks of the success of the French carving in Mexico? Does he suppose that anyone that Europe will ever again, and especially after the result of the last unpleasantness, interfere any more with the "interests" of America?

The politics of the world have changed. Foreign conquest is out of fashion. Colonies are no longer desirable dependencies. The modern principle of local self-government is so generally accepted that the old systems accordingly disappear. Even in Spain, despite Cuba is unquestionably relaxed, whatever the issue of the revolution. England would doubtless gladly retain Canada, however, in any government; and in a foreign war a colony is but a weakness to the European owner. The St. Domingo bargain is a mistake, and we hope that it will not be ratified.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY.

BY JOHN JONES, A.M.

I BET that my fellow-artists who are not yet successful in getting a picture hung will be there by MR. DISRAELI, in his new novel. Mr. Phoebus, at a private view of one of his master pieces, says: "To-morrow the public will commence. You know who the critics are. The men who have failed in literature or art. That is enough for them. They have their miserable conclusi model. Poor England! Happily, we manage things differently in this country. Here our critics are appointed to criticise the Exhibition in the newspapers. And you do not know that if they did as I do, and signed their articles, they would be ruined. They, however severely treated by them, would ever think of saying that they were fellows who had failed in every thing, and who were left to lecturing at their betters. The other day I heard a poet say, in the hearing of another, that most poetry nowadays was prose stuff. Presently the other came to me and said: "Do you suppose that that donkey meant to say that my poetry was prose stuff? By Gosh! I never saw any of his that wasn't stretched twaddle." That is a kind of remark which you never hear among artists. If I, for instance, say that Smith's figures are inexpressibly bad, when Smith hears of it he sweetly replies that Jones certainly ought to know what he is talking of.

It is indeed for that reason that I have allowed myself to be persuaded to write these little articles. The public know that my fellow-artists who write anonymously in the other papers understand our subject. They see, for instance, that when I Travel and Adventure.

PREPARED EXPRESSLY FOR HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TO THE SOURCES OF THE NILE.

By Sir Samuel Baker.

CHAPTER I.

Purpose of the Expedition.—Habits of the Camel.—Arab Migration.—Arrival at Sofi.—A Germon Hunter.—Purchases and Transportation of the Cabin.—Crossing the Atbara on a Bedstead.—A Giraffe Hunt.

It will be remembered that in the spring of 1861 Sir SAMUEL BAKER set out from Lower Egypt, with the hope of encountering Speke and Grant in the vicinity of the sources of the Nile, and a firm resolve to add to their discoveries or perish in the attempt. It will also be remembered that Mrs. Baker, a lady in the spring-time of existence, and as charming as she was heroic, accompanied her husband, and, during the five years of the expedition, displayed a courage and devotion that nothing could appall. It will likewise be remembered with what success this noble enterprise was crowned, and we need not revert to it. But, before entering directly on his search for the sources of the Nile, Sir Samuel Baker determined to study the tributaries which this river received from Abyssinia. The result was a series of explorations which lasted a year, and demonstrated to the traveler that, if the supernatural current of the river is kept up by the reservoirs arising from the equatorial rains, the inundation is produced exclusively by the Abyssinian rivers, and that these rushing torrents not only cause the river to overflow, but enrich its banks with the soil of the plateaux over which they sweep, whence proceeds the fertility of the banks on which this soil is deposited, and the formation of the Delta of Egypt. This important study, carried on in a country full of game, was diversified by exciting hunting expeditions, which enriched Baker's escort, and enabled the party to live in plenty during their journey.

Instead, therefore, of continuing their route to Khartoum, the explorer and his wife ascended the Atbara to within two hundred and twenty miles from its mouth; then, leaving it at their right, they turned southward and proceeded toward Cassala, on the Abyssinian frontier, where they arrived on the 9th of July. Since quitting the Nile boat the two travelers had journeyed, either on donkeys or camels, seven hundred and ten miles, six hundred and thirty miles of which had been through scorching deserts during the hottest season: 114° Fahr. in the shade under the water-skins, 137° in the sun.

The desert, even at this season, is not always terrible. The nights are cool and fresh, the sky is covered with stars, the horizon shuts down, the hills assume strange shapes in the moonlight, and the calmness which surrounds you in this mysterious solitude is invested with a supernatural character which is full of delight. There is not a mosquito; not one of those insects which are the pest of hot climates. As soon as the sun goes down you enjoy perfect comfort.

But the sun returns, the plain is boundless, and the traveler sees nothing but scorching sands and burning rocks. To the devouring rays of the sun is joined the withering breath of the simoom. Wood warps, ivory cracks, and paper splits at its touch; the marrow in one's bones dries up, and the wine-skins are emptied. The dust fills the ears and stops up the nostrils; it comes in thick clouds, formed of columns more than thirty feet in height, which revolve through the plain or scatter in all directions at the mercy of the whirlwind.

Even along the river, except the fringes of mimosa and the groups of dome-palms that line the banks, there is still the same burning plain. And to cross this plain there are only the most execrable means of transportation. Of all species of fatigue, says Baker, the back-breaking, monotonous swing of a heavy camel is the worst, and, should the rider lose patience, and administer a sharp cut that induces the creature to break into a trot, the torture of the rack is a pleasant tickling compared to the sensation of having your spine driven, from a sledge-hammer below, half a foot deeper into the skull. There is indeed the hygienic, the pre-blooded dromedary, which deliciously ambles a mile in six minutes, and can travel without giving way for nine or ten hours, but the Arabs prize these too highly to let them to strangers.

Mr. and Mrs. Baker set out from Cassala on the 11th of July, and took their way westward toward the Atbara. They had had rain on the very day that they left the desert. From this time the showers, more and more copious, had become daily. There was verdure every where; but the camels' feet sank deep into the soil; the formed adhesive clods upon their spongy toes that almost disabled them. The Arabs were hastening to lead theirs to firmer ground. The road was blocked up with flocks of goats and sheep, and camels bearing women and children, or loaded with strange articles of quaint household goods. Fine bronzed figures of Arabs, with sword, shield, and white topes or plaids, guided their milk-white dromedaries through the confused throng. All were migrating to the north, where the grass was beginning to swoon, and where neither fever nor the cattle disease were to be feared. Our travelers, on the contrary, pressed their course toward the south, and, in spite of increasing difficulties, reached Sofi a fortnight after their departure from Cassala.

Sofi is nothing but a wretched village consisting of some thirty huts, but the location is superb. A German hunter named Florian had built a stone cottage, the only one in the place, where he had lived for some years. He was a sallow, sickly-looking man, who, with a large, bony frame, had been reduced by constant hard work and frequent sickness to little but skin and bone. He had left Germany with the Austrian mission to Khartoum; but finding the work too laborious in such a climate, he had declared for independence, purchased a rifle, turned hunter, and employed his leisure in earning money by the work of his hands in various ways. This worthy man had thoroughly explored a part of the region which Baker proposed to visit, and could give him valuable information; and it was to consult him that the traveler had come to Sofi.

Outdoor life was no longer possible; it was necessary to seek a permanent shelter. This was an easy matter. For ten piastres, or about half a dollar, I purchased, says Baker, a remarkably neat house. This did not seem an extravagant outlay for a neat dwelling with a sound roof; neither were there any legal expenses in the form of conveyance, as in that happy and practical land the simple form of conveyance is the transportation of the house (the roof) upon the shoulders of about thirty men, and thus it is conveyed to any spot that the purchaser may consider desirable. Accordingly, our mansion was at once seized by a crowd of Arabs, and carried off in triumph, while the sticks that formed the wall were quickly arranged upon the dining-room, drawing-room, lady's boudoir, library, breakfast-room, bedroom, and dressing-room (with the great advantage of their combination in one circular room fourteen feet in diameter). The architecture was of ancient style, from the original design of a pill-box surmounted by a candle extinguisher.

I purchased two additional huts, and in the course of a week we had formed as pretty a camp as Robinson Crusoe himself could have coveted; but he, poor unfortunate! had only his mast Friday to assist him, while in our arrangements there were many clumsy and unscrutinable little comforts that could only be effected by a lady's hand. Not only were our walls covered with snow-white sand, and the borders ornamented with beautiful agates that we had collected in the neighborhood, but the interior of our house was the perfection of neatness: the floor was covered with white sand beaten firmly together to the depth of about six inches, the surface was swept and replaced with fresh material daily; the traveling bedsteads, with their bright green mosquito-curtains, stood on either side, affording a clear space in the centre of the circle, while exactly opposite the door stood the gun-rack, with its goodly array of weapons as the heart of a sportsman could desire.

My revolver and a brace of double-barreled pistols hung upon the wall, which, although the exterior of the house was straw, we had lined with the bright-colored canvas of the tent. Suspended by loops were little ornamental baskets worked by the Arabs, that contained a host of useful articles, such as needles, thread, etc., etc.; and the remaining surface was hung with hunting knives, fishing lines, and a variety of instruments belonging to the chase. A traveling table, with maps and a few books, stood against the wall, and one more article completed our furniture—an exceedingly neat toilet-table, the base of which was a flat-topped portmanteau, concealed by a cunning device of cloths and muslin; this, covered with the usual arrangement of brushes, mirror, scent-bottles, etc., threw an air of civilization over the establishment, which was increased by the presence of an immense sponging-bath, that, being flat and circular, could be fitted underneath a bed. In the draught of air near the door stood our filter in a wooden frame, beneath which was a porous jar that received and cooled the clear water as it fell.

We were thoroughly happy. There was a delightful calm and a sense of rest, a total estrangement from the cares of the world. The eye plunged into the valley for a distance of five miles. Every day I took my telescope and spied wild beasts leaving tranquilly on the other side of the river, where the country was a desert. There was plenty of game there, but none at all on our side, and no means of crossing the Atbara. Every day without exception, and generally for several hours of the night, the lightning flashed and thunder roared with little intermission, while the rain fell in such torrents that the entire country became impassable, with the exception of the hard ground of the Atbara Valley. The rich hues of the table-land had risen like leavened dough, and was knee-deep in adhesive mud; the grass upon this surface grew with such rapidity that in a few weeks it reached a height of nine or ten feet. The glorious Atbara was at its maximum.

We had seen it quite dry; now its current was two hundred yards wide, and more than forty feet deep. Nevertheless, we must cross it. Seventy-six giraffes! We felled a tree for a canoe; and I find in my journal

August 16. Our canoe is so heavy that it will only carry one person, and even then it threatens to become a sinking machine: three long days' hard work are lost. Florian is in despair; but nil desperandum! I shall set to work in disguise and make a raft.

August 18. Launched the raft; it carries four persons safely, but the current is strong, and it is therefore unmanageable. A dead elephant floated down the river to-day; this is the second that has passed within the last few days. They have probably been drowned in attempting to cross some powerful torrent tributary to the Atbara.

September 2. For many days past we have seen large herds of giraffes on the opposite side of the river, about two miles distant. To-day they lumbered up by descending from the level flats, and I was tempted at all hazards across the river. My bedstead, inverted and supported by water-skins, inflated, formed an excellent raft. There are hippopotamus hunters in the village that swim like otters: two of these were to draw the raft across the river by tow-lines, while two others were to hang on behind and keep it in the rapid current.

THE DEATH OF THE GIRAFFE.—[FROM A SKETCH BY SIR S. BAKER.]

Off we went! The current, running at nearly five miles an hour, carried us away at a great pace, and the whirlpools caused us much trouble, as we several times whirled round when we should have preferred a straight course; but the towing-swimmers being well mounted upon logs of light ambatch-wood, swam across in fine style, and after some difficulty we arrived at the opposite bank, and scrambled through thick bushes upon our hands and knees to the summit.

For about two miles' breadth on this side of the river the valley is rough, broken ground, full of gullies and ravines sixty or seventy feet deep, beds of torrents, bare sandstone rocks, bushy crags, fine grassy knolls, and long strips of mimosa scrub, forming a most perfect locality for shooting.

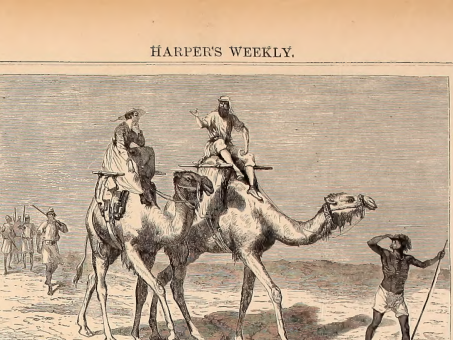
I had observed by the telescope that the giraffes were standing as usual upon an elevated position, from whence they could keep a good look-out. I knew it would be useless to ascend the slope direct, as their long necks give these animals an advantage similar to that of the man at the mast-head; therefore, although we had the wind in our favor, we should have been observed. I therefore determined to make a circuit of about five miles, and thus to approach them from above, with the advantage of the broken ground for stalking. It was the perfection of uneven country; by clambering broken cliffs, wading shoulder-deep through muddy gullies, sliding down the steep ravines, and winding through narrow bottoms of high grass and mimosas, for about two hours, during which we disturbed many superb nellut (Ant. strepsiceros), and reiel (Ant. Rubelis), we at length arrived at the point of the high table-land, upon the verge of which I had first noticed the giraffes with the telescope. Almost immediately I distinguished the tall neck of one of these splendid animals about half a mile distant upon my left, a little below the table-land; it was feeding on the bushes, and I quickly discovered several others near the leader of the herd. I turned sharp to my right, intending to arrive on the leeward side of the herd.

I had marked a thick bush as my point of cover, and upon arrival I found that the herd had fed down wind, and that I was within two hundred yards of the great bull sentinel that, having moved from his former position, was now standing directly before me. He was shortly joined by two others. A puff of wind gently fanned the back of my neck; it was cool and delightful, but no sooner did I feel the refreshing breeze than I knew it would convey our scent direct to the giraffes. A few seconds afterward the three grand obelisks threw their heads still higher in the air, and fixing their great black eyes upon the spot from which the danger came, they remained as motionless as though carved from stone.

The attitude of fixed attention and surprise of the three giraffes was sufficient warning for the rest of the herd, who immediately filed up from the lower ground, and joined their comrades. All now halted, and gazed sensitively in our direction, forming a superb tableau; their beautiful mottled skins glancing like the summer coat of a thorough-bred horse, the orange-colored statues standing out in high relief from a background of dark green mimosas.

This beautiful picture soon changed; I knew that my chance of a close shot was hopeless, as they would presently make a rush and be off; thus I determined to get the first start. I had previously studied the ground; and I concluded that they would push forward at right angles with my position, as they had thus ascended the hill; and that, on reaching the higher ground, they would turn to the right, in order to reach an immense tract of high grass, as level as a billiard-table, from which no danger could approach them unobserved.

I accordingly, with a gentle movement of my hand, directed my people to follow me, and I made a sudden rush forward at full speed. Off went the herd, shambling along at a tremendous pace, whisking their long tails above their hindquarters; and taking exactly the direction I had anticipated, they offered me a shoulder shot at a little within two hundred yards' distance. Unfortunately I fell into a deep hole concealed by the high grass, and by the time that I resumed the hunt they had increased their distance; but I observed the leader turned sharp to the right, through some low mimosa bush, to make direct for the open table-land. I made a short cut obliquely at my best speed, and only halted when I saw that I should lose ground by altering my position. Stopping short, I was exactly opposite the herd as they filed by me at right angles in full speed, within about one hundred and eighty yards. I had only my old Ceylon No. 10 double rifle, and I took a steady shot at a large dark-colored bull. The satisfactory sound of the ball upon his hide was followed almost immediately by his blundering forward for about twenty yards, and falling heavily in the low bush. I heard the crack of the ball of my left-hand barrel upon another fine beast, but no effects followed. Bachiet quickly gave me the single 2-ounce Manton rifle, and I singled out a fine dark-colored bull, who fell on his knees to the shot, but recovering, bobbled off dissabled, apart from the herd, with a fore-leg broken just below the shoulder. Upon my approach he attempted to move, but immediately fell, and was dispatched by my eager Arabs. I followed the herd for about a mile to no purpose, through deep chimmy ground and high grass, and I returned to our game.



TRAVERSING THE DESERT.—[FROM A SKETCH BY SIR S. BAKER.]

These were my first giraffes, and I admired them as they lay before me with a hunter's pride and satisfaction, but mingled with a feeling of pity for such beautiful and utterly helpless creatures. The eye of this animal is the most beautiful exaggeration of that of the gazelle, while the color of the reddish-orange hide, mottled with darker spots, changes the tints of the skin with the differing rays of light, according to the muscular movement of the body. No one who has merely seen the giraffe in a cold climate can form the least idea of its beauty in its native land. By the time we had skinned one of the animals it was nearly six o'clock, and it was necessary to hurry forward to reach the river before night; we therefore arranged some thorny boughs over the bodies, to which we intended to return on the following morning.

When about half-way to the river, as we were passing through grass about four feet high, three reiel bounded from a ravine, and, passing directly before us, gave me a splendid shot at about sixty yards. The Ceylon No. 10 struck the foremost through the shoulder, and it fell dead after running a few yards. This was also my first reiel (Antelope Rubelis); it was in splendid condition, the red coat was like satin, and the animal would weigh about five hundred pounds live weight. I had made very successful shots, having bagged three out of four at large game.

It was quite dark before we reached the river; we had been much delayed by repeated falls into deep holes and over hidden stones; thus I was well satisfied to find myself once more at home, after having crossed the river in pitchy darkness, in a similar manner as before.

The next morning we crossed the river anew in search of our game. There was but one giraffe left. The lions and tigers had devoured the other during the night, without leaving a single trace. The savage herd had wallowed in the mud, and the imprints told of the theft. This was a real loss. The natives set great store by the flesh of the giraffe, and they are right, for the meat is the best I have ever tasted. Every part of the animal is turned to some use. The skin, which is singularly hard, has the advantages of being as light as it is tough, which renders it very valuable for the manufacture of shields; and the long tendons of the legs are exceedingly prized by the Arabs in lieu of thread for sewing leather, and also for guitar-strings.

TEARING THE HIPPOPOTAMUS TO PIECES.—[FROM A SKETCH BY SIR S. BAKER.]

CHAPTER II.

Aggressors, or Hunters of the Harmur Tribe.—Swords and Shields.—Hunting with the Sword.—Last Departure from Sofar.—Encountered at Wat el Sheikh.—Purchase of Three Horses.—Hippopotamus Hunt.—Tearing the Animal to Pieces.—Attack and Slaughter.

It had been a month at Sofi when I had an audience of a party of hunters whom I had long wished to meet. I had heard of certain Arabs of the Harmur, who that inhabited the country south of Cassala, who hunted and killed all wild animals, from the antelope to the elephant, with no other weapon than the sword.

I could not understand how it could be possible to kill an elephant with the sword, unless the animal should be mobbed by a crowd of men and hacked to death, but I was assured that the most savage elephant had no chance upon level hunting ground against four aggressors (as the hunters with the sword are designated). I had determined to engage a party of those hunters to accompany me throughout my exploration of the Abyssinian rivers at the proper season, as I should have an excellent opportunity of combining sport with an examination of the country. My intentions had become known, and the visit of the hunters was the consequence.

The Harmur Arabs are distinguished from the other tribes by an extra length of hair, worn parted down the centre, and arranged in long curls; otherwise, there is no perceptible difference in their appearance from other Arabs. They are armed, as are all others, with sword and shield; the latter are circular, and are generally formed of rhinoceros hide. There are two kinds of shields used by the various tribes of Arabs; one is a narrow oval, the other is circular. There is no difference in the form of their swords. The blade is long and straight, two-edged, with a simple cross hatchet, having no other guard to the hand than the plain bar, which, at right angles with the hilt, forms the cross.

The sword of the aggressor is defined in no respect from those usually worn; but they were bound with cord very closely from the guard for about nine inches along the blade, which is marked to be grasped by the right hand, while the hilt was held by the left; the weapon was thus converted into a two-handed sword.

The Harmurs who could not afford to purchase horses hunted on foot, in parties not exceeding two persons. Their method was to follow the tracks of an elephant, so as to arrive at the same game between the hours of 10 A.M. and noon, at which time the animal is either asleep or extremely hungry, and easy to approach. When they discover the animal asleep, one of the hunters would carry on his feet, while the other followed expel in the confusion of the moment. The trunk several times as a defensive weapon, to prevent to insure the death of the elephant within about an hour. On the other hand, should the animal be awake upon their arrival, it would be impossible to approach the trunk; in such a case they would creep on foot, in parties not exceeding two persons. Their method was to follow the tracks of an elephant, so as to arrive at the same game between the hours of 10 A.M. and noon, at which time the animal is either asleep or extremely hungry, and easy to approach. When they discover the animal asleep, one of the hunters would carry on his feet, while the other followed with one blow sever the trunk while stretched upon the ground; in which case the elephant would rush upon his feet, while the hunter escaped in the confusion of the moment. The trunk severed cause a rush of blood sufficient to insure the death of the elephant within about an hour. On the other hand, should the animal be awake upon their arrival, it would be impossible to approach the trunk; in such a case they would creep upon the animal in parties not exceeding four. They start before daybreak, and ride slowly throughout the country in search of elephants, generally keeping along the course of a river until they come upon the tracks where a herd or a single elephant may have passed during the night. When once upon the tracks, they follow fast toward the retreating game. The elephants are by twenty miles distant, and they are often little to the aggressors. At length they discover them, and the hunt begins. The first step is to single out the bull with the largest tusks; this is the commencement of the fight. After a short hunt, the elephant turns upon his pursuers, who scatter and fly from his headlong charge until he gives up the pursuit; he then halts, and the day when again pressed by the hunters. It is the duty of one man in particular to ride up close to the hind leg of the elephant, and thus attract its attention upon himself. This insures a desperate charge. The greatest coolness and dexterity are then required by the hunter. But we shall soon see him at work.

As I intend to these fine fellows, who, in a modest and unassuming manner, recounted their adventures as matters of course, and not as any high small. My whole life had been passed in wild sports from early manhood, and I had imagined that I understood as much of the science of this subject; but here were men who, without the aid of the best rifles and deadly projectiles, went straight at their game, and faced the lion in his den with shield and sabre. I felt inclined to take off my cap and make a low bow to the gallant and swarthy fellows who sat before me. There is a freemasonry among hunters, and my heart was drawn toward these aggressors. We fraternized upon the spot, and I looked forward with intense pleasure to the day on which we might become allies in action. For this it was necessary to take the field anew.

On the 15th of September a heavy shower of rain fell; this proved to be the last of the season, and from that moment the burning sun ruled the sodden country and rapidly dried up all vegetation. In a week the grass assumed a tinge of yellow, and by the end of October there was not a green spot to relieve the eye from the golden blaze of the landscape, except the patches of grass and reeds that sprang from the mud-banks of the retiring river. We had quitted Sofi on the 4th of the last shower, and, after a long march at different places, had pitched our tents on the 15th at Wat el Sheikh. We here hunted grass below the village of Wat el Negur, and seven hours' journey from Settite. I at that time owned three horses, which I had purchased of the Harmur hunters, all three of Abyssinian breed, and handsome animals, although none exceeded fourteen hands and a half. I had named them Gazelle, Tetel, and Aggabi, which is the singular of aggressors. The two last names were appropriate; Gazelle was inexperienced, but remarkably handsome.

Scarcely had we arrived when I accepted an invitation to shoot a savage old bull hippopotamus that had been sufficiently disturbed to cause several of the natives. He lived in a deep and broad portion of the river, about a mile distant. My accordingly rode to the spot, and found the old hippo at home. The river was about 250 yards wide at this place, in an open bend that had formed a deep pool. In the centre of this was a mud bank, just below the surface upon this shallow bed the hippo was reposing. Upon perceiving he was exceedingly angry; snorting like a steam-engine, he lashed himself in a most absurd manner, by shaking his head and heaving half-way out of the water. This blustering demonstration was intended to frighten us. I had previously given Bacheet a rifle, and had ordered him to shoot at the opposite bank. I now hallooed to him to fire several shots at the hippo, in order to drive him from his position, that he might unmolested by a rush in the bed of the river. Bacheet descended at about quarter-shot, and fired from the bank edge, and fired a shot with the pistol. The hippo, who was a wicked, solitary old bull, accustomed to have the river to himself, instead of charging toward Bacheet, with a tremendous snorting that sent him scampering for the bank sunk in a panic. Once safe in his elevated position on the top of the bank, thirty feet above the river, he fired a shot from the rifle in defiance at the hippopotamus.

As the hippo had gained confidence, I showed myself above the rock, and called to him by his Arab name, "Hi-hoh! Hi-hoh!" He, thinking no doubt that he was the only bull here and gave a loud snort, sank, and quickly reappeared with a hundred yards from the spot where he made his positively refused to approach. Therefore called to Bacheet to shout from the other side to entice him, and, after much trouble, he was lured. I took a steady shot behind the ear with the little Archer rifle. This disturbed him for a few those fortunate shots that consoles you for many misses, and the saucy old hippo turned upon his back, rolled about in the shallow water, appearing to lashing the still and deep pool into waves, until at last he sought disappeared.

We had now settled down for a long halt. We settled; then my people started off toward the village, and in a marvelously short time a frantic crowd of Arabs arrived from the surrounding natives, and every thing necessary for an onslaught upon the hippo, who, up to this time, had not been driven from the water. It was now noon, and a half from the time he received the bullet, we discovered that he had floated down about a hundred yards lower down the river. Several heads of large crocodiles appeared and vanished suddenly within a few feet of the hippo's carcass; therefore the Arabs considered it prudent to wait until the carcass should have floated to the sandy pebbly shallows about half a mile below the pool. Upon arrival at that point there was a general rush, and by eight o'clock the animal was hauled by many ropes and hauled it to the shore. It was a very fine bull, and his enormous head measured twelve feet three inches. I had two haunches kept for the chiefs, and a large quantity of fat, which I had also weighed and seized by the Arabs, as it is the most delicate of all animal. Those people are passionately fond of a nerve of meat for ourselves, the usual disgusting scene of violence commenced, the crowd falling and judging success like a pack of hounds. A hundred knives were instantly at work. They fought over the fat like wild beasts. No sooner was the carcass flayed than the struggle commenced for the meat. The people were a mass of blood, in some cases dragging in the intestines wrestling for the fat, while many hacked at each other in the general confusion. Others were striven for as a bonne bouche. I quitted the savage spectacle, which I had seen before, and which was always conceived on a like principle.

TO BE CONTINUED.

AN OPIUM-EATER.

Dr. Quincey, in his "Confessions of an Opium-Eater," has given us a picture of the misery experienced by indulging in this narcotic, which could be tempting enough to those who do not meet the miserable condition of the patient in his waking state serve as a horrible warning. Dr. Pierquerlie, in his "Voyage en Mexico," gives a description of a case related by an English embassador to an Indian king. This high personage having been led to a sumptuous apartment, in a short time two slaves, bearing a litter, approached. Upon the litter, covered with shawls of great value, a human form was borne, to all appearance dead. Two physicians, who followed in attendance produced a bottle in which a bluish-looking liquor appeared. The embassador, thinking he was the involuntary witness of some funeral ceremony, wished to retire; but he was soon undeceived, upon observing one of the officers raise the head of this apparently lifeless being, replace the tongue which was hanging from the mouth, and make it swallow some black liquid, at the same time closing the mouth, and gently rubbing the throat in order to facilitate its passage. When this operation had been repeated five or six times, the figure opened its eyes and stirred its mouth of its own accord; it then swallowed, without assistance, another large dose of the fatal drug. In less than an hour became revived, and sat up upon the couch, having somewhat recovered its natural color and the purest use of its limbs. He then addressed the envoy in person, and asked him the object of his embassy. He eagerly to every one extraordinary being remained perfectly conscious, and capable of transacting business of the greatest importance. The English embassador took the liberty of asking him some questions concerning the substance which he had witnessed.

"Sir," he replied, "I have long been an opiumeater, and by degrees have fallen into this deplorable condition. I pass three parts of the day in the torpid state in which you have seen me. Although I am capable of moving or speaking, I remain my consciousness, and during this time I am surrounded with the most delightful visions; but I feel a delicious sense if I was not annoyed by zealous and affectionate attendants, who watch over me with the most anxious solicitude."

SUNSHINE ON THE SEA.

There are blossoms on the cherry,
And on the plum,
And my heart is light and merry
With the hope that blossoms there
For the sorrow and the weeping
When Autumn's brought to me.
In the past are calmly sleeping
Now there's sunshine on the sea,
I am looking for my lover
(Who is true as truth to me).
Now the white sail gleams afar
And there's sunshine on the sea.

"When the bloom of pear and cherry
Are white upon the tree,
Then you are to wed and merry,
Then look out, my love, for me."
So he said when first we courted,
While my tears rained on the deck,
For I felt half broken-hearted
In my fear of storm and wreck.
Now each spring-tide bud and blossom
Brings the time I've now nearer me,
And the sunshine in my bosom
Is the sunshine on the sea.

THE LOST CHANCE.

By Justin McCarthy.

"Remember, Laurence, my dear boy, whatever you do, not to bring home a frivolous creature, a flirt, and coquette, as your wife."

"But, my dear mother, I can assure you I have no intention of bringing home any wife."

"Well, I am sure—I think it is time you had a good wife" (this was said with something like a sigh), "for you are twenty-six; but in one of the frivolous flirting creatures one sees almost every where now. Let her be somebody with a pure, simple nature—one in which you could trust, and whom I could lean on as a daughter."

Laurence did not care to prolong the conversation, having nothing very particular to say on a subject which for as yet but little personal interest for him. So he laughed, promised, and bade his mother farewell for a season.

Laurence Gifford was a handsome young man, of good intellect, and some culture. In certain ways he would be called old-fashioned and slow-fashioned; for he was of a stendy, domestic turn, and he had a profound veneration for his mother. They were Yorkshire dalesmen, and Mrs. Gifford was a woman of pure and serene nature, to whom principle and goodness were every thing; but who was, perhaps, a little too prone to act in obedience to precept in her own life, and to insinuate the same course as the duty of others. Moreover, she was rather too much in the habit of judging success like a very shrewd woman. Now, nobody ever can justly judge of others who has not something of what I may perhaps call the dramatic power, which enables one for the moment to put one's self in the place, feel the feelings, and understand the purposes of another.

The moral of this little story—if it can pretend to any—is, that good intention and high principle are not always enough for the duties of life, and that for lack of a little of that which I have called dramatic power, a man may sometimes and sometimes go wrong, and sadly mislead others.

Laurence Gifford might be called a young man of fortune. His father had left property enough, accumulated in trade, to relieve the son from any actual necessity for living. So Laurence had studied and travelled for the sake of his own culture, and had lived for the most part quietly with his mother, avoiding but little of society, and seeking himself her companion as well as her son.

Now he was about to enter upon that world of which he had but little personal experience, and which he had only known through its perhaps, if you had seen him during his stay at the country seat of one of his friends, where he met, for the first time, Jennie Millicent. Miss Millicent was one of the prettiest, brightest, most animated, and brilliant girls any society could boast of. She was a girl who seemed to lend an appearance of reasonableness to the extravagant gallantry of that little poem of Rossard's (at least, I think it is Rossard's), which avers that the maid in an hour-glass is all that remained of a hapless lover who was thus reduced to dust and ashes by the first bright glance of a lady's eyes. Chance threw her, and then purposely intention, three Laurence Gifford and Jennie Millicent together a good deal in the course of their common friends. They found that they had many tastes in common. Jennie was a quick, eager reader, with a subtle, and apprehensive, and a judgment more than than her vivacious, brilliant manner would lead one to expect; and Laurence found himself, for the first time in his life, intellectually interested in the society of a woman.

They met at many other places during that season, and Laurence was for the first time in his life unhappy. Love, new-born, was disturbing up in his heart. Strange doubts and pains racked him.

For he said to himself, sadly and bitterly, "Jennie Millicent is a flirt. She has no heart or serious tenderness. She is heartless, and she knows it; she was determined to fascinate me, and she succeeded against her will. I am just another little triumph to her, and nothing more."

Then a more tender gloom in her blue eyes would seem to plead against his doubts, and he would devote himself to her—until some one else came near with whom she chose to divide her attention and her glances, and Laurence drew off, disheartened and miserable. "The shepherd in Virgil grew acquainted with Love, and found him a native of the rocks."

To what fine perplexities and pains he began to meet, in the same circles of society, a girl whose mother had been one of his mother's oldest friends, and to whom, therefore, he ought to have paid special attention, and would have paid it but for the distracting influence of bright Jennie Millicent. Caroline Hunter was a noble-looking girl, with a serene, Madonna-like face, and dark brown hair smoothly reposing on a white broad forehead. Her calm eyes sometimes rested on Laurence, with an expression that seemed to him to speak of sweet sympathy, loyalty and even compassion. He thought that she saw and understood his conditions, and pitied him.

"She pities me," he said to himself, "for she believes that I am entangled by a brilliant and heartless flirt. Perhaps like Jennie herself she has told her that she has made me her slave. Girls of that nature do such things sometimes, people say." And he drew nearer to Caroline Horton, and tried to maintain his independence and self-control, and to keep aloof from the perilous fascinations of Jennie Millicent. There was something soothing and consoling in the society of Miss Horton. She always conversed with him with the same sweet, serene smile; she always look at sympathy. Jennie Millicent usually met in words. Poor Laurence felt that there must be some influence about her which he could not clearly define or characterize, or he never having her side he could hardly remember what they had been talking of, and yet he was certain he knew that a congenial nature had given its sympathy and strength to him. She was always the same in manner. Jennie Millicent changed every hour. Caroline Horton listened tenderly and calmly, and spoke little; Jennie Millicent was always starting new ideas, and pursuing them as if they were bright butterflies and she an eager child.

Presently that little comedy was about to break up. Breakings-up, as Dickens says, are cognial things at school; but in after-life they are, among other drawbacks, the disadvantages, generally, that the boys and girls do not come back and play together any more. The guests in the social circle of which Laurence had formed as a part were about to scatter for and wide—some to the Highlands, some to Paris, a few to New England, and a few to Old England. A great friend of Laurence's, a young man, whom he had known at Harvard, had joined the group lately, and his presence and his imminent departure had given an additional impetus to Laurence: his imminent departure, for Laurence was grieved to lose him; the prospect of his presence soon observed that Gray and himself were rowing in the same boat—that Charley Gray was a captive and a bond-slave of Jennie Millicent.

One morning, about this time, Laurence received a letter from his mother, in answer to which for it wound up with the words, "Beware! my dear son. I have heard something about a triumphant flirt whom you claim to have conquered, you. I know I can trust your heart and head; but still, my son, be careful, and be true to yourself." Laurence felt ashamed. His mother, unconsciously, looked on him as a weak boy, who still must be kept in leading-strings. And Jennie Millicent had, then, really been boasting of her conquest! Who could have written to his mother on the subject?

"I have made a fool of myself," Laurence murmured, "and every one knows it. It was morning, and he was walking alone in one of the shrubberies of a country house as he read his mother's letter. Suddenly he started and flushed, for Jennie Millicent was there before him. As he turned the corner of a winding walk he saw her. She was alone, and at first she did not see him. She held a paper in her hand, and her eyes were fixed on it. In her walk, her attitude, the bend of her neck and head, there was something which spoke of a profound and genuine sadness. It was but for a moment that Laurence could thus observe her, for his tread announced him, and she looked up, and their eyes met. She blushed a deep crimtion, and seemed quite agitated, and she hastily crumpled in her hand the paper she had been reading.

"She was reading a love-letter," Laurence said to himself. "Thank Heaven, I never wrote her a love-letter!"

Then they talked for a while, and, for some reason which Laurence could not explain even to himself, they talked very gravely and almost sadly. All the manner of the coquette was laid aside, and Jennie spoke to him in the most sympathetic tone of a sincere friend. There was something in her manner of once tender and calm which he had never observed before, and which he could not understand. It seemed to say, "Let there be henceforth only the clear truth between us. Let us not mistake each other. I am your friend; and only that. Be you my friend."

Laurence's soul was drawn toward her. "Have I not, after all, misunderstood this girl?" he began to ask himself.

As they walked along the thorns of a rose-bush caught Jennie's dress. She put out her hand to release herself, and the paper she had been holding fell to the ground. Laurence stooped to pick it up, and saw, not without some confusion, that it was in his own writing.

"It is the copy you made for me of that beautiful little poem of Victor Hugo's," she said, quietly. "I to like the poem that I have always kept it."

Then Laurence remembered that weeks and weeks before he had spoken to Jennie of a little poem of Victor Hugo's, and had copied it for her. It was that tender, half-melancholy poem which contains such verses as

"Puisque ici toute chose
Donne toujours
Son opine, on a rose
A ses amours."

There was a moment's silence. Then Laurence said:

"We are all scattering soon. Are we never all to meet again?"

"All are not likely to meet again, I suppose," she replied. "But some of us are pledged to meet again some time. Will it not be?" Then, ungratitude you, Mr. Gifford?"

"Congratulate me, Miss Millicent? Good Heavens! for what?"

She looked into his face with unfeigned wonder. "Am I premature and rash?" she said, with a half smile. "Pray forgive me."

"But, Miss Millicent, pray tell me what you mean. I do beg of you—oh, confound it!"

He was actually about to take her hand, when he saw Charley Gray appearing in the path, and he gave vent to the ungracious ejaculation which closed his speech.

Laurence would have given his friend the go by, but Miss Millicent's manner seemed purpose, by to invite Gray to join them. And Laurence quietly drew off, resolving to find another opportunity of speaking to her. The Destinies were against him. As he wandered, restless and impatient, through the shrubbery he came suddenly to an arbor which he saw, at a little distance, Jennie and his friend Gray standing together. Gray had taken her hand in his; and she was not resisting. Her eyes were cast down, and she was listening to what he was pouring into her ear. Laurence rushed from the spot.

"Heartless coquette!" he muttered, between his clenched teeth. "How nearly I had betrayed myself to her! Oh, thank Heaven for the chance which showed me how false and cruel she is!"

That evening Laurence left the place, after having proposed for Caroline Huston and been accepted. That evening poor Charley Gray left the place, having proposed for and passionately pleaded to Jennie Millicent; and been politely, compassionately, decisively rejected. And Charley Gray was ever so much wealthier than Laurence Gifford.

Laurence was married soon after, and took his beautiful, calm bride to Europe. She was always beautiful and calm. She was married on the first night of Mount Blanc and the first glimpse of Italy. She was calm through the wonderful sunsets of the Mediterranean, and in a sudden fierce squall on the Leman. They crossed over to the Lake and visited the Holy Family at Caroline's face wore the same sweet, placid expression as they looked in the street of Geneva and gazed upon the Mount of Olives. And Laurence at last accepted the truth, which he had striven so long as he could to shut out from his heart and mind. There was nothing in his wife. He had married a shapely figure, and a beautiful complexion, without mind or soul attached. Caroline Gifford had neither brains nor sympathies. The quiet, sweet smile that always lay on her pretty face represented no more of glow within than a sunbeam on a frozen lake. This, then, was all!

He brought home his wife to his mother, who was at first delighted with her. Then Laurence learned that it was Caroline who had conveyed to his mother the hint about his attentions to Jennie Millicent. He smiled rather grimly and said nothing. Before a week he saw that his mother had found out poor Caroline, and knew that her son was tied for life to a brainless, soulless woman. No word of what she knew was breathed to Laurence by his mother; but she could see an all-ever-present look of pity, regret, and something like remorse upon her face.

Laurence Gifford was no more whiner against Destiny—which, indeed, in his case, as in that of most of us, meant his own folly and mistake; and he resolved to make the best of his life—such of his wife. At first he strove hard to love her; but after a while he gave that up as hopeless. There was nothing to love; and Caroline would not have cared to be troubled with love. She was married to a steadfast, good man, and she did not want any thing else. She did not even want her husband's society. She was glad to have him for her husband: and that was all. Indeed his efforts, in their first months of marriage, to get her to take an interest in literature, or art, or nature, or any of the things he loved, were terrible bores to her. And Laurence soon saw this, and mercifully spared her. He was always kind and affectionate to her, and he resolutely endeavored to keep his eyes fixed on her good qualities—a difficult task, for the most poor Caroline had assuredly no bad qualities whatever, save of the negative sort which sufficiently marked to be classed as good qualities by any but the most indulgent and partial observer.

So life went on for Laurence Gifford—quiet, cheerless, hopeless. His wife brought him no children; but that fact in no way troubled him. She was placidly contented, while Laurence strove to bear manfully the fate he had brought upon himself. And his mother was utterly miserable in seeing what she saw, and believing that she had some share in causing the ill.

Once, and only once, he saw his old friend, Charley Gray. The latter was still unmarried, and had settled permanently in Europe. Once, however, he crossed the Atlantic to see his friends, and while in his native city he met his old acquaintances talked long and late into the night.

"I sometimes see an old friend of yours and of mine, in London, Laurence," said Gray, slowly, and with a little hesitation, "Jennie Millicent. You remember her?" And he looked somewhat curiously into Laurence's face. A flush was there, and Laurence's lips were compressed.

"Oh, as Laurence said, coldly, "I have not forgotten her. She is still unmarried?"

"She is still unmarried, and apparently resolved not to marry," said Gray, "and I have a notion that she will remain so. She is a strange fate for one who was, and is, so brilliant, and who had so many admirers and offers. You know that I asked her to marry me, Laurence?"

"I do—I have heard so."

"Yes, the very day you proposed for your wife! A strange coincidence! I loved Jennie Millicent, and always shall love her. She was my first good friend now, and always shall be, and can never be any thing more. She couldn't love me —I don't believe she ever will—I have not the noblest woman I ever knew. No good cause, no noble cause to serve, but her heart and her help go to it. She lives only for her friends and for doing good. And, though I know as well as if she told me, Laurence, that you are unhappy and unhappy, she has the same bright ways that she had when I think you were first acquainted for her sake, although she is the only woman who ever made me unhappy."

"Why shall he never marry?" Laurence asked. And he spoke with difficulty, and with a choking sensation in his throat.

"Don't you know?

Laurence answered only by a motion of his head. He could not speak.

"Because, Laurence Gifford, she was like me —she loved somebody who did not love her!"

"The deuce she was!" Laurence exclaimed Laurence, starting up. "I can't breathe here. Let us go out into the open air."

They went into the open air; and they spoke of Jennie Millicent no more. When Laurence went to his bedroom that night he slept somewhat fortably and soundly, with her hair done up very tightly indeed, and every other hair in place, and the unchanging, placid smile upon her handsome, soulless face.

THE HERO OF A FAST NOVEL.

THE pride of life is one of the leading notes of the "fast novel." Death may, with impartial hand, strike at the palace of princes or kings and the hovel of the pauper; but the pride of life which informs the pen of our fast novelists understands to treat of pauper and prince only to mean a fit to be a hero unless he can throw money about like water. It is not necessary that the hero should be his own money-bag, provided that it should not be—otherwise he would, perhaps, be too commonplace. But he must be immersed in an inextricable state of debt, he goes down to shoot at one of his many places, he does not care for ballroom, he is a fearless rider, a strong fisher, and his guests, all of them mounting high in the social scale, are supposed to be good enough to ought it. They arrive at a dim picturesque old house, with oak-paneled walls, heavy wood-glass mullioned windows, fire-dogs and chimes of fabulous value all around. They find a cuisine of the highest order, and perfect cigars; a grand piano in the Elizabethan drawing-room, the cloth of billiard-balls under the cues, and ashes and ashes of cigarettes and cigar-whisk-tables in the little garden-room that looks through gothic windows on to the flower-beds and shady cedars. When out shooting, these gentlemen, who are "roughing it," toss the dogs Punch and turkey, and they shake them at the pundits to their perfumed cigarettes. When the hero flies from his debts and his creditors, he disappears from the low white shore to his yacht. There, on a velvet-cushioned bench, in the most novel, yet so fine, dress, he lies on a splendid goblet, in which champagne of fine grain of golden wine. Silky necktaties and purple grapes are his companions in the plate. In the mirrored cabin a choice dinner awaits him. When he goes ashore, and walks in the streets, every house decorated with imperial blue, filled with things of great antiquity and beauty—ivory, bronze, marble, china, enamel, all gleaming out of the prevailing line of deep azure; chambers, in a word, resembling as continuing as many caverns in them as Christie's itself on a view-day. When he gives a dinner at the little box inhabited by his yacht-boat, the table seems have half-guinea rose-buds in their coats, the dining-room is one sheet of light, a miniature sun in the blue are of the ceiling sheds down its rays, the atmosphere is scented with pastilles, the table is ablaze with gold and silver, and the hangings of the walls are some satin, silver-starred. Anonymas herself is dressed in flame-colored robes, and she seems to be literally on fire with the superb rubies that glitter all over her. She wears boots that cost thirty guineas a pair, with silver-gilt spurs, and a "click-clack" like a cavalryman's. But the golden tazze, costly china, exquisite pictures, Oriental stuffs, silks, satins, and the embroidered, paper tables, rose-bound books, with monograms in turquoises and pearls on the cover, make the hero of the fast novel unconscious of the hero's nameless protopie, sink into insignificance when compared with the contents of his house. Then he has guns with ten times more light, ten times more color, ten times more finish, than those of the most accomplished Purdey, silver, and sauber—not a large room, but small and bijou, "intensely" luminous, and very costly. The hero goes to the theatre and chooses a loge-out on the stage, it contains a big sofa-place, or is shaped like a jeweled bolster. Elsewhere in the gorgeous pages of our fast instructor we meet with girls enfolded in a glitter of jewels, and shirts with huge gold serpentine coils upon their arms, who lean over a boat's side and dangle their feet upon the azure onyx of the sunlit waters, but upon the flavors of new sauces, and the strong old wines prince send to their tables from Oriental burnooms, all interwoven with pearls and turquoises, which Oriental emancipators give to the asking. Even the artists of our fast novels have curious valuation studios, in which the smoke of choice cigars is ever round about and hits a love, and amber and seltzer perpetually mix in long fairy-like glasses of Venice.

BEAN-FANCIER.

DUTCHY the first centuries of the Roman Republic the bean was held in all classes allowed their wards to grow freely: shaving seems to have been quite unknown. It was not until the year 454 B.C. that a thing like a razor was seen in Rome; but at that time a few Greek barbers had made their appearance in the forum; and although, like all innovators, they were at first received with derision, yet after a time they succeeded in getting customers; for at last even more: until at the barbers' shops in Rome persons could meet who are in London or Paris safes in Paris: places of lounging and resort, where every one with nothing to do spends a few hours of his time each day. As the Romans grew richer from the spoils of conquered nations, and their manners more refined, the simple life of their ancestors for a mode of living more in keeping with their wealth, many had shaves whose sole business was to shave them and cut their hair with greasers. At first this task was performed with a knife, and it was not to have had women trained to the work; and, as a woman's hand is much lighter, and usually more skilful, than that of a man, the change was announced by connoisseurs to be for the better. By Julius Cæsar's time the beard had fallen into enough disrepute among all classes of society, slaves being the only people who still wore it. Cæsar himself was clean-shaven, and many successors every morning; Pompey, Virgil, Horace, Cicero, Augustus, were all clean shaven too; even Caligula and Nero had but slight beards for the fashions, would have thought it disrespectful and unseemly to appear in a public place with a beard.

It was Trajan who first had the courage to shake off the mother's yoke. This King, an excellent monarch in many respects, discovered that his chin was growing somewhat prematurely of each day; and, as he was the first emperor since Cæsar who really felt that he was on the throne for something more than eating and drinking, he relinquished a habit that cost him considerable trouble, and could afford to face, like Adrian, Antonius Pius, and Marcus Aurelius, his immediate successors, followed in his wake, and allowed their beards to grow unchecked. After them, however, came Commodus; as this exemplary monarch found the time hang so heavily upon his hands that he was obliged to kill time of an afternoon, it was not likely that he would resent the practice of shaving; and from the shaving of making half-hours go by; barbers had a new time of it; and thenceforth continued to be the fashionable companions for patrons until Decius and overturned Romulus-Augustulus, the last imperial, and consequently the kingdom of Italy, and with it the reign of mustaches.

In the reign of Osric, the last of the Brevitudes, which had arisen about the end of the eleventh century, a fierce contest arose between the Saxon or Roman Catholic Church of England, Scotland, and Ireland, as to how the priests should shave their heads and faces, or whether they should shave them at all. The British priests held that shaving was superfluous. The Pope, however, maintained that the use of razors was indispensable to salvation. The strife waxed warm; but, as things seemed going in favor of the Pope, Dewin, who favored intestine and excommunication, convoked a meeting of Christian bishops at Whitby, in Northumberland. Here that priests should shave all but a thin crown of hair off their heads; secondly, that they should shave their faces; and, thirdly, that they should shave upon pain of public penance. This was peremptory. The Anglo-Saxon priests gave in.

Strangely enough, the beard, which had seemed a heresy to the Church of Rome in the time of Osric, had come into favor again with the Catholic priesthood by the middle of the ninth century. Bishops and priests had begun to allow it to grow on their faces, and were even rather fax in shaving the crowns of their heads. This scandalized the Greek Church, the ministers of which made a diligent use of razors; and the dispute upon this subject grew so fierce as it had seen two centuries before between Rome and England. On this occasion, however, the Papal See argued that, as all the Apostles, and notably St. Peter, had worn beards, it was the duty of their successors to imitate them. This failed to convince the Greeks; and, in the famous edict of excommunication which the Patriarch Photius launched against Pope Nicholas in 856, it was alleged as a major grievance that the Latin priests refused to shave, and were consequently unworthy of entering into communion with the brethren of the Eastern Church. Modern priests of the Democritus school will smile when they remember that opinions on this mighty point were once so violent again since that two archbishops the Greek priests wear beards, and the Romish shave!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"THAT bet is not long enough for me," said a very tall, slender Englishman, upon being inducted into his bedroom by an Irish waiter at one of our hotels. "Faith, sir, you'll find it plenty long, Sir, when you get into it," was the reply. "Be then there'll be two of us intended to it." EXIT PAT, with a best fellow-ing up the year.

APOSTROPHE TO AN OYSTER.

Delicious bivalve, as we peruse
Ere I engulf thee in my jaws:
And let the muse in lofty verse
While thy just praises I rehearse.
Next to the man, who first found out
Whom fruit invites to swallow thee
Was he who first found out well,
Fool, could be starved, or on the shell.
Thou art, oh glutton! all to me,
A very type of true delight,
Virginia's shore no treasure owns,
Nor Spain, with all her golden mines,
To equal thee, oh oyster mine!
As thou appearest in the pot,
The daring wight whose lucky lip
Thy luscious flavor shall first sip,
Deserves from us a tribute rare
Of admiring thee to fast and air.

A SALOON-KEEPER of questionable honesty went to a lawyer to consult him about commencing an action against a fellow-citizen for defamation of character. The lawyer said he, fiercely, "has robbed me of my character? Get him behind the bar, and I will, well, I'll—I'll—I'll—I'll get him behind the bar, I will, Thou art, oh glutton! all to me, and I A very type of true delight. Virginia's shore no treasure owns, Nor Spain, with all her golden mines, To equal thee, oh oyster mine! As thou appearest in the pot, The daring wight whose lucky lip Thy luscious flavor shall first sip, Deserves from us a tribute rare Of admiring thee to fast and air.

A SALOON-KEEPER of questionable honesty went to a lawyer to consult him about commencing an action against a fellow-citizen for defamation of character. The lawyer said he, fiercely, "has robbed me of my character? Get him behind the bar, and I will, well, I'll—I'll—I'll—I'll get him behind the bar, I will, Then, my, oh glutton! all to me, and I A very type of true delight. Virginia's shore no treasure owns, Nor Spain, with all her golden mines, To equal thee, oh oyster mine! As thou appearest in the pot, The daring wight whose lucky lip Thy luscious flavor shall first sip, Deserves from us a tribute rare Of admiring thee to fast and air.

Jennie Williams had been doing something which her mamma had told her she mustn't do. She had been eating cucumbers, and, of course, got the cramp. At length she exclaimed: "Oh! the way she got found out. Mrs. Williams said, 'Jennie, do you know you were forbidden to eat cucumbers?' "But, mother, Satan tempted me!" "Why, child," said Mrs. Williams, "how could Satan get into the cucumber-bed?" "I did say, 'Get thee behind me, Satan,' and he went behind me, and pushed me into the cucumber-bed!"

An anatomical observer asserted a few days since that there are 480,281 feathers on the wings of a buzzard. "I don't believe it," said a bystander. "Then count them for yourself," was the reply.

A gentleman who was very zealous on the subject of temperance was endeavoring to persuade a friend to share at auction, and rode her home. "Well, Cæsar," said he to his servant, "you have been to the funeral of her? She rest me five hundred dollars." "Dunno, master." "Don't know what it was?" "No, Well, master, it makes me think of what the preacher said yesterday—sometimes the corpse of the money is soon parted." I discommender the fast part!"

THE other day Molecule propounded the following to Atom: "A boy of fifteen remonstrated to his father and mother have a daughter, but she is not my sister. Who is she?" Atom, after thinking for some reflected, but all in vain. To his every suggestion Molecule replied, "No, that is not right." Atom gave it up, and said he was beyond his depth. "Why, Atom, enough," said Molecule, with an exasperating smile; "she has!"

A MAN, being awakened by the captain of a passenger boat with the announcement that he must not occupy his berth with his boots on, angrily replied, "Oh, it won't hurt 'em: they're an old pair."

MANIA FOR THE SALOON SEASON.—Two hands are better than one.

The dealers of a house on West Lake Street, in Chicago, advertises "a hosiery for sale," which doubtless means that it is willing to dispose of its stocking.

"How is your wife to-day?" said a friend to a French gentleman. "Oh, mocke de ern," said he; "she is better, and I has found her a new doctor." "I am glad to do, I wish she would do it soon. I feel so anxious to have her well." "Oh, she is well. Yes she is. I shall not be so mocke dissatisfied."

A GENTLEMAN who was told that nothing could cure him but a quart of cattle tea, said, "Then I must die," said he, "for I don't like cattle tea."

"Walter, I'll take my hat," said a gentleman at a ball one evening, to he was going home. "What kind is it, sir?" "Why, it's a high hat." "Then you had better wait a little while." "Why, sir?" "Why, sir, because it is going to rain, and the water will run into the crown and spoil your hat."

THE UNITED PACIFIC—A quiet marriage.

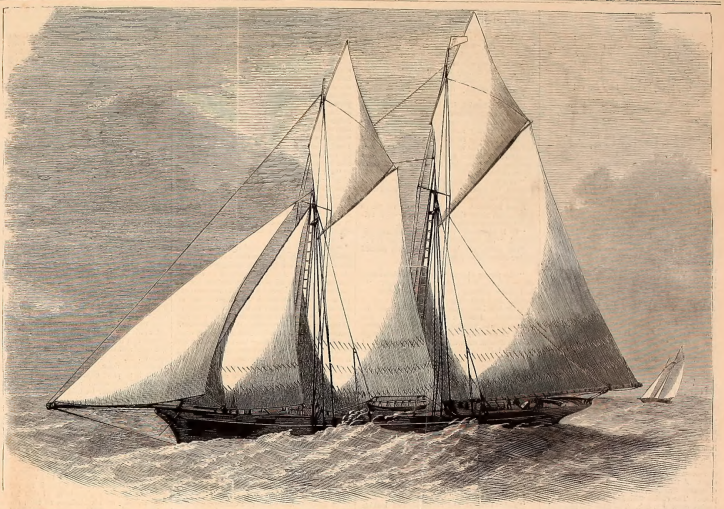
A Pennsylvania editor rejects an advertisement sent him by an Indiana lawyer on the condition that he would publish it for a year, saying, however, that he does so because he is a Democrat, and the proposition is "scandalously premature."

WHAT is stronger in death than life?—An old yellowlegged hen.

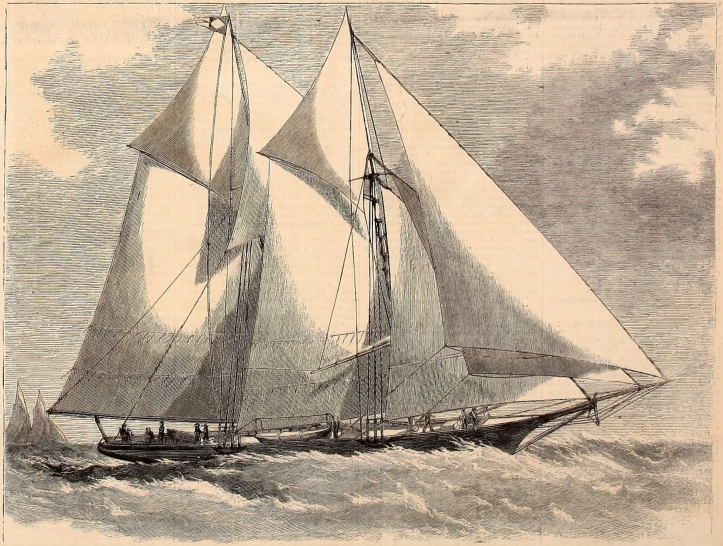
IN a little town out West a lady teacher was exercising a class of juveniles in mental arithmetic. She asked a bright-eyed boy, thus: "If you have ten dollars—" when up came a little hand. "What is it, Johnny?" "Please, ma'am," the boy said, "if you've ten dollars, father said one for sixty dollars the other day, and she was a regular old scrub at that."

KING DEATH'S DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES.

BACCHUS TAKES THE FIRST PREMIUM.



THE ENGLISH YACHT "CAMBRIA."



THE AMERICAN YACHT "SAPPHO."—[From a Sketch by C. R. Parsons.]

THE INTERNATIONAL YACHT RACE.—[See Page 350.]

DAISIES.

All the little children know
That the daisies are their own:
Why should daisies ever grow
That to children are unknown?
Oh, how sorry they must be,
Living without purpose thus:
Daisies no children see,
Oh, how you must long for us!

Running through the pleasant grass,
When the summer scents are sweet,
Touching daisies as we pass
With our happy little feet.
Some may grow upon the brink,
Some in hidden crevice fix;
Let no daisy-blossom think
That we have neglected it!

We must be so kind and wise
To these daisies of our own,
Giving sensible replies
When they make their wishes known.
Butter-cups belong to all,
So do other pretty flowers,
But the daisies are so small
That they can be only ours.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.)

MAN AND WIFE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS,
Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," "The Moonstone," etc., etc.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

TWELFTH SCENE.—DEURY LANE.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-FIRST.

THE LETTER AND THE LAW.

The many-toned murmur of the current of London life—flowing through the murky channel of Drury Lane—found its rumbled way from the front room to the back. Piles of old music hampered the dusty floor. Stage masks and weapons, and portraits of singers and dancers, hung round the walls. An empty violin case in one corner, a broken bust of Rossini in another. A fruitless print, representing the Trial of Queen Caroline, was pasted over the fireplace. The chairs were genuine specimens of ancient carving in oak. The table was an equally excellent example of dirty neglect. A small morsel of druggist was on the floor; and a large sheet of music was on the ceiling. The scene thus presented, revealed itself in the back drawing-room of a house in Drury Lane, devoted to the transaction of musical and theatrical business of the humbler sort. It was late in the afternoon, on Midsummer-day. Two persons were seated together in the room: they were Anne Silvester and Sir Patrick Lundie.

The opening conversation between them—comprising, on one side, the narrative of what had happened at Perth and at Swanhaven; and on the other, a statement of the circumstances attending the separation of Arnold and Blanche—had reached its end. It rested with Sir Patrick to lead the way to the next topic. He looked at his companion, and hesitated.

"Do you feel strong enough to go on?" he asked. "If you would prefer to rest a little, pray say so."

"Thank you, Sir Patrick. I am more than ready. I am eager, to go on. No words can say how anxious I feel to be of some use to you, if I can. It rests entirely with your experience to show me how."

"I can only do that, Miss Silvester, by asking you without ceremony for all the information that I want. And you say object to traveling to London, which you have not mentioned to me yet? I mean, of course, any object with which I have a claim (as Arnold Brinkworth's representative) to be acquainted?"

"I had no object, Sir Patrick. And I have failed to accomplish it."

"May I ask what it was?"

"It was to see Geoffrey Delamayn."

Sir Patrick started. "You have attempted to see him? When?"

"This morning."

"Why, you only arrived in London last night!"

"I only arrived," said Anne, after waiting many days on the journey. I was obliged to rest at Edinburgh, and again at York—and I was afraid I had seen Mrs. Glenarm soon enough to get to Geoffrey Delamayn before me."

"Afraid?" repeated Sir Patrick. "I understood that you had no serious intention of disputing the scoundrel with Mrs. Glenarm. What motive could possibly have taken you to see him?"

"The same motive which took me to Swanhaven."

"What! the idea that it rested with Delamayn to set things right? and that you might bribe him to it by consenting to release him, so far as your claims were concerned?"

"Bear with my folly, Sir Patrick, as patiently as you can. I was always slow now; and I got into a habit of brooding over things. I have been brooding over the position in which my misfortunes have placed Mr. Brinkworth. I have been obstinate—unreasonably obstinate—in believing that I could prevail with Geoffrey Delamayn, after I had failed with Mrs. Glenarm. I am an obstinate about it still. As you would not have heard me, my madness in going to Fulham might have had its excuse." She sighed bitterly, and said no more.

Sir Patrick took her hand.

"It has its excuse," he said, kindly. "Your motive is beyond reproach. Let me add—to quiet your mind—that, even if Delamayn had been willing to hear you, and had accepted the condition, the result would still have been the same. You are quite wrong in supposing that he has only to speak, and to set this matter right. It has passed entirely beyond his control. The incident that arose when Arnold Brinkworth spent those unlucky hours with you at Craig Fernie"—

"Oh, Sir Patrick, if I had only known that before I went to Fulham this morning!"

She shuddered as she said the words. Some thing was plainly associated with her visit to Geoffrey, that bore tremendously on her shaken nerves. What was it? Sir Patrick resolved to obtain an answer to that question, before he ventured on proceeding further with the main object of the interview.

"You have told me your reason for going to Fulham," he said. "But I have not heard what happened there yet."

"Nothing," she said. "Is it necessary for me to trouble you about that?" she asked—with evident reluctance to enter on the subject.

"It is absolutely necessary," answered Sir Patrick, "because Delamayn is concerned in it. Any concealment, any hesitation, and entered on her narrative in three words.

